THREE CENTURIES OF AMERICAN POLICIAND PROSE REVISED Edition NEWCOMER-ANDREWS-HAIR

THREE CENTURIES OF AMERICAN POETRY AND PROSE

REVISED EDITION

BY

ALPHONSO GERALD NEWCOMER
LATE PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH, STANFORD UNIVERSITY

ALICE E. ANDREWS FORMERLY TEACHER OF ENGLISH, JOHNSON HIGH SCHOOL, ST. PAUL

HOWARD JUDSON HALL PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH, STANFORD UNIVERSITY

COPYRIGHT 1917, 1929
BY SCOTT, FORESMAN AND COMPANY
2910.1

PREFACE

The fact that Twelve Centuries of English Poetry and Prose supplied a real need in schools and colleges prompted the editors to compile the present companion volume of American literature. It may be granted that the ideal method of studying literature is through reading authors from complete editions: the mere thumbing through of the author's whole work gives the student a valuable perspective of the particular part he is reading. But every teacher knows that except with the extraordinary coincidence of very small classes and very large libraries that ideal is unattainable. Even in our larger colleges and universities where, if anywhere, the ideal conditions might be found. books of selections representing periods of literary development are being used more and more for general courses in the history of literature, either as the basis of the student's reading or to supplement his reading in the library. widening scope of the study of literature in kind and form makes necessary a compilation that will represent adequately both the greater authors of an epoch and also those minor authors whose work shows secondary but significant tendencies of their time. All this is the result of that view which takes literature to be not a thing apart from life, but an expression of all life, and would make its study a segment of the ever widening circle of human interests. It may be remarked in passing that the selections of the present book may be used as a valuable supplement in the direct study of American history and society.

In poetry the aim of the editors has been to place between the covers of a single volume the greater part of what will remain permanent in American poetry from its beginnings down to the end of the first great productive period in American literature. The chief poets are represented by selections intended to include much (in some cases all) of enduring worth in their work, and also to show their variety, versatility, and range. To other poets we have tried to accord space according to their importance; and a few appear whose work, though in itself of minor worth, reflects some broad phase of American life that should not be left out of account.

In prose the choice has naturally been more difficult than in poetry. Whenever possible we have used wholes; when this was not possible we have made selections that would show the author's purpose in the whole, and have above all tried to avoid the scrappiness and ineffectiveness of mere fragments. Of fiction it is impossible to represent in a single volume of this kind more than the necessary minimum. In the case of Irving and Hawthorne we have omitted some of the selections easily found in cheap editions, for the sake of others not so common and yet notable in themselves.

The editors have thought it best to give considerable space to colonial writers and thus make the book useful in schools where students do not have access to large libraries, and where colonial authors before Franklin are not to be found. It is safe to say that few high schools have Mather, or Byrd, or Ward, or Sewall. In fact there are colleges and universities of respectable standing that do not afford their students access to these men. We have therefore included from such authors somewhat more proportionately than their artistic worth merits. Our object has been to give young people a chance to know with some degree of adequateness a period of national life that was the seedtime of national ideals. The editors firmly believe that to begin the study of American literature with Franklin is to miss some of the most interesting chapters of American life, interesting not only to mature minds able at once to see their significance in relation to the whole, but fascinating to young people to whom they are a discovery. In working over this literature at a time when the nation is conscious of its inner life as never before; when it is rising to justify that life before the world, we have come to feel more and more strongly that the best of the nineteenth century American literature is no weakling offshoot of English literature. draws its life-currents from the American spirit of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Emerson and Hawthorne are not to be accounted for fundamentally by the awakening in the Old World. They profited, it is true, by the genial culture of Europe current in their day; but their spiritual foundation was generations deep in American soil. We hope that these selections will show the unity and continuity of our national spirit as well as its vast changes.

In selecting the material from this early period one primary aim has been to choose what would arouse the student's natural interest. We have chosen units that will tell how the colonists came here, what they came for, of their fights with the Indians, their travails in the founding of a new civil community, of their social life and ideals, and of how at length they became aware of their artistic isolation and began to cultivate grace of expression. social record these old books need no apology. Young people can scarcely fail to note the difference between the society of Boston as seen in the diary of Sewall, and that of Virginia as the Westover papers show it, nor will they be likely to miss the contrast between the crabbed Puritanism of Ward and the expansive spirit of Williams that was destined to overcome it. We have generally avoided including anything merely because it was an attempt at art. To force upon young students as literature what our Puritan forbears put forward as such is too much like compelling them to admire as pictorial art the illustrations of the New England Primer. In the comparative and at times total absence of the aesthetic, we have frankly put before students pictures of social life, trusting that teachers will give them their proper perspective.

For the literature included under the heading From the Revolution to the Civil War, no excuse that it represents the life of an important people in the making is needed. Too long has the tone of the academic expounder of American literature been modeled, unconsciously enough perhaps, on the critical formula provided by Hazlitt in speaking of Irving:

"He [Irving] gives us very good copies of our British essayists and novelists, which may be very well on the other side of the water, or as proof of the capabilities of the national genius, but which might be dispensed with here, where we have to boast of the originals."

American literature, beginning with Irving, is not the product of immaturity, amateurism, and imitation; it has, as an acute American critic (Mr. James Lane Allen) has pointed out, something of the delicacy of outline and clarity of tone that mark French literature; if the possession of aesthetic sense be denied to Anne Bradstreet, it must be admitted in Poe; if our voice is crabbedly provincial and harsh in Wigglesworth it is far-reaching and resonant in Emerson; if Charles Brockden Brown is experimental. Hawthorne is finely sure in touch. And even though American literature follows. as Mr. Allen believes, the feminine rather than the masculine model, even if, as compared with the strong and inclusive virility of English letters, it seems somewhat thin, there are com-Cooper, Mark pensations and exceptions. Twain, and Whitman are no drawing-room products; and a type of insight and envisagement of life peculiarly our own seems to emerge from the collective American writings of the nineteenth century. Lest this be thought literary chauvinism, let it be admitted that American letters lack the scope, the broadly settled solidity of English letters, the penetrating white light of French letters. Still, no need to say "a poor thing but mine own." Kipling's An American is rather an identification than an indictment, no matter what its author intended. And it may be noted that our literature, for all "the cynic devil in its blood" has held singularly true to respect for the careful workmanship that if long continued means artistic mastery, and to a veracious presentment of things as they have been-not as one would have wished them to be. Whatever qualifications the cautious critic may wish to urge, it remains true that the American literature of the National Period is independent and important.

The order in which authors appear is in general chronological, in respect to the decade or generation of their greatest influence, or that with which they are most naturally connected. It has seemed best, however, to place the orators and historians as much as possible in groups by themselves, and also to group writers to some extent geographically, as in the case of the southern authors. The individual productions of an author, we have tried to place in the order of writing, feeling that this sequence will be of most interest to the student. Where, however, as in the case of the Dante sonnets of Longfellow, and in the case of authors who wrote both poetry and prose, it has seemed best to violate this order, we have done so.

As far as possible we have attempted to give in italics following each selection the date of writing, and in ordinary numerals the date of publication. In many cases one or both of these dates will fail to appear, though we have used every means at our disposal to find them. We believe that the order is, however, substantially correct.

As in Twelve Centuries of English Poetry and Prose, we have placed the notes where they are most accessible, at the bottom of the page, believing that there is no particular virtue, per se, in the hiding of the notes or the search for them, and in thus adding to the temptation not to refer to them at all. We have not attempted to make the notes take the place of the dictionary: but where a word though familiar has an unusual sense, or where even with a dictionary the student might stumble, we have tried to supply the correct gloss. In all cases we have attempted to furnish the student with the condensed and pertinent information necessary to make the text intelligible, and by cross references to coördinate all material in the book. The biographical paragraphs preceding each author's work give only the facts of his life most needed in a study of his work.

PREFACE V

In such a book as this, the form that a reprint should take is always a moot question. The old forms are a real bar to the ready apprehension of the thought. On the other hand, emendation and modernizing take from the text the evidence of the lingering medieval that was a real characteristic of the first generation of American life, north and south. We have deemed it best to modernize commonly, but to give a touch of the archaic by retaining the original spelling and punctuation in the selections from Smith, Strachey, Bradford, Mrs. Knight, and Nathaniel Ward. Even in these selections it did not seem best to reproduce such peculiarities of type as the long s's or the abbreviations so fantastic to modern eyes, and so misleading to the inexperienced reader.

In the labor of preparing this book we have had aid from many sources. First of all we would thank Professor Lindsay Todd Damon of Brown University, who as supervising editor has been of invaluable assistance. His criticism and suggestions regarding both subjectmatter and notes have been an asset not easily estimated. We would also thank colleagues and friends having access to special information useful in preparing the notes. We would especially thank Mr. Gerould, Librarian of the University of Minnesota; Dr. Solon J. Buck and Miss Jett of the Minnesota State Historical Society; Dr. Dawson Johnston, Mrs. Beals, and Miss Owens of the St. Paul Public Library; Miss Davis of the reference department of the Minneapolis Public Library; Mr. William C. Lane of the Harvard University Library; Mr. W. N. T. Carlton of the Newberry Library. We are indebted to Professor Firkins of the University of Minnesota for his kindness in furnishing the note on page 395; and to other friends who by suggestions and criticisms have aided in the work.

We gratefully acknowledge our indebtedness to the Houghton Mifflin Company for permission to use from Whittier's works "In School-Days," "My Triumph," "John Underhill," "Conductor Bradley," "A Sea Dream," "Sunset on the Bearcamp," "The Trailing Arbutus," "The Lost Occasion," and "The King's Missive"; from Longfellow's poems. "Mezzo Cammin"; from Jones Very's poems "The Soldier." "The Dead," "The War," "The Wild Rose of Plymouth"; from the poems of Oliver Wendell Holmes "Dorothy O." and "How the Old Horse Won the Bet"; from the works of James Russell Lowell, "After the Burial," "In a Copy of Omar Khayyàm," and "Franciscus de Verula-mio Sic Cogitavit"; to the Messrs. B. F. Johnson Publishing Company for permission to print from the poems of Henry Timrod, "I Know Not Why, but All This Weary Day," "Most Men Know Love but as a Part of Life." "Charleston," "Spring," "The Cotton Boll," and "Magnolia Cemetery": to the Messrs. P. J. Kenedy and Sons for permission to print from the poems of Abram J. Ryan, "The Conquered Banner"; to the Messrs. Lothrop. Lee and Shepard Company for permission to use from the poems of Paul Hamilton Hayne, "Shelley," "Ode to Sleep," "The Mocking-Birds," "Vicksburg," "Aspects of the Pines," "The Rose and Thorn," "The Pine's Mystery," "A Little While I Fain Would Linger Yet," and "In Harbor"; to the Messrs. Little, Brown and Company for permission to use Charles Sumner's "The True Grandeur of Nations," Margaret Junkin Preston's "The Shade of the Trees," Helen Hunt Jackson's poems "Spinning," "October," and "Coronation," and all the poems printed from Emily Dickinson; to Mrs. Janey Hope Marr of Norfolk, Virginia, for permission to print from the poems of her father James Barron Hope, "Our Anglo-Saxon Tongue," "Dreamers," and "Under One Blanket"; to Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons for permission to print the latest edition of all of Lanier's poems included in this book; to Mr. Horace Traubel for permission to print the poems of Walt Whitman here included.

The present volume was planned and some preliminary work done on it by the authors of Twelve Centuries of English Poetry and Prose before the lamented death of Professor Newcomer in 1913. The authorship as it appears on the title page was subsequently agreed upon.

August, 1917

PREFACE TO THE REVISED EDITION

The selections used in the first edition of this volume included nothing written after 1886. Since that date American literature has vastly expanded. In the twelve years since the first edition was published, and especially in these years following the World War, the interest in our own literature has increased in proportion as the writings themselves have gained in scope and intensity. No consideration of our literature can ignore this recent development; and the appeal of contemporary American poetry and prose, especially to young people, is so strong as to rekindle an interest in the past record.

In making the revision it was necessary to consider the size of the book for practical classroom purposes. For this reason selections that could best be spared from the old edition were abandoned, and the space thus gained was devoted in the revision to authors of today. The result is that the volume has not been increased unreasonably in size, though nearly one fourth of its material is new. The present volume is therefore of much greater variety than the first and, it is hoped, of correspondingly greater interest. The division of the book into epochs aims to be simple and practical, and is based upon what the student is supposed already to know of American political and social life through American history, and not upon movements seen by literary critics and named in terms beyond the young student's understanding.

In choosing the authors and their writings to fill in the gaps in the old edition between the Civil War and 1886 and to represent the literary development up to the present year the editors have faced a complex task. They cannot have succeeded to the satisfaction of all users of the book even in an element so apparently simple as finding material to represent adequately the literature of the South, East, and West. In choosing selections they have adhered as firmly as they could to their original principle of using wholes rather than extracts, a principle that has shut out some authors from whom no valuable unit short enough to be included might be chosen. Some material, moreover, otherwise excellent had to be rejected because it seemed unfitting for class-room use. From first to last the editors have kept their readers in mind, and without lowering their standards have made, wherever possible, concessions to the tastes of youth.

Instructors who have used the old volume will notice that the headnotes have been considerably expanded in the new volume to include bibliographical material and a few critical hints. These hints are intended to "place" the author in the student's mind; to give the student a starting-point from which he may intelligently read the author's work. They are in no sense to be taken as final critical estimates. In the bibliographical notes and the general bibliography at the end of the volume especial attention has been paid to citing books and articles reflecting recent, but sound, criticism. The assembling of this material and its preparation has been a time-consuming and painstaking The editors are especially grateful for the assistance of Dr. Nesta Mary Thompson of La Jolla, and Barbara Merrihew Perkins of Stanford University, California; they also acknowledge the many courtesies extended by George Thomas Clark and Nathan Van Patten, Director Emeritus and Director, respectively, of the Stanford University Libraries.

Copyrights are so jealously guarded by certain publishers that it has been impossible to represent two authors who would otherwise have been included. It was also impossible to print certain pieces of authors here represented; but the editors have spared neither pains nor expense in securing material they wished to include and they have succeeded beyond their first expectations. They therefore gratefully acknowledge the courtesy and coöperation of the great majority of publishers in granting the use of material.

The editors are indebted to the kindness of the following authors or their representatives who have given their express permission for the use of material in this volume:

To Franklin Pierce Adams for "Erring in Company" from Tobogganing on Parnassus, and "De Senectute" from So There!

PREFACE

To William Rose Benét for Elinor Wylie's "Atavism" from Nets to Catch the Wind, and "Castilian" from Black Armour.

To Julian Burroughs for selections from My Boyhood and Youth by John Burroughs.

To Witter Bynner for "A Fortune-Teller" and "Train-Mates" from Grenstone Poems, and "Roofs" from The Beloved Stranger.

To Nathalia Crane for "The Flathouse Roof" from The Janitor's Boy, and "The Poe Cottage" from Venus Invisible and Other Poems

To Theodosia Garrison Faulks for "Stains" and "April" from The Joy of Life, and "The Dreamer" from The Dreamer and Other Poems.

To Mary E. Wilkins Freeman for "In Butterfly Time" from A Humble Romance.

To Robert Frost for "Mending Wall" and "The Death of the Hired Man" from North of Boston, and "Storm Fear" from Selected Poems, and "Not to Keep" from New Hampshire.

To Arthur Guiterman for "Afternoon Tea" from The Mirthful Lyre, and "Strictly Germ-Proof" from The Laughing Muse.

To Du Bose Heyward for "The Mountain Woman" from Skylines and Horizons, and "Prodigal," "Dusk in the Low Country," and "The Half Pint Flask" published in The Bookman.

To Vachel Lindsay for "Abraham Lincoln Walks at Midnight" from Collected Poems, and "These Are the Young" and "The Angel Sons" from Going-to-the Stars.

To William McFee for "The Market" from Harbours of Memory.

To Edwin Markham for "The Man with the Hoe" and "Lincoln the Man of the People" from Collected Poems (in preparation).

To Edgar Lee Masters for "Anne Rutledge" from Spoon River Anthology, for "Henry Zoll, the Miller," "Benjamin Franklin Hazard," and "Henry Cogdal" from The New Spoon River, and for "Clipper Ships."

To Christopher Morley for "On Unanswering Letters" and "What Men Live By" from Mince Pie, "To the Little House" from Songs for a Little House, and "Nursery Rhymes for the Tender-Hearted" from Hide and Seek.

To Lizette Woodward Reese for "Tears" and "Old Saul" from Selected Poems, and "The Lark" from A Wayside Lute.

To Edwin Arlington Robinson for "Reuben Bright" and "The House on the Hill" from The Children of the Night, "Miniver Cheevy" from The Town Down the River, and "Stafford's Cabin" from Collected Poems.

To Robert Haven Schauffler for "Scum o' the Earth" from Scum o' the Earth and Other Poems, "Helen of Laughing Ledge," "God's-Eye View," and "Trash" from Hobnails in Eden.

To Charles L. Seeger for Alan Seeger's "I Have a Rendezvous with Death" from Poems.

To Sara Teasdale for "Blue Squills," "August Moonrise," "On the Dunes," and "The Unseen" from Flame and Shadow, and "A Star Map," published in The Bookman.

To Henry van Dyke for "The Three Best Things" from Collected Poems.

To Owen Wister for Padre Ignacio.

The editors are further indebted to the following publishers for the use of copyright material as listed:

To D. Appleton and Company for "How Mr. Rabbit Was Too Sharp for Mr. Fox" and "Why Mr. Possum Loves Peace" from Uncle Remus: His Songs and Sayings, by Joel Chandler Harris; and for "These Are the Young" and "The Angel Sons" from Going-to-the Stars, by Vachel Lindsay.

To Albert and Charles Boni, Inc., for "The Flathouse Roof" from The Janitor's Boy, by Nathalia Crane.

To Boni, Liveright and Company for their concurrence in permission to use "Henry Zoll, the Miller," "Benjamin Franklin Hazard," and "Henry Cogdal," from The New Spoon River, by Edgar Lee Masters.

To The Bookman for "Dusk in the Low Country," "Prodigal," and "The Half Pint Flask," by Du Bose Heyward; and for "A Star Map," by Sara Teasdale.

To Brandt and Brandt for "God's World" from Renascence and "Travel" and "Journey" from Second April, by Edna St. Vincent Millay.

To The Century Company for "A Wind-Storm in the Forests" from The Mountains of California, by John Muir; and for selections from Ranch Life and the Hunting Trail, by Theodore Roosevelt.

To Coward McCann, Inc., for "The Poe Cottage" from Venus Invisible, by Nathalia Crane.

To Dodd, Mead and Company for "A Vagabond Song" from More Songs from Vagabondia, "Moment Musicale" from Echoes from Vagabondia, and "The Joys of the Road" from Songs from Vagabondia, by Bliss Carman; and for "The Sea Gypsy" from More Songs from Vagabondia, and "The Wander-Lovers" from Songs from Vagabondia, by Richard Hovey.

To George H. Doran for "Tears" and "Old Saul" from Selected Poems, by Lizette Woodworth Reese; and for "Trees" from Trees and Other Poems, by Joyce Kilmer.

ILLUSTRATIONS

| Washington Irving        | page | 1   |
|--------------------------|------|-----|
| William Cullen Bryant    | page | 248 |
| Edgar Allan Poe          | page | 320 |
| Walt Whitmanfacing       | page | 678 |
| Edwin Arlington Robinson | page | 807 |

CONTENTS

| THE COLONIAL PERIOD                    |    | Samuel Sewall (1652-1730)              | 5   |
|--|----|--|-----|
| Introduction                           | 1  | From his Diary                         | 5   |
| John Smith (1580-1631)                 | 1  | WILLIAM BYRD (1674-1744)               | 6   |
| From A True Relation                   | 2  | From History of the Dividing Line      | 6   |
| From The General History of Virginia   | 3  | From A Progress to the Mines in the    |     |
| WILLIAM STRACHEY                       | 7  | Year 1732                              | 6.  |
| From A True Reportory                  | •  | Jonathan Edwards (1703-1758)           | 7:  |
| A Most Dreadful Tempest of             |    | The Flying Spider                      | 7:  |
| Those Ilands                           | 7  | From A Bit of Autobiography            | 73  |
| Actions and Occurrents in the          | •  | From Sinners in the Hands of an Angry  |     |
| Ilands                                 | 9  | God                                    | 73  |
| WILLIAM BRADFORD (1590-1657)           | 9  | JOHN WOOLMAN (1720-1772)               | 7   |
| From Of Plimoth Plantation             |    | From A Journal of John Woolman         |     |
| Of their Vioage Cape Codd              | 10 | [His Youth]                            | 78  |
| Showing How They Sought                |    | From Chapter IV                        | 79  |
| What Befell Them There-                |    | [A Visit to the Indians]               | 80  |
| aboute                                 | 11 | [Voyage to England]                    | 84  |
| John Winthrop (1588-1649)              | 12 | [An Experience During Sickness]        | 86  |
| From A History of New England          | 13 | [Cleanliness]                          | 87  |
| The Bay Psalm Book                     | 18 | Benjamin Franklin (1706-1790)          | 87  |
| Psalm 24                               | 18 | From his Autobiography                 | 88  |
| Psalm 121                              | 19 | The Way to Wealth                      | 108 |
| NATHANIEL WARD (1578-1652)             | 19 | Dialogue Between Franklin and the Gout | 112 |
| From The Simple Cobler of Aggavvamm    | 20 | HECTOR ST. JOHN DE CRÈVECOEUR (1735-   |     |
| The New England Primer                 | 23 | 1812)                                  | 114 |
| ROGER WILLIAMS (1605-1683)             | 25 | From Letters from an American Farmer   | 115 |
| From The Bloody Tenet of Persecution   | 25 | From Sketches of Eighteenth Century    |     |
| Anne Bradstreet (1612-1672)            | 27 | America                                | 116 |
| From The Four Seasons of The Year      |    | THOMAS GODFREY (1736-1765)             | 118 |
| (Spring)                               | 28 | The Invitation                         | 118 |
| "As Weary Pilgrim"                     | 29 | A Dithyrambic on Wine                  | 119 |
| MICHAEL WIGGLESWORTH (1631-1705)       | 29 | PHILLIS WHEATLEY (c. 1754-1784)        | 120 |
| From The Day of Doom                   | 29 | To The Right Honorable William         | 120 |
| BENJAMIN TOMPSON (1642-1714)           | 34 | His Excellency General Washington      | 120 |
| New-Englands Crisis                    | 34 | Timothy Dwight (1752-1817)             | 121 |
| On A Fortification                     | 35 | Columbia                               | 121 |
| BENJAMIN CHURCH (1639-1717)            | 35 | From The Triumph of Infidelity         | 122 |
| From Entertaining Passages Relating to |    | Love To The Church                     | 123 |
| Philip's War                           | 35 | John Trumbull (1750-1831)              | 123 |
|  |    | From M'Fingal                          |     |
| THE PROVINCIAL PERIOD                  |    | The Town-Meeting A.M                   | 123 |
| Introduction                           | 39 | The Town-Meeting P.M                   | 125 |
| COTTON MATHER (1663-1728)              | 39 | The Liberty Pole                       | 126 |
| From Magnalia Christi Americana        |    | JOEL BARLOW (1755-1812)                | 132 |
| [Sir William Phips]                    | 40 | The Hasty Pudding                      | 132 |
| [Witchcraft]                           | 45 | Anonymous                              |     |
| From The Diary of Cotion Mather        | 46 | Hale In The Bush                       | 136 |
| SARAH KEMBLE KNIGHT (1666-1727)        | 48 | Francis Hopkinson (1737-1791)          | 137 |
| From Her Private Journal               | 49 | The Battle of the Kegs                 | 137 |
|  |    |  |     |

xii CONTENTS

| PATRICK HENRY (1736-1799)               | 138        | Song of Marion's Men                    | 255        |
|---|------------|---|------------|
| Speech in the Virginia Convention, 1775 | 138        | The Prairies                            | 255        |
| THOMAS PAINE (1737-1809)                | 140        | The Battle-Field                        | 257        |
| From Common Sense                       | 140        | Robert of Lincoln                       | 257        |
|   |            | Waiting by the Gate                     | 258        |
| FROM THE REVOLUTION TO THE              |            | Joseph Rodman Drake (1796-1820)         | 259        |
| CIVIL WAR                               |            | The American Flag                       | 259        |
| Introduction                            | 145        | The Culprit Fay                         | 260        |
| George Washington (1732-1799)           | 146        | FITZ-GREENE HALLECK (1790-1867)         | 266        |
| To The President of Congress (Valley    |            | On the Death of Joseph Rodman Drake     | 267        |
| Forge)                                  | 146        | Burns                                   | 267        |
| Farewell Address                        | 149        | Marco Bozzaris                          | 260        |
| THOMAS JEFFERSON (17-43-1826)           | 156        | NATHANIEL PARKER WILLIS (1806-1867)     | 270        |
| From his Autobiography                  |            | Unseen Spirits                          | 270        |
| [Congress Under the Confederation]      | 157        | Pencilings by the Way                   | 270        |
| [The French Revolution]                 | 157        | JOHN HOWARD PAYNE (1792-1852)           | 272        |
| First Inaugural Address                 | 160        | Home, Sweet Home                        | 272        |
| PHILIP FRENEAU (1752-1832)              | 162        | GEORGE POPE MORRIS (1802-1864)          | 273        |
| From The House of Night                 | 162        | Woodman, Spare That Tree!               | 273        |
| To The Memory of The Brave Americans    | 166        | FRANCIS SCOTT KEY (1779-1843)           | 273        |
| Stanzas                                 | 167        | The Star-Spangled Banner                | 273        |
| The Wild Honeysuckle                    | 167        |   |            |
| The Indian Burying Ground               | 167        | Southern Lyrics                         |            |
| The Parting Glass                       | 168        | RICHARD HENRY WILDE (1789-1872)         | 27-        |
| On a Honey Bee                          | 168        | "My Life Is Like the Summer Rose"       | 27-        |
| To a Caty-Did                           | 169        | To the Mocking-Bird                     | 27-        |
| JOSEPH HOPKINSON (1770-1842)            | 170        | Edward Coate Pinkney (1802-1828)        | 274        |
| Hail Columbia                           | 170        | A Health                                | 27-        |
| CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN (1771-1810)      | 170        | Samuel Henry Dickson (1798-1872)        | 275        |
| From Wieland                            | 171        | "I Sigh for the Land of the Cypress and |            |
| Washington Irving (1783-1859)           | 177        | Pine"                                   | 275        |
| From A History of New York              | 178        |   |            |
| From The Sketch-Book                    |            |   |            |
| The Author's Account of Himself         | 186        | WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS (1806-1870)       | 275        |
| Rip Van Winkle                          | 188        | The Swamp Fox                           | 276        |
| Christmas Eve                           | 196        | The Yemassee                            | 277        |
| From The Alhambra                       |            | EDGAR ALLAN POE (1809-1849)             | 283        |
| From Palace of the Alhambra             | 201        | To Helen                                | 283        |
| From The Hall of Ambassadors            | 204        | Israfel                                 | 284        |
| The Mysterious Chambers                 | 205        | The City in the Sea                     | 284        |
| Legend of The Moor's Legacy             | 207        | The Collinson                           | 285        |
| Spanish Romance                         | 215        | The Coliseum                            | 285286 |
| From The Pilot                          | 216217 | To Frances S. Osgood                    | 286        |
| From The Deerslayer                     | 228        | The Conqueror Worm                      | 286        |
| From The Prairie                        | 243        | The Raven                               | 287        |
| WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT (1794-1878)       | 243        | Ulalume                                 | 289        |
| Thanatopsis                             | 248        | The Bells                               | 290        |
| To a Waterfowl                          | 249        | Annabel Lee                             | 291        |
| Green River                             | 249        | Eldorado                                | 292        |
| Summer Wind                             | 250        | The Fall of the House of Usher          | 292        |
| The Death of the Flowers                | 250        | A Descent into the Maelstrom            | 301        |
| "O, Fairest of the Rural Maids"         | 251        | The Masque of the Red Death             | 308        |
| A Forest Hymn                           | 251        | The Purloined Letter                    | 311        |
| June                                    | 253        | The Cask of Amontillado                 | 320        |
| The Past                                | 253        | NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE (1804-1864)         | 323        |
| The Evening Wind                        | 254        | From Twice-Told Tales                   | .,         |
| To the Fringed Gentian                  | 254        | Dr. Heidegger's Experiment              | 323        |
|   |            |   |            |

CONTENTS xiii

| Lady Eleanore's Mantle                | 328   | Daniel Webster (1782-1852)                | 453 |
|---------------------------------------|-------|---|-----|
| From Mosses from an Old Manse         | 335   | The Constitution Not a Compact Be-        |     |
| From The Scarlet Letter               | 347   | tween Sovereign States                    | 454 |
| From The House of the Seven Gables    | 356   | CHARLES SUMNER (1811-1874)                | 462 |
| RALPH WALDO EMERSON (1803-1882)       | 362   | From The True Grandeur of Nations         | 462 |
| Self Reliance                         | 363   | Abraham Lincoln (1809-1865)               | 468 |
| Compensation                          | 375   | Farewell Address at Springfield, Illinois | 468 |
| The Rhodora                           | 384   | Address in Independence Hall              | 469 |
| Each and All                          | 384   | The Gettysburg Address                    | 469 |
| Hymn                                  | 385   | Letter to Mrs. Bixby                      | 470 |
| The Humblebee                         | 385   | The Second Inaugural Address              | 470 |
| The Problem                           | 385   | John Greenleaf Whittier (1807-1892)       | 471 |
| The Snow-Storm                        | 386   | Memories                                  | 471 |
| Compensation                          | 387   | Proem                                     | 472 |
| Forbearance                           | 387   | Barclay of Ury                            | 472 |
| To Rhea                               | 387   | The Angels of Buena Vista                 | 474 |
|                                       |       | The Poor Voter on Election Day            | 475 |
| Eros                                  | 388   |   | 476 |
| Experience                            | 388   | Ichabod                                   | 476 |
| Forerunners                           | 388   | Burns                                     |     |
| Fable                                 | 388   | Maud Muller                               | 477 |
| Mithridates                           | 388   | The Barefoot Boy                          | 479 |
| Astraea                               | 389   | Skipper Ireson's Ride                     | 480 |
| Give All to Love                      | 389   | Telling the Bees                          | 481 |
| Merlin                                | 390   | My Playmate                               | 482 |
| Threnody                              | 391   | Snow-Bound                                | 483 |
| Ode                                   | 394   | The Eternal Goodness                      | 490 |
| The Romany Girl                       | 394   | In School-Days                            | 491 |
| Brahma                                | 395   | My Triumph                                | 492 |
| Worship                               | 395   | John Underhill                            | 493 |
| Boston Hymn                           | 395   | Conductor Bradley                         | 494 |
| Voluntaries                           | 396   | A Sea Dream                               | 495 |
| Letters                               | 397   | Sunset on the Bearcamp                    | 496 |
| The Past                              | 398   | The Trailing Arbutus :                    | 497 |
| HENRY DAVID THOREAU (1817-1862)       | 398   | The Lost Occasion                         | 497 |
| From Walden                           | 398   | The King's Missive                        | 498 |
| Prayer                                | 411   | HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW (1807-1882)    | 500 |
| The Fisher's Boy                      | 411   | A Psalm of Life                           | 500 |
| Inspiration                           | 412   | The Reaper and the Flowers                | 501 |
| •                                     |       | The Wreck of the Hesperus                 | 501 |
| MINOR LYRIC POETS                     |       | The Village Blacksmith                    | 502 |
| SAMUEL WOODWORTH; RICHARD HENRY       |       | Hymn to the Night                         | 503 |
| Dana; William Henry Furness;          |       | The Skeleton in Armor                     | 503 |
| Samuel Francis Smith                  | 412   | Endymion                                  | 505 |
| The Bucket (Woodworth)                | 412   | Maidenhood                                | 505 |
| The Little Beach-Bird (Dana)          | 413   | Excelsior                                 | 506 |
| Evening Hymn (Furness)                | 413   | Mezzo Cammin                              | 507 |
| , ,                                   | 413   | The Arsenal at Springfield                | 507 |
| America (Smith)                       | 413   | The Bridge                                | 508 |
| W (1704 1870)                         | 44.4  | The Old Clock on the Stairs               | 508 |
| WILLIAM HICKLING PRESCOTT (1796-1859) | 414   |   | 509 |
| From History of the Conquest of       | 4 4 4 | The Arrow and the Song The Builders       | 509 |
| Mexico                                | 414   |   |     |
| JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY (1814-1877)       | 421   | Tegner's Drapa                            | 510 |
| From The Rise of the Dutch Repub-     |       | Evangeline                                | 511 |
| lic                                   | 421   | The Secret of the Sea                     | 523 |
| Francis Parkman (1823-1893)           | 432   | Sir Humphrey Gilbert                      | 524 |
| From The Conspiracy of Pontiac        | 432   | Resignation                               | 524 |
| John Caldwell Calhoun (1782-1850)     | 445   | King Witlaf's Drinking Horn               | 525 |
| Speech on the Force Bill              | 445   | The Building of the Ship                  | 526 |

xiv CONTENTS

| Children                             | 529        | Second Series (The Courtin')           | 602  |
|--------------------------------------|------------|--|------|
| The Ladder of St. Augustine          | 530        | The Washers of the Shroud              | 604  |
| The Warden of the Cinque Ports       | 531        | Ode Recited at the Harvard Commemo-    |      |
| The Song of Hiawatha                 | 531        | ration                                 | 605  |
| Victor Galbraith                     | 535        | After the Burial                       | 609  |
|                                      | 536        | In a Copy of Omar Khayyam              | 610  |
| My Lost Youth                        | 537        | Franciscus De Verulamio Sic Cogitavit  | 610  |
| The Discoverer of the North Cape     | 538        | Jones Very (1813-1880)                 | 611  |
| Sandalphon                           | 539        | The Soldier                            | 611  |
| The Children's Hour                  |            | The Dead                               | 611  |
| A Day of Sunshine                    | 539        | The War                                | 611  |
| From Tales of a Wayside Inn          | T 10       | The Wild Rose of Plymouth              | 611  |
| Prelude                              | 540        | RICHARD HENRY DANA, JR. (1815-1882)    | 612  |
| The Landlord's Tale                  | 543        | From Two Years Before the Mast         | 612  |
| The Sicilian's Tale                  | 545        | JULIA WARD Howe (1819-1910)            | 622  |
| Hawthorne                            | 547        |  | 622  |
| Flower-De-Luce                       | 548        | Battle Hymn of the Republic            | 623  |
| Killed at the Ford                   | 548        | EDWARD EVERETT HALE (1822-1909)        | 623  |
| Giotto's Tower                       | 548        | The Man Without a Country              |      |
| Dante                                | 549        | HERMAN MELVILLE (1819-1891)            |      |
| Divina Commedia                      | 549        | Typee                                  | 635  |
| OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES (1809-1894)    | 550        | BAYARD TAYLOR (1825-1878)              | 6-12 |
| Old Ironsides                        | 550        | From Views A-Foot                      | 642  |
| To an Insect                         | 551        | Bedouin Song                           | 645  |
| My Aunt                              | 551        | To the Nile                            | 640  |
| The Last Leaf                        | 552        | Ariel in the Cloven Pine               | 6-10 |
| A Song (Harvard Centennial, 1836)    | 552        | The Song of the Camp                   | 647  |
| On Lending a Punch-Bowl              | 553        | THOMAS BUCHANAN READ (1822-1872)       | 648  |
| Non-Resistance                       | 554        | Sheridan's Ride                        | 648  |
| The Old Man Dreams                   | 554        | George Henry Boker (1823-1890)         | 649  |
| The Two Armies                       | 555        | Dirge for a Soldier                    | 649  |
| The Deacon's Masterpiece             | 555        | RICHARD HENRY STODDARD (1825-1903)     | 640  |
| The Voiceless                        | 557        | Silent Songs                           | 640  |
| Boston Common—Three Pictures         | 557        | The Sea                                | 649  |
| The Boys                             | 558        | Out to Sea                             | 650  |
| International Ode                    | 558        | Birds                                  | 650  |
| To My Readers                        | 559        | The Sky                                | 650  |
| Dorothy Q                            | 559        | There Are Gains for All Our Losses     | 650  |
| How the Old Horse Won the Bet        | 560        | Adsum                                  | 650  |
| From The Autocrat of the Breakfast   |            | GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS (1824-1892)      | 651  |
| Table                                | 562        | From Prue and I                        |      |
| The Chambered Nautilus               | 565        | A Word to the Gentle Reader            | 651  |
| Contentment                          | 578        | Sea from Shore                         | 652  |
| My Last Walk with the Schoolmistress | 579        |  |      |
| JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL (1819-1891)     | 582        | SOUTHERN LYRICS OF THE CIVIL WAR       |      |
| Rhoecus                              | 582        | ALBERT PIKE; THEODORE O'HARA; MARGARET |      |
| A Contrast                           | 584        | PRESTON; FRANCIS ORRAY TICKNOR;        |      |
| To the Dandelion                     | 584        | JOHN R. THOMPSON; THADDEUS             |      |
| Hebe                                 | 585        | OLIVER; JAMES BARRON HOPE;             |      |
| Ambrose                              | 585        | ABRAM JOSEPH RYAN                      | 661  |
| The Vision of Sir Launfal            | 586        | Dixie (Pike)                           | 662  |
| From A Fable for Critics             | 590        | The Bivouac of the Dead (O'Hara)       | 662  |
| Beaver Brook                         | 598        | The Shade of the Trees (Preston)       | 663  |
| 200.00                               | 599        | Little Giffen (Ticknor)                | 664  |
| The First Snow-Fall                  | 599599 | The Virginians of the Valley (Ticknor) | 664  |
| She Came and Went                    | 599599 | Music in Camp (Thompson)               | 664  |
| Auf Wiedersehen                      |            | All Quiet Along the Potomac Tonight    | 004  |
| Das Ewig-Weibliche                   | 600        |  | 665  |
| From The Biglow Papers (A Letter)    | 600        | (Oliver)                               | 003  |

CONTENTS xvii

| JOHN GOULD FLETCHER (1886- )      | 811 | ALAN SEEGER (1888-1916)                   | 832 |
|-----------------------------------|-----|---|-----|
| Down the Mississippi              |     | I Have a Rendezvous with Death            | 832 |
| Embarkation                       | 811 | FRANKLIN PIERCE ADAMS (1881- )            | 832 |
| Heat                              | 812 | Erring in Company                         | 833 |
| Full Moon                         | 812 | De Senectute                              | 833 |
| The Moon's Orchestra              | 812 | Edna St. Vincent Millay (1892- )          | 834 |
| The Stevedores                    | 812 | God's World                               | 834 |
| Night Landing                     | 812 | Journey                                   | 834 |
| The Silence                       | 813 | Travel                                    | 834 |
| The Wreck                         | 813 | Woodrow Wilson (1856-1924)                | 834 |
| JOHN G. NEIHARDT (1881- )         | 813 | First Inaugural Address                   | 835 |
| From The Song of the Indian Wars  |     | On Abraham Lincoln's Birthplace           | 837 |
| The Sowing of the Dragon          | 813 | AGNES REPPLIER (1855- )                   | 838 |
| Edgar Lee Masters (1869- )        | 815 | The Child                                 | 839 |
| Anne Rutledge                     | 815 | CHARLES WILLIAM BEEBE (1877- )            | 843 |
| Henry Zoll, the Miller            | 815 | From The Edge of the Jungle               |     |
| Benjamin Franklin Hazard          | 816 | From A Tropic Garden                      | 843 |
| Henry Cogdal                      | 816 | "PAUL BUNYAN" (Collected by ESTHER        |     |
| The Clipper Ships                 | 816 | SHEPHARD)                                 | 845 |
| EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON (1869- ) | 817 | From The Buckskin Harness                 | 845 |
| Reuben Bright                     | 818 | WILLIAM McFee (1881- )                    | 847 |
| The House on the Hill             | 818 | The Market                                | 847 |
| Miniver Cheevy                    | 818 | WILLA SIBERT CATHER (1876- )              | 849 |
| Stafford's Cabin                  | 818 | A Wagner Matinée                          | 849 |
| Robert Frost (1875- )             | 819 | CHRISTOPHER DARLINGTON MORLEY             |     |
| Mending Wall                      | 819 | (1890- )                                  | 852 |
| The Death of the Hired Man        | 820 | Nursery Rhymes for the Tender-Hearted     | 853 |
| Storm Fear                        | 822 | To the Little House                       | 853 |
| Not to Keep                       | 822 | What Men Live By                          | 853 |
| CARL SANDBURG (1878- )            | 822 | On Unanswering Letters                    | 855 |
| Clean Curtains                    | 823 | WITTER BYNNER (1881- )                    | 856 |
| A.E.F                             | 823 | A Fortune-Teller                          | 856 |
| Chicago                           | 823 | Train-Mates                               | 856 |
| Grass                             | 824 | Roofs                                     | 857 |
| Lost                              | 824 | WILLIAM ROSE BENÉT (1886- )               | 857 |
| Fog                               | 824 | The Falconer of God                       | 857 |
| Laughing Corn                     | 824 | The Horse Thief                           | 858 |
| NICHOLAS VACHEL LINDSAY (1879- )  | 824 | STEPHEN VINCENT BENÉT (1898- )            | 860 |
| Abraham Lincoln Walks at Midnight | 825 | Portrait of a Boy                         | 860 |
| These Are the Young               | 825 | The Ballad of William Sycamore            | 860 |
| The Angel Sons                    | 826 | NATHALIA CRANE (1913- )                   | 861 |
| MARGARET WIDDEMER                 | 826 | The Flathouse Roof                        | 861 |
| Factories                         | 827 | The Poe Cottage                           | 862 |
| The Watcher                       | 827 | Arthur Guiterman (1871- )                 | 862 |
| The Modern Woman to Her Lover     | 827 | Afternoon Tea—A Sonnet Sequence           | 862 |
| SARA TEASDALE (1884- )            | 828 | Strictly Germ-Proof                       | 864 |
| Blue Squills                      | 828 | ELINOR WYLIE (1885-1928)                  | 864 |
| August Moonrise                   | 828 | Atavism                                   | 864 |
| On the Dunes                      | 828 | Castilian                                 | 865 |
| The Unseen                        | 828 | Du Bose Heyward (1885- )                  | 865 |
| A Star Map                        | 829 | The Mountain Woman                        | 865 |
| ROBERT HAVEN SCHAUFFLER (1879- )  | 829 | Dusk in the Low Country                   | 865 |
| "Scum o' the Earth"               | 829 | Prodigal                                  | 866 |
| Helen of Laughing Ledge           | 830 | The Half Pint Flask                       | 866 |
| God's-Eye View                    | 831 | Bibliography                              | 879 |
| Trash                             | 831 |   | 885 |
| JOYCE KILMER (1886-1918)          | 832 | CHRONOLOGY                                |     |
| Trees                             | 832 | INDEX OF AUTHORS, TITLES, AND FIRST LINES | 897 |

WASHINGTON IRVING

THREE CENTURIES OF AMERICAN POETRY AND PROSE

THE COLONIAL PERIOD

MERICAN writings before the Revolutionary War may be divided into two groups, the Colonial and the Provincial. The break between the two comes after King Philip's War and the Indian wars in Virginia of the same time. It coincides, in general, with the annulment of the colonial charters, and the constituting of the colonies into British provinces. The men who came to North America from 1607 to 1680 brought with them the ideas of the social or religious groups in England from which they sprang; many were tinged with a lingering medievalism. Some were "gentlemen adventurers" touched with the spirit of Elizabethan romance. A large number were ardently attached to religious principles that they felt bound to propagate. All were filled with the wonder of the new world, all intensely occupied with the problems of getting and maintaining a foothold upon a hostile shore. The writers of this period were clergymen, men of affairs, administrators, soldiers. None were skilled writers; yet the simple records they have left show that there was in the colonies a keen intellectual life, sure, sooner or later, to produce a varied and vigorous literature.

JOHN SMITH 1580-1631

John Smith, typical sixteenth-century soldier of fortune, was a man whom Shakespeare might have used as a model for one of his soldiers; indeed, the dramatist may have been sitting by when the none too modest captain was recounting his adventures to eager listeners, over the ale in some London tavern. Smith, a Lincolnshire farm lad, fled an apprenticeship, enlisted under various flags with his share of the spoils for bonus, fought as Christian champion in single-handed duel with heathen warriors, was captured by the Turks and sold into slavery, escaped, suffered shipwreck, and at length made his way back to England, ripe in experience, and joined the Virginia colonists.

In the New World he proved himself indispen-

In the New World he proved himself indispensable as a resourceful adviser, explorer, and military leader, and was made president of the colony in 1608. He explored the New England coast in 1614-15 and received the title of Admiral of New England. His works include A True Relation, etc., 1608; Description of New England, 1616; General History of Virginia and the Summer Isles, 1624. Despite the quaint manner of Smith's narrative, the reader may perceive in it the joyous spirit of a man to whom the world was full of marvels that might be experienced by one hardy enough to take the risk. An accident forced him back to England, but his heart was in America and we count him one of our first pioneers.

Best edition: Works, ed. by E. Arber, 2 vols., 1895. Criticism: Henry Adams, Historical Essays, 1891, an iconoclastic view; same No. Am. 95: 1-30; see also A. G. Bradley, "Captain John Smith," Fortn. 101:69-82, a vivid appreciation; H. G. Parsons, "A Knight of the Sun," Blackw. 174:28-40, emphasizing the sea-roving and piratical side of Smith's life; K. P. Woods, "Captain John Smith and the American Nation," Harper, 104:470-75.

From A TRUE RELATION 1

. . . You shall vnderstand that after many crosses in the downes by tempests, wee arrived safely vppon the Southwest part of the great Canaries: within foure or fiue daies after we set saile for Dominica, the 26. of Aprill: the first land we made, wee fell with Cape Henry, the verie mouth of the Bay of Chissiapiacke, which at that present we little expected, hauing by a cruell storme bene put to the Northward:

Anchoring in this Bay twentie or thirtie went a shore with the Captain, and in comming aboard 2 they were assalted with certaine Indians, which charged them within Pistoll shot: in which conflict, Captaine Archer and Mathew Morton were shot: whereupon Captaine Newport seconding them, made a shot at them. which the Indians little respected, but having spent their arrowes, retyred without harme. And in that place was the Box 3 opened, wherin the Counsell for Virginia was nominated: and arriving at the place where wee are now seated, 4 the Counsell was sworn, and the President elected, which for that yeare was Maister Edm. Maria Wingfield, where was made choice for our scituation, a verie fit place for the erecting of a great cittie, about which some contention passed betwixt Captaine Wingfield and Captaine Gosnold: notwithstanding, all our provision was brought a shore, and with as much speede as might bee wee went about our fortification.

A band of colonizers, among whom Captain Bartholomew Gosnold was the prime mover and Captain John Smith a leading spirit, having obtained letters patent from King James, set sail from Blackwall for Virginia, December 19, 1666. They were four months on the way, being kept for six weeks in The Downs, in sight of England, and afterwards spending some time in Dominica and other islands of the West Indies. The earliest account of their experiences was Smith's Truc Relation, published at London in black letter in 1608. The original spelling and punctuation are here followed. The title page reads: A true relation of such occurrences and accidents of Noate as hath hapned in Virginia since the first planting of that Collony, which is now resident in the South part thereof, till the last returne from thence. Written by Captain Smith, Coronell of the said Collony, to a worshipfull friend of his in England.

in England.

Mr. Arber describes the True Relation as an "ordinary 'pamphlet of news,' carelessly printed."

An example of the careless printing is the first sentence of this selection. It should read somewhat as follows: "Within four or five days after, we set sail for Dominica [where we stayed for some time]. The 26th of April, the first land we made, we fell with Cape Henry," etc.

on land

The proprietors of the colony, all of whom lived in England, had placed in a sealed box, not to be opened until the Company reached Virginia, authoritative directions for the government of the colony.

settled (viz., at Jamestowr)

The two and twenty day of Aprill, 5 Captain Newbort and my selfe with divers others to the number of twenty two persons, set forward to discouer the Riuer, some fiftie or sixtie miles, finding it in some places broader, and in some narrower, the Countrie (for the moste part) on each side plaine high ground, with many fresh Springes, the people in all places kindely intreating vs. daunsing and feasting vs. with strawberries, Mulberies, Bread, Fish, and other their Countrie provisions wheref we had plenty: for which Captaine Newbort kindely requited their least fauours with Bels, Pinnes. Needles, beades, or Glasses, which so contented them that his liberallitie made them follow vs from place to place, and euer kindely to respect vs. In the midway staying to refresh our selves in a little Ile, foure or five savages came vnto vs. which described vnto vs the course of the River. and after in our journey, they often met vs. trading with vs for such prouision as wee had. and ariting at Arsatecke, hee whom we supposed to bee the chiefe King of all the rest. moste kindely entertained vs. giuing vs in a guide to go with vs vp the River to Powhatan. of which place their great Emperor taketh his name, where he that they honored for King vsed vs kindely. But to finish this discouerie, we passed on further, where within an ile 6 we were intercepted with great craggy stones in the midst of the river, where the water falleth so rudely, and with such a violence, as not any boat can possibly passe, and so broad disperseth the streame, as there is not past five or sixe Foote at a low water, and to the shore scarce passage with a barge, the water floweth 7 foure foote, and the freshes, by reason of the Rockes. haue left markes of the inundations 8, or 9. foote: The south side is plaine low ground, and the north side high mountaines, the rockes being of a grauelly nature, interlaced with many vains of glistring spangles.

That night we returned to Powhatan: the next day (being Whitsunday after dinner) we returned to the fals, leauing a mariner in pawn with the Indians for a guide of theirs, hee that they honoured for King followed vs by the riuer. That afternoone we trifled in looking vpon the Rockes and riuer (further he would not goe) so there we erected a crosse, and that night taking our man at Powhatans, Captaine Newbort congratulated 1 his kindenes with a Gown and a Hatchet: returning to Arsetecke. and stayed there the next day to observe the height 2 therof, and so with many signes of loue we departed.

7 Rises with the tide; "freshes" are freshets.

&lt;sup>5</sup> An error for May (1607). This date marks the beginning of Smith's explorations. As his map, published in 1612, shows, they covered Chesapeake Bay and all the important rivers from the James, "the River" here mentioned, to the Susquehanna, and led him to the future sites of Baltimore, Richmond, and Washington. The places mentioned in the present selection are on or near the James, from Richmond to Point Comfort.

The next day the Oueene of Agamatack kindely intreated 3 vs, her people being no lesse contented then the rest, and from thence we went to another place (the name whereof I doe not remember) where the people shewed vs the manner of their diving for Mussels, in which they finde Pearles.

That night passing by Weanock some twentie miles from our Fort, they according to their former churlish condition, seemed little to affect 4 vs. but as wee departed and lodged at the point of Weanocke, the people the next morning seemed kindely to content 5 vs, yet we might perceive many signes of a more Iealousie in them then before, and also the Hinde 6 that the King of Arseteck had given vs, altered his resolution in going to our Fort, and with many kinde circumstances 7 left us there. This gaue vs some occasion to doubt 8 some mischiefe at the Fort, yet Captaine Newport intended to haue visited Paspahegh and Tappahanocke, but the instant change of the winde being faire for our return we repaired to the fort with all speed, where the first we heard was that 400. Indians the day before had assalted the fort, and supprised it, had not God (beyond al their expectations) by meanes of the shippes (at whom they shot 9 with their Ordinances and Muskets) caused them to retire, they had entred the fort with our own men, which were then busied in setting Corne, their armes beeing then in driefats 10 and few ready but certain Gentlemen of their own, in which conflict, most of the Counsel was hurt, a boy slaine in the Pinnas, and thirteene or fourteene more hurt.

With all speede we pallisadoed our Fort: (each other day) for sixe or seauen daies we had alarums by ambuscadoes, and four or fiue cruelly wounded by being abroad: the Indians losse wee know not, but as they report three were slain and diuers hurt.

Captaine Newport having set things in order, set saile for England the 22 of June, leauing prouision for 13. or 14 weeks.

<sup>2</sup> latitude 1 gratefully acknowledged 3 entertained seemed somewhat disaffected toward professions vs before in our discouerie, to assure vs peace; our fort being then palisadoed round, and all our men in good health and comfort, albeit, that thro[u]gh some discontented humors, it did not so long continue.

The day before the Ships departure, the King of Pamaunke 11 sent the Indian that had met

[CONCLUSION]

In all this time, our men being all or the most part well recouered, and we not willing to trifle away more time then necessitie enforced vs vnto: we thought good, for the better content of the aduenturers, in some reasonable sort to fraight home Maister Nelson, with Cedar wood. About which, our men going with willing minds, [it] was in very good time effected, and the ship sent for England [on 2nd June, 1608]. Wee now remaining being in good health, all our men wel contented, free from mutinies, in loue one with another, and as we hope in a continuall peace with the Indians: where we doubt not but by Gods gracious assistance, and the adventurers 12 willing minds and speedie futherance to so honorable an action, in after times to see our Nation to enioy a Country, not onely exceeding pleasant for habitation, but also very profitable for comerce in generall; no doubt pleasing to almightie God, honourable to our gracious Soueraigne, and commodious 13 generally to the whole Kingdome.

1608 1607

From THE GENERAL HISTORY OF VIR-GINIA 14

From Book III, CHAPTER II. WHAT HAPPENED TILL THE FIRST SUPPLY

The new President, and Martin, 15 being little beloved, of weake judgement in dangers and 11 King Opechancanough 12 those who had invested their capital in the colony of the Council

<sup>5</sup> appeared friendly toward 8 suspect 8 the guide mentioned before

o i.e., which shot at them 10 vats or cases, for containing dry articles

<sup>21</sup> those who had invested their capital in the colony 12 those who had invested their capital in the colony
13 profitable
14 This history was prepared by Smith at the request of the London Virginia Company and printed at London, in 1624, just before the bankruptcy and dissolution of the company. Smith, already subjected to much hostile criticism and anticipating more, vehemently declared: "I thank God I never undertook anything yet [wherein] any could tax me of carelessness or dishonesty; and what is he to whom I am indebted or troublesome?" (Arber's edition of Smith, p. 274.) In regard to the much discussed incident of Pocahontas, Mr.
Arber remarks that the story was never questioned in Smith's lifetime, and that to deny the truth of it "is to create more difficulties than are involved in its acceptance" (ibid. p. cxv).

15 John Ratcliffe, and Captain John Martin, a member of the Council

lesse industrie in peace, committed the managing of all things abroad to Captaine Smith: who by his owne example, good words, and faire promises, set some to mow, others to binde thatch, some to build houses, others to thatch them, himselfe alwayes bearing the greatest taske for his owne share, so that in short time, he provided most of them lodgings, neglecting any for himselfe.

This done, seeing the Salvages superfluitie <sup>1</sup> beginne to decrease, [he] (with some of his workemen) shipped himselfe in the Shallop to search the Country for trade. The want of the language, knowledge to mannage his boat without sailes, the want of a sufficient power (knowing the multitude of the Salvages), apparell for his men, and other necessaries, were infinite impediments; yet no discouragement.

Being but six or seauen in company he went downe the river to Kecoughtan: where at first they scorned him, as a famished man; and would in derision offer him a handfull of Corne, a peece of bread, for their swords and muskets, and such like proportions also for their apparell. But seeing by trade and courtesie there was nothing to be had, he made bold to try such conclusions as necessitie inforced, though contrary to his Commission: Let fly his muskets, ran his boat on shore; whereat they all fled into the woods.

So marching towards their houses, they might see great heapes of corne: much adoe he had to restraine his hungry souldiers from present taking of it, expecting as it hapned that the Salvages would assault them, as not long after they did with a most hydeous noyse. Sixtie or seaventie of them, some blacke, some red, some white, some party-coloured, came in a square order, singing and dauncing out of the woods. with their Okee (which was an Idoll made of skinnes, stuffed with mosse, all painted and hung with chaines and copper) borne before them: and in this manner, being well armed with Clubs, Targets, Bowes, and Arrowes, they charged the English, that so kindly received them with their muskets loaden with Pistoll shot, that downe fell their God, and divers lay sprauling on the ground; the rest fled againe to the woods, and ere long sent one of their Ouivoughkasoucks 2 to offer peace, and redeeme their Okee.

Smith told them, if onely six of them would come vnarmed and loade his boat, he would not only be their friend, but restore them their Okee, and giue them Beads, Copper, and Hatchets besides: which on both sides was to their contents performed: and then they brought him Venison, Turkies, wild foule, bread, and what they had; singing and dauncing in signe of friendship till they departed.

In his returne, he discovered the Towne and Country of Warraskovack. . . .

And now the winter approaching, the rivers became so covered with swans, geese, duckes, and cranes, that we daily feasted with good bread, Virginia pease, pumpions, and putchamins, fish, fowle, and diverse sorts of wild beasts as fat as we could eate them: so that none of our Tuftaffaty humorists desired to goe for England.

But our Comaedies never endured long with out a Tragedie, some idle exceptions being muttered against Captaine Smith, for not discovering the head of Chickahamania river, and taxed by the Councell, to be too slow in so worthy an attempt. The next voyage hee proceeded so farre that with much labour by cutting of trees insunder he made his passage; but when his Barge could passe no farther, he left her in a broad bay out of danger of shot, commanding none should goe a shore till his returne: himselfe with two English and two Salvages went vp higher in a Canowe; but hee was not long absent, but his men went a shore, whose want of government gaue both occasion and opportunity to the Salvages to surprise one George Cassen, whom they slew, and much failed not to have cut of [f] the boat and all the rest.

Smith little dreaming of that accident, being got to the marshes at the rivers head, twentie myles in the desert, had his two men slaine (as is supposed) sleeping by the Canowe, whilst himselfe by fowling sought them victuall: who finding he was beset with 200. Salvages, two of them hee slew, still defending himselfe with the ayd of a Salvage his guid, whom he bound to his arme with his garters, and vsed him as a buckler, yet he was shot in his thigh a little, and had many arrowes that stucke in his cloathes but no great hurt, till at last they tooke him prisoner.

When this newes came to Iames towne, much was their sorrow for his losse, fewe expecting what ensued.

Sixe or seuen weekes those Barbarians kept him prisoner, many strange triumphes and coniurations <sup>6</sup> they made of him, yet hee so demeaned himselfe amongst them, as he not <sup>1</sup> supplies furnished by the Indians (mentioned earlier in the account)

<sup>2</sup> defined by Smith as "petty gods, and their affinities"

pumpkins
 fastidious fault-finders (tuft-taffeta, a silk fabric) religious ceremonies (described later) to avent the evil of his presence onely diverted them from surprising the Fort, but procured his owne libertie, and got himselfe and his company such estimation amongst them, that those Salvages admired him more then their owne Quiyouckosucks.

The manner how they vsed and deliuered him, is as followeth.

The Salvages having drawne 1 from George Cassen whether Captaine Smith was gone, prosecuting that oportunity they followed him with .300. bowmen, conducted by the King of Pamavnkee, who in divisions searching the turnings of the river, found Robinson and Emry by the fire side: those they shot full of arrowes and slew. Then finding the Captaine, as is said, that vsed the Salvage that was his guide as his shield (three of them being slaine and divers other so gauld) all the rest would not come neere him. Thinking thus to have returned to his boat, regarding them, as he marched, more then his way, [he] slipped vp to the middle in an oasie creeke and his Salvage with him; yet durst they not come to him till being neere dead with cold, he threw away his armes. Then according to their composition 2 they drew him forth and led him to the fire, where his men were slaine. Diligently they chafed his benummed limbs.

He demanding for their Captaine, they shewed him Opechankanough, King of Pamavnkee, to whom he gaue a round Ivory double compass Dvall. Much they marvailed at the playing of the Fly and Needle, which they could see so plainely and yet not touch it. because of the glasse that covered them. But when he demonstrated by that Globe-like Iewell, the roundnesse of the earth, and skies, the spheare of the Sunne, Moone, and Starres, and how the Sunne did chase the night round about the world continually; the greatnesse of the Land and Sea, the diversitie of Nations, varietie of complexions, and how we were to them Antipodes, and many other such like matters, they all stood as amazed with admiration. 3

Notwithstanding, within an houre after they tyed him to a tree, and as many as could stand about him prepared to shoot him: but the King holding vp the Compass in his hand, they all laid downe their Bowes and Arrowes, and in a triumphant manner led him to Orapaks, where he was after their manner kindly feasted, and well vsed. . . . Not long after, early in a morning a great fire was made in a long house, and a mat spread on the one side, as on the other; on the one they caused him to sit, and all the guard went out of the house, and presently came skipping in a great grim fellow, all painted over with coale, mingled with ovle; and many Snakes and Wesels skins stuffed with mosse, and all their tayles tyed together, so as they met on the crowne of his head in a tassell: and round about the tassell was as a Coronet of feathers, the skins hanging round about his head, backe, and shoulders, and in a manner covered his face; with a hellish voyce, and a rattle in his hand. With most strange gestures and passions he began his invocation, and environed the fire with a circle of meale; which done, three more such like devils came rushing in with the like antique tricks, painted halfe blacke, halfe red: but all their eyes were painted white, and some red stroakes like Mutchato's 4 along their cheekes: round about him those fiends daunced a pretty while, and then came in three more as vglv as the rest; with red eyes, and white stroakes over their blacke faces, at last they all sat downe right against him; three of them on the one hand of the chiefe Priest, and three on the other. Then all with their rattles began a song, which ended, the chiefe Priest lavd downe five wheat cornes: then strayning his armes and hands with such violence that he sweat, and his veynes swelled. he began a short Oration: at the conclusion they all gaue a short groane; and then layd down three graines more. After that, began their song againe, and then another Oration, ever laying downe so many cornes as before, till they had twice incirculed the fire; that done, they tooke a bunch of little stickes prepared for that purpose, continuing still their devotion, and at the end of every song and Oration. they layd downe a sticke betwixt the divisions of Corne. Till night, neither he nor they did either eate or drinke; and then they feasted merrily, with the best provisions they could make. Three dayes they vsed this Ceremony; the meaning whereof they told him, was to know if he intended them well or no. The circle of meale signified their Country, the circles of corne the bounds of the Sea, and the stickes his Country. They imagined the world to be flat and round, like a trencher; and they in the middest.

After this they brought him a bagge of gunpowder, which they carefully preserved till the next spring, to plant as they did their corne; because they would be acquainted with the nature of that seede.

Opitchapam the Kings brother invited him to his house, where, with as many platters of bread, foule, and wild beasts, as did environ him, he bid him wellcome; but not any of them would eate a bit with him, but put vp all the remainder in Baskets.

<sup>1</sup> learned 2 agreement 3 wonder

<sup>4</sup> mustachios

At his return to Opechancanoughs, all the Kings women, and their children, flocked about him for their parts; as a due by Custome, to be merry with such fragments.

But his waking mind in hydeous dreames did oft see wondrous shapes, Of bodies strange, and huge in growth, and of stupendious makes.

At last they brought him to Meronocomoco, where was Powhatan, their Emperor. Here more than two hundred of those grim Courtiers stood wondering at him, as he had beene a monster: till Powhatan and his travne had put themselues in their greatest braveries. Before a fire vpon a seat like a bedsted, he sat covered with a great robe, made of Rarowcun skinnes, and all the tayles hanging by. On either hand did sit a young wench of 16 or 18 yeares, and along on each side the house, two rowes of men, and behind them as many women, with all their heads and shoulders painted red: many of their heads bedecked with the white downe of Birds; but every one with something: and a great chavne of white beads about their necks.

At his entrance before the King, all the people gaue a great shout. The Queene of Appamatuck was appointed to bring him water to wash his hands, and another brought him a bunch of feathers, in stead of a Towell, to dry them: having feasted him after their best barbarous manner they could, a long consultation was held, but the conclusion was, two great stones were brought before Powhatan: then as many as could layd hands on him, dragged him to them, and thereon laid his head, and being ready with their clubs, to beate out his braines, Pocahontas the Kings dearest daughter, when no intreaty could prevaile, got his head in her armes, and laid her owne vpon his to saue him from death: whereat the Emperour was contented he should live to make him hatchets. and her bells, beads, and copper; for they thought him as well of all occupations as themselues. For the King himselfe will make his owne robes, shooes, bowes, arrowes, pots; plant, hunt, or doe any thing so well as the rest.

> They say he bore a pleasant shew, But sure his heart was sad. For who can pleasant be, and rest, That lives in feare and dread: And having life suspected, doth It still suspected lead.

Two days after. Powhatan having disguised himselfe in the most fearefullest manner he could, caused Captain Smith to be brought forth to a great house in the woods, and there voon a mat by the fire to be left alone. Not long after from behinde a mat that divided the house, was made the most dolefullest novse he ever heard: then Powhatan more like a devill then a man, with some two hundred more as blacke as himselfe, came vnto him and told him now they were friends, and presently he should goe to Iames towne, to send him two great gunnes, and a gryndstone, for which he would give him the Country of Capahowosick. and for ever esteeme him as his sonne Nantaanoud.

So to Iames towne with 12 guides Powhatan sent him. That night they quarterd in the woods, he still expecting (as he had done all this long time of his imprisonment) every houre to be put to one death or other: for all their feasting. But almightie God (by his divine providence) had mollified the hearts of those sterne Barbarians with compassion. The next morning betimes they came to the Fort, where Smith having used the Salvages with what kindnesse he could, he shewed Rawhunt, Powhatans trusty servant, two demi-Culverings 1 and a millstone to carry Powhatan: they found them somewhat too heavie; but when they did see him discharge them, being loaded with stones, among the boughs of a great tree loaded with Isickles, the yee and branches came so tumbling downe, that the poore Salvages ran away halfe dead with feare. But at last we regained some conference with them, and gaue them such toyes; and sent to Powhatan, his women, and children such presents, as gaue them in generall full content.

Now in Iames Towne they were all in combustion, the strongest preparing once more to run away with the Pinnace; which with the hazzard of his life, with Sakre falcon <sup>2</sup> and musket shot, Smith forced now the third time to stay or sinke.

Some no better then they should be, had plotted with the President, the next day to haue put him to death by the Leviticall law, for the liues of Robinson and Emry; pretending the fault was his that had led them to their ends: but he quickly tooke such order with such Lawyers, that he layd them by the heeles till he sent some of them prisoners for England.

Now ever once in foure or fiue dayes, Pocahontas with her attendants, brought him so much provision, that saved many of their liues, that els for all this had starved with hunger.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a short nine-pound cannon

<sup>2</sup> a very light cannon 3 Leviticus xxiv, 17

Thus from numbe death our good God sent reliefe,

The sweete asswager of all other griefe.

1623

WILLIAM STRACHEY

It is not known when or where Strachey was born or died; he was in the prime of life, 1609-1618. He sailed for Virginia in 1609 with Sir Thomas Gates, lieutenant-governor of the Colonization Colony, and Sir George Somers as admiral. The company was wrecked on the Bermudas in July, spent the winter in building boats, and reached Jamestown in the following April. Strachey was secretary and recorder of the Virginia colony, and joint author and editor of several publications concerning the colony—in short a professional writer, a "publicity agent" of the undertaking. Several accounts of this wreck and sojourn were sent back to England. There can be no doubt that some of these were used by Shakespeare as the groundwork of The Tempest, in which he speaks of the "still-vex'd Bermoothes" (I, ii, 229).

It is evident that Strachey writes as a man of imagination would concerning a new world not quite, perhaps, under the sway of such natural laws as bound the old world, a place where such wonders as fill the pages of Spenser were not impossible.

From A TRUE REPORTORY 1

Of the Wracke, and Redemption of Sir Thomas Gates Knight; upon and from the Ilands of the Bermudas: . . .

§. 1

A MOST DREADFULL TEMPEST . . . . THEIR WRACKE ON BERMUDA, AND THE DESCRIPTION OF THOSE ILANDS.

During all this time, the heavens look'd so blacke upon us, that it was not possible the elevation of the Pole 2 might be observed nor a Starre by night, not Sunne beame by day was to be seene. Onely upon the thursday night Sir George Summers being upon the watch, had an apparition of a little round light, like a faint Starre, trembling, and streaming along with a sparkeling blaze, halfe the height upon the Maine Mast, and shooting sometimes from Shroud to Shroud, tempting to settle as it were upon any of the foure Shrouds: and for three or foure houres together, or rather more, halfe the night it kept with us; running sometimes along the Maine-yard to the very end, and then returning. At which, Sir George Summers called divers about him, and shewed them the same, who observed it with much wonder, and carefulnesse: 3 but upon a sodaine, towards the morning watch, they lost the sight of it, and knew not what way it made....

And surely Madam, it is most true, there was not any houre (a matter of admiration 4) all these dayes, in which we freed not twelve hundred Barricos 5 of water, the least whereof contained six gallons, and some eight, besides three deepe Pumpes continually going, two beneath at the Capstone, and the other above in the halfe Decke, and at each Pumpe foure thousand stroakes at the least in a watch; so as I may well say, every foure houres, we quitted one hundred tunnes of water: and from tuesday noone till friday noone, we bailed and pumped two thousand tunne, and yet doe what we could, when our Ship held least in her. (after tuesday night second watch) shee bore ten foote deepe, at which stay our extreame working kept her one eight glasses, 6 forbearance whereof had instantly sunke us, and it being now Friday, the fourth morning, it wanted little, but that there had bin a generall determination, to have shut up hatches, and commending our sinfull soules to God, committed the Shippe to the mercy of the Sea: surely, that night we must have done it, and that night had we then perished: but see the goodnesse and sweet introduction of better hope, by our mercifull God given unto us. Sir George Summers, when no man dreamed of such happinesse, had discovered, and cried Land. Indeede the morning now three quarters spent, had wonne a little cleerenesse from the dayes before, and it being better surveyed, the very trees were seene to move with the winde upon the shoare side: whereupon our Governour commanded the Helmeman to beare up, the Boateswaine sounding at the first, found it thirteene fathome, and when we stood a little in seven fatham; and presently heaving his lead the third time, had ground at foure fathome, and by this, we had got her within a mile under the South-east point of the land, where we had somewhat smooth water. But having no hope to save her by comming to an anker in the same, we

The True Reportory is in the form of a letter addressed to a lady of 1ank dated 15 July 1610, and was published in Purchas His Pilgrimes in 1625. See vol. iv, p. 1734; in the 1905 ed., vol. xix, p. 5.2 pole-star

<sup>3</sup> concern 5 casks

wonder
 Eight half-hour glasses (four hours); cf. The Tempest, v, i, 223.

were inforced to runne her ashoare, as neere the land as we could, which brought us within three quarters of a mile of shoare, and by the mercy of God unto us, making out our Boates, we had ere night brought all our men, women, and children, about the number of one hundred and fifty, safe into the Hand.

We found it to be the dangerous and dreaded Iland, or rather Ilands of the Bermuda: whereof let mee give your Ladyship a briefe description. before I proceed to my narration. And that the rather, because they be so terrible to all that ever touched on them, and such tempests, thunders, and other fearefull objects are seene and heard about them, that they be called commonly. The Devils Ilands, and are feared and avoyded of all sea travellers alive, above any other place in the world. Yet it pleased our merciful God, to make even this hideous and hated place, both the place of our safetie, and meanes of our deliverance.

Sure it is, that there are no Rivers nor running Springs of fresh water to bee found upon any of them: when wee came first wee digged and found certaine gushings and soft bublings. which being either in bottoms, or on the side of hanging ground, were onely fed with raine water, which neverthelesse soone sinketh into the earth and vanisheth away, or emptieth it selfe out of sight into the Sea, without any channell above or upon the superficies of the earth: for according as their raines fell, we had our Wels and Pits (which we digged) either halfe full, or absolute exhausted and dry, howbeit some low bottoms (which the continuall descent from the Hills filled full, and in those flats could have no passage away) we found to continue as fishing Ponds, or standing Pooles, continually Summer and Winter full of fresh water.

Fowle there is great store, small Birds, Sparrowes fat and plumpe like a Bunting, bigger then ours, Robbins of divers colours greene and yellow, ordinary and familiar in our Cabbins, and other of lesse sort. White and gray Hernshawes, Bitters, Teale, Snites, Crowes, and Hawkes, of which in March wee found divers Ayres, 1 Goshawkes and Tassells, Oxen-birds, Cormorants, Bald-Cootes, Moore-Hennes, Owls, and Battes, in great store. And upon Newyeeres day in the morning, our Governour being walked foorth with another Gentleman Master James Swift, each of them with their Peeces killed a wild Swanne, in a great Seawater Bay or Pond in our Iland. A kinde of webbe-footed Fowle there is, of the bignesse of an English greene Ployer, or Sea-Meawe. which all the Summer wee saw not, and in the darkest nights of November and December (for in the night they onely feed) they would come forth, but not flye farre from home, and hovering in the ayre, and over the Sea, made a strange hollow and harsh howling. colour is inclining to Russet, with white bellies. (as are likewise the long Feathers of their wings Russet and White) these gather themselves together and breed in those Ilands which are high, and so farre alone into the Sea, that the Wilde Hogges cannot swimme over [to] them, and there in the ground they have their Burrowes, like Conves in a Warren, and so brought in the loose Mould, though not so deepe: which Birds with a light bough in a darke night (as in our Lowbelling 2) wee caught. I have beene at the taking of three hundred in an houre, and wee might have laden our Boates. Our men found a prettie way to take them, which was by standing on the Rockes or Sands by the Sea side, and hollowing, laughing, and making the strangest out-cry that possibly they could: with the noyse whereof the Birds would come flocking to that place, and settle upon the very armes and head of him that so cryed, and still creepe neerer and neerer, answering the novse themselves: by which our men would weigh them with their hand, and which weighed heaviest they tooke for the best and let the others alone, and so our men would take twentie dozen in two houres of the chiefest of them: and they were a good and well relished Fowle, fat and full as a Partridge. In January wee had great store of their Egges, which are as great as an Hennes Egge, and so fashioned and white shelled, and have no difference in volke nor white from an Hennes Egge. There are thousands of these Birds, and two or three Ilands full of their Burrowes, whether at any time (in two houres warning) wee could send our Cock-boat, and bring home as many as would serve the whole Company: which Birds for their blindnesse (for they see weakly in the day) and for their cry and whooting, wee called the Sea Owle: 3 they will bite cruelly with their crooked Bills.

&lt;sup>2</sup> a method of capturing birds by stupefying them with lights and the noise of a bell
<sup>3</sup> In The Tempest, 11, 11, 176, Caliban says: "Sometimes I'll get thee Young scamels from the took." If scamels be a misprint for sea-mells or sea mews, it probably refers to the birds described here; if for stantels, it refers to the hawks mentioned earlier. tioned earlier,

<sup>1</sup> aeries, nests

$. II

Actions and Occurrents whiles THEY CONTINUED IN THE ILANDS

So soone as wee were a little setled after our landing, with all the conveniencie wee might, and as the place, and our many wants would give us leave, wee made up our long Boate (as your Ladyship hath heard) in fashion of a Pinnace, fitting her with a little Deck, made of the Hatches of our ruin'd ship, so close that no water could goe in her, gave her Sayles and Oares, and intreating with our Masters Mate Henry Ravens (who was supposed a sufficient Pilot) wee found him easily wonne to make over therewith, as a Barke of Aviso 1 for Virginia, which being in the height of thirtie seven degrees, five degrees from the Iland which we were, might bee some one hundred and fortie leagues from us, or thereabouts (reckoning to every degree that lies North-east, and Westerly twentie eight English leagues) who the twentie eight of August being Munday, with sixe Saylers, and our Cape Merchant Thomas Whittingham departed from us out of Gates his Bay: 2 but to our much wonder returned againe upon the Wednesday night after, having attempted to have got cleere of the Iland, from the North North-east to the South-west, but could not as little water as shee drew, (which might not bee above twentie inches) for shoales and breaches, 3 so as he was faine to go out from Summers Creeks, and the same way we came in on the South South-east of the Ilands, and from thence wee [he] made to Sea the Friday after the first of September, promising if hee lived and arrived safe there, to returne unto us the next new Moone with the Pinnace belonging to the Colony there: according unto which instructions were directed unto the new Leiftenant Governour, and Councell from our Governour here, for which the Ilands were appointed carefully to be watched, and fiers prepared as Beacons to have directed and wafted him in, but two Moones were wasted upon the Promontory before mentioned, and [wee] gave many a long and wished looke round about the Horizon, from the North-east to the Southwest, but in vaine, discovering nothing all the while, which way soever we turned our eye, but ayre and sea.

1610 1625

a breakers

WILLIAM BRADFORD 1590-1657

English laws forbidding people to worship outside established churches did not prevent William Bradford, the young son of a Yorkshire yeoman, from joining the Independent church at Scrooby within the border of Nottingham. When this little congregation was threatened by the sheriffs and its members fled to Holland, Bradford was caught in an unsuccessful attempt to leave the country and imprisoned for several months. In Leyden he became a weaver and silk merchant. He studied much, learning Greek and some Hebrew that he might read the Scriptures in their own tongues.

As the years passed, the Leyden Puritans saw that among the Dutch they would shortly lose their English identity. The congregation therefore divided, and Bradford became a leader among the adventurous spirits who fared forth to a land where they might preserve not only their religious ideals but their English customs and blood. On the death of Governor Carver during the first terrible winter, Bradford was chosen to the office of governor; this office he held by annual election during almost all the rest of his life, serving with the greatest wisdom and self-sacrifice.

His manuscript history, Of Plimoth Plantation, lost during the Revolution, found in England, and returned (1897) to this country, is the most important account of the Pilgrims and of the Plymouth colony. It covers the period from 1606 to 1648, was begun about 1630, and was first published by the Massachusetts Historical Society in 1856. Though lacking the picturesqueness of Smith's narrative, its historical accuracy is greater. Its style is that of the Bible.

Bradford and the colony he guided represent the more liberal and primitive type of American Puritanism. After the establishment of the Massachusetts Bay Colony at Boston in 1630, Puritanism in New England took on the aspects of a state religion. The church and the government supported each other; the salaries of the clergy were from the public taxes, and the clergy often sat with the magistrates in the decision of difficult cases. The "Bay Colony" because of its larger population from its founding tended to dominate all the Massachusetts settlements. Plymouth feared that its own milder government in church and civil affairs would be overthrown by Boston. Bradford's tact prevented such a misfortune. He so administered the affairs of the Plymouth Colony that it escaped many of the bitter troubles that befell its stronger neighbor.

Best edition: History of Plymouth Plantation, 2 vols., published for the Massachusetts Historical Society, 1912. Bradford's Of Plimoth Plantation, published by the State of Massachusetts, 1899, includes a history of the original manuscript, its loss, discovery, and return to the State of Massachusetts. See also: "History of Plimoth Plantation," Ind. 52:2219-20; "Governor Bradford's Old Church," Outlook, 86:916-921, an interesting account of the church where Bradford was baptized.

<sup>1</sup> advice-boat, packet-boat

<sup>2</sup> Gates's Bay

From OF PLIMOTH PLANTATION. BOOK II

The 9. Chap.

Of their vioage, and how they passed the sea, and of their safe arrivall at Cape Codd.

September: 6. These troubls 2 being blowne over, and now all being compacte togeather in one shipe, they put to sea againe with a prosperus winde, which continued diverce days togeather, which was some incouragmente unto them: vet. . . . after they had injoyed faire winds and weather for a season, they were incountred many times with crosse winds, and mette with many feirce stormes, with which the shipe was shroudly shaken, and her upper works made very leakie; and one of the maine beames in the midd ships was bowed and craked, which put them in some fear that the shipe could not be able to performe the vioage. ... But in examening of all opinions, the master and others affirmed they knew the ship to be stronge and firme under water; and for the buckling 3 of the maine beame, ther was a great iron scrue the passengers brought out of Holland, which would raise the beame into his place; the which being done, the carpenter and master affirmed that with a post put under it, set firme in the lower deck, and otherways bounde, he would make it sufficiente. And as for the decks and uper workes they would calke them as well as they could, and though with the workeing of the ship they would not longe keepe stanch, yet ther would otherwise be no great danger, if they did not overpress her with sails. So they committed them selves to the will of God, and resolved to proseede. . . .

. . . In all this viage ther died but one of the passengers, which was William Butten, a youth, servant to Samuell Fuller, when they drew near the coast. But to omite other things, (that I may be breefe,) after longe beating at sea they fell with that land which is called Cape Cod: 4 the which being made and certainly knowne to be it, they were not a litle joyfull. After some deliberation had amongst them selves and with the master of the ship, they tacked aboute and resolved to stande for the southward (the wind and weather being faire) to finde some place aboute Hudsons river for their habitation. But after they had sailed that course aboute halfe the day, they fell amongst deangerous shoulds and roring breakers, and they were so farr intangled ther with as 5 they conceived them selves in great danger: and the wind shrinking upon them withall, they resolved to bear up againe for the Cape, and thought them selves hapy to gett out of those dangers before night overtooke them, as by Gods providence they did. And the next day they gott into the Cape-harbor wher they ridd in saftie. A word or too by the way of this cape: it was thus first named by Capten Gosnole and his company, Anno: 1602, and after by Capten Smith was called Cape James; but it retains the former name amongst seamen. Also that pointe which first shewed those dangerous shoulds unto them, they called Pointe Care, and Tuckers Terrour; but the French and Dutch to this day call it Malabarr, by reason of those perilous shoulds, and the losses they have suffered their.

Being thus arived in a good harbor and brought safe to land, they fell upon their knees and blessed the God of heaven, who had brought them over the vast and furious ocean, and delivered them from all the periles and miseries therof, againe to set their feete on the firme and stable earth, their proper elemente. And no marvell if they were thus joyefull, seeing wise Seneca was so affected with sailing a few miles on the coast of his owne Italy: as he affirmed, that he had rather remaine twentie years on his way by land, then pass by sea to any place in a short time; so tedious and dreadfull was the same unto him. 6

But hear I cannot but stay and make a pause, and stand half amased at this poore peoples presente condition; and so I thinke will the reader too, when he well considers the same. Being thus passed the vast ocean, and a sea of troubles before in their preparation (as may be remembred by that which wente before), they had now no freinds to wellcome them, nor inns to entertaine or refresh their weatherbeaten bodys, no houses or much less townes to repaire too, to seeke for succoure. It is recorded in scripture as a mercie to the apostle and his shipwraked company, that the barbarians shewed them no smale kindnes in refreshing them, 7 but these savage barbarians, ¹ The Plymouth "Pilgrims" of 1620 were the adventurous spirits from among the Leyden congregation of Puritans which was made up of persons who, like Bradford, had fled from religious persecution in England. These emigrants from Leyden obtained help in fitting out and provisioning the Mayflower, in which they sailed, from the merchants of colonization companies in London and Plymouth, and a joint stock company was formed, the merchants imposing rather exacting terms. At the end of seven years, the capital and profits were to be divided between the adventurers (investors) and the planters (colonists). the planters (colonists).

They had put back once because of the unseaworthiness of their ships.

as for the bending

&lt;sup>4</sup> Because they tooke much of that fishe ther,—Bradford's note.

<sup>5</sup> that <sup>6</sup> Seneca, Epistles, 53 7 Acts xxviii. 2

when they mette with them (as after will anpeare) were readier to fill their sids full of arrows then otherwise. And for the season it was winter, and they that know the winters of that cuntrie know them to be sharp and violent, and subjecte to cruell and feirce stormes, deangerous to travill to known places. much more to serch an unknown coast. Besids, what could they see but a hidious and desolate wildernes, full of wild beasts and willd men? and what multitude ther might be of them they knew not. Nether could they, as it were, goe up to the tope of Pisgah. 1 to vew from this willdernes a more goodly cuntrie to feed their hops; for which way soever they turnd their eys (save upward to the heavens) they could have litle solace or content in respecte of any outward objects. For summer being done, all things stand upon them with a wetherbeaten face; and the whole countrie, full of woods and thickets, represented 2 a wild and savage heiw. If they looked behind them. ther was the mighty ocean which they had passed, and was now as a maine barr and goulfe to seperate them from all the civil parts of the world. If it be said they had a ship to sucour them, it is trew; but what heard they daly from the master and company? but that with speede they should looke out a place with their shallop, wher they would be 3 at some near distance: for the season was shuch as he would not stirr from thence till a safe harbor was discovered by them wher they would be, and he might goe without danger; and that victells consumed apace, but he must and would keepe sufficient for them selves 4 and their returne. Yea, it was muttered by some, that if they gott not a place in time, they would turne them and their goods ashore and leave them. Let it also be considred what weake hopes of supply and succoure they left behinde them, that might bear up their minds in this sade condition and trialls they were under; and they could not but be very smale. It is true, indeed, the affections and love of their brethren at Leyden was cordiall and entire towards them, but they had litle power to help them, or them selves; and how the case stode betweene them and the marchants at their coming away, hath allready been declared. What could now sustaine them but the spirite of God and his grace? May not and ought not the children of these fathers rightly say: Our faithers were Englishmen which came over this great ocean, and were ready to perish in this willdernes; but they cried unto the Lord, and he heard their voyce, and looked on their adversitie, etc. Let them therfore praise the Lord, because he is good, and his mercies endure for ever. Yea, let them which have been redeemed of the Lord shew how he hath delivered them from the hand of the oppressour. When they wandered in the deserte willdernes out of the way, and found no citie to dwell in, both hungrie, and thirstie, their sowle was overwhelmed in them. Let them confess before the Lord his loving kindnes, and his wonderfull works before the sons of men.

1 Deuteronomy xxxiv, I

The 10. Chap.

SHOWING HOW THEY SOUGHT OUT A PLACE OF HABITATION, AND WHAT BEFELL THEM THEREABOUTE.

Being thus arrived at Cap-Codd the 11. of November, and necessitie calling them to looke out a place for habitation. (as well as the maisters and mariners importunitie,) they having brought a large shalop with them out of England, stowed in quarters in the ship, they now gott her out and sett their carpenters to worke to trime her up; but being much brused and shatered in the shipe with foule weather, they saw she would be longe in mending. Wherupon a few of them tendered them selves to goe by land and discovere those nearest places, whilst the shallop was in mending; and the rather because as they wente into that harbor ther seemed to be an opening some 2. or 3 leagues of, which the maister judged to be a river. It was conceived ther might be some danger in the attempte, yet seeing them resolute, they were permited to goe, being 16. of them well armed, under the conduct of Captain Standish, 5

Longfellow's Courtship of Miles Standish makes interesting the following excerpt from Bradford's list of the Pilgrims coming in the Mayflower:

"Captin Myles Standish, and Rose, his wife."

"Mr. Wilham Mullines, and his wife, and 2 children, Joseph and Priscila; and a servant, Robart Carter."

"Usen Alden was hired for a coors at South

"John Alden was hired for a cooper, at South-Hampton, where the ship victuled; and being a hopefull [promising] yong man, was much desired, but left to his owne liking to go or stay when he came here; but he stayed, and maryed here.

here."
Also the following entries, made in 1650:
"Captain Standish his wife died in the first sickness [an epidemic, probably of typhus fever, the first winter], and he married again, and hath four sons living, and some are dead.
"Mr. Molines, and his wife, his sone, and his servant, dyed the first winter. Only his daugter Priscila survived, and maried with John Alden, who are both living and have 11 children. And their eldest daughter is maried and hath five children." children.'

&lt;sup>2</sup> presented

<sup>3</sup> where they wanted to settle 4 the seamen (In the succeeding sentence also, the pronouns referring to the seamen and those referring to the passengers are used indiscriminately.)

having shuch instructions given them as was thought meete. They sett forth the 15, of November: and when they had marched aboute the space of a mile by the sea side, they espied 5. or 6. persons, with a dogg coming towards them, who were salvages; but they fled from them, and ranne up into the woods, and the English followed them, partly to see if they could speake with them, and partly to discover if ther might not be more of them lying in ambush. But the Indeans seeing them selves thus followed, they again forsooke the woods. and rane away on the sands as hard as they could, so as they could not come near them, but followed them by the tracte of their feet sundrie miles, and saw that they had come the same way. So, night coming on, they made their randevous and set out their sentinels, and rested in quiete that night, and the next morning followed their tracte till they had headed a great creake, and so left the sands, and turned an other way into the woods. But they still followed them by geuss, hopeing to find their dwellings; but they soone lost both them and them selves, falling into shuch thickets as were ready to tear their cloaths and armore in peeces. but were most distresed for wante of drinke. But at length they found water and refreshed them selves, being the first New-England water they drunke of, and was now in thir great thirste as pleasante unto them as wine or bear had been in for-times. Afterwards they directed their course to come to the other shore, for they knew it was a necke of land they were to crosse over, and so at length gott to the seaside, and marched to this supposed river, and by the way found a pond of clear fresh water, and shortly after a good quantitie of clear ground wher the Indeans had formerly set corne, and some of their graves. And proceeding furder, they saw new-stuble wher corne had been set the same year, also they found wher latly a house had been, wher some planks and a great ketle was remaining, and heaps of sand newly padled with their hands, which they, digging up, found in them diverce faire Indean baskets filled with corne, and some in eares, faire and good, of diverce collours, which seemed to them a very goodly sight, (haveing never seen any shuch before). This was near the place of that supposed river they came to seeck; unto which they wente and found it to open it selfe into 2. armes with a high cliffe of sand in the enterance, but more like to be crikes of salte water then any fresh, for ought they saw; and that ther was good harborige for their shalope; leaving it further to be discovered by their shalop when she was ready. So their time [that was ] limeted them being expired, they returned to the ship, least they should be in fear of their saftie; and tooke with them parte of the come and buried up the rest, and so like the men from Eshcoll 1 carried with them of the fruits of the land. and showed their breethren; of which, and their returne, they were marvelusly glad, and their harts incouraged.

1630-1650 1856

IOHN WINTHROP 1588-1649

John Winthrop, one of the foremost men in the founding of New England, was a landed gentleman of Suffolk, lord of Groton Manor. He had been educated at Cambridge and was of the Inner Temple. He practiced law in London, and held an administrative office under the crown until his Puritan principles blocked his further progress. Together with other gentlemen he obtained a liberal charter for a new colony overseas whose seat of government should be in the colony, not in London. He was chosen governor and with his assistants (magistrates) and nearly a thousand colonists migrated to Massachusetts Bay in 1630. where they founded Boston.

For twelve of the remaining years of his life Winthrop was chosen governor by annual election. He was a conservative, constructive administrator and statesman, one who believed in fixed creeds and laws, but who also had a large vision of what New England might and should become. His his tory, written in diary form amid the confusion of pressing affairs, should be read from the point of view of a contemporary, and weighed by the outlook of the seventeenth century, not ours. The style is terse and direct, rarely emotional, the expression of a man of affairs. Its chief social interest is its record of the problems and perplexities that the colonists met; of their ideals, their attitude toward government, education, religion. In all these matters Winthrop shows himself to be not only the wise and patient governor of the rank and file of the colonists, but easily chief among a group of men who were equal or superior to him in training and experience, men of strong, assertive personality. His account of what he considered the most important events in the colony shows how intense was the intellectual and social ferment in the Massachusetts of the first few decades, and indicates how New England came to be the intellectual and spiritual leader of the new world for several generations.

Best edition of Winthrop: Original Narratives series, ed. J. K. Hosmer, New York, 1908. R. C. Winthrop, Life and Letters of John Winthrop (authoritative edition), 1869, 1895.

1 Numbers xiii, 24

From HISTORY OF NEW ENGLAND 1

January, [1631] A house at Dorchester was burnt down.

February 11. Mr. Freeman's house at Watertown was burned down, but, being in the daytime, his goods were saved.

5. The ship Lyon, Mr. William Peirce, master, arrived at Nantasket. She brought Mr.
Williams, <sup>2</sup> (a godly minister) with his wife, Mr. Throgmorton, ——Perkins, —— Ong, and others, with their wives and children, about twenty passengers, and about two hundred tons of goods. She set sail from Bristol, December 1. She had a very tempestuous passage, yet, through God's mercy, all her people came safe, except Way his son, <sup>3</sup> who fell from the spritsail yard in a tempest, and could not be recovered, though he kept in sight near a quarter of an hour. Her goods also came all in good condition.

8. The governor 4 went aboard the Lyon, riding by Long Island. 5

9. The Lyon came to an anchor before Boston, where she rode very well, notwithstanding the great drift of ice.

10. The frost brake up; and after that, though we had many snows and sharp frost, yet they continued not, neither were the waters frozen up as before. It hath been observed, ever since this bay was planted by Englishmen, viz., seven years, that at this day the frost hath broken up every year.

The poorer sort of people (who lay long in tents, etc. 6) were much afflicted with the scurvy, and many died, especially at Boston and Charlestown; but when this ship came and brought store of juice of lemons, many recovered speedily. It hath been always observed here, that such as fell into discontent, and lingered 7 after their former conditions in England, fell into the scurvy and died.

18. Captain Welden, a hopeful young gentle, man, and an experienced soldier, died at Charlestown of a consumption, and was buried at Boston with a military funeral.

Of the old planters, s and such as came the year before, there were but two, (and those land.

The journal covers the period between March, 1630, and January, 1649. The manuscript was used by Cotton Mather in writing his Magnalia Christi Americana, and by other historians of New England.

Roger Williams

son of a colonist named Way

Winthrop usually, as here, speaks of himself in the third person.

5 in the lower Boston harbor

"So many had come during the summer before, that houses could not be built at once for all."

Tlonged Sounders of the colony servants) which had the scurvy in all the country. At Plymouth not any had it, no not of those, who came this year, whereof there were above sixty. Whereas, at their first planting there, near the half of their people died of it.

A shallop of Mr. Glover's was cast away upon the rocks about Nahant, but the men were saved.

Of those which went back in the ships this summer, for fear of death or famine, etc., many died by the way and after they were landed, and others fell very sick and low, etc.

The Ambrose, whereof Capt. Lowe was master, being new masted at Charlton, 9 spent 10 all her masts near Newfoundland, and had perished, if Mr. Peirce, in the Lyon, who was her consort, had not towed her home to Bristol. Of the other ships which returned, three, viz., the Charles, the Success, and the Whale, were set upon by Dunkirkers, 11 near Plymouth in England, and after long fight, having lost many men, and being much torn, (especially the Charles) they gat into Plymouth.

The provision, which came to us this year, came at excessive rates, in regard of <sup>12</sup> the dearness of corn <sup>13</sup> in England, so as every bushel of wheat-meal stood us in fourteen shillings, peas eleven shillings, etc. Tonnage was at £6.11.

22. We held a day of thanksgiving for this ship's arrival, by order from the governor and council, directed to all the plantations. <sup>14</sup>

[Nov. 1633.] ... The scarcity of workmen had caused them 15 to raise their wages to an excessive rate, so as a carpenter would have three shillings the day, a laborer two shillings and sixpence, etc., and accordingly those who had commodities to sell advanced their prices sometime double to that they cost in England, so as it grew to a general complaint, which the court, taking knowledge of, as also of some further evils which were springing out of the excessive rates of wages, they made an order that carpenters, masons, etc., should take but two shillings the day, and laborers but eighteen pence, and that no commodity should be sold at above four pence in the shilling more than it cost for ready money in England; oil, wine, etc., and cheese, in regard of the hazard of bringing, etc., [excepted]. The evils which were springing, etc., were: 1. Many spent much time

Dist
 Privateers from Dunkirk, a town on the French coast, at that time held by Spain, which was then at war with England.
 Decause of Wheat

because of 13 wheat 14 all the settlements of the colony under Governor Winthrop's authority 15 i. e., the workmen idly, etc., because they could get as much in four days as would keep them a week. 2. They spent much in tobacco and strong waters, etc., which was a great waste to the commonwealth. which, by reason of so many foreign commodities expended, 1 could not have subsisted to this time, but that it was supplied by the cattle and corn, which were sold to new comers at very dear rates, viz., corn at six shillings the bushel, a cow at £20,—yea, some at £24, some £26,—a mare at £35, an ewe goat at £3 or £4; and yet many cattle were every year brought out of England, and some from Virginia. Soon after order was taken for prices of commodities, viz., not to exceed the rate of four pence in the shilling above the price in England, except cheese and liquors, etc.

[July] 20. [1636] John Gallop, with one man more, and two little boys, coming from Connecticut in a bark of twenty tons, intending to put in at Long Island to trade, and being at the mouth of the harbor, were forced, by a sudden change of the wind, to bear up for Block Island or Fisher's Island, lying before Narragansett, where they espied a small pinnace, which, drawing near unto, they found to be Mr. Oldham's (an old planter, and a member of Watertown congregation, who had been long out a-trading, having with him only two English boys, and two Indians of Narragansett). So they hailed him, but had no answer: and the deck was full of Indians, (fourteen in all) and a canoe was gone from her full of Indians and goods. Whereupon they suspected they had killed John Oldham, 2 and the rather, because the Indians let slip and set up sail. being two miles from shore, and the wind and tide being off the shore of the island, whereby they drove towards the main at Narragansett. Whereupon they went ahead of them, and having but two pieces and two pistols, and nothing but duck shot, they bear up near the Indians, (who stood ready armed with guns, pikes, and swords) and let fly among them, and so galled them as they all gate under hatches. Then they stood off again, and returning with a good gale, they stemmed her upon the quarter 3 and almost overset her, which so frighted the Indians, as six of them leaped overboard and were drowned. Yet they durst not board her, but stood off again, and fitted their anchor, so as, stemming her the second time, they bored her bow through with their anchor, and so sticking fast to her, they made divers shot through her (being but inch board) and so raked her fore and aft, as they must needs kill or hurt some of the Indians: but, seeing none of them come forth, they gate loose from her and stood off again. Then four or five more of the Indians leaped into the sea, and were likewise drowned. So there being now but four left in her, they boarded her: whereupon one Indian came up and vielded: him they bound and put into hold. Then another yielded, whom they bound. But John Gallop, being well acquainted with their skill to untie themselves, if two of them be together. and having no place to keep them asunder, he threw him bound into [the] sea; and, looking about, they found John Oldham under an old seine, stark naked, his head cleft to the brains. and his hand and legs cut as if they had been cutting them off, and yet warm. So they put him into the sea; but could not get to the other two Indians, who were in a little room underneath, with their swords. So they took the goods which were left, and the sails, etc... and towed the boat away; but night coming on, and the wind rising, they were forced to turn her off, and the wind carried her to the Narragansett shore.

[September] 4. [1639] At the general court at Boston, one Mr. Nathaniel Eaton, brother to the merchant at Quilipiack, was convented 4 and censured. The occasion was this: He was a schoolmaster, and had many scholars, 5 the sons of gentlemen and others of best note in the country, and had entertained 6 one Nathaniel Briscoe, a gentleman born, to be his usher. 7 and to do some other things for him, which might not be unfit for a scholar. He had not been with him above three days but he fell out with him for a very small occasion, and, with reproachful terms, discharged him, and turned him out of his doors; but, it being then about eight of the clock after the Sabbath, 8 he told him he should stay till next morning, and, some words growing between them, he struck him and pulled him into his house. Briscoe defended himself, and closed with him, and, being Winthrop seems to mean: foreign luxuries took money out of the colony in payment, and the colony would have been destitute of money, and hence come to naught, had it not been for the local trade in colonial grown cattle and corn.

This murder led to the Pequot War.

<sup>3</sup> struck with their prow aft of the middle summoned to appear

This school was really Harvard College, or, as Cotton Mather says, the "society of scholars to lodge in the new nests" as soon as the candidates for admission should be prepared for the college, which had been founded three years before.

hired assistant teacher sassistant teacher

<sup>8</sup> The Sabbath began at sunset of Saturday and ended at sunset of Sunday.

parted, he came in and went up to his chamber to lodge there. Mr. Eaton sent for the constable, who advised him first to admonish him, etc., and if he could not, by the power of a master, reform him, then he should complain to the magistrate. But he caused his man to fetch him a cudgel, which was a walnut tree plant, big enough to have killed a horse, and a yard in length, and, taking his two men with him, he went up to Briscoe, and caused his men to hold him till he had given him two hundred stripes about the head and shoulders, etc., and so kept him under blows (with some two or three short intermissions) about the space of two hours, about which time Mr. Shepherd and some others of the town came in at the outcry. and so he gave over. In this distress Briscoe gat out his knife, and struck at the man that held him, but hurt him not. He also fell to prayer, (supposing he should have been murdered) and then Mr. Eaton beat him for taking the name of God in vain. After this Mr. Eaton and Mr. Shepherd (who knew not then of these passages1) came to the governor and some other of the magistrates, complaining of Briscoe for his insolent speeches, and for crying out murder and drawing his knife, and desired that he might be enjoined to a public acknowledgment, 2 etc. The magistrates answered that they must first hear him speak, and then they would do as they should see cause. Mr. Eaton was displeased at this, and went away discontented, etc., and, being after called into the court to make answer to the information which had been given by some who knew the truth of the case, and also to answer for his neglect and cruelty, and other ill usage towards his scholars, one of the elders (not suspecting such miscarriages 3 by him) came to the governor, and showed himself much grieved that he should be publicly produced, 4 alleging that it would derogate from his authority and reverence among his scholars, etc. But the cause 5 went on notwithstanding, and he was called, and these things laid to his charge in the open court. His answers were full of pride and disdain, telling the magistrates that they should not need-to do any thing herein, for he was intended to leave his employment. And being asked why he used such cruelty to Briscoe his usher, and to other his scholars, (for it was testified by another of his ushers and divers of his scholars that he would give them between twenty and thirty stripes at a time, and would occurrences

induced to confess publicly black to appear legal proceedings

not leave till they had confessed what he required) his answer was that he had this rule. that he would not give over correcting till he had subdued the party to his will. Being also questioned about the ill and scant diet of his boarders, (for, though their friends gave large allowance, yet their diet was ordinarily nothing but porridge and pudding, and that very homely) he put it off to his wife. So the court dismissed him at present, and commanded him to attend again the next day, when, being called, he was commanded to the lower end of the table, (where all offenders do usually stand) and, being openly convict 6 of all the former offences, by the oaths of four or five witnesses. he yet continued to justify himself: so, it being near night, he was committed to the marshal till the next day. When the court was set in the morning, many of the elders came into the court, (it being then private for matter of consultation) and declared how, the evening before, they had taken pains with him, to convince him of his faults; yet, for divers hours, he had still stood to his justification; but, in the end, he was convinced, and had freely and fully acknowledged his sin, and that with tears; so as they did hope he had truly repented, and therefore desired of the court that he might be pardoned, and continued in his employment. alleging such further reasons as they thought fit. After the elders were departed, the court consulted about it, and sent for him, and there, in the open court, before a great assembly, he made a very solid, wise, eloquent, and serious (seeming) confession, condemning himself in all the particulars, etc. Whereupon, being put aside, the court consulted privately about his sentence, and, though many were taken with his confession, and none but had a charitable opinion of it; yet, because of the scandal of religion, and offence which would be given to such as might intend to send their children hither, they all agreed to censure him, and put him from that employment. So, being called in, the governor, after a short preface, etc., declared the sentence of the court to this effect, viz.: that he should give Briscoe £30, [be] fined 100 marks, 8 and debarred teaching of children within our jurisdiction. A pause being made, and expectation that (according to his former confession) he would have given glory to God, and acknowledged the justice and clemency of the court, the governor giving him occasion, by asking him if he had aught to say,

<sup>3</sup> misdemeanors

<sup>6</sup> convicted

<sup>7</sup> ruling officials of the church

<sup>8</sup> about £67

he turned away with a discontented look, saying, "If sentence be passed, then it is to no end to speak." Yet the court remitted his fine to £20, and willed Briscoe to take but £20.

The church at Cambridge, taking notice of these proceedings, intended to deal with him. The pastor moved 1 the governor, if they might, without offence to the court, examine other witnesses. His answer was that the court would leave them to their own liberty; but he saw not to what end they should do it, seeing there had been five already upon oath, and those whom they should examine should speak without oath, and it was an ordinance of God that by the mouths of two or three witnesses every matter should be established. 2 But he soon discovered himself; for, ere the church could come to deal with him, he fled to Pascataguack, and, being pursued and apprehended by the governor there, he again acknowledged his great sin in flying, etc., and promised (as he was a Christian man) he would return with the messengers. But, because his things he carried with him were aboard a bark there, bound to Virginia, he desired leave to go fetch them. which they assented unto, and went with him (three of them) aboard with him. So he took his truss 3 and came away with them in the boat: but, being come to the shore, and two of them going out of the boat, he caused the boatsmen to put off the boat, and because the third man would not go out, he turned him into the water, where he had been drowned, if he had not saved himself by swimming. So he returned to the bark, and presently they set sail and went out of the harbor. Being thus gone, his creditors began to complain; and thereupon it was found that he was run in debt about £1000, and had taken up most of this money upon bills he had charged into England upon his brother's agents, and others whom he had no such relation to. So his estate was seized, and put into commissioners' hands, to be divided among his creditors, allowing somewhat for the present maintenance of his wife and children. And, being thus gone, the church proceeded and cast him out. He had been sometimes 4 initiated among the Jesuits, and, coming into England, his friends drew him from them, but, it was very probable, he now intended to return to them again, being at this time about thirty years of age, and upwards. See after.

1 submitted the proposal to

[December 1640] ... Mr. Nathaniel Eaton, of whom mention is made before, being come to Virginia, took upon him to be a minister, but was given up of God to extreme pride and sensuality, being usually drunken, as the custom is there. He sent for his wife and children. Her friends here persuaded her to stay awhile, but she went notwithstanding, and the vessel was never heard of after.

[September 22. 1642] The court, with advice of the elders, ordered a general fast. The occasions were, 1. The ill news we had out of England concerning the breach between the King and Parliament. 2. The danger of the Indians. 3. The unseasonable weather, the rain having continued so long, viz. near a fortnight together, scarce one fair day, and much corn and hay spoiled, though indeed it proved a blessing to us, for it being with warm easterly winds, it brought the Indian corn to maturity, which otherwise would not have been ripe, and it pleased God, that so soon as the fast was agreed upon, the weather changed, and proved fair after.

At this court, the propositions sent from Connecticut, about a combination, <sup>6</sup> etc., were read, and referred to a committee to consider of after the court, who meeting, added some few cautions and new articles, and for the taking in of Plymouth, (who were now willing) and Sir Ferdinando Gorges' province, <sup>7</sup> and so returned them back to Connecticut, to be considered upon against the spring, for winter was now approaching, and there could be no meeting before, etc.

The sudden fall of land and cattle, and the scarcity of foreign commodities, and money. etc., with the thin access of people from England, put many into an unsettled frame of spirit. so as they concluded there would be no subsisting here, and accordingly they began to hasten away, some to the West Indies, others to the Dutch, at Long Island, etc., (for the governor there invited them by fair offers) and others back for England. Among others who returned thither, there was one of the magistrates, Mr. Humfrey, and four ministers, and a schoolmaster. These would needs go against all advice, and had a fair and speedy voyage, till they came near England, all which time, three of the ministers, with the schoolmaster, spake reproachfully of the people and of the country, but the wind coming up against them.

&lt;sup>2</sup> 2 Corinthians xiii, 1

<sup>3</sup> bundle (of effects) 4 sometime, at one time

&lt;sup>5</sup> the Civil War in England <sup>7</sup> afterwards Maine <sup>6</sup> for mutual protection and defense

they were tossed up and down, being in 10ber 1 so long till their provisions and other necessaries were near spent, and they were forced to strait allowance, yet at length the wind coming fair again, they got into the Sleeve, 2 but then there arose so great a tempest at S.E. as they could bear no sail, and so were out of hope of being saved (being in the night also). Then they humbled themselves before the Lord, and acknowledged God's hand to be justly out against them for speaking evil of this good land and the Lord's people here, etc. Only one of them. Mr. Phillips of Wrentham, in England, had not joined with the rest, but spake well of the people, and of the country; upon this it pleased the Lord to spare their lives, and when they expected every moment to have been dashed upon the rocks, (for they were hard by the Needles 3) he turned the wind so as they were carried safe to the Isle of Wight by St. Helen's: vet the Lord followed them on shore. Some were exposed to great straits and found no entertainment, their friends forsaking them. One had a daughter that presently ran mad. . . . The schoolmaster had no sooner hired an house, and gotten in some scholars, but the plague set in, and took away two of his own children.

Others who went to other places, upon like grounds, succeeded no better. They fled for fear of want, and many of them fell into it, even to extremity, as if they had hastened into the misery which they feared and fled from, besides the depriving themselves of the ordinances 4 and church fellowship, and those civil liberties which they enjoyed here; whereas, such as staid in their places, kept their peace and ease, and enjoyed still the blessing of the ordinances, and never tasted of those troubles and miseries which they heard to have befallen those who departed. Much disputation there was about liberty of removing for outward advantages, and all ways were sought for an open door to get out at; but it is to be feared many crept out at a broken wall. For such as come together into a wilderness, where are nothing but wild beasts and beastlike men, and there confederate together in civil and church estate, whereby they do, implicitly at least, bind themselves to support each other, and all of them that society, whether civil or sacred, whereof they are members, how they can break from this without free consent, is hard to find, so as may satisfy a tender or good conscience in time of trial. Ask thy conscience, if thou wouldst have plucked up thy stakes, and brought thy family 3000 miles, if thou hadst expected that all. or most, would have forsaken thee there. Ask again, what liberty thou hast towards others, which thou likest not to allow others towards thyself: for if one may go, another may, and so the greater part, and so church and commonwealth may be left destitute in a wilderness, exposed to misery and reproach, and all for thy ease and pleasure, whereas these all, being now thy brethren, as near to thee as the Israelites were to Moses, it were much safer for thee, after his example, to choose rather to suffer affliction with thy brethren, than to enlarge thy ease and pleasure by furthering the occasion of their ruin. 5

Nine bachelors commenced 6 at Cambridge; they were young men of good hope, and performed their acts, 7 so as gave good proof of their proficiency in the tongues and arts. (8.) [October] 5. The general court had settled a government or superintendency over the college, viz., all the magistrates and elders over the six nearest churches and the president, or the greatest part of these. Most of them were now present at this first commencement, and dined at the college with the scholars' ordinary commons, which was done of purpose for the students' encouragement, etc., and it gave good content to all.

At this commencement, complaint was made to the governors of two young men, of good quality, 8 lately come out of England, for foul misbehavior, in swearing and ribaldry speeches, etc., for which, though they were adulti, 9 they were corrected 10 in the college, and sequestered, etc.. for a time.

1790: 1825-26

Winthrop's usual abbreviation for the month of December; the year began with March.
 La Manche (Fr. sleeve), the English Channel rocks near the Isle of Wight services of the (Puritan) church, forbidden in Eng-

Amid the trials of leadership Winthrop may often with good reason have felt himself to be the Moses of the New England people. It is well to remember that this passage was written by the same man who recorded in a single line the death of his son.

<sup>6</sup> graduated <sup>6</sup> graduated <sup>7</sup> parts; Cotton Mather says, "these exercises were, besides an oration usually made by the President, orations both salutatory and valedictory, made by some or other of the commencers, wherein all persons and orders of any fashion then present were addressed with proper complements, and reflections were made on the most remarkable occurrents of the preceding year; and these orations were made not only in Latin, but sometimes in Greek and in Hebrew also; and some of them were in verse, and even in Greekverse, as well as others in prose."—Magnalia Christi Americana, Book IV; Vol. ii, p. 12, ed. 1853.

<sup>1853.</sup> 8 birth

<sup>10</sup> probably, whipped

THE BAY PSALM BOOK 1

The first English book printed in North America was The Bay Psalm Book, published at Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1640. Cotton Mather says of it, "About the year 1639, the New England reformers, considering that their churches enjoyed the other ordinances of Heaven in their scriptural purity, were willing that the ordinance of 'the singing of Psalms' should be restored among them unto a share in that purity." A committee of three ministers did the work.

The attitude of the translators toward artistic excellence is worth noting. In the preface they say: "If therefore the verses are not always so smooth and elegant as some may desire or expect; let them consider that Gods Altar needs not our polishings: Ex. 20. for wee have respected rather a plaine translation, then to smooth our verses with the sweetnes of any paraphrase, and soe have attended Conscience rather than Elegance, fidelity rather then poetry, in translating the hebrew words into english language, and Davids poetry into english meetre; that soe wee may sing in Sion the Lords songs of prayse according to his owne will; untill hee take us from hence, and wipe away all our teares, & bid us enter into our masters joye to sing eternall Halleluiahs."

<sup>1</sup> The selections given follow the spelling and punctuation of the original edition.

Best edition: facsimile edition edited by Wilberforce Eames, The New England Society, New York, 1903.

23 A Pfalme of David. The Lord to mee a shepheard is, want therefore shall not I.

- Hee in the folds of tender-graffe, doth cause mee downe to lie:
   To waters calme me gently leads
- Reftore my foule doth hee: he doth in paths of righteousness for his names fake leade mee.
- 4 Yea though in valley of deaths shade I walk, none ill I'le feare: because thou art with mee, thy rod, and staffe my comfort are.
- s For mee a table thou hast spread, in presence of my foes: thou dost annoynt my head with oyle, my cup it over-flowes.
- 6 Goodnes & mercy furely shall all my dayes follow mee: and in the Lords house I shall dwell so long as dayes shall bee.

Psalme 24

A psalme of david:

THE earth Ichovahs is, and the fulnesse of it: the habitable world, & they that there upon doe sit.

- 2 Because upon the seas, hee hath it firmly layd: and it upon the water-floods most sollidly hath stayd.
- 3 The mountaine of the Lord, who shall thereto ascend? and in his place of holynes, who is it that shall stand?
- 4 The cleane in hands, & pure in heart; to vanity who hath not lifted up his soule, nor sworne deceitfully.

5 From God he shall receive a benediction, and righteousnes from the strong-God of his salvation.

6 This is the progenie of them that seek thy face:
of them that doe inquire for him:
of Iacob 'tis the race.

Selah. 1

7 Yee gates lift-up your heads, and doors everlasting, be yee lift up: & there into shall come the glorious-King

8 Who is this glorious King?
Iehovah, puissant, and valiant, Iehovah is in hattel valiant

9 Yee gates lift-up your heads, and doors everlasting, doe yee lift-up: & there into shall come the glorious-King, 10 Who is this glorious-King?

loe, it is Iehovah of warlike armies, hee the King of glory is; Selah.

Psalme 121.

A song of degrees.

I to the hills lift up mine eyes, from whence shall come mine aid 2 Mine help doth from Iehovah come, which heav'n & earth hath made.

3 Hee will not let thy foot be mov'd, nor slumber; that thee keeps.

4 Loe hee that keepeth Israell, hee slumbreth not, nor sleeps.

5 The Lord thy keeper is, the Lord on thy right hand the shade.

6 The Sun by day, nor Moone by night, shall thee by stroke invade.

7 The Lord will keep the from all ill: thy soule hee keeps alway,

8 Thy going out, & thy income, the Lord keeps now & aye.

1640

NATHANIEL WARD 1578-1652

In Ward's writings we get a taste of the controversial satire of the times, not confined to religious discussions within the Puritan church, but marking debate in general throughout Christendom. Discussion, in those days, became personal as it grew in earnestness; good manners in expressing opinion Ward was born in England, was are modern M.A. of Emanuel College, Cambridge, 1603, studied and practiced law, traveled on the Continent, was rector of Stondon Massey, until excommunicated by Archbishop Laud for Puritan teachings in 1633. He emigrated to New England and was colleague pastor at Agawam, or Ipswich, 1634-36. He compiled the first Massachusetts code of laws, The Body of Liberties, 1641. Five years later he returned to England, re-entered the ministry, then controlled by the Puritan Parliament, received the living of Shenfield, Essex, and served until his death. It is interesting that The Simple Cobbler, written at Agawam, went through four editions in London within a year.

<sup>1</sup> The word perhaps indicated a pause or choral direction in the original singing of the psalm.

The book is a satire against any toleration by the Puritans of liberalism in religion, and also against what were thought to be dangerous social customs. Ward with many others of his generation felt that their time was one of tremendous moral crisis; that is that a general judgment was imminent, that Satan would be dethroned, and that the chosen of God would rule the earth. Such an unfolding of the immediate future seemed to them foretold in the persecution of the Puritans in England, the flight to America, and the civil war then in progress in the mother country. To them these events were the fulfillment of ancient prophecies, as the first sentence of the present selection (beginning the book) indicates.

Professor Tyler says: "Upon the whole, The Simple Cobbler of Agawam is a droll and pungent bit of early American prose, with many literary offenses upon its head: an excessive fondness for antitheses; an untempered enjoyment of quirks and turns and petty freaks of phraseology; the pursuit of puns and metaphors beyond all decorum; the blurring of its sentences with great daubs and patches of Latin quotation; the willing employment of outlandish and uncouth words belonging to no language at all, sometimes huddled together into combinations that defy syntax and set all readers aghast."

In The Simple Cobbler Ward reveals one type of the American Puritan: a man whose face was turned toward the past, toward medievalism and asceticism. In The Bloody Tenet of Persecution Williams reveals another type: the man of progressive and tolerant ideas, who faced forward, toward religious enlightenment and freedom. It is well to get clearly in mind the point of view of the Bay Colony Massachusetts Puritans. They had founded a colony not at all in the interests of religious freedom, as we know it, but to promote and to propagate their own religious opinions and practices. Naturally, they did not welcome but often banished those who came to stir up religious dissension among them. They felt that those who were trying to tear down what they themselves were spending their fortunes and their lives in building up should go elsewhere and found, if they wished, their own communities. There was, they felt, plenty of empty space in the New World for everyone.

From THE SIMPLE COBLER OF AGGAV-VAMM IN AMERICA 1

SILTOR ULTRA CREPIDAM 2

Either I am in an appoplexie, or that man is in a lethargie, who doth not now sensibly feele God shaking the heavens over his head. and the earth under his feet; the heavens so, as the sun begins to turne into darknesse. the moon into blood. 3 the starres to fall down to the ground: so that little light of comfort or counsell is left to the sonnes of men; the earth so, as the foundations are failing, the righteous scarce know where to finde rest, the inhabitants stagger like drunken men: it is in a manner dissolved both in religions and relations: and no marvell; for, they have defiled it by transgressing the lawes, changing the ordinances, and breaking the everlasting covenant. The truths of God are the pillars of the world, wheron states and churches may stand quiet if they will; if they will not, hee can easily shake them off into delusions, and distractions enough.

Sathan is now in his passions, he feeles his passion 4 approaching; hee loves to fish in Though that dragon cannot rovled waters. sting the vitals of the elect mortally, yet that Beelzebub 5 can fly-blow their intellectuals miserably: the finer religion grows, the finer hee spins his cobwebs, hee will hold pace with Christ so long as his wits will serve him. Hee sees himselfe beaten out of grosse idolatries, heresies, ceremonies, where the light breakes forth with power: he will therefore bestirre him to prevaricate evangelical truths, and ordinances, that if they will needs be walking, vet they shall laborare varicibus, 6 and not keep their path, he will put them out of time and place: assassinating for his engineers, men of Paracelsian parts; well complexioned for honesty; for, such are fittest to mountebanke his ¹ The selections from Ward conform in spelling and punctuation with the original volume. The complete title is as follows: "The Simple Cobler of Aggavamm in America. Willing to help mend his Native Country, lamentably tattered, both in the upper-Leather and sole, with all the honest stitches he can take. And is willing never to bee paid for his work, by Old English wonted pay. It is his Trade to patch all the year long, gratis. Therefore I pray Gentlemen keep your purses. By Theodore de la Guard." The pseudonym is a translation of the author's own name, Theodore meaning "Gift of God" in Greek, as Nathaniel does in Hebrew.

² Literally, the cobbler beyond his last; that is, not sticking to his last: appropos of the Latin proverb, ne sutor subra crepidam judicaret, let not the cobbler pass judgment on things beyond his last.
³ Joel ii, 31 1 The selections from Ward conform in spelling and chimistry into sicke churches and weake judgements. 7

Nor shall hee need to stretch his strength over-much in this worke; too many men having not laid their foundations sure, nor ballasted their spirits deepe with humility and feare, are prest 8 enough of themselves to evaporate their owne apprehensions. Those that are acquainted with story know, it hath ever beene so in new editions of churches; such as are least able, are most busie to pudder in the rubbish, and to raise dust in the eyes of more steady repayrers. Civill commotions make roome for uncivill practises: religious mutations, for irreligious opinions: change of aire, discovers corrupt bodies; reformation of religion, unsound mindes. Hee that hath any well-faced phansy in his crowne. and doth not vent it now, fears the pride of his owne heart will dub him dunce for ever. Such a one will trouble the whole Israel of God 9 with his most untimely births, though he makes the bones of his vanity stick up, to the view and griefe of all that are godly wise. The devill desiers no better sport then to see light heads handle their heels, and fetch their carreers in a time, when the roofe of liberty stands open.

The next perplexed question, with pious and ponderous 10 men, will be: what should bee done for the healing of these comfortlesse exulcerations. I am the unablest adviser of a thousand. the unworthiest of ten thousand; yet I hope I may presume to assert what follows without iust offence.

First, such as have given or taken any unfriendly reports 11 of us New-English, should doe well to recollect themselves. Wee have beene reputed a colluvies 12 of wild opinionists, swarmed into a remote wildernes to find elbowroome for our phanatick doctrines and practises: I trust our diligence past, and constant sedulity against such persons and courses, will plead better things for us. I dare take upon me, to bee the herauld of New-England so farre, as to proclaime to the world, in the name of our colony, that all Familists, Antinomians, Ana baptists. 13 and other enthusiasts shall have free

<sup>3</sup> Joel ii, 31 4 death throes

&lt;sup>5</sup> prince of demons

<sup>6</sup> be afflicted with an enlarged vein, as in the thigh (hence, walk haltingly)

&lt;sup>7</sup> The passage "assassinating . . . . judgements" may be explained thus: destroying all good within them, so that he can use as his own plotters, these men who are as talented as Paracelsus (a celebrated medieval physician), well balanced in honesty; for such are fittest to introduce by trickery his deception into sick churches and persons of weak judgment.

<sup>8</sup> ready o the entire Christian Church (the chosen ones replacing, in God's favor, the descendents of Israel)

<sup>10</sup> grave, deliberate 11 See Winthrop's attitude in the same matter, p. 17. 12 offscourings, rabble

<sup>13</sup> various dissenting sects holding views contrary to those of the Puritans liberty to keepe away from us, and such as will come to be gone as fast as they can, the sooner the better

Secondly, I dare averre, that God doth no where in his word tolerate Christian states, to give tolerations to such adversaries of his truth. if they have power in their hands to suppresse

Here is lately brought us an extract of a Magna Charta, 1 so called, compiled between the sub-planters 2 of a West-Indian island; whereof the first article of constipulation, firmly provides free stable-room and litter for all kinde of consciences, be they never so dirty or jadish: making it actionable, yea, treasonable, to disturbe any man in his religion, or to discommend it, whatever it be. Wee are very sorry to see such professed prophanenesse in English professors, 3 as industriously to lay their religious foundations on the ruine of true religion: which strictly binds every conscience to contend earnestly for the truth: to preserve unity of spirit. faith and ordinances, to be all like minded, of one accord; every man to take his brother into his Christian care: to stand fast with one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel. And by no meanes to permit heresies or erronious opinions: but God abhorring such loathsome beverages, hath in his righteous judgement blasted that enterprize, which might otherwise have prospered well, for ought I know; I presume their case is generally knowne ere this. 4

If the devill might have his free option, I beleeve he would ask nothing else, but liberty to enfranchize all false religions, and to embondage the true; nor should hee need: it is much to be feared, that laxe tolerations upon state-pretences and planting necessities, 5 will be the next subtle stratagem he will spread to distate 6 the truth of God and supplant the peace of the churches. Tolerations in things tolerable, exquisitely drawn out by the lines of the scripture, and pensill of the spirit, are the sacred favours of truth, the due latitudes of love, the faire compartiments of Christian fraternity: but irregular dispensations, dealt forth by the facilities of men, are the frontiers of error, the redoubts of schisme, the perillous irritaments 7 of carnall and spirituall enmity.

My heart hath naturally detested foure things: the standing of the Apocrypha 8 in the Bible: forrainers dwelling in my countrey, to crowd out native subjects into the corners of the earth; alchymized 9 coines; tolerations of divers religions, or of one religion in segregant 10 shapes: he that willingly assents to the last. if he examines his heart by day-light, his conscience will tell him, he is either an atheist, or an heretique, or an hypocrite, or at best a captive to some lust: poly-piety is the greatest impiety in the world. True religion is ignis probationis, which doth congregare homogenea & segregare heterogenea. 11

Not to tolerate things meerly indifferent to weak consciences, argues a conscience too strong: pressed uniformity in these, causes much disunity: to tolerate more then indifferents. 12 is not to deale indifferently with God: he that doth it, takes his scepter out of his hand, and bids him stand by. Who hath to doe to institute religion but God. The power of all religion and ordinances, lies in their purity: their purity in their simplicity: then are mixtures pernicious. I lived in a city, where a Papist preached in one church, a Lutheran in another, a Calvinist in a third; a Lutheran one part of the day, a Calvinist the other, in the same pulpit: the religion of that place was but motly and meagre, their affections leopard-like.

If the whole creature should conspire to doe the Creator a mischiefe, or offer him an insolency, it would be in nothing more, than in erecting untruths against his truth, or by sophisticating his truths with humane medleves: the removing of some one jota in scripture, may draw out all the life, and traverse all the truth of the whole Bible: but to authorise an untruth, by a toleration of state, is to build a sconce against 13 the walls of heaven, to batter God out of his chaire: to tell a practical lye, is a great sin, but yet transient; but to set up a theoricall untruth, is to warrant every lye that lyes from its root to the top of every branch it hath, which are not a few.

SHOULD I not keepe promise in speaking a little to womens fashions, they would take it unkindly: I was loath to pester better matter with such stuffe; I rather thought it meet to let them stand by themselves like the Quae Genus

&lt;sup>1</sup> constitution (in reference to the Magna Charta or first written document of the English constitutional liberties)

&lt;sup>2</sup> Settlers, not proprietors; the facts are mentioned in Edward Johnson's Wonder-Working Providence, New York, Scribner's, 1910, Book II, Chapter xx.

the variation of the planting of a colony disstate: lower in position the planting of a colony disstate: lower in position incentives

s books of the Old Testament of doubtful authenticity, retained by the English church, but not as a foundation for doctrine counterfeit 10 separated, sectarian 11 a fire-test which doth bring together the like and scatter the unlike

<sup>12</sup> non-essentials 18 battlement over against

in the grammer. 1 being deficients, or redundants, not to be brought under any rule: I shall therefore make bold for this once, to borrow a little of their loose tongued liberty, and mispend a word or two upon their long-wasted. but short-skirted patience: a little use of my stirrup will doe no harme.

Ridentem dicere verum, quid prohibet? 2 Gray gravity it selfe can well beteam,3 That language be adapted to the theme. He that to parrots speaks, must parrotise: He that instructs a foole, may act th' unwise.

It is known more then enough, that I am neither nigard, nor cinick, to the due bravery of the true gentry: if any man mislikes a bullymong drossock 4 more than I, let him take her for his labour: I honour the woman that can honour her selfe with her attire: a good text alwayes deserves a fair margent; I am not much offended, if I see a trimme, 5 far trimmer than she that weares it: in a word, whatever Christianity or civility will allow, I can afford with London measure: 6 but when I heare a nugiperous 7 gentledame inquire what dresse the queen is in this week: what the nudiustertian 8 fashion of the court; with egge 9 to be in it in all haste, whatever it be: I look at her as the very gizzard of a trifle, the product of a quarter of a cypher, the epitome of nothing, fitter to be kickt, if shee were of a kickable substance, than either honour'd or humour'd.

To speak moderately, I truly confesse it is beyond the ken of my understanding to conceive, how those women should have any true grace, or valuable vertue, that have so little wit, as to disfigure themselves with such exotick garbes, as not only dismantles their native lovely lustre, but transclouts 10 them into gant-bar-geese, 11 ill-shapen-shotten 12-shell-fish, Egyptian hyeroglyphicks, or at the best into French flurts of the pastery, 13 which a proper

<sup>1</sup> The reference is probably to some well-known rule of Latin grammar, known by the catchwords quae genus.

2 Ridentem dicere verum quid vetat? What prohibits one speaking the truth in laughter?-Horace, Satires, I, i, 24-25.

4 Bullimong is a variety of grains sown together producing a mixed crop. Drassock is an untidy

<sup>6</sup> ornament 6 rather more than a full yard, customary among London merchants

7 trifle-inventing

8 of the day before yesterday (Latin, nudius tertius)

peagerness
To clout is to patch; hence, transform by patchwork.
Misprint: the passage should read: gant [dialect for gaunt] bar-geese [or barnacle geese]. These birds of Arctic origin frequented British waters at some seasons.

12 thin, from having spawned 18 the place where pastry is made English woman should scorne with her heels: it is no marvell they weare drailes 14 on the hinder part of their heads, having nothing as it seems in the fore-part, but a few squirrils brains to help them frisk from one ill-favour'd fashion to another.

These whimm-crown'd shees, these fashion-fansying wits.

Are empty thin brain'd shells, and fidling kits.

The very troublers and impoverishers of mankind, I can hardly forbeare to commend to the world a saying of a lady living sometime with the queen of Bohemia. I know not where shee found it, but it is pitty it should be lost.

The world is full of care, much like unto a bubble: Women and care, and care and women, and women and care and trouble.

The verses are even enough for such odde pegma's 15 I can make my selfe sicke at any time, with comparing the dazling splender wherewith our gentlewomen were imbellished in some former habits, with the gut-foundred 16 goosdom, wherewith they are now surcingled and debauched. Wee have about five or six of them in our colony: if I see any of them accidentally. I cannot cleanse my phansie of them for a moneth after. I have been a solitary widdower almost twelve years, purposed lately to make a step over to my native country for a voke-fellow: but when I consider how women there have tripe-wifed 17 themselves with their cladments. 18 I have no heart to the voyage, least their nauseous shapes and the sea, should work too sorely upon my stomach. I speak sadly; me thinkes it should breake the hearts of English-men, to see so many goodly Englishwomen imprisoned in French cages, peering out of their hood-holes for some men of mercy to help them with a little wit, and no body relieves them.

It is a more common then convenient saving. that nine taylors make a man: it were well if nineteene could make a woman to her minde: if taylors were men indeed, well furnished but with meer morall principles, they would disdain to be led about like apes, by such mymick marmosets. It is a most unworthy thing for men that have bones in them, to spend their

14 trailing head-dresses <sup>15</sup> A pegma is a framework used in theatrical representations, sometimes bearing an inscription. Here, perhaps, the verses, though uneven, are good enough to apply to such odd frameworks as women make of themselves, in displaying their clothes. 16 on the point of starvation

17 A tripe-wife is a woman who dresses tripe; used contemptuously. 18 garments lives in making fidle-cases for fatulous 1 womens phansies: which are the very pettitoes 2 of infirmity, the giblets of perquisquilian 3 toyes. I am so charitable to think, that most of that mystery would worke the cheerfuller while they live, if they might bee well discharged of the tyring slavery of mis-tyring women: it is no little labour to be continually putting up English-women into out-landish caskes: who if they be not shifted anew, once in a few months. grow too sowre for their husbands. What this trade will answer for themselves when God shall take measure of taylors consciences is beyond my skill to imagine. There was a time when

The jouning of the red-rose with the white. Did set our state into a damask plight. 4

But now our roses are turned to flore de lices, 5 our carnations to tulips, our gilliflowers to dayzes, our city-dames, to an indenominable quaemalry 6 of overturcas'd 7 things. Hee that makes coates for the moone, had need to take measure every noone; and he that makes for women, as often, to keepe them from lunacy.

I have often heard divers ladies vent loud feminine complaints of the wearisome varieties and chargable changes of fashions: I marvell themselves preferre not a bill of redresse. I would Essex ladies would lead the chore. 8 for the honour of their country and persons; or rather the thrice honorable ladies of the court, whom it best beesemes: who may wel presume of a le roy le veult 9 from our sober King, a les seigneurs ont assentus 10 from our prudent peers, and the like assentus, from our considerate. I dare not say wife-worne commons: who I beleeve had much rather passe one such bill, than pay so many taylors bills as they are forced to doe.

Most deare and unparallel'd ladies, be pleased to attempt it: as you have the precellency 11

1 foolish <sup>2</sup> pigs' feet when used for food (contemptuously, trifles) of the women of the world for beauty and feature; so assume the honour to give, and not take law from any, in matter of attire: if ye can transact so faire a motion among your selves unanimously, I dare say, they that most renite, 12 will least repent. What greater honour can your honors desire, then to build a promontory president 13 to all foraigne ladies, to deserve so eminently at the hands of all the English gentry present and to come; and to confute the opinion of all the wise men in the world: who never thought it possible for women to doe so good a work?

If any man think I have spoken rather merrily than seriously he is much mistaken. I have written what I write with all the indignation I can, and no more then I ought. I confesse I veer'd my tongue to this kinde of language de industria 14 though unwillingly, supposing those I speak to are uncapable of grave and rationall arguments.

I desire all ladies and gentlewomen to understand that all this while I intend not such as through necessary modesty to avoyd morose singularity, follow fashions slowly, a flight shot or two off, shewing by their moderation, that they rather draw countermont 15 with their hearts, then put on by their examples.

I point my pen only against the light-heel'd beagles that lead the chase so fast, that they run all civility out of breath, against these apeheaded pullets, which invent antique foolefangles, meerly for fashion and novelty sake.

1645-1646 1647

THE NEW ENGLAND PRIMER 16

The New England Primer was practically the only textbook used in the primary schools of New England in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Its utility to the Puritans lay in the fact that it combined religious and secular instruction, as the title page announces. The date of the first edition is unknown, but it must have been after 1650; it continued to be printed in varying editions throughout the northern provinces and states until the beginning of the nineteenth century. Six or seven generations of New England men and women grew up knowing this book by heart. Its religious and moral maxims were the essence of Puritan belief and life, and their influence has been incalculable.

See P. L. Ford, The New England Primer: A History of its Origin and Development, 1897.

<sup>3</sup> worthless worthless

Reference is to the "Wars of the Roses" between the rival houses of Lancaster and York, the former taking the red and the latter the white rose as a badge. The houses were joined in Henry VII, 1485. The "damask plight" is a figurative allusion to the happy blending of the houses of York and Lancaster which brought reace.

peace.

h ficur de lis The idea of this and the following figures is that things of natural beauty are turned artificially into things more showy.

perhaps, that which causes qualms: disgusting covered with turquoises: over-adorned

<sup>8</sup> A dance or company of dancers, or a choir; Ward was an Essex man.

<sup>9</sup> the king wills it 10 the lords have consented 11 superiority, pre-eminence

<sup>14</sup> laboriously, not naturally 12 show reluctance

<sup>13</sup> striking precedent

in thill, against the natural course
The facsimile reprint follows the earliest copy known, a unique copy in the Lenox Library, New York.

As runs the Glafe Mans life doth pafs. My Book and Heart Shall never part. Fob feels the Rod Yet bleffes GOD Our RING the good No man of blood. The Lion bold The Lamb doth hold.

Nightingales sing. In time of Spring.

The Royal Oak it was the Tree That sav'd his Royal Majesty. 1

Peter denies His Lord and cries.

Oueen Esther comes In Royal state To save the Jews From dismal fate.

Rachel doth mourn For her first born

Samuel anoints Whom God appoints. 2

Time cuts down all. Both great and small.

Uriah's beauteous wife, Made David seek his life 3

Whales in the Sea God's Voice obey.

After the battle of Worcester, Charles II escaped from the Parliamentary army by hiding in an oak.

<sup>2</sup> See 1 Samuel x. 1.

<sup>3</sup> See 2 Samuel xi.

Xerxes the great did die And so must you and I.

Youth forward slips Death soonest nips.

Zacheus he Did climb the Tree His Lord to see <sup>1</sup>

ROGER WILLIAMS 1605-1683

To Williams belongs the distinction of being, among American colonial leaders of his time, the man most liberal in respect to religious toleration. He was born in London, and died at Providence. Rhode Island. As a youth he was a protégé of Sir Edward Coke, who sent him to Cambridge, where he graduated, 1627. He was perhaps licensed to preach in the English Church, but came to Massachusetts in 1631. Because of his liberal views he was banished from the colony in 1634; he founded Providence the following year, and later visited England, where he obtained for Rhode Island a charter that allowed freedom of worship. Outside of Holland there were few places in Christendom where religious toleration was then practiced.

The Bloudy Tenent originated, according to Williams's account, as follows: To John Cotton, minister at Boston, had been proposed the question, "Whether persecution for cause of conscience be not against the doctrine of Jesus Christ, the King of Kings." Cotton had replied at some length, maintaining, among other things, "that Christians sinning against light of faith and conscience may justly be censured by the Church with excommunication, and by the civil sword also, in case they shall corrupt others to the perdition of their souls."

It is against this opinion, which may be said to represent the majority opinion of the Massachusetts Puritans, that The Bloudy Tenent is directed. The book was written while Williams was in London, and was published there. It is interesting to observe that it appeared in the same year with the more famous Areopagitica of John Milton, both of them documents in the long contest for the freedom of the human spirit. Later, Williams came to know Milton personally, and to assist him in the study of the Dutch language.

In reading this selection it is well to compare it with that from Ward, and to note the temperate mood in which it is written, a spirit seldom found in religious controversies of the day. Williams's style is scriptural and figurative like that of much English prose then written. Cotton and Williams do not seem to have been on unfriendly terms, notwithstanding their religious differences. To The Bloudy Tenent Cotton published a rejoinder, The Bloudy Tenent Washed and made White in the Bloude of the Lamb, London, 1647, and Williams replied once more with The Bloudy Tenent yet more Bloudy by Cotton's Endeavour to Wash it White in the Bloud of the Lambe, London. 1652.

From THE BLOODY TENET OF PERSECUTION $^{2}$

CHAPTER T

Truth. In what dark corner of the world, sweet Peace, are we two met? Below hath this present evil world banished me from all the coasts and quarters of it? And how hath the righteous God in judgment taken thee from the earth, Rev. vi. 4.

Truth and Peace rarely and seldom meet.

Peace are the world have long been out of course: the gates of earth and hell have conspired together to intercept our joyful meeting and our holy kisses. With what a wearied, tired wing have I flown over what a wearied, tired wing have I flown over nations, kingdoms, cities, towns, to find out precious Truth?

Truth. The like inquiries in my flights and Truth. The like inquiries in my flights and travels have I made for Peace and still am told she hath left the earth, and fled to heaven.

Peace. Dear Truth, what is the earth but a dungeon of darkness, where Truth is not?

Truth. And what's the Peace thereof but a fleeting dream, thine ape and counterfeit?

Peace. O where's the promise of the God of heaven, that righteousness and peace shall kiss each other?

Truth. Patience, sweet Peace, these heavens and earth are growing old, and shall be changed like a garment, Psal. cii. They shall melt away, and be burnt up with all the works that are therein; and the most high eternal Creator, shall gloriously create new heavens and new earth, wherein dwells righteousness, 2 Pet. 3. Our kisses then shall have their endless date of pure and sweetest joys. Till then both thou and I must hope and wait, and bear the fury 2 The full title is:

BLOVDY TENENT,

OF PERSECUTION, FOR CAUSE OF CONSCIENCE, DISCUSSED, IN

A Conference betweene

TRVTH and PEACE.

VVho,

In all tender Affection, present to the High Court of Parliament, (as the Result of their Discourse) these, (amongst other Passages) of highest consideration.

As the title page announces, the book is addressed to the British Parliament.

The dialogue form for a discussion of this nature was frequently used during the seventeenth cen-

<sup>1</sup> See Luke xix, 4.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Psalms xxxv, 10 <sup>6</sup> duration of the dragon's wrath, whose monstrous lies and furies shall with himself be cast into the lake of fire, the second death, Revel. xx. 1

Peace. Most precious Truth, thou knowest we are both pursued and laid in wait for. Mine heart is full of sighs, mine eyes with tears. Where can I better vent my full oppressed bosom, than into thine, whose faithful lips may for these few hours revive my drooping wandering spirits, and here begin to wipe tears from mine eyes and the eyes of my dearest children?

Truth. Sweet daughter of the God of Peace. begin: pour out thy sorrows, vent thy complaints. How joyful am I to improve these precious minutes to revive our hearts, both thine and mine, and the hearts of all that love the truth and peace, Zach, viii.

Peace. Dear Truth, I know thy birth, thy nature, thy delight. They that know thee will prize thee far above themselves and lives, and sell themselves to buy thee. Well spake that famous Elizabeth to her famous attorney Sir Edward Coke: 2 "Mr. Attorney, go on as thou hast begun and still plead, not pro domina regina, but pro domina veritate. 3

Truth. 'Tis true, my crown is high, my scepter's strong to break down strongest holds, to throw down highest crowns of all that plead, though but in thought, against me. Some few there are, but oh! how few, are valiant for the truth, and dare to plead my cause, as my witnesses in sack-cloth. Revel. xi., while all men's tongues are bent like bows to shoot out lying words against me.

Peace. O how could I spend eternal days and endless dates at thy holy feet, in listening to the precious oracles of thy mouth! All the words of thy mouth are truth, and there is no iniquity in them; thy lips drop as the honeycomb. But oh! since we must part anon, let us, as thou saidst, improve our minutes and, according as thou promisedst, revive me with thy words, which are sweeter than the honey and the honey-comb.

CHAPTER XLIII

Fourthly, I ask, Were not these elders or ministers of the church of Ephesus sufficiently furnished from the Lord Jesus to drive away these mystical and spiritual wolves? 4

Williams, like many other Puritan thinkers, believed that the second coming of Christ and the final punishment of Satan were at hand.
 Sir Edward Coke was the most famous English jurist and legal commentator of his day.

<sup>3</sup> not for sovereign queen but for sovereign truth
<sup>4</sup> Peace is speaking of Paul's warning to the elders or bishops of the church at Ephesus that "wolves" would enter into and not spare the Christian flock he had gathered there. Acts xx, 17-35.

Christ Tesus furnisheth his shepherds with power drive away wolves.

Truth. True it is, against the inhuman and uncivil violence of persecutors, they were not, nor are God's children able and provided; but to resist, drive away, expel, and kill spiritual and mystical wolves by the word of the Lord.—none are fit to be Christ's shepherds who are not able. Tit. i. 9, 10, 11. The Bishop or overseer must be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince the gainsavers; which gainsavers to be by him convinced, that is, overcome or subdued, though it may be in themselves ever obstinate, they were, I say, as greedy wolves in Crete, as any could be at Ephesus: for so saith Paul, verse 10. They were unruly and vain talkers, deceivers, whose mouths must be stopped, who subverted whole houses; and yet Titus-and every ordinary shepherd of a flock of Christ-had ability sufficient to defend the flock from spiritual and mystical wolves without the help of the civil magistrate.

Peace. In this respect, therefore, me thinks we may fitly allude to that excellent answer of Job to Bildad, the Shuhite, Job Job xxvi, "How hast thou helped xxvi. 1,2. him that is without power? How savest thou the arm that hath no strength? How hast thou counseled him that hath no wisdom? How hast thou plentifully declared the thing as it is?"

5. Lastly, I ask whether, as men deal with wolves, these wolves at Ephesus were intended by Paul to be killed, their brains dashed out with stones, staves, halberts, guns, etc., in the hands of the elders of Ephesus, etc.

Truth. Doubtless, comparing spiritual things with spiritual, all such mystical wolves must spiritually and mystically so be slain. And the witnesses of truth, Revel. xi. speak fire, and kill all that hurt them by that fiery word of God, and that two-edged sword in their hand, Psal. cxlix.

But oh! what streams of the blood of saints have been and must be shed until the lamb have obtained the victorie, Revel. xvii. Unmerciful by this unmerciful—and in the and bloody state of the New Testament, doctrine. when the church is spread all the world over-most bloody doctrine, viz. The wolves, (heretics), are to be driven away, their brains knocked out and killed, the poor sheep to be preserved for whom Christ died, etc.

Is not this to take Christ Jesus, and make him a temporal king by force? John vi. 15. Is not this to make his kingdom of this world, to set up a civil and temporal Israel, to bound out new earthly holy lands of Canaan, yea and to set up a Spanish Inquisition in all parts of the world, to the speedy destruction of thousands. yea of millions of souls, and the frustrating of the sweet end of the coming of the Lord Jesus. to wit, to save men's souls-and to that end not to destroy their bodies—by his own blood?

CHAPTER XLIV

Peace. The next scripture produced against such persecution, is 2 Cor. x. 4. John vi, 15, "The weapons of our warfare are 2 Cor. x, 4, not carnall, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds, casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ, and having in a readiness to avenge all disobedience," etc.

Unto which it is answered, 1 "When Paul saith, 'The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but spiritual,' he denieth not civil weapons of justice to the civil magistrate, Rom. xiii, but only to church officers; and yet the weapons of church officers he acknowledgeth to be such, as though they be spiritual, yet are ready to take vengeance on all disobedience, 2 Cor. x. 6, which hath reference, amongst other ordinances, to the censures of the church against scandalous offenders."

Truth. I acknowledge that herein the spirit of God denieth not civil weapons of justice to the civil magistrate, which the scripture he quotes. Rom. xiii. abundantly testify.

Yet withal I must ask why he here affirmeth the apostle denies not civil weapons of justice to the civil magistrate? of which there is no question, unless that, according to his scope of proving persecution for conscience, he intends withal that the apostle denies not civil weapons of justice to the civil magistrate in spiritual and religious causes; the contrary whereunto, the Lord assisting, I shall evince, both from this very scripture, and his own observation, and lastly by that xiiith of the Romans, by himself auoted.

First, then, from this scripture and his own observation: the weapons of church officers, saith he, are such which, though they be spiritual, are ready to take vengeance on all disobedience; which hath reference, saith he, amongst other ordinances, to the censures of the church against scandalous offenders.

I hence observe that, there being in this scripture held forth a two-fold The differstate, a civil state and a spiritual, ence of the civil and spiritual

Civil weapons most improper in spiritual causes: fitly exemplified by that similitude. 2 Cor. x. 4.

civil officers and spiritual, civil weapons and spiritual weapons. civil vengeance and punishment. and a spiritual vengeance and punishment; although the spirit speaks not here expressly of civil magistrates and their civil weapons, vet these states being of different natures and considerations as far differing as spirit from flesh. I first observe that civil weapons are most improper and unfitting in matters of the spiritual state and kingdom, though in the civil state most proper and suitable

1643-1644

1644

ANNE BRADSTREET 1612-1672

Mrs. Bradstreet is often spoken of by writers upon American literature as the first American poet. This is true only in the sense that she was the first permanent resident of the North American colonies to be known as a poet, and the first to publish a book of poems. Her culture and point of view were wholly English, and her poems are untouched by any atmosphere of the New World.

She was born in Northampton, England, and died in Massachusetts. She was a gentlewoman by birth, her father being Thomas Dudley, steward of the Earl of Lincoln, and afterwards governor of Massachusetts. At the age of sixteen she married Simon Bradstreet, A.B., Emanuel College, Cambridge, who was after her death governor of Massachusetts. She came with her husband to the colony in company with Winthrop in 1630. and finally settled at Andover. In the midst of her domestic duties as mother of eight children she wrote her poems, which first appeared in London, 1650. A second edition was published in Boston, 1678. Among her descendants were Channing, the two Richard H. Danas, Wendell Phillips, and Oliver Wendell Holmes. These selections are full of the frigid conventionality that in her time, even in the old world, often passed for imagination and took the place of real poetic emotion. Her poetry was book-inspired. originals were Raleigh's History of the World and Du Bartas' Works and Days together, of course, with the Geneva translation of the Bible. In reading her poems one should bear in mind that they are the work of an English lady, not a pioneer by choice, who in writing them sought escape from the unloveliness of her surroundings. Some of her lyrics show genuine feeling despite their stilted phrasing.

See introductions to the following: J. H. Ellis, The Works of Anne Bradstreet in Prose and Verse, 1867; C. E. Norton, The Poems of Mrs. Anne Bradstreet together with her Prose Remains, 1897; Helen S. Campbell, Anne Bradstreet and Her Time, 1891.

<sup>1</sup> the quotation is from Cotton

From THE FOUR SEASONS OF THE VEAR

Another four I've left yet to bring on. Of four times four the last quaternion: 1 The winter, summer, autumn, and the spring, In season all these seasons I shall bring. Sweet spring, like man in his minority. At present claimed and had priority. With smiling face, and garments somewhat

She trimmed her locks, which late had frosted

Nor hot nor cold she spake, but with a breath Fit to revive the numbed earth from death. "Three months," quoth she, "are 'lotted to my share-

March, April, May of all the rest most fair. Tenth of the first, Sol into Aries 2 enters, And bids defiance to all tedious winters. Crosseth the line, and equals night and day; Still adds to the last till after pleasant May: And now makes glad the darkened northern wights

Who for some months have seen but starry lights.

Now goes the plowman to his merry toil He might 3 unloose his winter-locked soil. The seedsman, too, doth lavish out his grain In hope the more he casts the more to gain. The gardener now superfluous branches lops. And poles erects for his young clambering hops; Now digs, then sows his herbs, his flowers, and roots.

And carefully manures 4 his trees of fruits. The Pleiades their influence 5 now give, And all that seemed as dead afresh doth live: The croaking frogs, whom nipping winter killed, Like birds now chirp and hop about the field. 30 The nightingale, 6 the blackbird, and the thrush

<sup>2</sup> set of four: The Four Seasons is the fourth poem of a series, the first three being The Four Ele-ments, The Four Humors of Man, and The

ments, The Four Humors of Man, and The Four Ages of Man.

The Ram, one of the zodiacal constellations. The sun enters Aries, the Ram, on the 21st of March, or the 10th of March, O. S. This is the vernal support as explained in the next few lines.

or the 10th of March, O. S. This is the vernal equinox, as explained in the next few lines.

The first edition has for to unloose.

The word is probably to be taken as generally in Shakespeare in its primitive sense of cultivate, till. From OF. manoevver, manage, handle, work.

The meaning is probably astrological rather than general. Power, benign or hurtful, flowed from the stars when these were in the ascendant. Hence, "to be born under a lucky star." The Pleiades, in Taurus, were supposed to exert a "sweet" influence. See Job xxxviii, 31. Mrs. Bradstreet inadvertently places the Pleiades in Aries.

Of course Mrs. Bradstreet heard no nightingale in America, but perhaps she is to be excused from the charge of insincerity because the whole fauna and flora of nature poetry had been convention-and flora of nature poetry had been conventionalized, and because her Puritanism shut her away from the most vital Elizabethan poetic models.

Now tune their lays on sprays of every bush. The wanton frisking kid and soft-fleeced lambs Do jump and play before their feeding dams; The tender tops of budding grass they crop; They joy in what they have, but more in hope-For though the frost hath lost his binding power.

Yet many a fleece of snow and stormy shower Doth darken Sol's bright eve, makes us remember

The pinching northwest wind of cold Decem-

My second month is April, green and fair, Of longer days, and a more temperate air. The sun in Taurus 7 keeps his residence, And with his warmer beams glanceth from thence.

This is the month whose fruitful showers pro-

All set and sown 8 for all delights and uses. The pear, the plum, and apple-tree now flourish: The grass grows long the hungry beast to nourish.

The primrose pale and azure violet Among the verdurous grass hath nature set, That when the sun on's love—the earth—doth shine

These might as lace set out her garment fine. The fearful bird his little house now builds In trees and walls, in cities and in fields; The outside strong, the inside warm and neat— A natural artificer complete.

The clucking hen her chirping chickens leads; With wings and beak defends them from the gleads. 9

My next and last is fruitful pleasant May, Wherein the earth is clad in rich array. The sun now enters loving Gemini, 10 And heats us with the glances of his eye; Our thicker raiment makes us lay aside, Lest by his fervor we be torrified. All flowers the sun now with his beams discloses Except the double pinks and matchless roses. Now swarms the busy, witty 11 honey-bee, Whose praise deserves a page from more than

The cleanly housewife's dairy's now in the

Her shelves and firkins filled for winter-time. 70 The meads with cowslips, honeysuckles, dight, 12

7 the constellation Taurus, the bull
 8 All things set (planted) and sown. Mrs. Bradstreet's need for rime interferes with her syntax, as has happened with some more famous poets.
 9 kites (used, probably, for hawks)
 10 The third sign of the Zodiac, named from the constellation Gemini, which it contains. Loving, because Castor and Pollux, the Gemini (twins), were celebrated for their devotion to each other.
 11 wise, discerning

One hangs his head, the other stands upright; But both rejoice at th' heaven's clear smiling face.

More at her showers, which water them a space. For fruits my season yields the early cherry, The hasty peas, and wholesome cool strawberry. 1

More solid fruits require a longer time; Each season hath his fruit, so hath each clime— Each man his own peculiar excellence, But none in all that hath preëminence.

Sweet fragrant spring, with thy short pittance fly.

Let some describe thee better than can I. Yet above all this privilege is thine, Thy days still lengthen without least decline.

1650

"AS WEARY PILGRIM"

As weary pilgrim, now at rest,
Hugs with delight his silent nest,
His wasted limbs now lie full soft
That miry steps have trodden oft;
Blesses himself to think upon
His dangers past and travails done,
The burning sun no more shall heat,
Nor stormy rains on him shall beat;
The briars and thorns no more shall scratch,
Nor hungry wolves at him shall catch;
He erring <sup>2</sup> paths no more shall tread,
Nor wild fruits eat, instead of bread;
For waters cold he doth not long,

For waters cold he doth not long,

For thirst no more shall parch his tongue;

No rugged stones his feet shall gall, Nor stumps nor rocks cause him to fall;

All cares and fears he bids farewell, And means in safety now to dwell—

And means in safety now to dwe. A pilgrim I on earth, perplexed

With sins, with cares and sorrows vexed,

By age and pains brought to decay,

And my clay house moldering away,

Oh, how I long to be at rest,

And soar on high among the blest! This body shall in silence sleep,

Mine eyes no more shall ever weep;

No fainting fits shall me assail,

Nor grinding pains my body frail, <sup>3</sup> With cares and fears ne'er cumbered be,

Nor losses know, nor sorrows see.
What though my flesh shall there consume?

It is the bed Christ did perfume; And when a few years shall be gone This mortal shall be clothed upon. A corrupt carcass down it lies,

A glorious body it shall rise, 4
In weakness and dishonor sown

In power 't is raised by Christ alone.

Then soul and body shall unite.

And of their maker have the sight; Such lasting joys shall there behold

As ear ne'er heard nor tongue e'er told.

Lord, make me ready for that day!

Then come, dear bridegroom, come away.

August 31, 1669

1867

MICHAEL WIGGLESWORTH 1631-1705

Wigglesworth was the most popular versifier of his day in New England. He was born in England, and died at Malden, Massachusetts. Coming as a child with his parents to New England, he graduated at Harvard, 1651, was tutor there, 1652-1654, and was pastor of the church at Malden from 1657 until his death. Ill health broke in upon his preaching and caused him to study and practice medicine, and from 1686 he carried on both medicine and the ministry. His published works are The Day of Doom, 1662; God's Controversy with New England, 1662, published, 1871; Meat out of the Eater, 1669. Ten editions of The Day of Doom have been published in America and two in England.

Of this piece Tyler says, the "shrill reverberating clatter, that would instantly catch and please the popular ear, at that time deaf to daintier and more subtile effects in poetry," made it the best known American poem in the colonies. The poem remains a landmark of the poetic taste of the time and a vigorous and lucid if lurid statement of Puritan belief in some essential matters. Lowell says, "[The Day of Doom] was the solace of every fireside, the flicker of the pine knots by which it was conned perhaps adding a livelier relish to its premonitions of eternal combustion."

The theological tenets and religious attitudes of the poem were current in New England and to a large extent in non-conformist England for a hundred years after it was written. Its lilting lines are easy to remember and, despite the inappropriateness of the meter, they still arrest the attention with their irresistible vigor and decided picturesqueness of phrasing.

From THE DAY OF DOOM 5

1

Still was the night, serene and bright, when all men sleeping lay;
Calm was the season, and carnal reason thought so 't would last for aye.

<sup>4</sup> 2 Corinthians v, 2-4; 1 Corinthians xv, 42,43
 <sup>5</sup> In Wigglesworth's time the day of doom, or Judgment Day, was supposed, by many people, to be close at hand.

The entire flatness of such lines and couplets as these admits no defense.

<sup>2</sup> wandering

<sup>3</sup> wear out

"Soul, take thine ease, 1 let sorrow cease, much good thou hast in store:"
This was their song, their cups among, the evening before.

2

Wallowing in all kinds of sin, vile wretches lay secure:
The best of men had scarcely then their lamps kept in good ure.
Virgins unwise, 2 who through disguise amongst the best were numbered,
Had closed their eyes; yea and the wise through sloth and frailty slumbered;

3

Like as of old, 3 when men grew bold God's threatenings to contemn, Who stopped their ear, and would not hear, when mercy warned them:
But took their course, without remorse, till God began to pour Destruction the world upon in a tempestuous shower;

4

Who put away the evil day, and drowned their cares and fears, Till drowned were they, and swept away by vengeance unawares; So at the last, whilst men sleep fast in their security, Surprised they are in such a snare as cometh suddenly.

5

For at midnight break 4 forth a light, which turned the night to day,
And speedily an hideous cry did all the world dismay.

Sinners awake, their hearts do ache, trembling their loins surpriseth;
Amazed with fear, by what they hear, each one of them ariseth.

6

They rush from beds with giddy heads, and to their windows run,
Viewing this light, which shines more bright than doth the noon-day sun.
Straightway appears (they see't with tears) the Son of God most dread;
Who with his train comes on amain to judge both quick and dead.

Luke xii, 19; the poem is a tissue of Biblical allusions. Only those most necessary to the understanding of the poem are noted.
Matthew xxv, I brake

Matthew xxv, 1
The line refers to the destruction of man at the time of the deluge. See Genesis vi. 7

•

Before his face the heavens gave place, and skies are rent asunder,
With mighty voice, and hideous noise, more terrible than thunder.
His brightness damps heaven's glorious lamps and makes them hide their heads;
As if afraid, and quite dismayed, they quit their wonted steads.

14

The Judge draws nigh, exalted high upon a lofty throne,
Amidst the throng of angels strong, lo, Israel's Holy One!
The excellence of whose presence and awful majesty,
Amazeth nature, and every creature, doth more than terrify.

15

The mountains smoke, the hills are shook, the earth is rent and torn,
As if she should be clear dissolved, or from her center born. The sea doth roar, forsakes the shore, and shrinks away for fear:
The wild beasts flee into the sea, so soon as he draws near.

20

His winged hosts fly through all coasts, together gathering
Both good and bad, both quick and dead and all to judgment bring.
Out of their holes those creeping moles, that hid themselves for fear,
By force they take, and quickly make before the Judge appear.

21

Thus every one before the throne of Christ the judge is brought,
Both righteous and impious that good or ill hath wrought.
A separation, and differing station by Christ appointed is (To sinners sad) 'twixt good and bad, 'twixt heirs of woe and bliss.

borne from the center (According to the old Ptolemaic astronomy the center of the earth is the center of the universe, the one immovable point in all creation. To move fixed objects in their relation to this center means total destruction.) 22

At Christ's right hand the sheep do stand, his holy martyrs, who
For his dear name suffering shame, calamity and woe
Like champions stood, and with their blood their testimony sealed;
Whose innocence without offence, to Christ their Judge appealed.

27

At Christ's left hand, the goats do stand, all whining hypocrites,
Who for self-ends did seem Christ's friends, but fostered guileful sprites:
Who sheep resembled, but they dissembled (their hearts were not sincere)
Who once did throng Christ's lambs among but now must not come near.

38

All silence keep both goats and sheep before the Judge's throne:
With mild aspect to his elect then speaks the holy one;
"My sheep draw near, your sentence hear, which is to you no dread,
Who clearly now discern and know, your sins are pardoned.

30

"'Twas meet that ye should judged be, that so the world may spy
No cause of grudge, whenas I judge and deal impartially.
Know therefore all both great and small, the ground and reason why
These men do stand at my right hand, and look so cheerfully." 1

166

Then to the bar all they drew near who died in infancy,
And never had or good or bad effected pers'nally;
But from the womb unto the tomb were straightway carried,
(Or at the least ere they transgressed) who thus began to plead:

167

"If for our own transgression, or disobedience,
We here did stand at thy left hand,
just were the recompense;
But Adam's guilt our souls hath spilt, 2 his fault is charged upon us;
And that alone hath overthrown and utterly undone us.

168

"Not we, but he ate of the tree, whose fruit was interdicted; Yet on us all of his sad fall the punishment's inflicted.
How could we sin that had not been, or how is his sin our,
Without consent, which to prevent we never had the power?

169

"O great Creator why was our nature depraved and forlorn? Why so defiled, and made so viled, whilst we were yet unborn? If it be just, and needs we must transgressors reckoned be, Thy mercy, Lord, to us afford, which sinners hath set free.

170

"Behold we see Adam set free, and saved from his trespass, Whose sinful fall hath spilt us all, and brought us to this pass. Canst thou deny us once to try, or grace to us to tender, When he finds grace before thy face who was the chief offender?"

171

Then answered the Judge most dread:
"God doth such doom forbid,
That men should die eternally for what they never did.
But what you call old Adam's fall,
and only his trespass,
You call amiss to call it his,
both his and yours it was.

172

"He was designed of all mankind to be a public head; A common root, whence all should shoot and stood in all their stead.

² ruined

&lt;sup>1</sup> The stanzas omitted here recount the vain excuses of the heathen and of various classes of enlightened sinners.

'He stood and fell, did ill or well, not for himself alone, But for you all, who now his fall and trespass would disown.

173

"If he had stood, then all his brood had been established
In God's true love never to move, nor once awry to tread;
Then all his race my Father's grace should have enjoyed forever,
And wicked sprites 1 by subtile sleights could them have harmed never.

174

"Would you have grieved to have received through Adam so much good, As had been your for evermore, if he at first had stood? Would you have said, 'We ne'er obeyed nor did thy laws regard; It ill befits with benefits, us, Lord, to so reward?'

175

"Since then to share in his welfare, you could have been content,
You may with reason share in his treason, and in the punishment.
Hence you were born in state forlorn, with natures so deprayed;
Death was your due because that you had thus yourselves behaved.

176

"You think, 'If we had been as he, whom God did so betrust,
We to our cost would ne'er have lost all for a paltry lust.'
Had you been made in Adam's stead, you would like things have wrought,
And so into the self-same woe, yourselves and yours have brought.

177

"I may deny you once to try, or grace to you to tender,
Though he finds grace before my face who was the chief offender;
Else should my grace cease to be grace, for it would not be free,
If to release whom I should please
I have no liberty.

178

"If upon one what's due to none
I frankly shall bestow,
And on the rest shall not think best compassion's skirts to throw,
Whom injure I? Will you envy and grudge at others' weal?
Or me accuse, who do refuse yourselves to help and heal?

170

"Am I alone of what's my own, no master or no lord?
And if I am, how can you claim what I to some afford?
Will you demand grace at my hand, and challenge what is mine?
Will you teach me whom to set free, and thus my grace confine?

180

"You sinners are, and such a share as sinners, may expect;
Such you shall have, for I do save none but mine own elect.
Yet to compare your sin with their who lived a longer time,
I do confess yours is much less, though every sin's a crime.

181

"A crime it is, therefore in bliss you may not hope to dwell;
But unto you I shall allow the easiest room in hell."
The glorious King thus answering, they cease, and plead no longer;
Their consciences must needs confess his reasons are the stronger.

182

Thus all men's pleas the Judge with ease doth answer and confute.
Until that all, both great and small, are silenced and mute.
Vain hopes are cropped, all mouths are stopped, sinners have nought to say,
But that 'tis just and equal most they should be damned for aye.

189

O dismal day! whither shall they for help and succor flee? To God above with hopes to move their greatest enemy?

<sup>1</sup> spirits (often thus in Elizabethan literature)

His wrath is great, whose burning heat no floods of tears can slake; His word stands fast that they be cast into the burning lake.

105

Unto the saints with sad complaints should they themselves apply? They're not dejected nor aught affected with all their misery. Friends stand aloof and make no proof what prayers or tears can do; Your godly friends are now more friends to Christ than unto you.

196

Where tender love men's hearts did move unto a sympathy,
And bearing part of others' smart in their anxiety,
Now such compassion is out of fashion, and wholly laid aside;
No friends so near, but saints to hear their sentence can abide.

197

One natural brother beholds another in his astonied fit, <sup>1</sup>
Yet sorrows not thereat a jot, nor pities him a whit.
The godly wife conceives no grief, nor can she shed a tear
For the sad state of her dear mate, when she his doom doth hear.

198

He that was erst a husband pierced with sense of wife's distress, Whose tender heart did bear a part of all her grievances, Shall mourn no more as heretofore, because of her ill plight, Although he see her now to be a damned forsaken wight.

100

The tender mother will own no other of all her num'rous brood,
But such as stand at Christ's right hand, acquitted through his blood.
The pious father had now much rather his graceless son should lie
In hell with devils, for all his evils, burning eternally,

200

Than God most high should injury by sparing him sustain; And doth rejoice to hear Christ's voice, adjudging him to pain.

Thus having all, both great and small, convinced and silenced, Christ did proceed their doom to read, and thus it uttered:

201

"Ye sinful wights and cursed sprites, that work iniquity, Depart together from me forever to endless misery;
Your portion take in yonder lake, where fire and brimstone flameth;
Suffer the smart which your desert, 2 as its due wages claimeth."

202

Oh piercing words, more sharp than swords!
What! to depart from Thee,
Whose face before for evermore
the best of pleasures be!
What! to depart (unto our smart),
from thee eternally!
To be for aye banished away with devils' company!

203

What! to be sent to punishment, and flames of burning fire!
To be surrounded, and eke confounded with God's revengeful ire!
What! to abide, not for a tide, these torments, but forever!
To be released, or to be eased, not after years, but never!

204

Oh fearful doom! now there's no room for hope or help at all;
Sentence is past which aye shall last;
Christ will not it recall.
Then might you hear them rend and tear the air with their outcries;
The hideous noise of their sad voice ascendeth to the skies.

205

They wring their hands, their caitiff-hands, and gnash their teeth for terror;
They cry, they roar for anguish sore, and gnaw their tongues for horror.

The rime was accurate then.

<sup>1</sup> dazed condition

But get away without delay. Christ pities not your cry: Depart to Hell, there you may yell, and roar eternally.

1662 1662

BENJAMIN TOMPSON 1642-1714

Benjamin Tompson, first native-born New England poet, was born at Braintree, now Quincy, Massachusetts, where his father was pastor of the church. He graduated from Harvard, 1662, was for two years master of the Boston grammar school, where he had Cotton Mather as a pupil, and later taught at Charlestown, Braintree, and at Roxbury, where he died. He also practiced medicine, a calling that any educated person, at that time, might assume.

Tompson's verses totally lack beauty, grace, or imagination, but they are here included because of their very crudity and the fact that they are a native New England product, like The Bay Psalm Book. The facts that to his neighbors Tompson was "the renowned Poet of New-England," and that Cotton Mather called him "a good poet" and used one of his poems in his Magnalia serve to show the low standard in poetry then current in New England. They also indicate how little of literary grace was then imparted by the study of the classics at Harvard. It is at once seen that Tompson wrote of things around him. New-Englands Crisis, the first book of poetry to be published in Boston, is a versified chronicle of King Philip's War. Its "Prologue" is a picture of Boston in the second generation. The point of view is that the war was sent as a punishment to the colony which had not, as a whole, kept the faith of the fathers.

H. J. Hall, Benjamin Tompson, His Poems, collected, with an introduction, 1924.

NEW-ENGLANDS CRISIS 1

From the prologue

The times wherein old Pompion 2 was a Saint, When men far'd hardly yet without complaint On vilest Cates; 3 the dainty Indian Maize Was eat with Clamp-shells out of wooden Traves

Under thatcht Hutts without the cry of Rent, And the best Sawce to every Dish, Content. When Flesh was food, & hairy skins made

And men as wel as birds had chirping Notes. When Cimnels 4 were accounted noble bloud Among the tribes of common herbage food. 10 Of Ceres bounty form'd was many a knack

Enough to fill poor Robins Almanack, 5 These golden times (too fortunate to hold) Were quickly sin'd away for love of gold. Twas then among the bushes, not the street If one in place did an inferiour meet, Good morrow Brother, is there ought you want? Take freely of me, what I have you ha'nt. Plain Tom and Dick would pass as current now. As ever since Your Servant Sir and bow. Deep-skirted doublets, puritanick capes Which now would render men like upright Apes. Was comlier wear our wiser Fathers thought Than the cast fashions from all Europe brought. Twas in those dayes an honest Grace would hold

Till an hot puddin grew at heart a cold. And men had better stomachs to religion Than I to capon, turkey-cock or pigeon. When honest Sisters met to pray not prate About their own and not their neighbours state. During Plain Dealings Reign, that worthy Stud" Of th' ancient planters race before the flood These times were good. Merchants car'd not a rush

For other fare than Jonakin and Mush. 7 Although men far'd and lodged very hard Yet Innocence was better than a Guard. Twas long before spiders & wormes had drawn Their dungy webs or hid with cheating Lawne New-Englands beautyes, which stil seem'd to Illustrious in their own simplicity. Twas ere the neighboring Virgin-land 8 had broke

The Hogsheads of her worse than hellish smoak. 9

Twas ere the Islands 10 sent their Presents in. Which but to use was counted next to sin. Twas ere a Barge had made so rich a fraight As Chocholatte, dust-gold and bitts of eight. 11 Ere wines from France and Moscovadoe 12 too Without the which the drink will scarsly doe, From western Isles, ere fruits and dillicacies. Did rot maids teeth & spoil their hansome faces.

Or ere these times did chance the noise of war Was from our towns and hearts removed far. No Bugbear Comets 13 in the chrystal air To drive our christian Planters to despair.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The original spelling and punctuation are retained in these selections.

&lt;sup>2</sup> pumpion, pumpkin <sup>3</sup> cakes, delicacies

<sup>4</sup> scalloped summer squashes

<sup>5</sup> the title of an almanac first published in 1661 or 1662

<sup>7 &</sup>quot;Johnny-cake"; "mush" is the Indian name for "hasty pudding."

<sup>8</sup> Virginia

<sup>9</sup> Tobacco was exported in hogsheads.
10 the West Indies, then the source of many luxuries 11 Spanish dollars

<sup>12</sup> unrefined sugar

<sup>13</sup> In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries comets were supposed to be a dire warning of disaster.

No sooner pagan malice 1 peeped forth But Valour snib'd it: then were men of worth Who by their prayers slew thousands Angel like.

Their weapons are unseen with which they strike

Then had the Churches rest, 2 as yet the coales Were covered up in most contentious souls. Freeness in Judgment, union in affection.

Dear love, sound truth they were our grand protection

These were the twins which in our Councells

These gave prognosticks of our future fate. If these be longer liv'd our hopes increase. These warrs will usher in a longer peace: But if New-Englands love die in its youth The grave will open next for blessed Truth. 1676 1676

ON A FORTIFICATION

AT BOSTON BEGUN BY WOMEN

Dux Foemina Facti

A Grand attempt some Amazonian 3 Dames Contrive whereby to glorify their names, A Ruff for Boston Neck of mud and turfe, Reaching from side to side from surfe to surfe, 4 Their nimble hands spin up like Christmas pyes, Their pastry by degrees on high doth rise. The wheel at home counts it an holiday, Since while the Mistris worketh it may play. A tribe of female hands, but manly hearts Forsake at home their pastry-crust and tarts 10 To knead the dirt, the samplers down they

Their undulating silks they closely furle. The pick-axe one as a Commandress holds. While t'other at her awkness gently scolds. One puffs and sweats, the other mutters why Cant you promove your work so fast as I? Some dig, some delve, and others hands do feel The little waggons weight with single wheel. And least some fainting fits the weak surprize, They want no sack nor cakes, they are more

These brave essayes draw forth Male stronger hands

<sup>1</sup> The Indians were pagans.
<sup>2</sup> Pious New Englanders thought of the colonies in terms of the churches, centers of the community life.

<sup>3</sup> In Greek mythology the Amazons were female warriors. <sup>4</sup> Boston was built on a promontory. Its only connection on was built on a promontory. Its only connection with the mainland was a narrow strip, Boston Neck, sometimes submerged by storm and high tide. The incident told in the verses took place during King Philip's War and probably at the time when the natives came within a few miles of Boston.

More like to Dawbers than to Martial bands: These do the work, and sturdy bulwarks raise. But the beginners well deserve the praise.

1676

BENJAMIN CHURCH 1639-1717

Captain Church was one of the first of those frontiersmen who, as farmers, soldiers, scouts, hunters, or adventurers after wealth, have fought with the Indians from Cape Cod to the mountains of Arizona. He was born in England and died at Little Compton, Rhode Island. After settling at Duxbury, Massachusetts, Church was tempted by the fertile lands of Rhode Island and removed to Little Compton, where in the year of the outbreak of King Philip's War, 1675, he became the first white inhabitant. In the struggle with Philip, Church showed himself brave to the point of rashness, resourceful, and a natural leader of men. After recovering from severe wounds, he was placed in command of the Plymouth troops by whom Philip was killed. He was made colonel of militia, but was never fully rewarded for his services.

The History was compiled by Thomas Church, son of Benjamin, from full memoranda written by his father, in 1716. It is the unadorned account of a man of action who left the record as a matter of historical importance.

From ENTERTAINING PASSAGES RE-LATING TO PHILIP'S WAR, which began in the month of June, 1675,—as also of EXPEDITIONS more lately made, ..., with some account of the Divine Providence toward Benjamin Church, Esq., by T. C. 5

Their next motion 6 was towards the place where the prisoners told them that they had left their women and children, and surprised them all and some others that were newly come to them. And upon examination they held to one story, that it was hard to tell where to find Annawon, for he never roosted twice in a place.

Now a certain Indian soldier that Captain Church had gained over to be on his side prayed that he might have liberty to go and fetch in his father, who, he said, was about four miles from that place, in a swamp, with no other than one young squaw. Captain Church inclined to go with him, thinking it might be in his way to gain some intelligence of Annawon; and so, taking one Englishman and a few Indians with him, leaving the rest there, he went with his new soldier to look [after] his father.

<sup>5</sup> The present selection is from the edition of this work by Henry Martyn Dexter, Boston, Wiggin, 1865.
6 After the death of Philip, a chief, Annawon, remained in arms at the head of a considerable band. It will be seen that Church, who had adopted Indian methods of warfare and was out scouting, away from his main force, led his few men, almost all Indians, and some of them only recently captured from the hostile tribe, into the Indian stronghold in the swamp and contured the chief. hold in the swamp and captured the chief.

When he came to the swamp, he bid the Indian go see if he could find his father. He was no sooner gone but Captain Church discovered a track coming down out of the woods; upon which he and his little company lay close. some on one side of the track, and some on the other. They heard the Indian soldier make a howling for his father and at length somebody answered him; but while they were listening. they thought they heard somebody coming towards them: presently they saw an old man coming up with a gun on his shoulder, and a young woman following of him in the track which they lay by. They let them come up between them, and then started up and laid hold on them both. Captain Church immediately examined them apart, telling them what they must trust to if they told false stories. He asked the young woman what company they came last from. She said, "From Captain Annawon's." He asked her how many were in company with him when she left him. She said, "Fifty or sixty." He asked her how many miles it was to the place where she left She said she did not understand miles. but he was up in Squannaconk 1 swamp.

The old man, who had been one of Philip's council, upon examination gave exactly the same account. Captain Church asked him if they could get there that night. He said if they went presently and traveled stoutly, they might get there by sunset. He asked whither he was going. He answered that Annawon had sent him down to look for some Indians that were gone down into Mount Hope Neck 2 to kill provisions. Captain Church let him know that those Indians were all his prisoners.

By this time came the Indian soldier and brought his father and one Indian more. The Captain was now in great strait of mind what to do next; [he] had a mind to give Annawon a visit, now he knew where to find him. But his company was very small, but half a dozen men beside himself, and [he] was under a necessity to send somebody back to acquaint his lieutenant and company with his proceedings. However, he asked his small company that were with him whether they would willingly go with him and give Annawon a visit. They told him they were always ready to obey his commands, etc.; but withal told him that they knew this Captain Annawon was a great soldier: that he had been a valiant captain under Asuhmeguin, 3 Philip's father; and that he had been Philip's chieftain all this war: a very subtle man, and of great resolution, and had often said that he would never be taken alive by the English. And moreover they knew that the men that were with him were resolute fellows, some of Philip's chief soldiers; and therefore feared whether it was practicable to make an attempt upon him with so small a handful of assailants as now were with him. Told him further that it would be a pity that, after all the great things he had done, he should throw away his life at last, etc. Upon which he replied that he doubted not Annawon was a subtle and valiant man: that he had a long time. but in vain, sought for him, and never till now could find his quarters, and he was very loath to miss of the opportunity; and doubt not but that, if they would cheerfully go with him, the same almighty Providence that had hitherto protected and befriended them would do so still, etc.

Upon this with one consent they said they would go. Captain Church then turned to one Cook of Plymouth (the only Englishman then with him), and asked him what he thought of it. Who replied, "Sir, I am never afraid of going anywhere when you are with me." Then Captain Church asked the old Indian if he could carry his horse with him,-for he conveyed a horse thus far with him. He replied that it was impossible for an horse to pass the swamps. Therefore he sent away his new Indian soldier with his father and the Captain's horse to his lieutenant, and orders for him to move to Taunton with the prisoners, to secure them there. and to come out in the morning in the Rehoboth road in which he might expect to meet him, if he were alive and had success.

The Captain then asked the old fellow if he would pilot him unto Annawon. He answered that he having given him his life, he was obliged to serve him. He bid him move on then, and they followed. The old man would out-travel them so far, sometimes, that they were almost out of sight; looking over his shoulder and seeing them behind he would halt.

Just as the sun was setting, the old man made a full stop and sat down; the company coming up also sat down, being all weary. Captain Church asked, "What news?" He answered, that about that time in the evening, Captain Annawon sent out his scouts to see if the coast were clear, and as soon as it began to grow dark, the scouts return, and then, said he, "we may move again securely." When it began to grow dark, the old man stood up again, and Captain Church asked him if he would take a gun and fight for him. He bowed very low, and prayed him not to impose such a thing upon him as to fight against Captain Annawon, his old friend. "But," says he, "I will go along with you, and be helpful to you, and will lay hands on any man that shall offer to hurt you."

&lt;sup>1</sup> In the southeasterly part of the town of Rehoboth, Bristol County, Massachusetts; no scene of colonial history is better preserved today in its original primitive condition.

&quot; Philip had just been killed there.

* better known as Massasoit, friend of the Pilgrims

It being now pretty dark, they moved close together;—anon they heard a noise. The Captain stayed the old man with his hand, and asked his own men what noise they thought it might be. They concluded it to be the pounding of a mortar. The old man had given Captain Church a description of the place where Annawon now lay, and of the difficulty of getting at him. Being sensible that they were pretty near them, with two of his Indians he creeps to the edge of the rocks, from whence he could see their camps. He saw three companies of Indians at a little distance from each other; being easy to be discovered by the light of their fires. He saw also the great Annawon and his company, who had formed his camp or kenneling-place by falling a tree under the side of the great clefts of rocks and setting a row of birch bushes up against it; where he himself, and his son, and some of his chiefs had taken up their lodging, and made great fires without them, and had their pots and kettles boiling, and spits roasting. Their arms also he discovered, all set together in a place fitted for the purpose, standing up an-end against a stick lodged in two crotches, and a mat placed over them to keep them from the wet or dew. The old Annawon's feet and his son's head were so near the arms as almost to touch them.

But the rocks were so steep that it was impossible to get down, but as they lowered themselves by the boughs and the bushes that grew in the cracks of the rock. Captain Church creeping back again to the old man asked him if there was no possibility of getting at them some other way. He answered, "No." That he and all that belonged to Annawon, were ordered to come that way, and none could come any other way without difficulty, or danger of being shot.

Captain Church then ordered the old man and his daughter to go down foremost with their baskets at their backs, that when Annawon saw them with their baskets he should not mistrust the intrigue. Captain Church and his handful of soldiers crept down also, under the shadow of these two and their baskets, and the Captain himself crept close behind the old man, with his hatchet in his hand, and stepped over the voung man's head to the arms. The young Annawon discovering of him, whipped his blanket over his head and shrunk up in a heap. The old Captain Annawon started up on his breech and cried out "Howoh." And despairing of escape, threw himself back again, and lav silent until Captain Church had secured all the arms, etc. And having secured that company. he sent his Indian soldiers to the other fires and companies, giving them instructions what to do and say. Accordingly they went into the midst of them. When they discovered themselves who they were. [they] told them that their Captain Annawon was taken, and it would be best for them guietly and peaceably to surrender themselves, which would procure good quarter for them: otherwise, if they should pretend to resist or make their escape, it would be in vain, and they could expect no other but that Captain Church, with his great army, who had now entrapped them, would cut them to pieces. Told them also if they would submit themselves, and deliver up all their arms unto them, and keep every man his place until it was day, they would assure them that their Captain Church, who had been so kind to themselves when they surrendered to him, should be as kind to them. Now they being old acquaintance, and many of them relations, did much the readier give heed to what they said, and complied, and surrendered up their arms unto them, both their guns and hatchets, etc., and were forthwith carried to Captain Church.

Things being so far settled, Captain Church asked Annawon, what he had for supper, "for," said he, "I am come to sup with you." "Taubut," said Annawon with a big voice, and looking about upon his women bid them hasten and get Captain Church and his company some supper; then turned to Captain Church and asked him whether he would eat cow beef or horse beef. The Captain told him cow beef would be most acceptable. It was soon got ready, and pulling his little bag of salt out of his pocket, which was all the provision he brought with him, this seasoned his cow beef. So that with it and the dried green corn, which the old squaw was pounding in the mortar while they were sliding down the rocks, he made a very hearty supper. And this pounding in the mortar proved lucky for Captain Church's getting down the rocks; for when the old squaw pounded they moved, and when she ceased to turn the corn they ceased creeping. The noise of the mortar prevented the enemy's hearing their creeping, and the corn, being now dressed, supplied the want of bread and gave a fine relish with the cow beef.

Supper being over, Captain Church sent two of his men to inform the other companies that he had killed Philip, and had taken their friends in Mount Hope Neck, but had spared their lives, and that he had subdued now all the enemy, he supposed, excepting this company of Annawon's: and now if they would be orderly and keep their places until morning, they should have good quarter, and that he would carry them to Taunton, where they might see their friends again, etc.

The messengers returned and informed that the Indians yielded to his proposals.

Captain Church thought it was now time for him to take a nap, having had no sleep in two days and one night before; told his men that if they would let him sleep two hours, they should sleep all the rest of the night. He laid himself down and endeavored to sleep, but all disposition to sleep departed from him.

After he had lain a little while, he looked up to see how his watch managed, but found them all fast asleep. Now Captain Church had told Captain Annawon's company, as he had ordered his Indians to tell the others, that their lives should all be spared, excepting Captain Annawon's, and it was not in his power to promise him his life, but he must carry him to his masters at Plymouth, and he would entreat them for his life.

Now when Captain Church found not only his own men, but all the Indians fast asleep, Annawon only excepted, who, he perceived, was as broad awake as himself; and so they lay looking one upon the other, perhaps an hour. Captain Church said nothing to him, for he could not speak Indian, and thought Annawon could not speak English.

At length Annawon raised himself up. cast off his blanket, and with no more clothes than his small breeches, walked a little way back from the company. Captain Church thought no other but that he had walked a little distance for some necessary errand, and would very soon return. But by and by he was gone out of sight and hearing, and then Captain Church began to suspect some ill design in him; and got all the guns close to him, and crowded himself close under young Annawon; that if he should anywhere get a gun, he should not make a shot at him, without endangering his son. Lying very still awhile waiting for the event, at length he heard somebody coming the same way that Annawon went. The moon now shining bright, he saw him at a distance coming with something in his hands, and coming up to Captain

Church he fell upon his knees before him, and offered him what he had brought, and speaking in plain English said, "Great Captain, you have killed Philip, and conquered his country; for I believe that I and my company are the last that war against the English, so suppose the war is ended by your means; and therefore these things belong unto you." Then opening his pack, he pulled out Philip's belt, curiously wrought with wampum, being nine inches broad. wrought with black and white wampum in various figures, and flowers and pictures of many birds and beasts. This, when hung upon Captain Church's shoulders, it reached his ankles: and another belt of wampum he presented him with, wrought after the former manner, which Philip was wont to put upon his head. It had two flags on the back part, which hung down on his back, and another small belt with a star upon the end of it, which he used to hang on his breast, and they were all edged with red hair, which Annawon said they got in the Mohogs' country. Then he pulled out two horns of glazed powder, and a red cloth blanket. He told Captain Church these were Philip's royalties 2 which he was wont to adorn himself with when he sat in state; that he thought himself happy that he had an opportunity to present them to Captain Church, who had won them, etc. 3 Spent the remainder of the night in discourse; and Captain Annawon gave an account of what mighty success he had formerly in wars against many nations of Indians, when [he] served Asuhmequin, Philip's father, etc.

In the morning, as soon as it was light, the Captain marched with his prisoners out of that swampy country towards Taunton, met his lieutenant and company about four miles out of town, who expressed a great deal of joy to see him again, and said 't was more than ever they expected. They went into Taunton, were civilly and kindly treated by the inhabitants. refreshed and rested themselves that night.

Early next morning, the Captain took old Annawon and half a dozen of his Indian soldiers, and his own man, and went to Rhode Island; sending the rest of his company, and his prisoners, by his lieutenant to Plymouth. Tarrying two or three days upon the island, he then went to Plymouth, and carried his wife and his two children with him. . . .

Probably 1716

1716

1 Mohawks'

Monawks
 2 kingly trappings
 3 Church appreciated the force of this pathetic incident.
 Throughout the war he showed himself compassionate and honest with the Indians, and it was the properties of the wishes and expectations that the wholly against his wishes and expectations that the Plymouth authorities put Annawon to death.

THE PROVINCIAL PERIOD

THE grandsons of the first colonists were American-born and educated. Unaided by England they had held their native soil through devastating Indian wars in 1676 both in Virginia and New England. Their victory begot a spirit of self-sufficiency destined to produce momentous results just a century later. In local affairs they claimed and strove stoutly to maintain selfgovernment, the more so because the annulment of their charters had curtailed their political privileges. The provincials often called themselves "New English"; they were loval British subjects, but their affections were rooted in America. Their relations with England were chiefly commercial, but often their own interests did not coincide with those of England. Immigration from the mother country had practically ceased and the writers of the period were almost without exception born and educated in America. Their writings reflect American points of view in society and in politics, and also a growing care for the art of expression both in prose and poetry. No one of the provincial writers lived by his writing. The chances that a literary genius might arise in so small a population as that of the colonies before the Revolution were small. and the sympathetically stimulating and critical atmosphere necessary to the success of genius was lacking. The mass of fervid political writing toward the close of the period furnished little that is of literary value, for literature thrives best in a time of calm. Nevertheless, one writer, Franklin, has left a fascinating record of self-discipline and attainment in a style that needs no apologies.

COTTON MATHER 1663-1728

Cotton Mather was third in the line of the "Mather dynasty." Increase Mather, his father, was born in Massachusetts, educated at Harvard, and became one of its presidents. Cotton Mather was also Massachusetts bred; it is not known that he ever went a hundred miles from Boston, the place of his birth and death. He has been called the "primate of New England," for no archbishop of an established church ever exercised greater influence than did Mather from his pulpit in the North Church. He was not only a powerful preacher but somewhat of a scientific innovator. He introduced inoculation into New England against much opposition, conspicuously that of the New England Courant published by Franklin and his brothers.

Precocious as a youth, Mather was graduated A.B. of Harvard, 1678, A.M. 1681, and became assistant pastor to his father, 1680. A few years later he was in full control of the North Church, his father having been chosen president of Harvard College. He wrote Memorable Providences Relating to Witchcraft, 1689; Wonders of the Invisible World, 1693; Magnalia Christi Americana, 1702; Essays to do Good, 1710. His publications, mostly sermons and religious essays, amount to some four hundred titles.

Mather was undoubtedly the most erudite man of his time in the colonies. His library of two or three thousand volumes in many languages was the largest in America north of Mexico. The Magnalia Christi Americana (Mighty Works of Christ in America) or Ecclesiastical History of New England is the most important literary monument of the colonial seventeenth century. It is written without restraint, is often untrustworthy as to fact, and combines church and political history with biography, anecdote, and legend. The style, consciously adopted by Mather and defended by him, illustrates in its involved sentence-structure, display of learning, and conceits, some of the worst features of the pedantic prose fashionable in England two generations before Mather's time. Of this style, the puns, for example, are characteristic. They are not made with necessarily humorous intent, but for the purpose of extracting from the idea all its suggestiveness, and to show the writer's skill in dressing out a thought in new array. Although a wide gap in style and a wider gap in ideas separates the Magnalia from Treasure Island, it will be seen that Mather had as keen a relish for a story of mutiny and treasure-trove as did Stevenson.

Biography: B. Wendell, Cotton Mather, 1891. See also J. T. Adams, The Founding of New England; K. B. Murdock, Cefton Mather, same, Increase Mather, the Forer ost American Puritan, 1925; W. F. Poole, "Cottin Mather and Salem Witchcraft," No. Am. 99:337-97.

From MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA 1

TSIR WILLIAM PHIPS

. . . For my reader now being satisfied that a person's being obscure in his original 2 is not always a just prejudice to an expectation of considerable matters from him, I shall now inform him that this our Phips was born February 2, A. D. 1650, at a despicable plantation 3 on the river of Kennebec, and almost the furthest village of the eastern settlement of New England. And as the father of that man 4 which was as great a blessing as England had in the age of that man was a smith, so a gun-smithnamely. Tames Phips, once of Bristol—had the honor of being the father to him whom we shall presently see made by the God of Heaven as great a blessing to New England as that country could have had, if they themselves had pleased. His fruitful mother, yet living, had no less than twenty-six children, whereof twenty-one were sons; but equivalent to them all was William, one of the youngest, whom his father, dying, left young with his mother, and with her he lived, "keeping of sheep in the wilderness," 5 until he was eighteen years old; at which time he began to feel some further dispositions of mind from that providence of God which "took him from the sheepfolds,

One division of the Magnalia comprises the lives of men "that have been Shields unto the churches of New England." The appendix to this division, which is here given in part, is occupied with the life of "Sir William Phips late Governour of New England."
To get under your Mathan has interested a new term.

<sup>2</sup> To get under way, Mather has just cited a number of examples of men of obscure origin who have been commanding figures in the world.

<sup>3</sup> small settlement or group of farms

<sup>4</sup> perhaps Bunyan, whose father is said to have been a

5 1 Samuel xvii, 28

from following the ewes great with young, and brought him to feed his people." 6 Reader. inquire no further who was his father. Thou shalt anon see that he was, as the Italians express it, "a son to his own labors!"

His friends earnestly solicited him to settle among them in a plantation of the east: but he had an unaccountable impulse upon his mind, persuading him, as he would privately hint unto some of them, that he was born to greater matters.' To come at those 'greater matters' his first contrivance was to bind himself an apprentice unto a ship carpenter for four years; in which time he became a master of the trade that once, in a vessel of more than forty thousand tons, repaired the ruins of the earth: Noah's, I mean; he then betook himself an hundred and fifty miles further afield, even to Boston, the chief town of New England; which being a place of the most business and resort in those parts of the world, he expected there more commodiously to pursue the Spes majorum et meliorum 7—hopes which had inspired him. At Boston, where it was that he now learned first of all to read and write, he followed his trade for about a year; and, by a laudable deportment, so recommended himself, that he married a young gentlewoman 8 of good repute, who was the widow of one Mr. John Hull, a well-bred merchant, but the daughter of one Captain Roger Spencer, a person of good fashion, who, having suffered much damage in his estate, by some unkind and unjust actions. which he bore with such patience, that for fear of thereby injuring the public, he would not seek satisfaction, posterity might afterward see the reward of his patience, in what Providence hath now done for one of his own posterity. Within a little while after his marriage, he indented 9 with several persons in Boston to build them a ship at Sheepscott River, two or three leagues eastward of Kennebec; where having launched the ship, he also provided a lading of lumber to bring with him, which would have been to the advantage of all concerned. But just as the ship was hardly finished, the barbarous Indians on that river broke forth into an open and cruel war upon the English; and the miserable people, surprised by so sudden a storm of blood, had no refuge from the infidels but the ship now finishing in the harbor. Whereupon he left his intended lading behind him, and, instead thereof, carried with 9 contracted

tinker

Psalms lxxviii, 70, 71 hope of greater and better things
 Note here and elsewhere the consciousness of social rank in the early New England writers.

him his old neighbors and their families, free of all charges to Boston; so the first action that he did, after he was his own man, was to save his father's house, with the rest of the neighborhood, from ruin; but the disappointment which befel him from the loss of his other lading, plunged his affairs into greater embarrassments with such as had employed him.

But he was hitherto no more than beginning to make scaffolds for further and higher actions! He would frequently tell the gentlewoman his wife that he should yet be captain of a King's ship; 1 that he should come to have the command of better men than he was now accounted himself; and that he should be owner of a fair brick-house in the Green-lane of North-Boston; 2 and that, it may be, this would not be all that the providence of God would bring him to. She entertained these passages 3 with a sufficient incredulity; but he had so serious and positive an expectation of them, that it is not easy to say what was the original thereof. He was of an enterprising genius, and naturally disdained littleness; but his disposition for business was of the Dutch mold, where, with a little show of wit, 4 there is as much wisdom demonstrated, as can be shown by any nation. His talent lav not in the airs that serve chiefly for the pleasant and sudden turns of conversation; but he might say, as Themistocles, 5 'Though he could not play upon a fiddle, yet he knew how to make a little city become a great one.' He would prudently contrive a weighty undertaking, and then patiently pursue it unto the end. He was of an inclination cutting rather like a hatchet than like a razor; he would propose very considerable matters to himself, and then so cut through them, that no difficulties could put by the edge of his resolutions. Being thus of the true temper for doing of great things, he betakes himself to the sea, the right scene for such things; and upon advice of a Spanish wreck about the Bahamas, he took a voyage thither; but with little more success than what just served him a little to furnish him for a voyage to England; whither he went in a vessel, not much unlike that which the Dutchmen stamped on their first coin, with these words about it: Incertum quo Fata ferant. 6 Having first informed himself that there was another Spanish wreck, wherein was lost a mighty treasure, hitherto undiscovered, he had a strong impression upon his mind that he must be the discoverer; and he made such representations of his design at Whitehall, 7 that by the year 1683 he became the captain of a King's ship, and arrived at New England commander of the Algier Rose, a frigate of eighteen guns and ninety-five men.

To relate all the dangers through which he passed, both by sea and land, and all the tiresome trials of his patience, as well as of his courage, while year after year the most vexing accidents imaginable delayed the success of his design, it would even tire the patience of the reader: for very great was the experiment that Captain Phips made of the Italian observation, "He that cannot suffer both good and evil. will never come to any great preferment." Wherefore I shall supersede all journal of his voyages to and fro, with reciting one instance of his conduct, that showed him to be a person of no contemptible capacity. While he was captain of the Algier Rose, his men growing weary of their unsuccessful enterprise, made a mutiny, wherein they approached him on the quarterdeck, with drawn swords in their hands, and required him to join with them in running away with the ship, to drive a trade of piracy on the South Seas. Captain Phips, though he had not so much of a weapon as an ox-goad, or a jawbone in his hands, yet, like another Shamgar or Samson, 8 with a most undaunted fortitude, he rushed in upon them, and with the blows of his bare hands, felled many of them, and quelled all the rest. But this is not the instance which I intended: that which I intend is, that (as it has been related unto me) one day while his frigate lay careening, 9 at a desolate Spanish island, by the side of a rock, from whence they had laid a bridge to the shore, the men, whereof he had about an hundred, went all but about eight or ten to divert themselves, as they pretended, in the woods; where they all entered into an agreement, which they signed in a ring, 10 that about seven o'clock that evening they would seize the captain, and those eight or ten which they knew to be true unto him, and leave them to perish on this island, and so be gone away unto the South Sea to seek their Will the reader now imagine that fortune. Captain Phips, having advice of this plot but about an hour and half before it was to be put

<sup>1</sup> a ship in the English navy
2 Now Salem Street; North Boston was just coming to be the best residence quarter of the city.
3 listened to these speeches 4 ingenuity, skill
5 According to Plutarch, Themistocles was wont thus to reply to those who twitted him with ignorance of the social graces.
4 "uncertain whither the fates will lead"

<sup>7</sup> the royal palace in London Shamgar smote six hundred Philistines with an ox-goad, and Samson one thousand with the jawbone of an ass. See Judges iii, 31; xv, 15. 9 lying far over on one side for repairs to the other in execution, yet within two hours brought all these rogues down upon their knees to beg for their lives? But so it was! for these knaves considering that they should want a carpenter with them in their villainous expedition, sent a messenger to fetch unto them the carpenter, who was then at work upon the vessel: and unto him they showed their articles: telling him what he must look for if he did not subscribe among them. The carpenter being an honest fellow. did with much importunity prevail for one half hour's time to consider of the matter; and returning to work upon the vessel, with a spy by them set upon him, he feigned himself taken with a fit of the colic, for the relief whereof he suddenly run unto the captain in the great cabin for a dram; where, when he came, his business was only, in brief, to tell the captain of the horrible distress which he was fallen into; but the captain bid him as briefly return to the rogues in the woods, and sign their articles, and leave him to provide for the rest. The carpenter was no sooner gone but Captain Phips, calling together the few friends (it may be seven or eight) that were left him aboard, whereof the gunner was one, demanded of them, whether they would stand by him in the extremity which he informed them was now come upon him; whereto they replied, 'They would stand by him, if he could save them'; and he answered, 'By the help of God he did not fear it.' All their provisions had been carried ashore to a tent, made for that purpose there; about which they had placed several great guns to defend it, in case of any assault from Spaniards, that might happen to come that way. Wherefore Captain Phips immediately ordered those guns to be silently drawn and turned; and so pulling up the bridge, he charged his great guns aboard, and brought them to bear on every side of the tent. By this time the army of rebels comes out of the woods; but as they drew near to the tent of provisions, they saw such a change of circumstances, that they cried out, "We are betrayed!" And they were soon confirmed in it, when they heard the captain with a stern fury call to them, "Stand off, ye wretches, at your peril!" He quickly saw them cast into a more than ordinary confusion when they saw him ready to fire his great guns upon them, if they offered one step further than he permitted them: and when he had signified unto them his resolve to abandon them unto all the desolation which they had purposed for him, he caused the bridge to be again laid, and his men begun to take the provisions aboard. When the wretches beheld what was coming upon them, they fell to very humble entreaties; and at last fell down upon their knees, protesting that they never had anything against him, excent only his unwillingness to go away with the King's ship upon the South-Sea design: but upon all other accounts, they would choose rather to live and die with him than with any man in the world: however, since they saw how much he was dissatisfied at it, they would insist upon it no more, and humbly begged his pardon. And when he judged that he had kept them on their knees long enough, he having first secured their arms, received them aboard; but he immediately weighed anchor and, arriving at Jamaica, he turned them off. Now, with a small company of other men he sailed from thence to Hispaniola, 2 where, by the policy of his address, 3 he fished out of a very old Spaniard (or Portuguese) a little advice about the true spot where lay the wreck which he had been hitherto seeking, as unprosperously as the chemists have their aurisick 4 stone: that it was upon a reef of shoals, a few leagues to the northward of Port de la Plata, upon Hispaniola, a port so called, it seems, from the landing of some of the shipwrecked company, with a boat full of plate, 5 saved out of their sinking frigate. Nevertheless, when he had searched very narrowly the spot whereof the old Spaniard had advised him, he had not hitherto exactly lit upon it. Such thorns did vex his affairs while he was in the Rose frigate: but none of all these things could retund 6 the edge of his expectations to find the wreck; with such expectations he returned then into England, that he might there better furnish himself to prosecute a new discovery; for though he judged he might, by proceeding a little further, have come at the right spot; yet he found his present company too ill a crew to be confided in.

<sup>10</sup> round-robin

So proper was his behavior, that the best noblemen in the kingdom now admitted him into their conversation; 8 but yet he was opposed by powerful enemies, that clogged his affairs with such demurrages, 9 and such disappointments, as would have wholly discouraged his designs, if his patience had not been in-"He who can wait, hath what he vincible.

Haiti, named Española (Little Spain) by Columbus sagacity and suavity of his manner
 Probably a misprint for aurific (gold-bearing), the f of Mather's manuscript having been mistaken for a long s; the reference is to the search of the alchemists for gold.

<sup>5</sup> valuables, generally utensils, of gold and silver 6 dull

<sup>7</sup> agreeable

* intercourse

<sup>9</sup> delays

<sup>1</sup> i.e., the powder and shot removed desireth." 1 Thus his indefatigable patience, with a proportionable diligence, at length overcame the difficulties that had been thrown in his way; and prevailing with the Duke of Albemarle, and some other persons of quality, to fit him out, he set sail for the fishing-ground, which had been so well baited half an hundred years before; and as he had already discovered his capacity for business in many considerable actions, he now added unto those discoveries. by not only providing all, but also by inventing many of the instruments necessary to the prosecution of his intended fishery. Captain Phips arriving with a ship and a tender at Port de la Plata, made a stout canoe of a stately cottontree, so large as to carry eight or ten oars, for the making of which piragua (as they call it) he did, with the same industry that he did everything else, employ his own hand and adz, and endure no little hardship, lying abroad in the woods many nights together. This piragua, with the tender, being anchored at a place convenient, the piragua kept busking to and again, 2 but could only discover a reef of rising shoals thereabouts, called "The Boilers,"which, rising to be within two or three foot of the surface of the sea, were yet so steep, that a ship striking on them, would immediately sink down, who could say how many fathom? into the ocean. Here they could get no other pay for their long peeping among the boilers, but only such as caused them to think upon returning to their captain with the bad news of their total disappointment. Nevertheless, as they were upon the return, one of the men looking over the side of the piragua, into the calm water, he spied a sea feather, growing, as he judged, out of a rock; whereupon they bade one of their Indians to dive and fetch this feather, that they might, however, carry home something with them, and make, at least, as fair a triumph as Caligula's. 3 The diver bringing up the feather, brought therewithal a surprising story, that he perceived a number of great guns in the watery world where he had found his feather; the report of which great guns exceedingly astonished the whole company; and at once turned their despondencies for their ill success into assurances that they had now lit upon the true spot of ground which they had been looking for: and they were further confirmed in these assurances, when, upon further diving, the Indian fetched up a sow, as they styled it, or a lump of silver worth perhaps two or three hundred pounds. Upon this they prudently buoyed the place, that they might readily find it again; and they went back unto their captain, whom for some while they distressed with nothing but such bad news as they formerly thought they must have carried him: nevertheless, they so slipped in the sow of silver on one side under the table, where they were now sitting with the captain, and hearing him express his resolutions to wait still patiently upon the providence of God under these disappointments, that when he should look on one side, he might see that odd thing before him. At last he saw it; seeing it, he cried out with some agony, "Why! What is this? whence comes this?" And then, with changed countenances, they told him how and where they got it. "Then," said he, "thanks be to God! we are made"; and so away they went, all hands to work; wherein they had this one further piece of remarkable prosperity, that whereas if they had first fallen upon that part of the Spanish wreck where the pieces of eight 4 had been stowed in bags among the ballast, they had seen a more laborious, and less enriching time of it: now, most happily, they first fell upon that room in the wreck where the bullion had been stored up; and they so prospered in this new fishery, that in a little while they had, without the loss of any man's life, brought up thirty-two tons of silver; for it was now come to measuring of silver by tons. Besides which, one Adderly, of Providence, who had formerly been very helpful to Captain Phips in the search of this wreck, did, upon former agreement, meet him now with a little vessel here; and he. with his few hands, took up about six tons of silver; whereof, nevertheless, he made so little use, that in a year or two he died at Bermudas. and, as I have heard, he ran distracted some while before he died. Thus did there once again come into the light of the sun a treasure which had been half an hundred wears groaning under the waters: and in this time there was grown upon the plate a crust like limestone, to the thickness of several inches; which crust being broken open by iron contrived for that purpose, they knocked out whole bushels of rusty pieces of eight which were grown thereinto. Besides that incredible treasure of plate in various forms, thus fetched up, from seven or eight fathom under water, there were vast riches of 4 a Spanish coin of the value of eight reals, or one dollar

1 possibly an adaptation of such passages as Proverbs xxiii, 18; Hebrews vi, 15, etc.

<sup>2</sup> scurrying to and fro
3 Caligula, the mad Roman emperor, wishing to be honored by a military triumph, led an army to the Rhine. Finding no barbarians whom he might fight, he performed some theatrical military move-ments, and then marched to the sea where he bade his soldiers fill their helmets with shells as trophies of Neptune worthy to adorn the temples of Rome.

gold, and pearls and jewels, which they also lit upon: and, indeed, for a more comprehensive invoice, I must but summarily say, "All that a Spanish frigate uses to be enriched withal." Thus did they continue fishing till their provisions failing them, 'twas time to be gone; but before they went, Captain Phips caused Adderly and his folk to swear, that they would none of them discover 1 the place of the wreck, or come to the place any more till the next year, when he expected again to be there himself. And it was also remarkable, that though the sows came up still so fast, that on the very last day of their being there they took up twenty, yet it was afterwards found, that they had in a manner wholly cleared that room of the ship where those massy things were stowed.

But there was one extraordinary distress which Captain Phips now found himself plunged into: for his men were come out with him upon seamen's wages, at so much per month; and when they saw such vast litters of silver sows and pigs, as they called them, come on board them at the captain's call, they knew not how to bear it, that they should not share all among themselves, and be gone to lead "a short life and a merry," in a climate where the arrest of those that had hired them should not reach them. In this terrible distress he made his vows unto Almighty God, that if the Lord would carry him safe home to England with what he had now given him, "to suck of the abundance of the seas, and of the treasures hid in the sands," 2 he would for ever devote himself unto the interests of the Lord Tesus Christ and of his people, especially in the country which he did himself originally belong unto. And he then used all the obliging arts imaginable to make his men true unto him, especially by assuring them that, besides their wages, they should have ample requitals made unto them; which if the rest of his employers would not agree unto, he would himself distribute his own share among them. Relying upon the word of one whom they had ever found worthy of their love, and of their trust, they declared themselves content; but still keeping a most careful eye upon them, he hastened back for England with as much money as he thought he could then safely trust his vessel withal; not counting it safe to supply himself with necessary provisions at any nearer port, and so return unto the wreck, by which delays he wisely feared lest all might be lost, more ways than one. Though he also left so much behind him, that many from divers parts made very considerable voyages of gleanings after his harvest; which came to pass by certain Bermudians compelling of Adderly's boy, whom they spirited away with them, to tell them the exact place where the wreck was to be found. Captain Phips now coming up to London in the year 1687, with near three hundred thousand pounds sterling aboard him, did acquit himself with such an exemplary honesty, that partly by his fulfilling his assurances to the seamen, and partly by his exact and punctual care to have his employers defrauded of nothing that might conscientiously belong unto them, he had less than sixteen thousand pounds left unto himself: as an acknowledgment of which honesty in him, the Duke of Albemarle made unto his wife, whom he never saw, a present of a golden cup, near a thousand pound in value. The character of an honest man he had so merited in the whole course of his life, and especially in this last act of it, that this, in conjunction with his other serviceable qualities, procured him the favors of the greatest persons in the nation; and "he that had been so diligent in his business, must now stand before kings, and not stand before mean men." 3 There were indeed certain mean men-if base, little, dirty tricks, will entitle men to meanness-who urged the King to seize his whole cargo, instead of the tenths, 4 upon his first arrival; on this pretence, that he had not been rightly informed of the true state of the case when he granted the patent, under the protection whereof these particular men had made themselves masters of all this mighty treasure; but the King replied, that he had been rightly informed by Captain Phips of the whole matter, as it now proved; and that it was the slanders of one then present which had, unto his damage, hindered him from hearkening to the information; wherefore he would give them, he said, no disturbance: they might keep what they had got; but Captain Phips, he saw, was a person of that honesty, fidelity and ability, that he should not want his countenance. 5 Accordingly the King, in consideration of the service done by him, in bringing such a treasure into the nation, conferred upon him the honor of knighthood; and if we now reckon him a knight of the golden fleece, 6 the style might pretend unto some circumstances that would justify it. Or call him, if you please, "the knight of honesty;" for it was honesty with 3 Proverbs xxii, 29

¹ disclose ² Deuteronomy xxxiii, 19

<sup>4</sup> perhaps the usual royal share in treasure thus found, or the royal share agreed upon in the special contract or patent in this case

&lt;sup>6</sup> favor
<sup>6</sup> The Golden Fleece is a Burgundian, not an English order. The allusion is to the story of Jason and the Argonauts, and to Phips's early occupation.

industry that raised him; and he became a mighty river, without the running in of muddy water to make him so. Reader, now make a pause, and behold one raised by God! <sup>1</sup>

[WITCHCRAFT]

Now, the arrival of Sir William Phips to the government of New England, was at a time when a governor would have had occasion for all the skill in 2 sorcery that was ever necessary to a Tewish counselor; a time when scores of poor people had newly fallen under a prodigious possession of devils, which it was then generally thought had been by witchcrafts introduced. It is to be confessed and bewailed, that many inhabitants of New England, and young people especially, had been led away with little sorceries, wherein they "did secretly those things that were not right against the Lord their God"; 3 they would often cure hurts with spells, and practice detestable conjurations with sieves, and keys, and peas, and nails, and horseshoes, and other implements, to learn the things for which they had a forbidden and impious Wretched books had stolen into curiosity. the land, wherein fools were instructed how to become able fortune-tellers: among which, I wonder that a blacker brand is not set upon that fortune-telling wheel, which that shamscribbler that goes under the letters of R. B. has promised in his Delights for the Ingenious, 4 as an honest and pleasant recreation: and by these books, the minds of many had been so poisoned, that they studied this finer witchcraft; until 'tis well if some of them were not betraved into what is grosser, and more sensible and capital. Although these diabolical divinations are more ordinarily committed perhaps all over the whole world, than they are in the country of New England, yet, that being a country devoted unto the worship and service of the Lord Jesus Christ above the rest of the world, He signalized his vengeance against these wickednesses, with such extraordinary dispensations as have not been often seen in other places.

The devils which had been so played withal, 5 and, it may be, by some few criminals more wisdom concerning (By old Jewish law and the laws of England witcheraft was punishable by death.)

6 played with, used for trivial purposes explicitly engaged and employed, now broke in upon the country, after as astonishing a manner as was ever heard of. Some scores of people first about Salem, the center and first-born of all the towns in the colony, and afterwards in several other places, were arrested with many preternatural vexations 6 upon their bodies, and a variety of cruel torments, which were evidently inflicted from the demons of the invisible world. The people that were infected and infested with such demons, in a few days' time arrived unto such a refining alteration upon their eyes, that they could see their tormenters: they saw a devil of a little stature. and of a tawny color, attended still 7 with specters that appeared in more humane circumstances, 8

These tormenters tendered unto the afflicted a book, requiring them to sign it, or to touch it at least, in token of their consenting to be listed in the service of the devil; which they refusing to do, the specters under the command of that blackman, as they called him, would apply themselves to torture them with prodigious molestations.

The afflicted wretches were horribly distorted and convulsed; they were pinched black and blue: pins would be run everywhere in their flesh; they would be scalded until they had blisters raised on them; and a thousand other things before hundreds of witnesses were done unto them, evidently preternatural: for if it were preternatural to keep a rigid fast for nine, yea, for fifteen days together; or if it were preternatural to have one's hands tied close together with a rope to be plainly seen, and then by unseen hands presently pulled up a great way from the earth before a crowd of people; such preternatural things were endured by them.

But of all the preternatural things which befell these people, there were none more unaccountable than those wherein the prestigious demons would ever now and then cover the most corporeal things in the world with a fascinating mist of invisibility. As now; a person was cruelly assaulted by a specter, that, she said, run at her with a spindle, though nobody else in the room could see either the specter or the spindle: at last, in her agonies, giving a snatch at the specter, she pulled the spindle away; and it was no sooner got into her hand, but the other folks then present beheld that it was indeed a real, proper, iron spindle; which,

9 juggling

Here follows an account of Phips's services to the colony as governor, and especially of his staunch support of the church.

&lt;sup>3</sup> 2 Kings xvii, 9 <sup>4</sup> probably Delights for the Ingenious in above Fifty Select and Choice Emblems etc. Collected by R. B., I.ondon, 1684

&lt;sup>6</sup> physical afflictions of various kinds that might not be accounted for by natural laws

&lt;sup>7</sup> always <sup>8</sup> appearance, form

when they locked up very safe, it was nevertheless by the demons taken away to do farther mischief.

Again, a person was haunted by a most abusive i specter, which came to her, she said, with a sheet about her, though seen to none but herself. After she had undergone a deal of tease from the annovance of the specter, she gave a violent snatch at the sheet that was upon it; wherefrom she tore a corner, which in her hand immediately was beheld by all that were present, a palpable corner of a sheet: and her father, which was now holding of her, catched, that he might keep what his daughter had so strangely seized; but the specter had like to have wrung his hand off, by endeavoring to wrest it from him; however, he still held it. and several times this odd accident was renewed in the family. There wanted not the oaths of good credible people to these particulars. . . .

1694-1697 1702

From THE DIARY OF COTTON MATHER 2

8 m. Thursday. [October 22, 1702.] This day the Lord graciously carried me, thro' the duties of a fast, which was kept throughout the province.

God helps me, not only on this day, but at other times with great frequency and fervency to commit my children into his merciful hands, now the smallpox is on every side of us.

And being in extreme distress about my poor, feeble, wasted consort, who after more than twenty weeks' languishment, is, for my further trial, fallen into the symptoms of an hopeless consumption, I did the night before the fast, keep, as far as my strength would permit, a vigil. <sup>3</sup> In this vigil after I had, prostrate in the dust, left the case of my consort with the Lord, I repaired unto my bedchamber to take some rest, the latter part of the night. But, before my going to rest, I took my Psalm-book into my hand that I might sing something for the quieting of my uneasy mind. And, unto my

1 deceptive

2 Cotton Mather's Diary, kept between the years 1681 and 1724, differs in style from his formal writings. It may well be compared in point of self-consciousness with the diary of Sewall. The extracts are taken from that time of his life in which he was at the full height of his physical vigor and personal influence.

fluence.

This passage is to be taken literally. The religious exercises of Mather were as rigorous as those of many a medieval saint. His diary shows that in one year he kept sixty fasts and twenty vigils. Light on the inner quality of the extreme Puritans is shed by such a biography as that of Saint Catherine of Siena.

surprise, the very first verse that at the opening of the book my eye was carried unto was that: Psal. 105:37.

And there was not among their tribes,

A feeble person told.

Lord, thought I! This won't be fulfilled until the resurrection of the dead. The tribes of the raised will not have one feeble person among them. And must I resign the condition of my consort, at last, unto what shall be done in the future state? Lord. Thy will be done!

Behold a strange thing! On the night after the fast, my consort had appearing to her, (she supposes, in her sleep) a grave person, who brought with him a woman in the most meager and wretched circumstances imaginable. My consort fell into the praises of God, in that her condition was not yet so miserably circumstanced as that woman's now before her. The grave person then told her that, inasmuch as there were at this time a couple of symptoms become insupportable to her, he would propose a way wherein she should obtain some help for them. First, for her intolerable pain in her breast, said he, let them cut the warm wool from a living sheep and apply it warm unto the grieved pain. Next, for her salivation, which hitherto nothing had relieved, said he, take a tankard of spring-water, and therein over the fire dissolve an agreeable quantity of mastics, and of gum isinglass: drink of this liquor now and then to strengthen the glands, which ought to have been done a great while ago.

She told this on Friday to her principal physician, 4 who mightily encouraged our trying the experiments. We did it; and unto our astonishment my consort revived at a most unexpected rate; insomuch that she came twice on Saturday out of her sick chamber unto me in my study; and there she asked me to give thanks unto God with her, and for her, on the account of the recovery in so surprising a degree begun unto her.

After this, my dear consort continued much refreshed and yet feeble. We had great hopes of her becoming a strong person again, and yet great fears, lest some further latent mischief within her prove after all too hard for her.

4 It is said that as late as 1721 there was but one regularly trained physician in Boston. The profession of medicine in America, as in England, was in its infancy; any person who served an apprenticeship to an older practitioner being deemed fit to give medical advice. One Boston surgeon was a butcher. Educated gentlemen trained neither professionally nor by apprenticeship also frequently gave medical advice to their families or friends. Cotton Mather and Michael Wigglesworth were considered good physicians.

8 m. Friday [October 30, 1702.] Yesterday, I first saw my Church History since the publication of it. 1 A gentleman arrived here from Newcastle, in England, that had bought it there. Wherefore, I set apart this day for solemn thanksgiving unto God for his watchful and gracious providence over that work, and for the harvest of so many prayers, and cares, and tears, and resignations, as I had employed upon it.

My religious friend, Mr. Bromfield, who had been singularly helpful to the publication of that great book. 2 (of twenty shillings price, at London) came to me at the close of the day, to join with me in some of my praises to God.

On this day my little daughter, Nibby, began to fall sick of the smallpox. 3 The dreadful disease, which is raging in the neighborhood. is now got into my poor family. God prepare me, God prepare me, for what is coming upon me!

The child was favorably visited in comparison of what many are.

It becomes impossible for me to record much in these memorials: the vast numbers of the sick among my neighbors and the duties which I owe to the sick in my own family engrossing my time exceedingly.

It being impossible for me to visit the many scores of sick families in my neighborhood, and vet it being my desire to visit them as far as 'tis possible, I composed a sheet which I entitled, Wholesome Words, or, A visit of Advice to Families Visited with Sickness. I put myself to the small expense of printing it; and then dividing my flock into three parts, I singled out three honest men, unto whom I committed the care of lodging a sheet in every family, as fast as they should hear of any falling sick in it. The Lord makes this my poor essay 4 exceeding acceptable and serviceable.

The month of November coming on, I had on my mind a strong impression to look out some agreeable paragraph of scripture to be handled in my public ministry, while the two dreadful

The force of this paragraph is felt only when we understand that, as Barrett Wendell points out in his Literary History of America, Mather undertook the Magnalia as an act of religious patriotism. He could see liberalism growing apace and he hoped to stay the scourge by caling to mind the providences through which the Church had passed. Hence his devout thankfulness that the consecrated task was finished.

2 It was published in London, the only folio in our literature.

Attempt, or perhaps with a double meaning of trial and tentative discourse; see history of the word. and mortal sicknesses of the smallpox and the scarlet fever should be raging among us. After earnest supplications to the Lord for his direction I used an action which I would not encourage ever to be used in any divinatory way. 5 I thought I would observe whether the first place that occurred at my opening of my Bible would prove suitable or no; or such as might carry any intimation of angelical direction in it. Unto my amazement, it proved the history of our Lord's curing the sick son of the nobleman, in the fourth chapter of John. I saw that the whole Bible afforded not a more agreeable or profitable paragraph. So I began a course of sermons upon it.

9 m. Saturday. [November 14.] The awful circumstances upon me. (and upon the town) caused me to lie in the dust this day with secret prayer and fasting before the Lord.

In this month, my lovely consort again declines; and some latent mischief within her, brings on a feebleness that gives us great apprehensions of a mortal issue.

9 m. Saturday. [November 21.] I obtained, I compelled, the leisure for another day of prayer with fasting in my study, to carry my distressed family unto the Lord.

Humiliations are coming thick upon me!

My study is though a large, yet a warm chamber, (the hangings 6 whereof are boxes with between two and three thousand books in them); and we are so circumstanced that my house. though none of the smallest, cannot afford a safe hospital now for my sick folks anywhere so well as there. So I resigned my study for an hospital to my little folks that are falling sick of a loathsome disease. God sanctified this to humble me for my not serving him as I should have done in my study; which provokes him to chase me out of it. . .

9 m. [November 24.] My daughter Nanny was taken sick. She proved full and blind and very sore of the distemper.

9 m. [November 27.] My son Increase was taken sick. He also proved pretty full and blind and sore, though not so bad as his sister.

The little creatures keep calling for me so often to pray with them, that I can scarce do it less than ten or a dozen times in a day; besides what I do with my neighbors.

But the most exquisite of my trials was the condition of my lovely consort. It now began to be hopeless.

<sup>3</sup> Nineteen years later, Mather introduced inoculation to combat the disease, and was so opposed that his life was endangered by a bomb thrown in at his study window.

Divination in the manner described was common then and is perhaps not unknown even now. Mather is drawn toward the practice even while intellectually condemning it. " wall coverings

Lord, if thy poor servant have any grace in him. it will now be tried unto the uttermost!

How shall I glorify the Lord in the midst of these distresses and confusions? Truly, after my sorry manner I did set myself to do it.

I spent much time with my lovely consort. I prayed with her as agreeably as I could. I endeavored her most consummate preparation for the heavenly world by suitable questions and proposals. I comforted her with as lively discourses upon the glory of heaven whereto she was going, as I could make unto her. I disposed her and myself, all that I could, unto a glorious resignation.

At last the black day arrives: Tuesday, the first of December. I had never yet seen such a black day in all the time of my pilgrimage. The desire of my eyes is this day to be taken from me. Her death is lingering and painful. All the forenoon of this day she lies in the pangs of death; sensible, until the last minute or two before her final expiration.

I cannot remember the discourses that passed between us. Only her devout soul was full of satisfaction about her going to a state of blessedness with the Lord Jesus Christ, and as far as my distress would permit me, I studied how to confirm her satisfaction and consolation.

This I remember, that a little before she died I asked her to tell me faithfully what fault she had seen in my conversation 1 that she would advise me to rectify. She replied (which I wondered at) that she knew of none, but that God had made what she had observed in my conversation exceedingly serviceable unto her, to bring her much nearer unto himself.

When I saw to what a point of resignation I was now called of the Lord I resolved, with his help therein, to glorify him. So, two hours before my lovely consort expired, I kneeled by her bedside, and I took into my two hands a dear hand, the dearest in the world. With her then in my hands, I solemnly and sincerely gave her up unto the Lord; and in token of my real resignation I gently put her out of my hands, and laid away a most lovely hand, resolving that I would never touch it any more!

This was the hardest and perhaps the bravest action that ever I did. She afterwards told me that she signed and sealed my act of resignation. And though, before that, she called for me continually, she after this never asked for me any more.

She continued until near two o'clock in the afternoon. And the last sensible word that she spoke, was to her weeping father, "Heaven, Heaven will make amends for all."

When she was expired, I immediately prayed with her father, and the other weeping people in the chamber, for the grace to carry it well under the present calamity, and I did consummate my resignation in terms as full of glory to the wisdom and goodness and all sufficiency of the Lord, as I could utter.

She lived with me just as many years as she had lived in the world before she came to me: with an addition of the seven months, wherein her dying languishments were preparing me to part with her. When I had been married unto her just sixteen years, (and as near as I can recollect, on that very week, sixteen years, that I was married unto her) God began to take her from me. I then said unto my father, "I seem to feel in my mind, the bodings of a dark cloud hanging over my family." The cloud came on, and now, see what was in it!

On the Friday following, my lovely consort had a very honorable funeral.

Indeed, I do not know of a gentlewoman who has died in this land, these many years, more generally esteemed and lamented. This was every one's observation. . . .

1702 1911

SARAH KEMBLE KNIGHT 1666-1727

Mrs. Knight was born in Boston, and after the death of her husband was a school teacher there. In consideration of her rank in society, for she belonged to a substantial family, she was known as Madam Knight. For her time, station in life, and sex, she was well educated. Her Diary shows that some Puritans were able to take a humorous view of the trivial incidents of life, and to enjoy thoroughly an adventure rather less common in her day than a journey across Africa in ours.

In 1704-5, apparently to secure her interest in the settlement of an estate, Mrs. Knight made the journey from Boston to New York, a distance then estimated at 271 miles, and return. Boston then contained some ten thousand inhabitants, and New York about half as many. Her journey may be followed with tolerable accuracy on any good map. It led along the old "Pequot path," and is approximately the route of the first post road between the two cities. The journal, made for her private satisfaction only, was first printed in 1825. Donald G. Mitchell says of it, "The little book is not perhaps altogether Addisonian: but the vivacious author was very keen of eye, and quick of hearing; and I think has given us the most realistic and vivid account of cross-country journeyings in her time which can anywhere be found." It is well to compare her picture of rural social life in New England with the equally faithful picture of Boston society of the same time in Sewall's Diary.

<sup>1</sup> behavior, public and private

From HER PRIVATE JOURNAL 1

Tuesday, October the third, about 8 in the morning, I with the Post 2 proceeded forward without observing any thing remarkable; And about two, afternoon, Arrived at the Post's second stage, where the western Post mett him and exchanged Letters. Here, having called for something to eat, the woman bro't in a Twisted thing like a cable, but something whiter; and laving it on the bord, tugg'd for life to bring it into a capacity to spread; which having with great pains accomplished, shee serv'd in a dish of Pork and Cabage, I suppose the remains of Dinner. The sause was of a deep Purple, which I tho't was boil'd in her dye Kettle; the bread was Indian, 3 and every thing on the Table service Agreeable to 4 these. I, being hungry, gott a little down; but my stomach was soon cloy'd, and what cabbage I swallowed serv'd me for a Cudd the whole day after.

Having here discharged the Ordnary 5 for self and Guide, (as I understood was the custom.) About Three afternoon went on with my Third Guide, who Rode very hard; and having crossed Providence Ferry. we come to a River? which they Generally Ride thro'. But I dare not venture: so the Post got a Ladd and Cannoo to carry me to tother side, and hee rid thro' and Led my hors. The Cannoo was very small and shallow, so that when we were in she seem'd redy to take in water, which greatly terrified mee, and caused me to be very circumspect, sitting with my hands fast on each side, my eyes stedy, not daring so much as to lodg my tongue a hair's breadth more on one side of my mouth then tother, nor so much as think on Lott's wife, 8 for a wry thought would have oversett our wherey: But was soon put out of this pain, by feeling the Cannoo on shore, which I as soon almost saluted with my feet; and Rewarding my sculler, again mounted and made the best of our way forwards. The Rode here was very even and the day pleasant, it being now

1 The manuscript of Madam Knight's journal is not in her own hand, and contains some evident mistakes. In the extracts here given, the spelling and punctuation follow the manuscript.
man

8 of Indian corn

in harmony with <sup>5</sup> The reckoning, bill; each postman served successively as guide to Mrs. Knight. After a few days she found it so fatiguing to keep the pace, that she hired guides of her own.

This was apparently near the present city of Provi-dence, although the distances given farther on seem to cast this into doubt. The town of Providence is not mentioned, perhaps because of its unimportance, for it had dwindled from 500 to 26 inhabitants during King Philip's War. pably the Pawtuxet * Genesis xix, 26 probably the Pawtuxet near Sunsett. But the Post told mee wee had neer 14 miles to Ride to the next Stage, (where we were to Lodg.) I askt him of the rest of the Rode, foreseeing wee must travail in the night. Hee told mee there was a had River 9 we were to Ride thro', which was so very firce a hors could sometimes hardly stem it: But it was but narrow, and wee should soon be over. I cannot express The concern of mind this relation sett me in: no thoughts but those of the dang'ros River could entertain my Imagination, and they were as formidable as varios. still 10 Tormenting me with blackest Ideas of my Approching fate-Sometimes seing my self drowning, otherwhiles drowned, and at the best like a holy Sister Just come out of a Spiritual Bath in dripping Garments.

Now was the Glorious Luminary, with his swift Coursers arrived at his Stage, 11 leaving poor me with the rest of this part of the lower world in darkness, with which wee were soon Surrounded. The only Glimering we now had was from the spangled Skies, Whose Imperfect Reflections rendered every Object formidable. Each lifeless Trunk, with its shatter'd Limbs, appear'd an Armed Enymie; and every little stump like a Ravenous devourer. Nor could I so much as discern my Guide, when at any distance, which added to the terror.

Thus, absolutely lost in Thought, and dying with the very thoughts of drowning, I come up with the post, who I did not see till even with his Hors: he told mee he stopt for mee: and wee Rode on Very deliberatly a few paces, when we entred a Thickett of Trees and Shrubbs, and I perceived by the Hors's going, we were on the descent of a Hill, which, as wee come neerer the bottom, 'twas totaly dark with the Trees that surrounded it. But I knew by the Going of the Hors wee had entred the water. which my Guide told mee was the hazzardos River he had told me off; and hee, Riding up close to my Side, Bid me not fear—we should be over Imediatly. I now ralyed all the Courage I was mistriss of, Knowing that I must either Venture my fate of drowning, or be left like the Children in the wood. So, as the Post bid me, I gave Reins to my Nagg; and sitting as Stedy as Just before in the Cannoo, in a few minutes got safe to the other side, which hee told mee was the Narragansett country.

Here We found great difficulty in Travailing, the way being very narrow, and on each side the Trees and bushes gave us very unpleasent welcome with their Branches and bow's which wee could not avoid, it being so exceeding dark. My Guide, as before so now, putt on harder than I, with my weary bones, could follow; so left mee and the way beehind him. Now Returned my distressed aprehensions of the place where I was: the dolesome woods, my Company next to none. Going I knew not whither. and encompased with Terrifying darkness; The least of which was enough to startle a more Masculine courage. Added to which the Reflections, as in the afternoon of the day that my Call 1 was very Ouestionable, which till then I had not so Prudently as I ought considered. Now, coming to the foot of a hill, I found great difficulty in ascending; But being got to the Top, was there amply recompensed with the friendly Appearance of the Kind Conductress of the night, Just then Advancing above the Horisontall Line. The Raptures which the Sight of that fair Planett produced in mee. caus'd mee, for the Moment to forgett my present wearyness and past toils; and Inspir'd me for most of the remaining way with very divirting tho'ts, some of which, with the other Occurances of the day. I reserved to note down when I should come to my Stage. My tho'ts on the sight of the moon were to this purpose:

&lt;sup>9</sup> perhaps the Potowomut River <sup>11</sup> the end of his journey

Fair Cynthia,2 all the Homage that I may Unto a Creature, unto thee I pay; In Lonesome woods to meet so kind a guide. To Mee's more worth than all the world beside. Some Joy I felt just now, when safe got o'er Yon Surly River to this Rugged shore, Deeming Rough welcomes from these clownish 4

Trees, Better than Lodgings with Nereidees. 5 Yet swelling fears surprise; all dark appears— Nothing but Light can disipate those fears. My fainting vitals can't lend strength to say, But softly whisper, O I wish 'twere day. The murmer hardly warm'd the Ambient air, E're thy Bright Aspect rescues from dispair: Makes the old Hagg her sable mantle loose, And a Bright Joy do's through my Soul diffuse. The Boistero's Trees now Lend a Passage Free, And pleasant prospects thou giv'st light to see.

From hence wee kept on, with more ease than before: the way being smooth and even, the night warm and serene, and the Tall and thick Trees at a distance, especially when the

1 errand (perhaps, also, call of duty)

moon glar'd light through the branches, fill'd my Imagination with the pleasent delusion of a Sumpteous citty, fill'd with famous Buildings and churches, with their spiring steeples, Balconies, Galleries and I know not what: Granduers which I had heard of, and which the stories of foreign countries had given me the Idea of Here stood a Lofty church—there is a steeple. And there the Grand Parade-O see the people! That Famouse Castle there, were I but nigh, To see the mote and Bridg and walls so high-They'r very fine! sais my deluded eye.

Being thus agreably entertain'd without a thou't of any thing but thoughts themselves. I on a suden was Rous'd from these pleasing Imaginations, by the Post's sounding his horn. which assured mee hee was arrived at the Stage, where we were to Lodg: and that musick was then most musickall and agreeable to mee.

Being come to mr. Havens', I was very civilly Received, and courteously entertained, in a clean comfortable House; and the Good woman was very active in helping off my Riding clothes. and then ask't what I would eat. I told her I had some Chocolett, if shee would prepare it; which with the help of some Milk, and a little clean brass Kettle, she soon effected to my satisfaction. I then betook me to my Apartment, which was a little Room parted from the Kitchen by a single bord partition; where, after I had noted the Occurrances of the past day. I went to bed, which, tho' pretty hard, Yet neet and handsome. But I could get no sleep, because of the Clamor of some of the Town tope-ers in next Room, Who were entred into a strong debate concerning the Signifycation of the name of their Country, (viz.) Narraganset. One said it was named so by the Indians. because there grew a Brief there, of a prodigious Highth and bigness, the like hardly ever known, called by the Indians Narragansett; And quotes an Indian of so Barberous a name for his Author, that I could not write it. His Antagonist Replyed no-It was from a Spring it had its name, which hee well knew where it was, which was extreem cold in summer, and as Hott as could be imagined in the winter, which was much resorted too by the natives, and by them called Narragansett, (Hott and Cold,) and that was the originall of their places name with a thousand Impertinances 9 not worth notice, which He utter'd with such a Roreing voice and Thundering blows with the fist of wickedness on the Table, that it peirced my very head. I heartily fretted, and wish't 'um tongue tyed:

<sup>2</sup> the moon

<sup>3</sup> A created thing; the Puritans and their immediate descendants interpreted the Ten Commandments very strictly. 4 rustic spirit of night streng-growing, massed the naive amateurishness of these lines is characteristic of early American verse. See, for an English parallel, such bits of verse as Bunyan inserts in Pilgrim's Progress.

&lt;sup>5</sup> The Nereids were the guardian spirits of streams.

<sup>9</sup> irrelevant things

but with as little succes as a friend of mine once, who was (as shee said) kept a whole night awake, on a Jorny, by a country Left. <sup>1</sup> and a Sergent, Insigne and a Deacon, contriving how to bring a triangle into a Square. They kept calling for tother Gill, which while they were swallowing, was some Intermission; But presently, like Oyle to fire, encreased the flame. I set my Candle on a Chest by the bed side, and setting up, fell to my old way of composing my Resentments, in the following manner:

I ask thy aid, O Potent Rum!
To Charm these wrangling Topers Dum.
Thou hast their Giddy Brains possest—
The man confounded with the Beast—
And I, poor I, can get no rest.
Intoxicate them with thy fumes:
O still their Tongues till morning comes!

And I know not but my wishes took effect; for the dispute soon ended with 'tother Dram; and so Good night!

Wedensday, October 4th. About four in the morning, we set out for Kingston (for so was the Town called) with a french Docter in our company. Hee and the Post put on very furiously, so that I could not keep up with them. only as now and then they'd stop till they see This Rode was poorly furnished with accommodations for Travellers, so that we were forced to ride 22 miles by the post's account, but neerer thirty by mine, before wee could bait so much as our Horses, which I exceedingly complained of. But the post encourag'd mee, by saying wee should be well accommodated anon at mr. Devills, a few miles further. But I questioned whether we ought to go to the Devil to be helpt out of affliction. However, like the rest of Deluded souls that post to the Infernal denn, Wee made all posible speed to this Devil's Habitation; where alliting, in full assurance of good accommodation, wee were going in. But meeting his two daughters, as I suposed twins, they so neerly resembled each other, both in features and habit, and look't as old as the Divel himselfe, and quite as Ugly, We desired entertainm't, but could hardly get a word out of 'um, till with our Importunity, telling them our necesity, &c. they call'd the old Sophister, who was as sparing of his words as his daughters had bin, and no, or none, was the reply's hee made us to our demands. Hee differed only in this from the old fellow in to'ther Country: hee let us depart. However, I thought it proper to warn poor Travailers to endeavour to Avoid falling into circumstances like ours, which, at our next Stage I sat down and did as followeth:

May all that dread the cruel feind of night Keep on, and not at this curs't Mansion light. 'Tis Hell; 'tis Hell! and Devills here do dwell: Here dwells the Devill—surely this's Hell. Nothing but Wants: 2 a drop to cool yo'r Tongue Cant be procur'd these cruel Feinds among. Plenty of horrid Grins and looks sevear, Hunger and thirst, But pitty's bannish'd here The Right hand keep, if Hell on Earth you fear!

Thus leaving this habitation of cruelty, we went forward; and arriving at an Ordinary <sup>3</sup> about two mile further, found tollerable accommodation. But our Hostes, being a pretty full mouth'd old creature, entertain'd our fellow travailer, the french Docter, with Inumirable complaints of her bodily infirmities; and whisperd to him so lou'd, that all the House had as full a hearing as hee; which was very divirting to the company, (of which there was a great many,) as one might see by their sneering. But poor weary I slipt out to enter my mind in my Jornal, and left my Great Landly with her Talkative Guests to themselves.

From hence we proceeded (about ten forenoon) through the Narragansett country, pretty Leisurely: and about one afternoon come to Paukataug 4 River, which was about two hundred paces over, and now very high, and no way over to to'ther side but this. I darid not venture to Ride thro, my courage at best in such cases but small, And now at the Lowest Ebb, by reason of my weary, very weary, hungry, and uneasy Circumstances. So takeing leave of my company, tho' with no little Reluctance, that I could not proceed with them on my Jorny, Stop at a little cottage Just by the River, to wait the Waters falling, which the old man that lived there said would be in a little time, and he would conduct me safe over. This little Hutt was one of the wretchedest I ever saw a habitation for human creatures. It was suported with shores 5 enclosed with Clapbords, laid on Lengthways, and so much asunder, that the Light come throu' every where; the doore tyed on with a cord in the place of hinges; The floor the bear earth; no windows but such as the thin covering afforded, nor any furniture but a Bedd with a glass Bottle hanging at the head on't; an earthan cupp, a small pewter Bason, A Bord with sticks to stand on, instead of a table, and a block or two in the corner instead of chairs. The family were the old man, his wife and two Children; all and every part being the picture of poverty. Notwithstanding both the Hutt and its Inhabitance were very clean and tydee: to the crossing the Old Proverb, that bare walls make giddy howswifes.

&lt;sup>2</sup> is lacking <sup>3</sup> tavern

¹ Pawcatuck props

<sup>1</sup> leftenant, lieutenant

Saturday, Oct. 7th, wee 1 sett out early in the Morning, and being something unaquainted with the way, having ask't it of some wee mett. they told us wee must Ride a mile or two and turne down a Lane on the Right hand; and by their Direction wee Rode on but not Yet comeing to the turning, we mett a Young fellow and ask't him how farr it was to the Lane which turn'd down towards Guilford. Hee said wee must Ride a little further, and turn down by the Corner of uncle Sams Lott. My Guide vented his Spleen at the Lubber; and we soon after came into the Rhode, and keeping still on, without any thing further Remarkabell, about two a clock afternoon we arrived at New Haven, where I was received with all Posible Respects and civility. Here I discharged Mr. Wheeler with a reward to his satisfaction, and took some time to rest after so long and toilsome a Journey; And Inform'd myselfe of the manners and customs of the place, and at the same time employed myselfe in the afair I went there upon.

They are Govern'd by the same Laws as wee in Boston, (or little differing,) thr'out this whole Colony of Connecticot, 2 And much the same way of Church Government, and many of them good. Sociable people, and I hope Religious too: but a little too much Independent in their principalls, and, as I have been told, were formerly in their Zeal very Riggid in their Administrations towards such as their Lawes made Offenders, even to a harmless Kiss or Innocent merriment among Young people. Whipping being a frequent and counted an easy Punishment, about which, as other Crimes, the Tudges were absolute in their Sentances.

. . . Their Diversions in this part of the Country are on Lecture days 3 and Training days mostly: on the former there is Riding from town to town.

And on training dayes The Youth divert themselves by Shooting at the Target, as they call it, (but it very much resembles a pillory,)

<sup>1</sup> Mrs. Knight and her guide, Joshua Wheeler; they were now at Killingsworth, Connecticut.

<sup>2</sup> Mrs. Knight feels herself to be in a foreign country, a fact that throws a little light on the feeling of each separate colony for its independence. This led to a certain amount of estrangement quite to the time of the Constitution (1789).

3 The midweek religious lecture was generally on Thursday afternoon, and the services were less formal than on Sunday.

where hee that hitts neerest the white has some vards of Red Ribbin presented him, which being tied to his hattband, the two ends streeming down his back, he is Led away in Triumph, with great applause, as the winners of the Olympiack Games. 4. They generally marry very young: the males oftener as I am told under twentie than above: they generally make public wedings, and have a way something singular (as they say) in some of them. viz. Tust before Toyning hands the Bridegroom quitts the place, who is soon followed by the Bridesmen, and as it were, dragg'd back to duty being the reverse to the former practice among us, to steal Mrs. Bride.

There are great plenty of Oysters all along by the sea side, as farr as I Rode in the Collony, and those very good. And they Generally lived very well and comfortably in their famelies. But too Indulgent (especially the farmers) to their slaves: sufering too great familiarity from them, permitting them to sit at Table and eat with them, (as they say to save time,) and into the dish goes the black hoof as freely as the white hand. They told me that there was a farmer lived nere the Town where I lodgd who had some difference with his slave, concerning something the master had promised him and did not punctualy perform: which caused some hard words between them; But at length they put the matter to Arbitration and Bound themselves to stand to the award of such as they named—which done, the Arbitrators Having heard the Allegations of both parties, Order the master to pay 40s to black face, and acknowledge his fault. And so the matter ended: the poor master very honestly standing to the award.

They give the title of merchant to every trader; who Rate their Goods according to the time and spetia 5 they pay in: viz. Pay, mony, Pay as mony, and trusting. Pay is Grain, Pork, Beef. &c. at the prices sett by the General Court 6 that year; mony is pieces of Eight, Ryalls, or Boston or Bay shillings 7 (as they call them,) or Good hard money, as sometimes silver coin is termed by them; also Wampom,. vizt. Indian beads which serves for change. Pay as mony is provisions, as aforesaid one Third cheaper then as the Assembly or General

&lt;sup>4</sup> The Olympic games, held every four years from 776 n.c. at Olympia, constituted the greatest festival of the Greek race.

<sup>5</sup> specie

The General Courts of the colonies were wont to set the prices of staples.

The Spanish dollar or "piece of eight" contained eight reals. The Bay Shilling was comed by the Mass-achusetts Bay Colony.

Court sets it: and Trust as they and the merchant agree for time

Now, when the buyer comes to ask for a comodity, sometimes before the merchant answers that he has it, he sais, is Your pay redy? Perhaps the Chap Reply's Yes: what do You pay in? say's the merchant. The buyer having answered, then the price is set; as suppose he wants a sixpenny knife, in pay it is 12d—in pay as money eight pence, and hard money its own price, viz. 6d. It seems a very Intricate way of trade and what Lex Mercatoria 1 had not thought of.

Being at a merchants house, in come a tall country fellow, with his alfogeos 2 full of Tobacco; for they seldom Loose their Cudd, but keep Chewing and Spitting as long as they'r eves are open,-he advanc't to the middle of the Room, makes an Awkward Nodd, and spitting a Large deal of Aromatick Tincture, he gave a scrape with his shovel like shoo, leaving a small shovel full of dirt on the floor, made a full stop, Hugging his own pretty Body with his hands under his arms, Stood staring rown'd him, like a Catt let out of a Baskett. At last, like the creature 3 Balamm Rode on he opened his mouth and said: have You any Ribinen for Hatbands to sell I pray? The Questions and Answers about the pay being past, the Ribin is bro't and opened. Bumpkin Simpers, cryes its confounded Gay I vow; and beckning to the door, in comes Jone Tawdry dropping about 50 curtsees, and stands by him: hee shows her the Ribin. Law, You, sais shee, its right Gent, 4 do You, take it, tis dreadfull pretty. Then she enquires, have you any hood silk I pray? which being brought and bought. Have You any thred silk to sew it with says shee, which being accommodated with they Departed. They Generaly stand after they come in a great while speachless, and sometimes dont say a word till they are askt what they want, which I impute to the Awe they stand in of the merchants, who they are constantly almost Indebted too; and must take what they bring without Liberty to choose for themselves: but they serve them as well, making the merchants stay long enough for their pay.

We may Observe here the great necessity and bennifitt both of Education and Conversation; 5 for these people have as Large a portion of mother witt, and sometimes a Larger, than those who have bin brought up in Citties; But for want of emprovements. Render themselves almost Ridiculos, as above. I should be glad if they would leave such follies, and am sure all that Love Clean Houses (at least) would be glad on't too.

They are generally very plain in their dress, throught all the Colony, as I saw, and follow one another in their modes: that You may know where they belong, especially the women, meet them where you will.

Their Cheif Red Letter day is St. Election. 6 which is annually Observed according to Charter, to choose their Govenr: a blessing they can never be thankfull enough for, as they will find, if ever it be their hard fortune to loose it. 7 The present Govenor in Conecticott is the Honorable John Winthrop Esq. A Gentleman of an Ancient and Honourable Family, whose Father was Govenor here sometime before, and his Grand father had bin Govr of the Massachusetts. This gentleman is a very curteous and afable person, much Given to Hospitality, and has by his Good services Gain'd the affections of the people as much as any who had bin before him in that post.

Decr. 6th. Being by this time well Recruited and rested after my Journy, my business lying unfinished by some concerns at New York depending thereupon, my Kinsman, Mr. Thomas Trowbridge of New Haven, must needs take a Journy there before it could be accomplished, I resolved to go there in company with him, and a man of the town which I engaged to wait on 8 me there. Accordingly, Dec. 6th we set out from New Haven, and about 11 same morning came to Stratford ferry; which crossing, about two miles on the other side Baited our horses and would have eat a morsell ourselves, But the Pumpkin and Indian mixt Bred had such an Aspect, and the Bare-legg'd Punch 9 so awkerd or rather Awfull a sound, that we left both, and proceeded forward, and about seven at night come to Fairfield, where we met with good entertainment and Lodg'd; and early next morning set forward to Norowalk, from its halfe Indian name North-walk, when about 12 at noon we arrived, and Had a Dinner of Fryed Venison, very savoury. Landlady wanting some pepper in the seasoning, bid the Girl hand her the spice in the little Gay cupp on the shelfe. From hence we Hasted

the law of merchants; trade rules having a certain legal standing
 Sp. alforja, saddlebags; here, of course, cheeks

<sup>3</sup> Numbers xxii, 21-33

<sup>4</sup> elegant

&lt;sup>6</sup> social intercourse

&lt;sup>6</sup> Jocosely: the general election day was celebrated as a holiday, just as a saint's day would be in a Catholic country.

<sup>7</sup> The governor of Massachusetts was at this time appointed by the king, to the general discontent of the colony.

<sup>8</sup> accompany apparently a local name for some kind of drink

towards Rve. walking and Leading our Horses neer a mile together, up a prodigios high Hill; and so Riding till about nine at night, and there arrived and took up our Lodgings at an ordinary, which a French family kept. Here being very hungry, I desired a fricasee, which the Frenchman undertakeing, mannaged so contrary to my notion of Cookery, that I hastned to Bed superless: And being shewd the way up a pair of stairs which had such a narrow passage that I had almost stopt by the Bulk of my Body; But arriving at my apartment found it to be a little Lento 1 Chamber furnisht amongst other Rubbish with a High Bedd and a Low one, a Long Table, a Bench and a Bottomless chair.—Little Miss went to scratch up my Kennell which Russelled as if shee'd bin in the Barn amongst the Husks, and supose such was the contents of the tickin-nevertheless being exceeding weary, down I laid my poor Carkes (never more tired) and found my Covering as scanty as my Bed was hard. Annon I heard another Russelling noise in The Room called to know the matter-Little miss said shee was making a bed for the men; who, when they were in Bed, complained their leggs lay out of it by reason of its shortness-my poor bones complained bitterly not being used to such Lodgings, and so did the man who was with us; and poor I made but one Grone, which was from the time I went to bed to the time I Riss, which was about three in the morning, Setting up by the Fire till Light, and having discharged our ordinary which was as dear as if we had had far Better fare-wee took our leave of Monsier and about seven in the morn come to New Rochell a french town, where we had a good Breakfast. And in the strength of that about an how'r before sunsett got to York. Here I applyd myself to Mr. Burroughs, a merchant to whom I was recommended by my Kinsman Capt. Prout, and received great Civilities from him and his spouse, who were now both Deaf but very agreeable in their Conversation, Diverting me with pleasant stories of their knowledge in Brittan from whence they both come...

The Cittie of New York is a pleasant, well compacted place, situated on a Commodious River which is a fine harbour for shipping. The Buildings Brick Generaly, very stately and high, though not altogether like ours in Boston. The Bricks in some of the Houses are of divers Coullers and laid in Checkers, being glazed look very agreeable. The inside of them are neat to admiration, the wooden work, for only the walls are plasterd, and the Sumers 2 and Gist 3 are plained and kept very white scowr'd as so is all the partitions if made of Bords. The fire places have no Jambs (as ours have) But the Backs run flush with the walls, and the Hearth is of Tyles and is as farr out into the Room at the Ends as before the fire, which is Generally Five foot in the Low'r rooms, and the peice over where the mantle tree should be is made as ours with Joyners work, and as I supose is fasten'd to iron rodds inside. The House where the Vendue 4 was, had Chimney Corners like ours, and they and the hearths were laid with the finest tile that I ever see. and the stair cases laid all with white tile which is ever clean, and so are the walls of the Kitchen which had a Brick floor. They were making Great preparations to Receive their Govenor. Lord Cornbury from the Jerseys, and for that end raised the militia to Gard him on shore to the fort.

They are Generaly of the Church of England and have a New England Gentleman for their minister, and a very fine church set out with all Customary regusites. There are also a Dutch and Divers Conventicles as they call them, viz. Baptist, Quakers, etc. They are not strict in keeping the Sabbath as in Boston and other places where I had bin, But seem to deal with great exactness as farr as I see or Deall with. They are sociable to one another and Curteos and Civill to strangers and fare well in their The English go very fasheonable in their dress. But the Dutch, especially the middling sort, differ from our women, in their habitt 5 go loose, were French muches 6 which are like a Capp and a head band in one, leaving their ears bare, which are sett out with Tewells of a large size and many in number. And their fingers hoop't with Rings, some with large stones in them of many Coullers as were their pendants in their ears, which You should see very old women wear as well as Young.

They have Vendues very frequently and make their Earnings very well by them, for they treat with good Liquor Liberally, and the Customers Drink as Liberally and Generally pay for't as well, by paying for that which they Bidd up Briskly for, after the sack has gone plentifully about, tho' sometimes good penny worths are got there. Their Diversions in the Winter is Riding Sleys about three or four Miles out of Town, where they have Houses of supporting beams

 ioist(s) an auction which thrifty Mrs. Knight had just attended of dress

&lt;sup>6</sup> wear French mutches (mutch is Scotch, cap)
<sup>7</sup> a name applied to several sorts of wine

entertainment at a place called the Bowery. and some go to friends Houses who handsomely treat them. Mr. Burroughs carry'd his spouse and Daughter and myself out to one Madame Dowes, a Gentlewoman that lived at a farm House, who gave us a handsome Entertainment of five or six Dishes and choice Beer and metheglin. Cyder, etc., all which she said was the produce of her farm. I believe we mett 50 or 60 slays that day—they fly with great swiftness and some are so furious that they'le turn out of the path for none except a Loaden Nor do they spare for any diversion the place affords, and sociable to a degree. they'r Tables being as free to their Navbours as to themselves

Having here transacted the affair I went upon and some other that fell in the way, after about a fortnight's stay there I left New-York with no Little regrett, and Thursday, Dec. 21, set out for New Haven with my Kinsman Trowbridge, and the man that waited on me about one afternoon, and about three come to halfway house about ten miles out of town, where we Baited and went forward, and about 5 come to Spiting Devil, Else 1 Kings bridge, where they pay three pence for passing over with a horse, which the man that keeps the Gate set up at the end of the Bridge receives.

January 6th. Being now well Recruited and fitt for business I discoursed 2 the persons I was concerned with, that we might finnish in order to my return to Boston. They delayd as they had hitherto done hoping to tire my Patience. But I was resolute to stay and see an End of the matter let it be never so much to my disadvantage-So Tanuary 9th they come again and promise the Wednesday following to go through with the distribution of the Estate which they delayed till Thursday and then come with new amusements. But at length by the mediation of that holy good Gentleman, the Rev. Mr. James Pierpont, the minister of New Haven, and with the advice and assistance of other our Good friends we come to an accommodation and distribution, which having finished though not till February, the man that waited on me to York taking the charge of me I sit out for Boston. We went from New Haven upon the ice (the ferry being not passable thereby) and the Rev. Mr. Pierpont with Madam Prout Cuzin Trowbridge and divers others were taking leave wee went onward without anything Remarkabl till wee come to New London and Lodged again at Mr. Saltonstalls—and here I dismist my Guide, and my Generos entertainer provided me Mr. Samuel Rogers of that place to go home with me-I staved a day here Longer than I intended by the Commands of the Honorable Govenor Winthrop to stay and take a supper with him whose wonderful civility I may not omitt. The next morning I Crossed the Ferry to Groton, having had the Honor of the Company, of Madam Livingston (who is the Govenors Daughter) and Mary Christophers and divers others to the boat— And that night Lodged at Stonington and had Rost Beef and pumpkin sause for supper. The next night at Haven's and had Rost fowle, and the next day wee come to a river which by Reason of The Freshetts coming down was swell'd so high wee feard it impassable and the rapid stream was very terryfying-However we must over and that in a small Cannoo. Mr. Rogers assuring me of his good Conduct. 3 I after a stay of near an how'r on the shore for consultation went into the Cannoo, and Mr. Rogers paddled about 100 yards up the Creek by the shore side, turned into the swift stream and dexterously steering her in a moment wee come to the other side as swiftly passing as an arrow shott out of the Bow by a strong arm. I staid on the shore till Hee returned to fetch our horses, which he caused to swim over himself bringing the furniture 4 in the Cannoo. But it is past my skill to express the Exceeding fright all their 5 transactions formed in me. Wee were now in the colony of the Massachusetts and taking Lodgings at the first Inn we come too had a pretty difficult passage the next day which was the second of March by reason of the sloughy ways then thawed by the Sunn. Here I mett Capt. John Richards of Boston who was going home, So being very glad of his Company we Rode something harder than hitherto, and missing my way in going up a very steep Hill, my horse dropt down under me as Dead; this new surprize no little hurt me meeting it Tust at the Entrance into Dedham from whence we intended to reach home that night. But was now obliged to gett another Hors there and leave my own, resolving for Boston that night if possible. But in going over the Causeway at Dedham the Bridge being overflowed by the high waters comming down I very narrowly escaped falling over into the river Hors and all which twas almost a miracle I did notnow it grew late in the afternoon and the people having very much discouraged us about the sloughy way which they said wee should find very difficult and hazardous it so wrought on mee being tired and dispirited and disapointed of my desires of going home that I agreed to Lodg there that night which we did at the house of one Draper, and the next day being March 3d wee got safe home to Boston, where I found my aged and tender mother and my Dear and only Child in good health with open arms redy to receive me, and my kind relations and friends flocking in to welcome mee and hear the story of my transactions and travails I having this day bin five months from home and now I cannot fully express my Joy and Satisfaction. But desire sincearly to adore my Great Benefactor for thus graciously carving forth and returning in safety his unworthy handmaid. 1704-5 1825

&lt;sup>3</sup> skill, dexterity <sup>5</sup> probably these in the original MS. <sup>4</sup> saddles and other equipment

<sup>1</sup> otherwise

<sup>2</sup> conferred with

SAMUEL SEWALL 1652-1730

The Diary that Sewall left, now printed in three large volumes, gives an intimate record of one of the foremost Boston citizens of his time, a man of education, wealth, and position, whose life was built into the social structure of the community. He was born in Hampshire, England, and died in Boston. He came with his parents to Massachusetts in 1661, graduated at Harvard, A.B., 1671, A.M., 1674, studied for the ministry, but entered public life, serving in administrative and judicial offices, and at length as chief justice of Massachusetts, 1718-28. As judge in some of the witchcraft trials he admitted evidence which, years later, he came to consider worthless. For this error he made public confession. In addition to his Diary, Sewall wrote A Description of the New Heaven, 1697; The Selling of Joseph, 1700, the first anti-slavery tract published in America; and several other pamphlets. His writings, consisting of personal memoranda, some of which have been published for their historical importance, are numerous.

The Diary, kept in a diary-writing age, when the record of passing events in print was only beginning, has given the author the title of the American Pepys. It is unfortunate that these diarists, Sewall and Pepys, should now, because of the informality and quaintness of their style, and the intimacy of their material, be regarded as almost comic characters. Both were substantial citizens and honest officers highly esteemed by their contemporaries. Diaries equally intimate, written today, will appear equally fantastic two centuries hence. Sewall gives some pictures of colonial life, especially that of the official and higher social circles, that can nowhere be excelled for their vividness. His work is a priceless record of early provincial Massachusetts, as accurate as any such document can humanly be. The parts chosen have been selected for their social picturesqueness.

The Diary of Samuel Sewall, 3 vols., Massachusetts Historical Society, 1882; also Samuel Sewall's Diary, (abridged) edited by Mark Van Doren, 1927.

From his DIARY 1

October 1, [1720] Saturday. I dine at Mr. Stoddard's: from thence I went to Madam Winthrop's 2 just at three. Spake to her, saying my loving wife died so soon and suddenly, 'twas hardly convenient 3 for me to think of marrying again; however I came to this resolution, that I would not make my court to any person without first consulting with her. Had a pleasant discourse about seven single per sons sitting in the fore-seat 4 September 20th viz. Madam Rebekah Dudley, Catharine Win throp, 5 Bridget Usher, Deliverance Legg, Rebekah Loyd, Lydia Colman, Elizabeth Bellingham. She propounded one and another for me but none would do; said Mrs. Loyd was about her aga.

October 3. 2. Waited on Madam Winthron again; 'twas a little while before she came in Her daughter Noves being there alone with me I said I hoped my waiting on her mother would not be disagreeable to her. She answered she should not be against that that might be for her comfort. 6 . . . By and by in came Mr. Airs Chaplain of the Castle, 7 and hanged up his hat which I was a little startled at, it seeming as if he was to lodge there. At last Madam Winthrop came too. After a considerable time I went up to her and said, if it might not be inconvenient I desired to speak with her. She assented, and spake of going into another room; but Mr. Airs and Mrs. Noyes presently 8 rose up, and went out, leaving us there alone. Then I ushered in discourse from the names in the fore-seat; at last I prayed that Katharine [Mrs. Winthrop] might be the person assigned for me. She instantly took it up in the way of denial, as if she had catched at an opportunity to do it, saying she could not do it before she was asked. Said that was her mind unless she should change it, which she believed she should not; could not leave her children. I expressed my sorrow that she should do it so speedily, prayed her consideration, and asked her when a suitable

&lt;sup>1</sup> The Diary covers the period from 1673 to 17.29.
<sup>2</sup> Madam Winthrop, who was the mother of twelve children, most of whom died young, was now a second time a widow, and in her fifty-seventh year. Her second husband was Wait Still Winthrop, grandson of the first governor. Judge Sewall's second wife had been dead a little more than four months.

 The front seat of the church was reserved for persons of social rank. Sometimes a place there was voted by the church to a person it wished to honor.

<sup>5</sup> Madam Winthrop 6 happiness

<sup>7</sup> chaplain of the garrison at the Castle, the fortification on Castle Island in the harbor 8 at once

I should wait on her again. She setting no time. I mentioned that day sennight. Gave her Mr. Willard's Fountain Opened 1 with the little print and verses, saving I hoped, if we did well read that book we should meet together hereafter. if we did not now. She took the book, and put it in her pocket. Took leave.

Midweek, I dined with the October 5. Court. 2... Although I had appointed to wait upon her, M<sup>m</sup> Winthrop, next Monday, yet I went from my Cousin Sewall's thither about three P. M. The nurse told me Madam dined abroad at her daughter Noves's: they were to go out together. I asked for the maid, who was not within. Gave Katee a penny and a kiss, and came away. Accompanied my son and daughter Cooper in their remove to their new house. Went to tell Joseph, 3 and Mr. Belcher saw me by the South Meetinghouse 4 though 'twas duskish, and said I had been at housewarming 5 (he had been at our house). Invited me to drink a glass of wine at his house at seven and eat part of the pasty provided for the Commissioners' voyage to Casco-Bay. His Excellency, Madam Belcher, S. S. 6 Col. Fitch, Mr. D. Oliver, Mr. Anthony Stoddard, Mr. Welsteed, Mr. White, Mr. Belcher sat down. At coming home gave us of the cake and gingerbread to carry away. 'Twas about ten before we got home; Mr. Oliver and I waited on the Governor to his gate; and then Mr. Oliver would wait on me home.

October 6. Lecture-day; Mr. Cutler, 7 president of the Connecticut college, 8 preached in Dr. C. Mather's turn. He made an excellent discourse from Heb. 11, 14, "For they that say such things, declare plainly that they seek a country." Brother Odlin, Son Sewall of Brookline, and Mary Hirst dine with me. asked Mary of Madam Lord, Mr. Oliver and wife, and bid her present my service to them.

October 6th. A little after six p.m. I went to Madam Winthrop's. She was not within. I gave Sarah Chickering, the maid, two shillings, Juno, 9 who brought in wood, one shilling. Afterward the nurse came in, I gave her eighteen pence, having no other small bill. After awhile Dr. Noves came in with his mother; and quickly after his wife came in. They sat talking, I think, till eight o'clock. I said I feared I might be some interruption to their business. Dr. Noves replied pleasantly, he feared they might be an interruption to me, and went away. Madam seemed to harp upon the same string. Must take care of her children: could not leave that house and neighborhood where she had dwelt so long. I told her she might do her children as much or more good by bestowing what she laid out in house-keeping, upon them. Said her son would be of age the 7th of August. I said it might be inconvenient for her to dwell with her daughter-in-law, who must be mistress of the house. I gave her a piece of Mr. Belcher's cake and ginger-bread wrapped up in a clean sheet of paper; told her of her father's kindness to me when treasurer, and I constable. My daughter Judith was gone from me and I was more lonesome-might help to forward one another in our journey to Canaan. 10-Mr. Evre came within the door: I saluted him, asked how Mr. Clark did, and he went away. I took leave about nine o'clock. I told [her] I came now to refresh her memory as to Monday night: said she had not forgot it. In discourse with her, I asked leave to speak with her sister; I meant to gain Madam Mico's 11 favor to persuade her sister. She seemed surprised and displeased, and said she was in the same con-

dition! 12

October 10. . . . In the evening I visited Madam Winthrop, who treated me with a great deal of courtesy; wine, marmalade. I gave her a News-Letter about the Thanksgiving; 13 proposals, for sake of the verses for David Teffries. 14 She tells me Dr. Increase Mather visited her this day, in Mr. Hutchinson's coach.

It seems Dr. Cotton Mather's chimney fell afire yesterday, so as to interrupt the assembly, A.M. Mr. Cutler ceased preaching a quarter of an hour.

October 11th. I writ a few lines to Madam Winthrop to this purpose: "Madam, these wait on you with Mr. Mayhew's Sermon and Account of the State of the Indians on Martha's Vineyard. I thank you for your unmerited favors of yesterday; and hope to have the happiness a sermon entitled The Fountain Opened by Samuel Willard, Judge Sewall's former pastor, then dead <sup>2</sup> Members of the Court (Sewall was now chief justice of Massachusetts) were wont to dine together occasionally at a public house.

<sup>3</sup> one of his sons who would be interested in the sister's moving into the new house 4 the original Old South Church, on the site of the present, Washington and Milk Streets festivities attending the opening of the new house

&lt;sup>6</sup> Samuel Sewall 7 Timothy Cutler, 1684-1765, President of Yale College, 1719-1722 8 Yale College 9 probably a negro slave

no heaven; in reference to the journey of the Israelites from Egypt to the land of Canaan Madam Winthrop's sister state of mind (concerning the marriage)
 The Boston News-Letter founded 1704; this number perhaps contained notice of the Thanksgiving which was held that year on October 27.

which was held that year on October 27.

** perhaps refers to some proposed printing of memorial verses for David Jeffries, Madam Winthrop's sonin-law, drowned at sea four years before of waiting on you tomorrow before eight o'clock after noon. I pray God to keep you, and give you a joyful entrance upon the two hundred and twenty-ninth year of Christopher Columbus his 1 discovery; and take leave, who am, madam, SS" your humble servant, Sent this by Deacon Green, who delivered it to Sarah Chickering, her mistress not being at home.

October 12th. . . . Mrs. Anne Cotton came to [the] door ('twas before eight) said Madam Winthrop was within, directed me into the little room, where she was full of work behind a stand: Mrs. Cotton came in and stood. Madam Winthrop pointed to her to set me a chair. Madam Winthrop's countenance was much changed from what 'twas on Monday,looked dark and lowering. At last, the work, (black stuff or silk) was taken away, I got my chair in place, had some converse, but very cold and indifferent to what 'twas before. Asked her to acquit me of rudeness if I drew off her glove. Inquiring the reason, I told her twas great odds between handling a dead goat. and a living lady. Got it off. I told her I had one petition to ask of her, that was, that she would take off the negative she laid on me the third of October: She readily answered she could not, and enlarged upon it; She told me of it so soon as she could: could not leave her house, children, neighbors, business. I told her she might do some good to help and support Mentioning Mrs. Gookin, Nath., 2 the widow Weld was spoken of; said I had visited Mrs. Denison. I told her Yes! Afterward I said, If after a first and second vagary, 3 she would accept of me returning, her victorious kindness and good will would be very obliging. She thanked me for my book, (Mr. Mayhew's Sermon), But said not a word of the letter. When she insisted on the negative, I prayed there might be no more thunder and lightning: I should not sleep all night. I gave her Dr. Preston, The Church's Marriage and the Church's Carriage, which cost me six shillings at the sale. The door standing open, Mr. Airs came in, hung up his hat, and sat down. After awhile, Madam Winthrop moving, he went out. Ino. Eyre looked in, I said How do ye, or Your servant, Mr. Eyre; but heard no word from him. Sarah filled a glass of wine, she drank to me, I to her. She sent Juno home with me with a good lantern; I gave her sixpence and bid her thank her mistress. In some of our discourse, I told her I had rather go to the stone-house adjoining to her. 4 than to come to her against her mind. Told her the reason why I came every other night was lest I should drink too deep draughts of pleasure. She had talked of canary: her kisses were to me better than the best canary. Explained the expression concerning Columbus. . . .

October 19. Midweek, visited Madam Winthrop: Sarah told me she was at Mr. Walley's. would not come home till late. I gave her Hannah three oranges with her duty, a not knowing whether I should find her or no. Was ready to go home; but said if I knew she was there. I would go thither. Sarah seemed to speak with pretty good courage, she would be there. I went and found her there, with Mr. Walley and his wife in the little room below. At 7 o'clock I mentioned going home; at 8, I put on my coat, and quickly waited on her home. She found occasion to speak loud to the servant, as if she had a mind to be known. Was courteous to me; but took occasion to speak pretty earnestly about my keeping a coach: I said 'twould cost £100, per annum: she said 'twould cost but £40. Spake much against John Winthrop, his false-heartedness. Mr. Eyre came in and sat awhile; I offered him Dr. Incr. Mather's Sermons, whereof Mr. Appleton's Ordination Sermon was one; said he had them already. I said I would give him another. Exit. Came away somewhat late.

October 20. Mr. Colman preaches from Luke 15. 10. Joy among the Angels: made an excellent discourse.

At Council, Col. Townsend spake to me of my hood: should get a wig. I said 'twas my chief ornament: I wore it for sake of the day. Brother Odlin, and Sam, Mary, and Jane Hirst dine with us. Promised to wait on the Governor about seven. Madam Winthrop not being at lecture, I went thither first; found her very serene with her daughter Noves, Mrs. Dering, and the widow Shipreev sitting at a little table, she in her armed chair. She drank to me; and I to Mrs. Noves. After awhile prayed the favor to speak with her. She took one of the candles, and went into the best room, closed the shutters, sat down upon the couch. She told me Madam Usher had been there, and said the coach must be set on wheels, 7 and not by rusting. She spake something of my needing a wig. Asked me what " used, not set by to rust

Columbus's
 probably Mrs. Nathaniel Gookin
 The Judge was not paying attention to Madam Winthrop only.

&lt;sup>4</sup> The prison; this identifies the site of Madam Win-throp's house with that of the old Court House on Court Street.

<sup>5</sup> compliments (apparently to Hannah's mistress)
6 Stepson of Madam Winthrop; apparently there had not been cordial feeling between them concerning the settlement of the Winthrop estate.

her sister said to me. I told her, She said, if her sister were for it, she would not hinder it. But I told her, she 'did not say she would be glad to have me for her brother. Said, I shall keep you in the cold, and asked her if she would be within tomorrow night, for we had had but a running feat. She said she could not tell whether she should, or no. I took leave. As were drinking at the Governor's, he said: In England the ladies minded little more than that they might have money, and coaches to ride in. I said, And New England brooks its name. At which Mr. Dudley smiled. Governor said they were not quite so bad here.

October 21. Friday, my son, the minister. came to me P.M. by appointment and we pray for one another in the old chamber: more especially respecting my courtship. About 6 o'clock I go to Madam Winthrop's; Sarah told me her mistress was gone out, but did not tell me whither she went. She presently ordered me a fire; so I went in, having Dr. Sibb's Bowels 4 with me to read. I read the two first sermons, still nobody came in: at last about 9 o'clock Mr. Ino. Eyre came in; I took the opportunity to say to him as I had done to Mrs. Noves before, that I hoped my visiting his mother would not be disagreeable to him; he answered me with much respect. When 'twas after nine o'clock he of himself said he would go and call her, she was but at one of his brothers: awhile after I heard Madam Winthrop's voice, inquiring something about John. After a good while and clapping the garden door twice or thrice, she came in. I mentioned something of the lateness; she bantered me, and said I was later. She received me courteously. I asked when our proceedings should be made public. She said they were like to be no more public than they were already. Offered me no wine that I remember. I rose up at eleven o'clock to come away, saying I would put on my coat, She offered not to help me. I prayed her that Juno might light me home; she opened the shutter, and said 'twas pretty light abroad; Juno was weary and gone to bed. So I came home by star-light as well as I could. At my first coming in, I gave Sarah five shillings. I writ Mr. Eyre his name in his book with the date October 21, 1720. It cost me eight shillings. Jehovah jireh! 5 Madam told Madam Mico A vague, neutral word meaning act, deed; here, they had had but a hurried talk, not a deliberate conversation. me she had visited M. Mico, Wendell, and Wm. Clark of the South [Church].

October 22. Daughter Cooper visited me before my going out of town; stayed till about sunset. I brought her going near as far as the Orange Tree. <sup>6</sup> Coming back, near Leg's Corner, little David Jeffries saw me, and looking upon me very lovingly, asked me if I was going to see his grandmother? I said, Not tonight. Gave him a penny, and bid him present my service to his grandmother.

October 24. I went in the hackney coach through the common, stopped at Madam Winthrop's (had told her I would take my departure from thence). Sarah came to the door with Katee in her arms: but I did not think to take notice of the child. Called her mistress. I told her, being encouraged by David Teffries' loving eyes, and sweet words. I was come to inquire whether she could find in her heart to leave that house and neighborhood, and go and dwell with me at the South-end: I think she said softly. Not yet. I told her it did not lie in my lands to keep a coach. If I should, I should be in danger to be brought to keep company with her Neighbor Brooker, (he was a little before sent to prison for debt). Told her I had an antipathy against those who would pretend to give themselves, but nothing of their I would 7 a portion of my estate with myself. And I supposed she would do so. As to a periwig, my best and greatest Friend, I could not possibly have a greater, began to find me with hair before I was born, and had continued to do so ever since; and I could not find in my heart to go to another. She commended the book I gave her. Dr. Preston. The Church's Marriage; quoted him saying 'twas inconvenient keeping out of a fashion commonly used. 8 I said the time and tide did circumscribe my visit. She gave me a dram of black-cherry brandy, and gave me a lump of the sugar that was in it. She wished me a good journey. I prayed God to keep her, and came away. Had a very pleasant journey to Salem...

November 2. Midweek, went again, and found Mrs. Alden there, who quickly went out. Gave her about a half pound of sugar almonds, cost three shillings per pound. Carried them on Monday. She seemed pleased with them, asked what they cost. Spake of giving her a hundred pounds per annum if I died before her. Asked her what sum she would give me, if she should die first? Said I would give her

<sup>3</sup> hears appropriately

The full title is Bowels Opened: or A Discovery of the Union between Christ and the Church by Dr. Sibb, a popular English Puritan minister of the time.

Genesis xx, 14—"The Lord will provide."

&lt;sup>6</sup> a tavern <sup>7</sup> would [give]

&lt;sup>8</sup> The Judge was opposed throughout his life to wearing wigs.

time to consider of it. She said she heard as if I had given all to my children by deeds of gift. I told her 'twas a mistake; Point-Judith was mine, etc. That in England, I owned, my father's desire was that it should go to my eldest son; 'twas £20 per annum; she thought 'twas forty. I think when I seem'd to excuse pressing this, she seemed to think 'twas best to speak of it; a long winter was coming on. Gave me a glass or two of canary.

Nov. 4. Friday. Went again about seven o'clock: found there Mr. John Walley and his wife: sat discoursing pleasantly. I showed them Isaac Moses's writing. Madam W. served comfeits 2 to us. After awhile a table was spread, and supper was set. I urged Mr. Walley to crave a blessing; but he put it upon me. About nine they went away. I asked Madam what fashioned necklace I should present her with. She said, None at all. I asked here whereabout we left off last time; mentioned what I had offered to give her: asked her what she would give me; she said she could not change her condition; she had said so from the beginning; could not be so far from her children, the lecture. 3 Quoted the Apostle Paul affirming that a single life was better than a married. I answered, That was for the present distress. 4 She said she had not pleasure in things of that nature as formerly: I said, you are the fitter to make me a wife. If she held in that mind. I must go home and bewail my rashness in making more haste than good speed. However, considering the supper, I desired her to be within next Monday night, if we lived so long. Assented. She charged me with saying that she must put away Juno, if she came to me: I utterly denied it, it never came in my heart; yet she insisted upon it; saying it came in upon discourse about the Indian woman that obtained her freedom this court. About ten I said I would not disturb the good orders of her house, and came away. She not seeming pleased with my coming away. Spake to her about David Jeffries, had not seen him.

Monday, November 7th. My son prayed in the old chamber. Our time had been taken up by Son and Daughter Cooper's visit; so that I only read the 130th and 143d Psalm. 'Twas on account of my courtship. I went to Mad. Winthrop; found her rocking her little Katee in the cradle. I excused my coming so late (near eight). She set me an armed chair and cushion: and so the cradle was between her armed chair and mine. Gave her the remnant of my almonds; She did not eat of them as before; but laid them away; I said I came to inquire whether she had altered her mind since Friday, or remained of the same mind still. She said. Thereabouts. I told her I loved her. and was so fond as to think that she loved meshe said had a great respect for me. I told her, I had made her an offer, without asking any advice: she had so many to advise with, that 'twas a hindrance. The fire was come to one short brand besides the block, which brand was set up in end; at last it fell to pieces, and no recruit was made: she gave me a glass of wine. I think I repeated again that I would go home and bewail my rashness in making more haste than good speed. I would endeavor to contain myself, and not go on to solicit her to do that which she could not consent to. Took leave of her. As came down the steps she bid me have a care. Treated me courteously. Told her she had entered the fourth year of her widowhood. I had given her the News-Letter before: I did not bid her draw off her glove as sometime I had done. Her dress was not so clean as sometime it had been. 5 Tehovah jireh!

<sup>1</sup> an Indian

1 Corinthians vii, 26

Midweek, November 9th. Dine at Brother Stoddard's: . re so kind as to inquire of me if they should invite Madam Winthrop; I answered No. Thanked my Sister Stoddard for her courtesy; sat down at the table Simeon Stoddard, Esgr., Madam Stoddard, Samuel Sewall, Mr. Colman, Madam Colman, Mr. Cooper, Mrs. Cooper, Mrs. Hannah Cooper, Mr. Samuel Sewall of Brookline, Mrs. Sewall, Mr. Joseph Sewall, Mrs. Lydia Walley, Mr. William Stoddard. Had a noble treat. At night our meeting was at the Widow Belknap's. Gave each one of the meeting one of Mr. Homes's sermons, 12 in all; she sent her servant home with me with a lantern. Madam Winthrop's shutters were open as I passed by.

About the middle of December Madam Winthrop made a treat for her children; I.r. Sewall, Prince, Willoughby: I knew nothing or it; but the same day abode in the council chamber for fear of the rain, and dined alone upon Kilby's pies and good beer. 6

1673-1729 1882

1722.

preserves (often candied fruits)
The midweek lecture was delivered on Thursday afternoon. The sermon differed little from that of Sunday, but if anything was less formal.

Other passages, not here quoted, make the meaning clear. She did not dress herself so carefully for his calling as she had sometimes done.
 Judge Sewall married Mrs. Mary Gibbs, March 29,

WILLIAM BYRD 1674-1744

Colonel William Byrd is a striking example of the aristocratic, cultured southern gentleman of the eighteenth century. He was born and he died in the ancestral mansion now standing below Petersburg upon the James River. Byrd was educated in London, admitted to the English bar from the Middle Temple, traveled and studied on the Continent, receiving all the advantages then afforded a person of good birth and wealth. He was a member of the Royal Society to which he contributed a few papers. His life was spent in Virginia as a public official and man of affairs. He founded the cities of Petersburg and Richmond, and extended his estate until it reached some 180,000 acres. His manuscripts, all of them descriptive of the country. History of the Dividing Line, A Journey to the Land of Eden, and A Progress to the Mines, were published in 1841.

One cannot fail to contrast his view of life, interests, habits, aims, with those of his New England contemporaries. He was one of the wealthiest men in all the colonies, and he lived, as nearly as he could, the life of the English country gentleman. He was abundant in hospitality, free and engaging in manners, pleasure-loving by disposition, but had a keen eye to business. London was to him the center of culture and social enjoyment. His library of four thousand volumes, probably the largest private library in North America in the generation after Cotton Mather, was a well-balanced, carefully selected collection of the classics, and of the best English and Continental history, science, and literature. In urbanity and vivacity of style, Byrd shows a likeness to his friend and correspondent, Richard Steele.

Best edition: ed. John Spencer Bassett, 1901, with biographical and explanatory matter, and a catalogue of his library. Byrd's Journey to the Land of Eden, which includes most of the material in Bassett's edition, was edited by Mark Van Doren, 1928. See also J. Fiske, Old Virginia and her Neighbors, 1897.

From HISTORY OF THE DIVIDING LINE 1

March 12, [1728].... Our landlord 2 had a tolerable good house and clean furniture, and yet we could not be tempted to lodge in it. We chose rather to lie in the open field, for fear of growing too tender. A clear sky, spangled with stars, was our canopy which, being the

The party was now camping at a planter's house

some miles inland.

last thing we saw before we fell asleep, gave us magnificent dreams. The truth of it is, we took so much pleasure in that natural kind of lodging that I think at the foot of the account mankind are great losers by the luxury of feather-beds and warm apartments.

The curiosity of beholding so new and withal so sweet a method of encamping, brought one of the senators of North Carolina to make us a midnight visit. But he was so very clamorous in his commendations of it that the sentinel, not seeing his quality, 3 either through his habit or behavior, had like to have treated him roughly.

After excusing the unseasonableness of his visit, and letting us know he was a Parliament man, 4 he swore he was so taken with our lodging that he would set fire to his house as soon as he got home, and teach his wife and children to lie, like us, in the open field.

March 13. Early this morning our chaplain repaired to us with the men we had left at Mr. Wilson's. We had sent for them the evening before to relieve those who had the laboroar 5 from Corotuck Inlet. But to our great surprise they petitioned not to be relieved, hoping to gain immortal reputation by being the first of mankind that ventured through the great Dismal. 6 But the rest being equally ambitious of the same honor, it was but fair to decide their pretensions by lot. After fortune had declared herself, those which she had excluded offered money to the happy persons to go in their stead. But Hercules would have as soon sold the glory of cleansing the Augean stables, 7 which was pretty near the same sort of work.

No sooner was the controversy at an end, but we sent them, unfortunate fellows, back to their quarters, whom chance had condemned to remain upon firm land and sleep in a whole skin. In the mean while the surveyors carried the line three miles, which was no contemptible day's work, considering how cruelly they were entangled with briars and gall bushes. The leaf of this last shrub bespeaks it to be of the Alaternus family.

Our work ended within a quarter of a mile of the Dismal above-mentioned, where the ground began to be already full of sunken holes and slashes, which had, here and there, some few reeds growing in them.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Dispute having arisen between Virginia and Carolina concerning the line dividing the two colonies, commissioners from both sides, of whom Byrd commissioners from both sides, of whom Byrd was one, were appointed to accompany and oversee the actual work of the surveyors who ran the line 241 miles west from the sea, fixing its location permanently. This part of the diary records Byrd's experiences in executing the commission.

The party was traveled from the coast on March 7.

<sup>3</sup> official or social rank

&lt;sup>4</sup> The colonial legislator, apparently tipsy, assumed the title usually applied to a member of the British Parliament.

<sup>5</sup> brunt of the work

<sup>6</sup> Dismal Swamp: see any map.

<sup>7</sup> One of the twelve labors of Hercules was to cleanse the stables of King Augeas where three thousand oxen had been stalled for thirty years.

'Tis hardly credible how little the bordering inhabitants were acquainted with this mighty swamp, notwithstanding they had lived their whole lives within smell of it. Yet, as great strangers as they were to it, they pretended to be very exact in their account of its dimensions, and were positive it could not be above seven or eight miles wide, but knew no more of the matter than star-gazers know of the distance of the fixed stars. At the same time, they were simple enough to amuse our men with idle stories of the lions, panthers, and alligators they were like to encounter in that dreadful place.

In short, we saw plainly there was no intelligence of this terra incognita 1 to be got, but from our own experience. For that reason it was resolved to make the requisite dispositions to enter it next morning. We allotted every one of the surveyors for this painful enterprise with twelve men to attend them. Fewer than that could not be employed in clearing the way, carrying the chain, marking the trees, and bearing the necessary bedding and provisions. Nor would the commissioners themselves have spared their persons on this occasion, but for fear of adding to the poor men's burthen, while they were certain they could add nothing to their resolution. . . . .

March 14. Before nine of the clock this morning, the provisions, bedding, and other necessaries were made up into packs for the men to carry on their shoulders into the Dismal. They were victualed for eight days at full allowance, nobody doubting but that would be abundantly sufficient to carry them through that inhospitable place; nor indeed was it possible for the poor fellows to stagger under more. As it was, their loads weighed from 60 to 70 pounds, in just proportion to the strength of those who were to bear them.

'Twould have been unconscionable to have saddled them with burthens heavier than that, when they were to lug them through a filthy bog which was hardly practicable with no burthen at all. Besides this luggage at their backs, they were obliged to measure the distance, mark the trees, and clear the way for the surveyors every step they went. It was really a pleasure to see with how much cheerfulness they undertook, and with how much spirit they went through all this drudgery. For their greater safety, the commissioners took care to furnish them with Peruvian bark, rhubarb, and hipocoacanah, <sup>2</sup> in case they might happen, in that wet journey, to be taken with fevers or fluxes.

Although there was no need of example to inflame persons already so cheerful, yet, to enter the people with better grace, the author and two more of the commissioners accompanied them half a mile into the Dismal. The skirts of it were thinly planted with dwarf reeds and gall-bushes but, when we got into the Dismal itself, we found the reeds grew there much taller and closer and, to mend the matter, was so interlaced with bamboo-briars that there was no scuffling through them without the help of pioneers. At the same time, we found the ground moist and trembling under our feet like a quagmire, insomuch that it was an easy matter to run a ten-foot pole up to the head in it, without exerting any uncommon strength to

Two of the men, whose burthens were the least cumbersome, had orders to march before with their tomahawks and clear the way, in order to make an opening for the surveyors. By their assistance we made a shift to push the line half a mile in three hours, and then reached a small piece of firm land about 100 yards wide standing up above the rest like an island. Here the people were glad to lay down their loads and take a little refreshment, while the happy man whose lot it was to carry the jug of rum began already, like Aesop's bread-carriers, 3 to find it grow a good deal lighter.

After reposing about an hour, the commissioners recommended vigor and constancy to their fellow-travelers, by whom they were answered with three cheerful huzzas in token of obedience. This ceremony was no sooner over but they took up their burthens and attended the motion of the surveyors who, though they worked with all their might, could reach but one mile farther, the same obstacles still attending them which they had met with in the morning.

However small this distance may seem to such as are used to travel at their ease, yet our poor men, who were obliged to work with an unwieldy load at their backs, had reason to think it a long way; especially in a bog where they had no firm footing, but every step made a deep impression, which was instantly filled with water. At the same time they were laboring with their hands to cut down the reeds, which were ten feet high, their legs were hampered with the briars. Besides, the weather happened to be very warm, and the tallness of the reeds kept off every friendly breeze from coming to refresh them. And, indeed, it was a little provoking to hear the wind whistling among the branches of the white cedars, which grew here and there amongst the reeds, and at the same time not have the comfort to feel the least breath of it.

&lt;sup>1</sup> unknown land <sup>2</sup> ipecacuanha

&lt;sup>3</sup> Aesop on asking for the lightest burden, and on being told to choose, chose the bread, the heaviest of all. He was laughed at. But at dinner he distributed to his fellow-servants half the bread, and at supper the remainder. During the rest of the journey Aesop carried only the empty basket.

In the mean time the three commissioners returned out of the Dismal the same way they went in and, having joined their brethren, proceeded that night as far as Mr. Wilson's.

This worthy person lives within sight of the Dismal, in the skirts whereof his stocks range and maintain themselves all the winter, and yet he knew as little of it as he did of Terra Australis Incognita. He told us a Canterbury tale 2 of a North Briton whose curiosity spurred him a long way into this great desert, as he called it, near 20 years ago, but he having no compass, nor seeing the sun for several days together, wandered about till he was almost famished; but at last he bethought himself of a secret his countrymen make use of to pilot themselves in a dark day.

He took a fat louse out of his collar and exposed it to the open day on a piece of white paper which he brought along with him for his journal. The poor insect, having no eye-lids, turned himself about till he found the darkest part of the heavens, and so made the best of his way towards the north. By this direction he steered himself safe out, and gave such a frightful account of the monsters he saw and the distresses he underwent, that no mortal since has been hardy enough to go upon the like dangerous discovery.

March 15. The surveyors pursued their work with all diligence, but still found the soil of the Dismal so spongy that the water oozed up into every footstep they took. To their sorrow, too, they found the reeds and briars more firmly interwoven than they did the day before. But the greatest grievance was from large cypresses which the wind had blown down and heaped upon one another. On the limbs of most of them grew sharp snags, pointing every way like so many pikes, that required much pains and caution to avoid.

March 25.... In the mean time, we who stayed behind had nothing to do but to make the best observations we could upon that part of the country. The soil of our landlord's plantation, though none of the best, seemed more fertile than any thereabouts, where the ground is near as sandy as the deserts of Africa, and consequently barren. The road leading from thence to Edenton, being in distance about 27 miles, lies upon a ridge called Sandy Ridge, which is so wretchedly poor that it will not bring potatoes.

<sup>1</sup> unknown southern land
<sup>2</sup> Cock-and-bull story; a humorous tale like Chaucer's Canterbury Tales; this tale and another following show Byrd's fashionable London dislike of the Scotch.

The pines in this part of the country are of a different species from those that grow in Virginia: their bearded leaves are much longer and their cones much larger. Each cell contains a seed of the size and figure of a black-eyed pea, which, shedding in November, is very good mast for hogs, and fattens them in a short time.

The smallest of these pines are full of cones. which are eight or nine inches long, and each affords commonly 60 or 70 seeds. This kind of mast has the advantage of all other by being more constant, and less liable to be nipped by the frost or eaten by the caterpillars. The trees also abound more with turpentine, and consequently yield more tar than either the yellow or the white pine; and for the same reason make more durable timber for building. The inhabitants hereabouts pick up knots of lightwood in abundance, which they burn into tar, and then carry it to Norfolk or Nansimond for a market. The tar made in this method is the less valuable because it is said to burn the cordage, though it is full as good for all other uses as that made in Sweden and Muscovy.

Surely there is no place in the world where the inhabitants live with less labor than in North Carolina. It approaches nearer to the description of Lubberland <sup>3</sup> than any other, by the great felicity of the climate, the easiness of raising provisions, and the slothfulness of the people.

Indian corn is of so great increase that a little pains will subsist a very large family with bread, and then they may have meat without any pains at all, by the help of the low grounds, and the great variety of mast that grows on the high-land. The men for their parts, just like the Indians, impose all the work upon the poor women. They make their wives rise out of their beds early in the morning, at the same time that they lie and snore till the sun has run one third of his course and dispersed all the unwholesome damps. Then, after stretching and yawning for half an hour, they light their pipes, and, under the protection of a cloud of smoke, venture out into the open air; though, if it happens to be never so little cold, they quickly return shivering into the chimney corner. When the weather is mild, they stand leaning with both their arms upon the cornfield fence, and gravely consider whether they had best go and take a small heat at the hoe: but generally find reasons to put it off till another time.

A general colloquial term for a sluggard's paradise; local colonial jealousies caused much ill blood, even political danger, till long after the Revolution.

Thus they loiter away their lives, like Solomon's sluggard, 1 with their arms across, and at the winding up of the year scarcely have bread to eat.

To speak the truth, 'tis a thorough aversion to labor that makes people file off to North Carolina, where plenty and a warm sun confirm them in their disposition to laziness for their whole lives.

March 26. Since we were like to be confined to this place till the people returned out of the Dismal, 'twas agreed that our chaplain might safely take a turn to Edenton to preach the gospel to the infidels there, and christen their children. He was accompanied thither by Mr. Little, one of the Carolina commissioners, who, to show his regard for the church, offered to treat him on the road with a fricassee of rum. They fried half a dozen rashers of very fat bacon in a pint of rum both which, being dished up together, served the company at once for meat and drink.

Most of the rum they get in this country comes from New England and is so bad and unwholesome that it is not improperly called "kill-devil." It is distilled there from foreign molasses which, if skilfully managed, yields near gallon for gallon. Their molasses comes from the same country, and has the name of "long sugar" in Carolina, I suppose from the ropiness of it, and serves all the purposes of sugar both in their eating and drinking.

When they entertain their friends bountifully, they fail not to set before them a capacious bowl of Bombo, 2 so called from the admiral of that name. This is a compound of rum and water in equal parts, made palatable with the said long sugar. As good humor begins to flow and the bowl to ebb, they take care to replenish it with sheer rum, of which there always is a reserve under the table. But such generous doings happen only when that balsam of life is plenty; for they have often such melancholy times that neither Land-graves nor

<sup>1</sup> Proverbs xix, 24
<sup>2</sup> According to Tobias Smollett, in Roderick Random, the liquor is made of rum, sugar, water, and nutmeg. Compare the amusing and important part "Kill-devil Bombo" plays in Owen Wister's Lady Baltimore.

Cassicks <sup>3</sup> can procure one drop for their wives when they lie in, or are troubled with the colic or vapors. Very few in this country have the industry to plant orchards which, in a dearth of rum, might supply them with much better liquor.

. . . . . . . . .

November 11. 4 [1728] We had all been so refreshed by our day of rest that we decamped earlier than ordinary, and passed the several fords of Hico River. The woods were thick great part of this day's journey, so that we were forced to scuffle hard to advance seven miles, being equal in fatigue to double that distance of clear and open grounds.

We took up our quarters upon Sugar-tree Creek, in the same camp we had lain in when we came up, and happened to be entertained at supper with a rarity we had never had the fortune to meet with before during the whole expedition.

A little wide of this creek, one of the men had the luck to meet with a young buffalo of two years old. It was a bull which, notwithstanding he was no older, was as big as an ordinary ox. His legs are very thick and very short, and his hoofs exceeding broad. His back rose into a kind of bunch a little above the shoulders, which I believe contributes not a little to that creature's enormous strength. His body is vastly deep from the shoulders to the brisket, sometimes six feet in those that arefull grown. The portly figure of this animal is disgraced by a shabby little tail, not above 12 inches long. This he cocks up on end whenever he's in a passion and, instead of lowing or bellowing, grunts with no better grace than a

The hair growing on his head and neck is long and shagged, and so soft that it will spin into thread not unlike mohair, which might be wove into a sort of camlet. <sup>5</sup> Some people have stockings knit of it that would have served an Israelite during his forty years' march through the wilderness.

Its horns are short and strong, of which the Indians make large spoons, which they say will

Officials of the upper house of the Carolina legislature, and landed proprietors, held these titles of aristocracy as provided by the constitution formed for the colony by John Locke. The separation between the Carolinas was not made till the year following this diary.

After about six weeks' work, "because the rattle-snakes began to crawl out of their winter quarters, and might grow dangerous to the men and their horses, it was determined to proceed no further with the line till fall." The work was resumed in September, and by November 11 had reached high, rolling ground.

<sup>5</sup> an Eastern fabric, perhaps made of camel's hair

split and fall to pieces whenever poison is put into them. Its color is a dirty brown, and its hide so thick that it is scarce penetrable. However, it makes very spongy sole leather by the ordinary method of tanning, though this fault might by good contrivance be mended.

As thick as this poor beast's hide was, a bullet made shift to enter it and fetch him down. It was found all alone, though buffaloes seldom are. They usually range about in herds, like other cattle, and, though they differ something in figure, are certainly of the same species. There are two reasons for this opinion: the flesh of both has exactly the same taste, and the mixed breed betwixt both, they say, will generate. All the difference I could perceive between the flesh of buffalo and common beef was that the flesh of the first was much yellower than that of the other, and the lean something tougher.

The men were so delighted with this new diet, that the gridiron and frying-pan had no more rest all night than a poor husband subject to curtain lectures. Buffaloes may be easily tamed when they are taken young. The best way to catch them is to carry a milch mare into the woods and, when you find a cow and a calf, to kill the cow and then, having catched the calf, to suckle it upon the mare. After once or twice sucking her, it will follow her home and become as gentle as another calf.

If we could get into a breed of them, they might be made very useful not only for the dairy by giving an ocean of milk, but also for drawing vast and cumbersome weights by their prodigious strength. These with the other advantages I mentioned before, would make this sort of cattle more profitable to the owner than any other we are acquainted with, though they would need a world of provender. <sup>1</sup>

1728 1841

From A PROGRESS TO THE MINES 2 IN THE YEAR 1732

September 18. For the pleasure of the good company of Mrs. Byrd and her little governor, my son, <sup>3</sup> I went about half way to the falls <sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The American bison at this time extended from Tennessee to the Great Slave Lake, and from Oregon to western New York.

<sup>2</sup> situated in Orange and Spottsylvania Counties, Virginia, on or near the Rapidan and Rappahannock Rivers

afterwards a fellow officer of Washington in the defense of Virginia in the French and Indian War Falls of the James at the site of Richmond; large tracts of land in this vicinity had descended to the Colonel from his father.

in the chariot. There we halted, not far from a purling stream, and upon the stump of a propagate oak picked the bones of a piece of roast beef. By the spirit which that gave me, I was the better able to part with the dear companions of my travels, and to perform the rest of my journey on horseback by myself. reached Shaccoa's 5 before two o'clock, and crossed the river to the mills. I had the grief to find them both stand as still for the want of water, as a dead woman's tongue for want of breath. It had rained so little for many weeks above the falls, that the Najades 6 had hardly water enough left to wash their faces. However, as we ought to turn all our misfortunes to the best advantage, I directed Mr. Booker, my first minister 7 there, to make use of the lowness of the water for blowing up the rocks at the mouth of the canal. For that purpose I ordered iron drills to be made about two foot long, pointed with steel, chisel-fashion, in order to make holes, into which we put our cartridges of powder, containing each about three ounces. There wanted skill among my engineers to choose the best parts of the stone for boring, that we might blow to the most advantage. They made all their holes quite perpendicular, whereas they should have humored the grain of the stone for the more effectual execution. I ordered the points of the drills to be made chisel way, rather than the diamond, that they might need to be seldomer repaired, though in stone the diamond points would make the most dispatch. The water now flowed out of the river so slowly that the miller was obliged to pond it up in the canal by setting open the flood-gates at the mouth, and shutting those close at the mill. By this contrivance, he was able at any time to grind two or three bushels. either for his choice customers or for the use of my plantations. Then I walked to the place where they broke 8 the flax, which is wrought with much greater ease than the hemp, and is much better for spinning. From thence I paid a visit to the weaver, who needed a little of Minerva's inspiration 9 to make the most of a piece of fine cloth. Then I looked in upon my Caledonian spinster, 10 who was mended more in her looks than in her humor. However, she promised much, though at the same time

Scotch woman, perhaps a spinster in both senses of the word: spinner, and unmarried woman

&lt;sup>5</sup> At the site of Richmond; a year later Byrd planned the town there, and one at Petersburg.
<sup>6</sup> guardian spirits of brooks and springs

&lt;sup>o</sup> guardian spirits of brooks and springs <sup>7</sup> jocularly used: overseer broke the woody part of the flax stalk from the fiber Minerva, goddess of wisdom, particularly presided over spinning and weaving.

intended to perform little. She is too highspirited for Mr. Booker, who hates to have his sweet temper ruffled, and will rather suffer matters to go a little wrong sometimes than give his righteous spirit any uneasiness. He is very honest, and would make an admirable overseer where servants will do as they are bid. But eve-servants, 1 who want abundance of overlooking, are not so proper to be committed to his care. I found myself out of order, and for that reason retired early; yet with all this precaution had a gentle fever in the night, but towards morning nature sat open all her gates, and drove it out in a plentiful perspiration. . . .

Sept. 20. . . . I parted there with my intendant. 2 and pursued my journey to Mr. Randolph's, at Tuckahoe, without meeting with any adventure by the way. Here I found Mrs. Fleming, who was packing up her baggage with design to follow her husband the next day, who was gone to a new settlement in Goochland. 3 Both he and she have been about seven years persuading themselves to remove to that retired part of the country, though they had the two strong arguments of health and interest for so doing. The widow 4 smiled graciously upon me, and entertained me very handsomely. Here I learned all the tragical story of her daughter's humble marriage with her uncle's overseer. Besides the meanness of this mortal's aspect, the man has not one visible qualification, except impudence, to recommend him to a female's inclinations. But there is sometimes such a charm in that Hibernian endowment that frail woman can't withstand it, though it stand alone without any other recommendation. Had she run away with a gentleman or a pretty fellow, there might have been some excuse for her, though he were of inferior fortune: but to stoop to a dirty plebian without any kind of merit is the lowest prostitution. I found the family justly enraged at it; and though I had more good nature than to join in her condemnation, vet I could devise no excuse for so senseless a prank as this young gentlewoman had played. . . .

Sept. 21. I was sorry in the morning to find myself stopped in my career by bad weather brought upon us by a north-east wind. This drives a world of raw unkindly vapors upon us from Newfoundland, loaden with blight, coughs, and pleurisies. However, I complained not, lest I might be suspected to be tired of the good company; though Mrs. Fleming was not so much upon her guard, but mutinied strongly at the rain, that hindered her from pursuing her dear husband. I said what I could to comfort a gentlewoman under so sad a disappointment. I told her a husband that staved so much at home as hers did, could be no such violent rarity as for a woman to venture her precious health to go daggling through the rain after him, or to be miserable if she happened to be prevented. That it was prudent for married people to fast sometimes from one another, that they might come together again with the better stomach. That the best things in this world, if constantly used, are apt to be cloving, which a little absence would prevent. This was strange doctrine to a fond female. who fancies people should love with as little reason after marriage as before. . . .

September 22. We had another wet day to try both Mrs. Fleming's patience and my good breeding. The northeast wind commonly sticks by us three or four days, filling the atmosphere with damps injurious both to man and beast. The worst of it was, we had no good liquor to warm our blood and fortify our spirits against so strong a malignity. However, I was cheerful under all these misfortunes, and expressed no concern but a decent fear lest my long visit might be troublesome. Since I was like to have thus much leisure. I endeavored to find out what subject a dull married man could introduce that might best bring the widow to the use of her tongue. At length I discovered she was a notable quack, and therefore paid that regard to her knowledge as to put some questions to her about the bad distemper that raged then in the country. I mean the bloody flux, that was brought us in the negro-ship consigned to Col. Braxton. She told me she made use of very simple remedies in that case with very good success. She did the business either with hartshorn drink, that had plantain leaves boiled in it, or else with a strong decoction of St. Andrews cross 5 in new milk instead of water. I agreed with her that those remedies might be very good, but would be more effectual after a dose or two of Indian physic. But for fear this conversation might be too grave for a widow, I turned the discourse and began to talk of plays; and finding her taste lay most towards comedy, I offered my service to read one to her. which she kindly accepted. She produced the second part of the Beggars' Opera, 6 which had

<sup>1</sup> those who will work only under the eye of the master <sup>2</sup> overseer

&lt;sup>2</sup> Goochland County perpetuates the name, <sup>4</sup> Byrd does not tell who she is.

&lt;sup>6</sup> a medicinal herb, Ascyrum hypericoides
<sup>6</sup> Byrd means that it was the first part of the poet Gay's Beggars' Opera, that had run for 40 (really 60) nights in London. The second part, named Polly from one of the characters in the first, was prohibited upon the stage because of its supposed political bias. The Duchess of Queensbury, an enthusiastic patroness of Gay, solicited subscrip-

diverted the Town for 40 nights successively. and gained four thousand pounds to the author. This was not owing altogether to the wit or humor that sparkled in it, but to some political reflections that seemed to hit the ministry. But the great advantage of the author was, that his interest was solicited by the Duchess of Queensbury, which no man could refuse who had but half an eve in his head, or half a guinea in his pocket. Her Grace, like death, spared nobody, but even took my Lord Selkirk 1 in for two guineas, to repair which extravagance he lived upon Scots herrings two months afterwards. But the best story was, she made a very smart 2 officer in His Majesty's guards give her a guinea, who, swearing at the same time 'twas all he had in the world, she sent him fifty for it the next day, to reward his obedience. After having acquainted my company with the history of the play, I read three acts of it, and left Mrs. Fleming and Mr. Randolph to finish it. who read as well as most actors do at a rehearsal. Thus we killed the time, and triumphed over the bad weather.

September 27. . . . I took my leave about ten, and drove over a spacious level road ten miles to a bridge built over the river Po, which is one of the four branches of Matopany, about 40 yards wide. Two miles beyond that, we passed by a plantation belonging to the company, of about 500 acres, where they keep a great number of oxen to relieve those that have dragged their loaded carts thus far. Three miles farther we came to the Germanna road, where I quitted the chair, <sup>3</sup> and continued my journey on horseback. I rode eight miles together over a stony road, and had on either side continual poisoned fields, with nothing but saplings growing on them. Then I came into the main county road that leads from Fredericksburgh to Germanna, which last place I reached in ten This famous town consists of miles more. Colonel Spotswood's 4 enchanted castle on one side of the street, and a baker's dozen of ruinous tenements on the other, where so many German families had dwelt some years ago: but are now removed ten miles higher, in the fork of Rappahannock, to land of their own. There had also been a chapel about a bow-shot from the Colonel's house, at the end of an avenue of cherry trees; but some pious people had lately burnt it down with the intent to get another built nearer to their own homes. Here I arrived about three o'clock, and found only Mrs. Spotswood at home, who received her old acquaintance with many a gracious smile. I was carried into a room elegantly set off with pier glasses, the largest of which came soon after to an odd misfortune. Amongst other favorite animals that cheered this lady's solitude, a brace of tame deer ran familiarly about the house, and one of them came to stare at me as a stranger. But unluckily spying his own figure in the glass, he made a spring over the tea table that stood under it, and shattered the glass to pieces and, falling back upon the tea table, made a terrible fracas among the china. This exploit was so sudden, and accompanied with such a noise, that it surprised me, and perfectly frightened Mrs. Spotswood. 'twas worth all the damage to show the moderation and good humor with which she bore this disaster. In the evening the noble Colonel came home from his mines, who saluted me very civilly; and Mrs. Spotswood's sister. Miss Theky, who had been to meet him en cavalier, 5 was so kind too as to bid me welcome. We talked over a legend of old stories, supped about nine, and then prattled with the ladies till 'twas time for a traveler to retire. In the mean time I observed my old friend to be very uxorious and exceedingly fond of his children. This was so opposite to the maxims he used to preach up before he was married, that I could not forbear rubbing up the memory of them. But he gave a very good-natured turn to his change of sentiments by alleging that whoever brings a poor gentlewoman into so solitary a place, from all her friends and acquaintance, would be ungrateful not to use her and all that

September 28. We all kept snug in our several apartments till nine, except Miss Theky, who was the housewife of the family. At that hour we met over a pot of coffee, which was not quite strong enough to give us the palsy. After breakfast the Colonel and I left the ladies to their domestic affairs and took a turn in the garden, which has nothing beautiful but three belongs to her with all possible tenderness.

tions even in the royal palace to an edition of Polly at a guinea each, and for her partisanship was dismissed from the court. It is interesting to see how closely these Virginians followed London, "The Town," and were alive to the incidents of its gay life that have passed into the literary history of England. Imagine such interest on the part of the Puritan aristocracy of Boston!

1 a Scotchman; a characteristic English thrust at alleged

Scotch penuriousness

2 finely dressed

tions even in the royal palace to an edition of

&lt;sup>2</sup> finely dressed
<sup>5</sup> Sedan chairs were then sometimes used for rather extensive journeys.
<sup>4</sup> Colonel Spotswood, British army officer and governor of Virginia from 1710-1722, was a prominent figure in the development of Virginia. This residence, built in a wide loop of the Rapidan, commanded a fine view of the country. The local name Germanna Mills remained over a century.

on horseback 6 It is possible Byrd means legion.

terrace walks that fall in slopes one below another. I let him understand that, besides the pleasure of paying him a visit, I came to be instructed by so great a master in the mystery of making of iron wherein he had led the way. and was the Tubal Cain 1 of Virginia. He corrected me a little there, by assuring me he was not only the first in this country, but the first in North America, who had erected a regular furnace. That they ran altogether upon bloomeries 2 in New England and Pennsylvania till his example had made them attempt greater works. But, in this last colony, they have so few ships to carry their iron to Great Britain that they must be content to make it only for their own use, and must be obliged to manufacture it when they have done. That he hoped he had done the country very great service by setting so good an example. That the four furnaces now at work in Virginia circulated a great sum of money for provisions and all other necessaries in the adjacent counties. That they took off a great number of hands from planting tobacco, and employed them in works that produced a large sum of money in England to the persons concerned, whereby the country is so much the richer. That they are besides a considerable advantage to Great Britain, because it lessens the quantity of bar iron imported from Spain, Holland, Sweden, Denmark and Muscovy, which used to be no less than 20,000 tons yearly; though at the same time no sow iron is imported thither from any country but only from the plantations. For most of this bar iron they do not only pay silver, but our friends in the Baltic are so nice, they even expect to be paid all in crown pieces. On the contrary, all the iron they receive from the plantations they pay for it in their own manufactures, and send for it in their own shipping. Then I inquired after his own mines and hoped. as he was the first that engaged in this great undertaking, that he had brought them to the most perfection. He told me he had iron in several parts of his great tract of land consisting of 45,000 acres, but that the mine he was at work upon was thirteen miles below Germanna. That his ore (which was very rich) he raised a mile from his furnace, and was obliged to cart the iron, when it was made, fifteen miles to Massaponux, a plantation he had upon Rappahannock River; 3 but that the road was exceeding good, gently declining all the way, and had no more than one hill to go up in the whole journey. For this reason his loaded carts went it in a day without difficulty. He said it was true his works were of the oldest standing: but that his long absence in England. and the wretched management of Mr. Greame. whom he had entrusted with his affairs, had put him back very much. That what with neglect and severity, above 80 of his slaves were lost while he was in England, and most of his cattle That his furnace stood still great part of the time, and all his plantations ran to That indeed he was rightly served for committing his affairs to the care of a mathematician whose thoughts were always among the stars. That, nevertheless, since his return he had applied himself to rectify his steward's mistakes and bring his business again into order. That now he had contrived to do everything with his own people except raising the mine 4 and running the iron, by which he had contracted his expense very much. Nay, he believed that by his directions he could bring sensible negroes to perform those parts of the work tolerably well. But at the same time he gave me to understand that his furnace had done no great feats lately, because he had been taken up in building an air furnace at Massaponux which he had now brought to perfection, and should be thereby able to furnish the whole country with all sorts of cast iron as cheap and as good as ever came from England. I told him he must do one thing more to have a full vent 5 for those commodities; he must keep a shallop 6 running into all the rivers, to carry his wares home to people's own doors. And, if he would do that, I would set a good example and take of a whole ton of them. Our conversation on this subject continued till dinner, which was both elegant and plentiful. The afternoon was devoted to the ladies, who showed me one of their most beautiful walks. They conducted me through a shady lane to the landing, and by the way made me drink some very fine water that issued from a marble fountain and ran incessantly. Just behind it was a covered bench, where Miss Theky often sat and bewailed her virginity. Then we proceeded to the river, which is the south branch of Rappahanock, about 50 yards wide, and so rapid that the ferry boat is drawn over by a chain, and therefore called the Rapidan. At night we drank prosperity to all the Colonel's projects in a bowl of

&lt;sup>1</sup> The first worker in iron; see Genesis iv, 22, <sup>2</sup> mills for producing wrought iron directly from the ore without the process of transforming it from cast iron

There is a confusion in places here hard to reconcile with modern, or even eighteenth century maps.

<sup>4</sup> ore 5 sale, market

<sup>6</sup> a boat for shallow water navigation

rack punch. 1 and then retired to our devotions. September 29. Having employed about two hours in retirement, I sallied out at the first summons to breakfast where our conversation with the ladies, like whip sillabub, 2 was very pretty, but had nothing in it. This it seems was Miss Theky's birthday, upon which I made her my compliments, and wished she might live twice as long a married woman as she had lived a maid. I did not presume to prv into the secret of her age, nor was she forward to disclose it for this humble reason, lest I should think her wisdom fell short of her years. . . . Then the Colonel and I took another turn in the garden, to discourse farther on the subject of iron. He was very frank in communicating all his dear-bought experience to me, and told me very civilly he would not only let me into the whole secret, but would make a journey to James River and give me his faithful opinion of all my conveniences. 3 For his part he wished there were many more iron works in the country, provided the parties concerned would preserve a constant harmony among themselves. and meet and consult frequently what might be for their common advantage. By this they might be better able to manage the workmen. and reduce their wages to what was just and reasonable. After this frank speech, he began to explain the whole charge of an iron-work. He said there ought at least to be an hundred negroes employed in it, and those upon good land would make corn, and raise provisions enough to support themselves and the cattle. and do every other part of the business. That the furnace might be built for £700 and made ready to go to work, if I went the nearest way to do it, especially, since coming after so many, I might correct their errors and avoid their miscarriages. That if I had ore and wood enough, and a convenient stream of water to set the furnace upon, having neither too much nor too little water, I might undertake the affair with a full assurance of success; provided the distance of carting be not too great, which is exceedingly burdensome. That there must be abundance of wheel carriages, shod with iron, and several teams of oxen, provided to transport the wood that is to be coaled, 4 and afterwards the coal and ore to the furnace, and last of all the sow iron to the nearest water carriage, and carry back limestone and other necessaries from thence to the works; and a sloop also would be useful to carry the iron on board the ships, the masters not being always in the humor to fetch it. Then he enumerated the people that were to be hired, viz.: a founder. a mine-raiser, 5 a collier, a stock-taker, a clerk, a smith, a carpenter, a wheelwright, and several carters. That these altogether will be a standing charge of about £500 a year. That the amount of freight, custom, commission and other charges in England, comes to 27 shillings a ton. But that the merchants yearly find out means to inflame the account with new articles.6 as they do in those of tobacco. That, upon the whole matter, the expenses here and in England may be computed modestly at £3 a ton. And the rest that the iron sells for will be clear gain, to pay for the land and negroes, which 'tis to be hoped will be £3 more for every ton that is sent over. As this account agreed pretty near with that which Mr. Chiswell had given me. I set it down (notwithstanding it may seem a repetition of the same thing) to prove that both these gentlemen were sincere in their representations. We had a Michaelmas goose for dinner, of Miss Theky's own raising. . . . In the afternoon we walked in a meadow by the river side, which winds in the form of a horseshoe about Germanna, making it a peninsula containing about 400 acres. Rappahanock forks about fourteen miles below this place, the northern branch being the larger, and consequently must be the river that bounds my Lord Fairfax's grant of the northern neck.

September 30. The sun rose clear this morning and so did I, and finished all my little affairs by breakfast. It was then resolved to wait on the ladies on horseback, since the bright sun, the fine air, and the wholesome exercise all invited us to it. We forded the river a little above the ferry and rode six miles up the neck' to a fine level piece of rich land where we found about twenty plants of ginseng, 7 with the scarlet berries growing on the top of the middle stalk. The root of this is of wonderful virtue in many cases, particularly to raise the spirits and promote perspiration, which makes it a specific in colds and coughs. The Colonel complimented me with all we found, in return for my telling him the virtues of it. We were all pleased to find so much of this king of plants so near the Colonel's habitation and growing, too, upon his own land; but were, however, surprised to find it upon level ground after we had been told it grew only upon the north side

&lt;sup>1</sup> strictly, punch made with arrack, a liquor distilled from the cocoa palm <sup>2</sup> wine, ale, or cider whipped with cream

facilities, natural resources burned into charcoal

&lt;sup>5</sup> skilled mechanic to oversee the hoisting of the ore (?) <sup>6</sup> increase the account with new stipulations

<sup>7</sup> a plant with an aromatic root much valued as a drug

of stony mountains. I carried home this treasure with as much joy as if every root had been a graft of the tree of life, and washed and dried it carefully. This airing made us hungry as so many hawks so that, between appetite and a very good dinner, 'twas difficult to eat like a philosopher. In the afternoon the ladies walked me about amongst all their little animals, with which they amuse themselves and furnish the table: the worst of it is, they are so tenderhearted they shed a silent tear every time any of them are killed. At night the Colonel and I quitted the threadbare subject of iron, and changed the scene to politics. He told me the Ministry 1 had receded from their demand upon New England to raise a standing salary for all succeeding governors, for fear some curious members of the House of Commons should inquire how the money was disposed of that had been raised in the other American colonies for the support of their governors. And particularly what becomes of the four and one half per cent. paid in the sugar colonies for that purpose. That duty produces near £20,000 a year; but, being remitted into the exchequer. not one of the West India governors is paid out of it; but they, like falcons, are let loose upon the people, who are complaisant enough to settle other revenues upon them, to the great impoverishing of these colonies. In the mean time, 'tis certain the money raised by the four and one half per cent, molders away between the minister's fingers, nobody knows how, like the quitrents 2 of Virginia. And 'tis for this reason that the instructions forbidding all governors to accept of any presents from their assemblies are dispensed with in the Sugar Islands, 3 while 'tis strictly insisted upon everywhere else, where the assemblies were so wise as to keep their revenues among themselves. He said further that, if the assembly in New England would stand bluff, 4 he did not see how they could be forced to raise money against their will; for if they should direct it to be done by act of Parliament, which they have threatened to do, (though it be against the right of Englishmen to be taxed but by their representatives,) yet they would find it no easy matter to put such an act in execution. Then the Colonel read me a lecture upon tar, affirming that it can't be made in this warm climate after the manner they make it in Sweden and Muscovy, by barking the tree two yards from the ground, whereby the turpentine descends all into the stump in a year's time, which is then split in pieces in order for the kiln. But here the sun fries out the turpentine in the branches of the tree, when the leaves are dried, and hinders it from descending. But, on the contrary, those who burn tar of lightwood in the common way, and are careful about it, make as good as that which comes from the east country, nor will it burn the cordage more than that does. Then we entered upon the subject of hemp. which the Colonel told me he never could raise here from foreign seed, but at last sowed the seed of wild hemp. (which is very common in the upper parts of the country) and that came up very thick. That he sent about 500 pounds of it to England, and that the Commissioners of the Navy, after a full trial of it, reported to the Lords of the Admiralty that it was equal in goodness to the best that comes from Riga. 5 I told him if our hemp were never so good it would not be worth the making here, even though they should continue the bounty. And my reason was, because labor is not more than two pence a day in the east country where they produce hemp, and here we can't compute it at less than ten pence which, being five times as much as their labor, and considering besides that our freight is three times as dear as theirs, the price that will make them rich will ruin us, as I have found by woful experience. Besides, if the King, who must have the refusal, 6 buys our hemp, the navy is so long in paying both the price and the bounty that we who live from hand to mouth can't afford to wait so long for it. And then our good friends, the merchants, load it with so many charges that they run away with great part of the profit themselves. Just like the bald eagle which, after the fishing hawk has been at great pains to catch a fish, pounces upon and takes it from him. Our conversation was interrupted by a summons to supper, for the ladies, to show their power, had by this time brought us tamely to go to bed with our bellies full, though we both at first declared positively against it. So very pliable a thing is frail man when women have the bending of him.

1732 1841

the English ministry sums paid to an over-lord or a government in lieu of services that might otherwise be demanded probably the sugar producing islands of the West Indies, in the commerce of which all the colonies were greatly interested 4 firm

<sup>5</sup> a Baltic port noted for its trade in hemp 6 in trade, the right of first buying, or refusing to buy, a commodity

JONATHAN EDWARDS 1703-1758

Just a generation later than Cotton Mather, Edwards was even greater as a pulpit orator than his predecessor, and far outreached him in creative genius. He was born at East Windsor, Connecticut, of an intellectual ancestry, graduated from Yale at the age of seventeen and remained there two years as a tutor. In 1727 he was made colleague pastor with his grandfather of the church at Northampton, Massachusetts. His strictness in church discipline forced his resignation from this pastorate, and he became missionary to the Indians of Stockbridge, Massachusetts, 1750. It was here that he wrote The Freedom of the Will, 1754: The Nature of Virtue, posthumously published; Treatise on Original Sin, 1758; and A Dissertation Concerning the End for Which God Created the World. He was elected to the presidency of the College of New Jersey (Princeton College) less than a year before he died. The commanding intellectual figure of New England throughout his day, preacher, missionary, philosopher, educator, he may perhaps be longest known by his philosophical work, The Freedom of the Will. This work is remarkable for its originality and for its penetrating psychological conclusions. Edwards believed that there could be no such thing as absolute freedom of the will. Whether the individual realizes it or not, there is some cause disposing him to choose one of several courses of action each of which may seem equally inviting of uninviting. Edwards's diary and sermons, however, are of more popular interest and give a significant glimpse into the Puritan heart absorbed in all-consuming inward struggle. An interesting study might be made of the differences in religious and moral experience between Edwards, Mather, Woolman, and Franklin.

Rather late in Edwards's life a copy of a novel (probably Richardson's Sir Charles Grandison) fell into his hands, and he was heard to lament that he himself had not paid more attention to style. Yet he wrote with a vigor and an imaginative touch beyond the reach of most eighteenth century Americans, and showed a great advance in simplicity and directness of style over his New England contemporaries and predecessors, notably Cotton Mather. We can feel the strength of his oratory even today if we bear in mind how seriously his hearers regarded the matters of which he spoke, and how honest his appeal was to their emotions.

The first two pieces following, printed from the writings of Edwards when a boy, show an exceedingly interesting mind, one full of logical, creative curiosity, and capable of great development in the direction of natural science. It is interesting to compare him with his contemporary, Franklin.

Biography: A. V. G. Allen, 1889, 1890. Criticism: Stephen (HL2); More (Shel. 11); E. G. Smythe, "The Flying Spider," etc., And. Rev. 13: 1-19; E. G. Smythe, review of Allen's Jonathan Edwards, And. Rev. 1:285-304.

THE FLYING SPIDER <sup>1</sup> OF INSECTS

Of all Insects no one is more wonderfull than the Spider especially with Respect to their sagacity and admirable way of working. these Spiders for the Present shall be Distinguished into those that keep in houses and those that keep in forests upon trees bushes shrubs &c and those that keep in rotten Logs for I take em to be of very Different kinds and natures: there are also other sorts some of which keep in rotten Logs hollow trees swamps and grass. Of these last every One knows the truth of their marching in the air from tree to tree and these sometimes at five or six rods Distanss sometimes, nor Can any one Go out amongst the trees in a Dewey morning towards the latter end of august or at the beginning of september but that he shall see hundreds of webbs made Conspicuous by the Dew that is lodged upon them reaching from one tree & shrub to another that stand at a Considerable Distance, and they may be seen well enough by an observing eye at noon Day by their Glistening against the sun and what is still more wonderfull: i know I have severall times seen in a very Calm and serene Day at that time of year, standing behind some Opake body that shall Just hide the Disk of the sun and keep of his Dazzling rays from my eye and looking close by the side of it, multitudes of little shining webbs and Glistening Strings of a Great Length and at such a height as that one would think they were tack'd to the Sky by one end were it not that they were moving and floating and there Very Often appears at the end of these Webs a Spider floating and sailing in the air with them, which I have Plainly Discerned in those webs that were nearer to my eye and Once saw a very large spider to my surprise swimming in the air in this manner, and Others have assured me that they Often have seen spiders fly, the appearance is truly very Pretty And Pleasing and it was so pleasing as well as surprising to me that I Resolved to endeavour to Satisfy my Curiosity about it by finding Out the way and manner of their Doing of it, being also Persuaded that If I could find out how the [y] flew I could easily find out how they made webs from tree to tree, and accordingly at a time when I was in the

<sup>1</sup> This selection is as far as possible an exact transcript of the original, a closely written, rather obscure ms. As nearly as can be ascertained, it was written when Edwards was about twelve years old, and reveals an analytical keenness of mind and a comprehension of the subject very unusual at any time in a child of that age.

Woods I happened to see one of these spiders on a bush, so I went to the bush and shook it hoping thereby to make him Uneasy upon it and provoke him to leave it by flying and took Good Care that he should not Gct of from it any other way So I Continued Constantly to shake it. which made him severall times let himself fall by his web a little but he would presently creep up again till at last he was pleased ho wever to leave that bush and march along in the air to the next but which way I Did not know nor Could I Concieve but Resolved to watch him more narrowly next time so I brought [him] back to the same bush again and to be sure that there was nothing for him to Go upon the next time I whisked about a stick I had in my hand on all side[s] of the bush that I might breake any web Going from it if there were any and leave nothing else for him to Go on but the Clear air, and then shook the bush as before but it was not long before he again to my surprize went to the next bush. I took [him] of upon my stick and holding of him near my eye shook the stick as I had Done the bush wherupon he let himself Down A little hanging by his web and [I] Presently Perceived a web Out from his tail a Good way into the air. I took hold Of it with my hand and broke it off not knowing but that I might take it out to the Stick with him from the bush, but then I Plainly Percieved another such a string to Proceed Out of his tail I now Concieved I had found out the Whole mystery. I repeated the triall Over and Over again till I was fully satisfied of his way of working which I Dont only Conjecture to be on this wise viz they when they would Go from tree [to] tree or would Sail in the air let themselves hang Down a little way by their webb and then put out a web at their tails which being so Exceeding rare when it first comes from the spider as to be lighter than the air so as of itself it will ascend in it (which I know by Experience) the moving air takes it by the End and by the spiders Permission Pulls it out of his tail to any length and If the further End Of it happens to catch by a tree or anything why there's a web for him to Go over upon and the Spider immediately percieves it and feels when it touches, much after the same manner as the soul in the brain immediately Percieves when any of those little nervous strings that Proceed from it are in the Least Jarred by External things; and this very way I have seen Spiders Go from one thing to another I believe fifty time[s] at least since I first Discovered it: but if nothing is in the way of these webs to hinder their flying out at a sufficient Distance and they Dont catch by any thing, there will be so much of it Drawn out into the air as by its ascending force there will be enough to Carry the spider with it, or which is all one now there is so much of this web which is rarer than the air as that the web taken with the spider shall take up as much or more space than the same quantity of which if it be equall they together will be in a perfect equilibrium or Poise with the air so as that when they are loose therein they will neither ascend nor Descend but only as they are Driven by the wind, but if they together be more will ascend therein, like as a man at the bottom of the sea if he has hold on a stick of wood or any thing that is lighter or takes up more Space for the Quantity of matter than the water, if it be a little piece it may not be enough to Carry him and Cause him to swim therin but if there be enough of it it will Carry him up to the surface of the water if there be so much as that the Greater rarity shall more than Counterballance the Greater Density of the man and if it be Doth but Just Cause to balance, Put the man any where in the water and there he'll keep without ascending or Descending; tis Just so with the Spider in the air as with the man in the water, for what is lighter than the air will swim Or ascend therin as well as that which is lighter than the water swims in that, and If a spider has hold on so much of a web that the Greater Levity of all of it shall more than counterpoise the Greater Gravity of the spider, so that the ascending force of the web shall be more than the Descending force of the spider the web by its ascending will necessarily Carry the Spider up unto such a height as that the air shall be so much thinner and lighter as that the lightness of the web with the Spider shall no longer prevail. Now Perhaps here it will be asked how the spider knows when he has put out web enough and when he Does know how Does he Get himself loose from the web by which he hung to the trees. I answer there is no occasion for the spiders knowing, for their manner is to let out their web untill the ascending force of their web And the force of the wind has upon it together with the weight of the spider shall be enough to break the web by which the spider hung to the tree for the stress of all these Comes upon that and nature has so provided that Just so much web as is sufficient to break that shall be sufficient to carry the spider.

1715?

From A BIT OF AUTOBIOGRAPHY

FOUND IN HIS OWN HANDWRITING

I had a variety of concerns and exercises 1 about my soul from my childhood; but I had two more remarkable seasons of awakening. before I met with that change by which I was brought to those new dispositions, and that new sense of things, that I have since had. The first time was when I was a boy, some years before I went to college, at a time of remarkable awakening in my father's congregation. 2 I was then very much affected for many months, and concerned about the things of religion, and my soul's salvation; and was abundant in religious duties. I used to pray five times a day in secret, and to spend much time in religious conversation with other boys: and used to meet with them to pray together. I experienced I know not what kind of delight in religion. My mind was much engaged in it. and had much self-righteous pleasure; and it was my delight to abound in religious duties. I with some of my schoolmates joined together. and built a booth in a swamp, in a very retired spot, for a place of prayer. And besides, I had particular secret places of my own in the woods, where I used to retire by myself; and was from time to time much affected. My affections seemed to be lively and easily moved, and I seemed to be in my element when engaged in religious duties. And I am ready to think, many are deceived with such affections, and such a kind of delight as I then had in religion, and mistake it for grace. 3

But in process of time, my convictions and affections were off and I entirely lost all those affections and delights and left off secret prayer at least as to any constant performance of it; and returned like a dog to his vomit, and went on in the ways of sin. 4 Indeed I was at times very uneasy, especially toward the latter part of my time at college; when it pleased God to seize me with a pleurisy, in which he brought me nigh to the grave, and shook me over the pit of hell. And yet it was not long after my recovery, before I fell again into my old ways of sin. But God would not suffer me to go on with any quietness; I had great and violent inward struggles, till, after many conflicts with wicked inclinations, repeated resolutions, and bonds that I laid myself under by a kind of vows to God. I was brought wholly to break off all former wicked ways, and all ways of known outward sin: and to apply myself to seek salvation, and practice many religious duties: but without that kind of affection and delight which I had formerly experienced. My concern now wrought more by inward struggles and conflicts, and self reflections. I made seeking my salvation the main business of my life. But yet it seems to me I sought it after a miserable manner: which has made me sometimes since to question, whether ever it issued in that which was saving; being ready to doubt, whether such miserable seeking ever succeeded. I was indeed brought to seek salvation in a manner that I never was before; I felt a spirit to part with all things in the world, for an interest in Christ. My concern continued and prevailed, with many exercising thoughts and inward struggles: but yet it never seemed to be proper to express that concern by the name of terror.

From my childhood up, my mind had been full of objections against the doctrine of God's sovereignty, in choosing whom he would to eternal life, and rejecting whom he pleased; leaving them eternally to perish, and be everlastingly tormented in hell. It used to appear like a horrible doctrine to me. But I remember the time very well, when I seemed to be convinced, and fully satisfied, as to this sovereignty of God, and his justice in thus eternally disposing of men, according to his sovereign pleasure. But I never could give an account how, or by what means. I was thus convinced, not in the least imagining at the time, nor a long time after, that there was any extraordinary influence of God's Spirit in it; but only that now I saw further, and my reason apprehended the justice and reasonableness of it. However my mind rested in it; and it put an end to all those cavils and objections. And there has been a wonderful alteration in my mind, with respect to the doctrine of God's sovereignty, from that day to this; so that I scarce ever have found so much as the rising of an objection against it, in the most absolute sense, in God showing mercy to whom he will show mercy, and hardening 5 whom he will. God's absolute sovereignty and justice, with respect to salvation and damnation, is what my mind seems to rest assured of, as much as of any thing that I see with my eyes; at least it is so at times. But I have often, since that first conviction, had quite another kind of sense of God's sovereignty than I had then. I have often since had not only a conviction, but a distresses

 His father was for sixty years pastor at Windsor, Connecticut.

divine favor
 not sinful acts, but a perfunctory rather than a positive attitude toward religious matters

<sup>5</sup> Romans ix, 18

delightful conviction. The doctrine has very often appeared exceeding pleasant, bright, and sweet. Absolute sovereignty is what I love to ascribe to God. But my first conviction was not so.

Not long after I first began to experience these things. I gave an account to my father of some things that had passed in my mind. I was pretty much affected by the discourse we had together; and when the discourse was ended, I walked abroad alone, in a solitary place in my father's pasture, for contemplation. And as I was walking there, and looking upon the sky and clouds, there came into my mind so sweet a sense of the glorious majesty and grace of God, as I know not how to express. seemed to see them both in a sweet conjunction: majesty and meekness joined together; it was a sweet, and gentle, and holy majesty; and also a majestic meekness; an awful sweetness; a high, and great, and holy gentleness.

After this my sense of divine things gradually increased, and became more and more lively, and had more of that inward sweetness. The appearance of everything was altered; there seemed to be, as it were, a calm, sweet cast, or appearance of divine glory, in almost everything. God's excellency, his wisdom, his purity and love, seemed to appear in everything; in the sun, moon, and stars; in the clouds and blue sky; in the grass, flowers, trees; in the water, and all nature; which used greatly to fix my mind. I often used to sit and view the moon for a long time; and in the day spent much time in viewing the clouds and sky, to behold the sweet glory of God in these things; in the meantime singing forth, with a low voice, my contemplations of the Creator and Redeemer. And scarce anything, among all the works of nature, was so sweet to me as thunder and lightning; formerly, nothing had been so terrible to me. Before, I used to be uncommonly terrified with thunder, and to be struck with terror when I saw a thunder storm rising; but now, on the contrary, it rejoiced me. I felt God, if I may so speak, at the first appearance of a thunder storm; and used to take the opportunity, at such times, to fix myself in order to view the clouds and see the lightnings play, and hear the majestic and awful voice of God's thunder, which oftentimes was exceedingly entertaining, leading me to sweet contemplations of my great and glorious God. While thus engaged, it always seemed natural to me to sing, or chant forth my meditations; or, to speak my thoughts in soliloquies with a singing voice 1

The heaven I desired was a heaven of holiness: to be with God, and to spend my eternity in divine love, and holy communion with Christ. My mind was very much taken up with contemplations on heaven, and the enjoyments there; and living there in perfect holiness, humility, and love; and it used at that time to appear a great part of the happiness of heaven, that there the saints could express their love to Christ. It appeared to me a great clog and burden that what I felt within. I could not express as I desired. The inward ardor of my soul seemed to be hindered and pent up, and could not freely flame out as it would. I used often to think, how in heaven this principle should freely and fully vent and express itself. Heaven appeared exceedingly delightful, as a world of love; and that all happiness consisted in living in pure, humble, heavenly, divine love.

I remember the thoughts I used then to have of holiness: and said sometimes to myself, "I do certainly know that I love holiness, such as the Gospel prescribes." It appeared to me that there was nothing in it but what was ravishingly lovely; the highest beauty and amiableness—a divine beauty; far purer than anything here upon earth; and that everything else was like mire and defilement, in comparison of it.

Holiness, as I then wrote down some of my contemplations on it, appeared to me to be of a sweet, pleasant, charming, serene, calm nature; which brought an inexpressible purity, brightness, peacefulness, and ravishment to the soul. In other words, that it made the soul like a field or garden of God, with all manner of pleasant flowers; enjoying a sweet calm, and the gentle vivifying beams of the sun. The soul of a true Christian, as I then wrote my meditations, appeared like such a little white flower as we see in the spring of the year; low, and humble on the ground, opening its bosom to receive the pleasant beams of the sun's glory, rejoicing as it were in a calm rapture; diffusing around a sweet fragrancy; standing peacefully and lovingly, in the midst of other flowers round about; all in like manner opening their bosoms, to drink in the light of the sun. There was no part of creature 2 holiness, that I had so great a sense of its loveliness as humility, brokenness of heart, and poverty of spirit; and there was nothing that I so earnestly longed for. My heart panted after this, to lie low before God, as in the dust; that I might be nothing, and that God might be all, that I might become as a little child.

Edwards's record of his spiritual experiences coincides with that of many other persons of intense devotion from David to St. Francis.
 The holiness of a created thing as distinguished from the holiness of God. This sentence structure is now considered incorrect.

On Jan. 12, 1723, I made a solemn dedication of myself to God, and wrote it down; giving up myself and all that I had to God to be for the future in no respect my own; to act as one that had no right to himself in any respect. And solemnly vowed to take God for my whole portion and felicity; looking on nothing else as any part of my happiness, nor acting as if it were; and his law for the constant rule of my obedience; engaging to fight with all my might against the world, the flesh, and the devil, to the end of my life. But I have reason to be infinitely humbled, when I consider how much I have failed of answering my obligation.

. . . . . . . .

They say there is a young lady 1 in [New Haven] who is beloved of that Great Being, who made and rules the world, and that there are certain seasons in which this Great Being, in some way or other invisible, comes to her and fills her mind with exceeding sweet delight, and that she hardly cares for anything except to meditate on him—that she expects after a while to be received up where he is, to be raised up out of the world and caught up into heaven; being assured that he loves her too well to let her remain at a distance from him always. There she is to dwell with him, and to be ravished with his love and delight forever. Therefore if you present all the world before her, with the richest of its treasures, she disregards it and cares not for it, and is unmindful of any pain or affliction. She has a strange sweetness in her mind and singular purity in her affections: is most just and conscientious in all her conduct; and you could not persuade her to do anything wrong or sinful, if you would give her all the world, lest she should offend this Great Being.

She is of a wonderful sweetness, calmness, and universal benevolence of mind; especially after this great God has manifested himself to her mind. She will sometimes go about from place to place, singing sweetly; and seems to be always full of joy and pleasure; and no one knows for what. She loves to be alone, walking in the fields and groves, and seems to have someone invisible always conversing with her. <sup>2</sup> 1723

From the sermon SINNERS IN THE HANDS OF AN ANGRY GOD <sup>3</sup>

(Based on the text: "Their foot shall slide in due time." Deuteronomy xxxii, 35.)

The wrath of God is like great waters that are dammed for the present: they increase more and more and rise higher and higher, till an outlet is given; and the longer the stream is stopped, the more rapid and mighty is its course when once it is let loose. 'Tis true that judgment against your evil work has not been executed hitherto: the floods of God's vengeance have been withheld: but your guilt in the mean time is constantly increasing, and you are every day treasuring up more wrath; the waters are continually rising and waxing more and more mighty; and there is nothing but the mere pleasure of God that holds the waters back. that are unwilling to be stopped, and press hard to go forward. If God should only withdraw his hand from the floodgate it would immediately fly open, and the fiery floods of the fierceness and wrath of God would rush forth with inconceivable fury, and would come upon you with omnipotent power; and if your strength were ten thousand times greater than it is, yea, ten thousand times greater than the strength of the stoutest, sturdiest devil in hell, it would be nothing to withstand or endure it.

The bow of God's wrath is bent, and the arrow made ready on the string, and justice bends the arrow at your heart and strains the bow, and it is nothing but the mere pleasure of God, and that of an angry God, without any promise or obligation at all, that keeps the arrow one moment from being made drunk with your blood.

Thomas Wentworth Higginson, speaking of this paragraph, says in his History of American Literature, "This may fairly be called the high-water mark of Puritan prose."
 The congregation at Enfield, Connecticut, appears to

The congregation at Enfield, Connecticut, appears to have remained indifferent during a time of general religious awakening. Edwards, invited from Northampton, preached this sermon as a "lecture," July 8, 1741, to the ministers and people of Enfield and the neighboring towns. Trumbull in his History of Connecticut says that before the close "there was heard such a breathing of distress and weeping, that the preacher was obliged to speak to the people and desire silence that he might be heard!" Think as we may concerning the subject-matter of Edwards's sermon, we cannot escape the energy of his imagination and the power of his appeal. This selection is included as one of the most vivid specimens of Puritan imagination and mid-eighteenth century belief. Compare Edwards's oratory with that of the professional orators of a century later.

&lt;sup>1</sup> This paragraph was found written upon a blank leaf. It is a description of Miss Sarah Pierrepont, whom he married.

Thus are all you that never passed under a great change of heart by the mighty power of the Spirit of God upon your souls; all that were never born again and made new creatures, and raised from being dead in sin to a state of new and before altogether unexperienced light and life, (however you may have reformed your life in many things, and may have had religious affections, and may keep up a form of religion in your families and closets and in the house of God, and may be strict in it) you are thus in the hands of an angry God; 'tis nothing but his mere pleasure that keeps you from being this moment swallowed up in everlasting destruction.

However unconvinced you may now be of the truth of what you hear, by and by you will be fully convinced of it. Those that are gone from being in the like circumstances with you, see that it was so with them; for destruction came suddenly upon most of them; when they expected nothing of it, and while they were saying, Peace and safety: now they see that those things that they depended on for peace and safety were nothing but thin air and empty shadows.

The God that holds you over the pit of hell much as one holds a spider or some loathsome insect over the fire, abhors you, and is dreadfully provoked: his wrath towards you burns like fire; he looks upon you as worthy of nothing else but to be cast into the fire; he is of purer eyes than to bear to have you in his sight; you are ten thousand times so abominable in his eyes as the most hateful and venomous serpent is in ours. You have offended him infinitely more than ever a stubborn rebel did his prince: and yet it is nothing but his hand that holds you from falling into the fire every moment. 'Tis ascribed to nothing else, that you did not go to hell the last night; that you was suffered to awake again in this world after you closed your eyes to sleep and there is no other reason to be given why you have not dropped into hell since you arose in the morning, but that God's hand has held you up. There is no other reason to be given why you han't gone to hell since you have sat here in the house of God, provoking his pure eyes by your sinful wicked manner of attending his solemn worship. Yea, there is nothing else that is to be given as a reason why you don't this very moment drop down into hell.

O sinner! Consider the fearful danger you are in. 'Tis a great furnace of wrath, a wide and bottomless pit, full of the fire of wrath, that you are held over in the hand of that God whose wrath is provoked and incensed as much against you as against many of the damned in hell. You hang by a slender thread, with the flames of divine wrath flashing about it, and ready every moment to singe it and burn it asunder; and you have no interest in any Mediator, and nothing to lay hold of to save yourself, nothing to keep off the flames of wrath, nothing of your own, nothing that you ever have done, nothing that you can do, to induce God to spare you one moment. . . .

It is everlasting wrath. It would be dreadful to suffer this fierceness and wrath of Almighty God one moment; but you must suffer it to all eternity: there will be no end to this exquisite, horrible misery. When you look forward you shall see a long forever, a boundless duration before you, which will swallow up you thoughts and amaze your soul; and you will absolutely despair of ever having any deliverance, any end, any mitigation, any rest at all; you will know certainly that you must wear out long ages, millions of millions of ages, in wrestling and conflicting with this almighty, merciless vengeance; and then when you have so done, when so many ages have actually been spent by you in this manner, you will know that all is but a point to what remains. So that your punishment will indeed be infinite. Oh, who can express what the state of a soul in such circumstances is! All that we can possibly say about it gives but a very feeble, faint representation of it; it is inexpressible and inconceivable: for "who knows the power of God's anger?"

How dreadful is the state of those that are daily and hourly in danger of this great wrath and infinite misery! But this is the dismal case of every soul in this congregation that has not been born again, however moral and strict, sober and religious, they may otherwise be. Oh. that you would consider it, whether you be young or old! There is reason to think that there are many in this congregation now hearing this discourse, that will actually be the subjects of this very misery to all eternity. We know not who they are, or in what seats they sit, or what thoughts they now have. It may be they are now at ease and hear all these things without much disturbance, and are now flattering themselves that they are not the persons, promising themselves that they shall escape. If we knew that there was one person, and but one, in the whole congregation, that was to be the subject of this misery, what an awful thing it would be to think of! If we knew who it was, what an awful sight would it be to see such a person! How might all the rest of the congregation lift up a lamentable and bitter cry over him! But alas! instead of one, how many is it likely will remember this discourse in hell! And it would be a wonder. if some that are now present should not be in hell in a very short time, before this year is out. And it would be no wonder if some persons that now sit here in some seats of this meetinghouse in health, and quiet and secure, should be there before tomorrow morning. Those of you that finally continue in a natural condition. that shall keep out of hell longest, will be there in a little time! Your damnation don't slumber; it will come swiftly and, in all probability, very suddenly upon many of you. You have reason to wonder that you are not already in hell. 'Tis doubtless the case of some that heretofore you have seen and known, that never deserved hell more than you and that heretofore appeared as likely to have been now alive as you. Their case is past all hope: they are crying in extreme misery and perfect despair. But here you are in the land of the living and in the house of God, and have an opportunity to obtain salvation. What would not those poor, damned, hopeless souls give for one day's such opportunity as you now enjoy! . . .

Are there not many here that have lived long in the world that are not to this day born again, and so are aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and have done nothing ever since they have lived but treasure up wrath against the day of wrath? Oh, sirs, your case in an especial manner is extremely dangerous; your guilt and hardness of heart is extremely great. Don't you see how generally persons of your years are passed over and left in the present remarkable and wonderful dispensation of God's mercy? You had need to consider yourselves and wake thoroughly out of sleep; you cannot bear the fierceness and the wrath of the infinite God.

And you that are young men and young women, will you neglect this precious season that you now enjoy, when so many others of your age are renouncing all youthful vanities and flocking to Christ? You especially have now an extraordinary opportunity; but if you neglect it, it will soon be with you as it is with those persons that spent away all the precious days of youth in sin and are now come to such a dreadful pass in blindness and hardness.

And you children that are unconverted, don't you know that you are going down to hell to bear the dreadful wrath of that God that is now angry with you every day and every night?

Will you be content to be the children of the devil, when so many other children in the land are converted and are become the holy and happy children of the King of kings?

And let every one that is yet out of Christ and hanging over the pit of hell, whether they be old men and women or middle-aged or young people or little children, now hearken to the loud calls of God's word and providence. This acceptable year of the Lord that is a day of such great favor to some will doubtless be a day of as remarkable vengeance to others. Men's hearts harden and their guilt increases apace at such a day as this, if they neglect their souls. And never was there so great danger of such persons being given up to hardness of heart and blindness of mind. God seems now to be hastily gathering in his elect in all parts of the land; and probably the bigger part of adult persons that ever shall be saved will be brought in now in a little time, and that it will be as it was on that great outpouring of the Spirit upon the Jews in the Apostles' days, the election will obtain and the rest will be blinded. If this should be the case with you, you will eternally curse this day, and will curse the day that ever you was born to see such a season of the pouring out of God's Spirit, and will wish that you had died and gone to hell before you had seen it. Now undoubtedly it is as it was in the days of John the Baptist, the axe is in an extraordinary manner laid at the root of the trees, that every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit may be hewn down and cast into the fire.

Therefore let every one that is out of Christ now awake and fly from the wrath to come. The wrath of Almighty God is now undoubtedly hanging over great part of this congregation. Let every one fly out of Sodom. "Haste and escape for your lives, look not behind you, escape to the mountain, lest ye be consumed."

1741 1741

JOHN WOOLMAN 1720-1772

Woolman was exceptional among the eighteenth-century American writers for his gentle sweetness. He was born in the humblest circumstances at Northampton, New Jersey. He was farmer, shop-keeper, tailor, merchant. In 1741 he began to preach as an itinerant evangelist of the Society of Friends, traveling throughout the colonies, and finally to England, where he died at York of smallpox. He wrote a tract, Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes, 1754. His works, including the Journal, were published in 1774-5.

In place of Edwards's gloomy fire of soul, Woolman shows a tolerant, kindly belief in the benevolent intention of the universe. His care for the oppressed, whether bond or free, is the American counterpart of a similar impulse in Wesley, Howard, and Wilberforce, his English contemporaries, which marks the awakening of a broad humanitarianism in Christendom. In his day Quakers were despised for their unorthodox views and their refusal to do military service. People were yet alive who had seen Quakers hanged. In spite of all Franklin's toleration, Woolman and Franklin, neighbor philanthropists, moved in spheres exclusive each of the other. To understand Woolman, and the beauty of his inner life, one must realize the supreme importance he attaches to the inner voice, and man's duty to heed it.

See The Journal of John Woolman with Introduction by J. G. Whittier, 1871.

From A JOURNAL OF JOHN WOOLMAN

From CHAPTER I

[HIS YOUTH]

I have often felt a motion <sup>1</sup> of love to leave some hints in writing of my experience of the goodness of God; and now, in the thirty-sixth year of my age, I begin this work.

I was born in Northampton, in Burlington county, West Jersey, 2 in the year 1720; and before I was seven years old I began to be acquainted with the operations of Divine love. Through the care of my parents, I was taught to read near as soon as I was capable of it; and as I went from school one seventh-day, I remember, while my companions went to play by the way, I went forward out of sight, and sitting down, I read the twenty-second chapter of the Revelation: "He showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the lamb," etc.; and in reading it, my mind was drawn to seek after that pure habitation, which, I then believed, God had prepared for his servants. The place where I sat, and the sweetness that attended my mind, remain fresh in my memory. This, and the like gracious visitations, had that effect upon me, that when boys used ill language, it troubled me; and through the continued mercies of God, I was preserved from it.

The pious instructions of my parents were often fresh in my mind when I happened to be among wicked children, and were of use to me. My parents having a large family

<sup>1</sup> prompting
<sup>2</sup> The territory comprising New Jersey was divided into East and West New Jersey in 1676, Quakers becoming proprietors of West New Jersey. Though the colony was reunited in 1702, the old names were long in use.

of children, used frequently, on first-days, after meeting, to put us to read in the Holy Scriptures, or some religious books, one after another, the rest sitting by without much conversation; which I have since often thought was a good practice. From what I had read and heard, I believed there had been, in past ages, people who walked in uprightness before God, in a degree exceeding any that I knew or heard of, now living; and the apprehension of there being less steadiness and firmness amongst people in this age than in past ages, often troubled me while I was a child.

A thing remarkable in my childhood was, that once, going to a neighbor's house, I saw, on the way, a robin sitting on her nest; and as I came near she went off, but, having young ones, flew about, and with many cries expressed her concern for them. I stood and threw stones at her, till one striking her, she fell down dead. At first I was pleased with the exploit: but after a few minutes was seized with horror as having, in a sportive way, killed an innocent creature while she was careful for her young. I beheld her lying dead, and thought those young ones, for which she was so careful, must now perish for want of their dam to nourish them: and after some painful considerations on the subject, I climbed up the tree, took all the young birds, and killed them, supposing that better than to leave them to pine away and die miserably; and believed, in this case, that Scripture proverb was fulfilled, "The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel." I then went on my errand, but for some hours could think of little else but the cruelties I had com-Thus He mitted, and was much troubled. whose tender mercies are over all his works hath placed a principle in the human mind, which incites to exercise goodness toward every living creature; and this being singly attended to, people become tender-hearted and sympathizing; but being frequently and totally rejected, the mind becomes shut up in a contrary disposition.

About the twelfth year of my age, my father being abroad, 'my mother reproved me for some misconduct, to which I made an undutiful reply; and the next first-day, as I was with my father returning from meeting, he told me he understood I had behaved amiss to my mother, and advised me to be more careful in future. I knew myself blamable, and in shame and confusion remained silent. Being thus awakened to a sense of my wickedness, I felt remorse in my mind, and getting home, I retired and prayed to the Lord to forgive me; and do not remember that I ever, after that, spoke unhandsomely to either of my parents, however foolish in some other things.

<sup>3</sup> the first day of the week; Quaker terminology 4 away from home

I kept steadily to meetings, spent first-days afternoon chiefly in reading the Scriptures, and other good books, and was early convinced in my mind that true religion consisted in an inward life wherein the heart doth love and reverence God the Creator, and learns to exercise true justice and goodness, not only toward all men but also toward the brute creatures: that as the mind is moved by an inward principle to love God as an invisible, incomprehensible Being, by the same principle it is moved to love him in all his manifestations in the visible world: that, as by his breath the flame of life was kindled in all animal sensible creatures, to say we love God as unseen, 1 and, at the same time, exercise cruelty toward the least creature moving by his life, or by life derived from him, was a contradiction in itself. I found no narrowness respecting sects and opinions, but believed that sincere upright-hearted people, in every society, 2 who truly love God, were accepted of him.

As I lived under the cross, and simply followed the openings of Truth, my mind, from day to day, was more enlightened; my former acquaintance were left to judge of me as they would, for I found it safest for me to live in private, and to keep these things sealed up in my own breast. While I silently ponder on that change wrought in me, I find no language equal to it, 3 nor any means to convey to another a clear idea of it. I looked upon the works of God in this visible creation, and an awfulness covered me: my heart was tender and often contrite, and universal love to my fellow-creatures increased in me; this will be understood by such who have trodden in the same path.

Some glances of real beauty may be seen in their faces who dwell in true meekness. There is a harmony in the sound of that voice to which Divine love gives utterance, and some appearance of right order in their temper and conduct whose passions are regulated; yet all these do not fully show forth that inward life to such who have not felt it; but this white stone 4 and new name are known rightly to such only who have them. . . .

From Chapter IV

On the 9th [of May, 1757] breakfasted at a Friend's house, who putting us a little on our way, I had conversation with him in the fear of the Lord, concerning his slaves; in which my heart was tender, and I used much plainness of speech with him, which he appeared to take kindly. We pursued our journey without appointing meetings, being pressed in my mind to be at the Yearly Meeting in Virginia. And in my traveling on the road, I often felt a cry rise from the center of my mind, "O Lord, I am a stranger on the earth, hide not thy face from me." On the 11th day of the fifth month, we crossed the rivers Potomac and Rappahannock, and lodged at Port Royal: and on the way we happening in company with a colonel of the militia, who appeared to be a thoughful man, I took occasion to remark on the difference in general between a people used to labor moderately for their living, training up their children in frugality and business, and those who live on the labor of slaves; the former, in my view, being the most happy life: with which he concurred, and mentioned the trouble arising from the untoward, slothful disposition of the negroes; adding that one of our laborers would do as much in a day as two of their slaves. I replied that free men, whose minds were properly on their business, found a satisfaction in improving, cultivating, and providing for their families; but negroes, laboring to support others, who claim them as their property, and expecting nothing but slavery during life, had not the like inducement to be industrious.

After some further conversation, I said that men having power, too often misapplied it; that though we made slaves of the negroes, and the Turks made slaves of the Christians, I however believed that liberty was the natural right of all men equally; which he did not deny; but said the lives of the negroes were so wretched in their own country, that many of them lived better here than there. I only said, "There is great odds in regard to us, on what principle we act." 5 and so the conversation on that subject ended. I may here add that another person, some time afterward, mentioned the wretchedness of the negroes, occasioned by their intestine wars, as an argument in favor of our fetching them away for slaves; to which I then replied, "If compassion on the Africans, in regard to their domestic troubles, were the real motives of our purchasing them, that spirit of tenderness being attended to, would incite us to use them kindly, that as strangers brought out of affliction, their lives might be happy among us: and as they are human creatures whose souls are as precious as ours, and who may receive the same help and comfort from the holy Scriptures as we do, we could not omit suitable endeavors to instruct them therein. But while we manifest by our conduct, that our views in purchasing them are to advance ourselves: and while our buying captives taken in war, animates those parties to push on that war, and increase desolation amongst them; to say they live unhappy in Africa, is far from being an argument in our favor." I further said. "The present circumstances of these provinces to me appear difficult; that the slaves look like a burthensome stone to such who burthen themselves with them, and if the white people retain a resolution to prefer their outward prospects of gain to all other considerations, and do not act conscientiously toward them as fellow-creatures, I believe that burthen will grow heavier and heavier, until times change in a way disagreeable to us." At this the person appeared very serious, and owned that in considering their condition, and the manner of their treatment in these provinces. he had sometimes thought it might be just in the Almighty so to order it.

<sup>1 1</sup> John iv, 20 2 sect or religion 3 to describe it

<sup>4</sup> Revelation ii, 17

&lt;sup>5</sup> great difference in the principles on which we act (as explained farther on)

. . . The prospect of a road lying open to the same degeneracy, in some parts of this newly settled land of America, in respect to our conduct toward the negroes, hath deeply bowed my mind in this journey; and though to briefly relate how these people are treated is no agreeable work, yet, after often reading over the notes I made as I traveled, I find my mind engaged to preserve them. Many of the white people in those provinces take little or no care of negro marriages; and when negroes marry after their own way, some make so little account of those marriages, that, with views of outward interest, they often part men from their wives by selling them far asunder; which is common when estates are sold by executors at vendue. 2 Many whose labor is heavy being followed at their business in the field by a man with a whip, hired for that purpose, have in common little else allowed but one peck of Indian corn and some salt for one week, with a few potatoes; the potatoes they commonly raise by their labor on the first day of the week.

2 auction

The correction ensuing on their disobedience to overseers, or slothfulness in business, is often very severe, and sometimes desperate.

Men and women have many times scarce clothes enough to hide their nakedness, and boys and girls ten and twelve years old, are often quite naked amongst their master's children. Some of our Society, and some of the society called New Lights. 3 use some endeavors to instruct those they have in reading; but in common this is not only neglected, but disapproved. These are the people by whose labor the other inhabitants are in a great measure supported, and many of them in the luxuries of life: these are the people who have made no agreement to serve us, and who have not forfeited their liberty that we know of: these are the souls for whom Christ died: and for our conduct toward them we must answer before Him who is no respecter of persons.

They who know the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom he hath sent, and are thus acquainted with the merciful, benevolent, Gospel spirit, will therein perceive that the indignation of God is kindled against oppression and cruelty; and in beholding the great distress of so numerous a people will find cause for mourning. . . .

From Chapter VIII

[A VISIT TO THE INDIANS] 4

[We] lodged at Bethlehem: 5 parting there with John. William 6 and we went forward on the 9th day of the sixth month, and got lodging on the floor of a house about five miles from Fort Allen. Here we parted with William. At this place we met with an Indian trader, lately come from Wyoming; 7 and in conversation

5 In 1742 the Moravians, a religious sect of the followers of John Huss, founded Bethlehem in Pennsylvania, where the brotherhood still maintains religious and educational establishments.

God John Pemberton and William Lightfoot, Quakers settled in 1762; in 1778 the scene of a massacre by the British and Indians

&lt;sup>1</sup> He has just spoken of how the Jews became degenerate through love of dominion.

 <sup>3</sup> probably a sect formed in this country in consequence of the preaching of Whitefield, and numerous in Virginia and North Carolina
 4 For many years Woolman had felt love in his heart "towards the natives in this land who dwell far back in the wilderness." Feeling that he might back in the wilderness." Feeling that he might understand them and, as he explains on page 84, bring some message of brotherly sympathy, he resolved to visit them as soon as the way opened. The opportunity came in 1763. The French and Indian War was scarcely over and Pontiac's War was just begun. The journey led him and his companion, Benjamin Parvin, far into the country of the Delaware Indians, many of whom were at the time fighting the English. The selection begins with the first days of the journey. All the places mentioned are in Pennsylvania. sylvania.

with him. I perceived that white people often sell rum to the Indians, which I believe is a great evil: first, they being thereby deprived of the use of their reason, and their spirits violently agitated, quarrels often arise which end in mischief; and the bitterness and resentment occasioned hereby are frequently of long continuance. Again, their skins and furs, gotten through much fatigue and hard travels in hunting, with which they intended to buy clothing, when they become intoxicated they often sell at a low rate for more rum; and afterward, when they suffer for want of the necessaries of life, are angry with those who, for the sake of gain, took the advantage of their weakness. Of this their chiefs have often complained, at their treaties with the English. Where cunning people pass counterfeits, and impose that on others which is good for nothing, it is considered as a wickedness; but to sell that to people which we know does them harm, and which often works their ruin, for the sake of gain, manifests a hardened and corrupt heart, and is an evil which demands the care of all true lovers of virtue to suppress. While my mind this evening was thus employed. I also remembered that the people on the frontiers, among whom this evil is too common, are often poor, who venture to the outside of a colony, that they may live more independent of such as are wealthy, who often set high rents on their land. I was renewedly confirmed in a belief, that if all our inhabitants lived according to sound wisdom, laboring to promote universal love and righteousness, and ceased from every inordinate desire after wealth, and from all customs which are tinctured with luxury, the way would be easy for the inhabitants, though much more numerous than at present, to live comfortably on honest employments, without that temptation they are often under of being drawn into schemes to make settlements on lands which have not been purchased of the Indians, or of applying to that wicked practice of selling rum to them.

On the 10th day of the month [June, 1763] we set out early in the morning, and crossed the western branch of the Delaware, called the Great Lehigh, near Fort Allen; the water being high, we went over in a canoe. Here we met an Indian, and had some friendly conversation with him, and gave him some biscuit; and he having killed a deer, gave the Indians with us some of it. Then after traveling some miles, we met several Indian men and women with a cow and horse and some household goods, who were lately come from their dwelling at Wyoming, and going to settle at another place; we made them some small presents; and some of them understanding English, I told them my motive in coming into their country, with which they appeared satisfied. One of our guides talking awhile with an ancient woman concerning us, the poor old woman came to my companion and me, and took her leave of us with an appearance of sincere affection. So going on we pitched our tent near the banks of the same river, having labored hard in crossing some of those mountains called the Blue Ridge: and by the roughness of the stones and the cavities between them, and the steepness of the hills, it appeared dangerous: but we were preserved in safety, through the kindness of Him whose works in these mountainous deserts appeared awful; toward whom my heart was turned during this day's travel.

Near our tent, on the sides of large trees peeled for that purpose, were various representations of men going to and returning from the wars, and of some killed in battle. This being a path heretofore used by warriors, and as I walked about viewing those Indian histories. which were painted mostly in red but some in black, and thinking on the innumerable afflictions which the proud, fierce spirit produceth in the world: thinking on the toils and fatigues of warriors, traveling over mountains and deserts; thinking on their miseries and distresses when wounded far from home by their enemies: and of their bruises and great weariness in chasing one another over the rocks and mountains: and of their restless, unquiet state of mind, who live in this spirit; and of the hatred which mutually grows up in the minds of the children of those nations engaged in war with each other: during these meditations, the desire to cherish the spirit of love and peace amongst these people, arose very fresh in me. 1 This was the first night that we lodged in the woods; and being wet with traveling in the rain, the ground, our tent, and the bushes which we purposed to lay under, our blankets also wet, all looked discouraging; but I believed that it was the Lord who had thus far brought me forward, and that he would dispose of me as he saw good, and therein I felt easy. So we kindled a fire with our tent open to it; and with some bushes next the ground, and then our blankets, we made our bed; and lying down, got some sleep: and in the morning feeling a little unwell. I went into the river; the water was cold, but soon after I felt fresh and well.

One might read long in colonial records for so sympathetic an attitude toward the Indians, and long in any literature of the time for such an attempt to put oneself in the place of the oppressed.

The 11th day of the sixth month, the bushes being wet, we tarried in our tent till about eight o'clock; when going on, crossed a high mountain supposed to be upward of four miles over; the steepness of the north side exceeding all the others: we also crossed two swamps; and it raining near night, we pitched our tent and lodged.

About noon, on our way we were overtaken by one of the Moravian brethren 1 going to Wehaloosing, 2 and an Indian man with him who could talk English; and we being together while our horses eat grass, had some friendly conversation; but they traveling faster than we, soon left us. This Moravian I understood had spent some time this spring at Wehaloosing; and was by some of the Indians invited to come again.

The 12th day of the sixth month, and first of the week, it being a rainy day, we continued in our tent: and here I was led to think on the nature of the exercise which hath attended me. Love was the first motion, 3 and thence a concern arose to spend some time with the Indians, that I might feel and understand their life and the spirit they live in, if haply I might receive some instruction from them, or they be in any degree helped forward by my following the leadings of Truth amongst them. As it pleased the Lord to make way for my going at a time when the troubles of war were increasing. and when by reason of much wet weather. traveling was more difficult than usual at that season, I looked upon it as a more favorable opportunity to season my mind, and bring me into a nearer sympathy with them: and as mine eve was to the great Father of mercies, humbly desiring to learn what his will was concerning me, I was made quiet and content.

Our guide's horse, though hoppled, went away in the night; and after finding our own, and searching some time for him, his footsteps were discovered in the path going back again, whereupon my kind companion went off in the rain, and after about seven hours returned with him; and here we lodged again, tying up our horses before we went to bed, and loosing them to feed about break of day.

On the 13th day of the sixth month, the sun appearing, we set forward; and as I rode over the barren hills, my meditations were on the alteration in the circumstances of the natives of this land since the coming of the English. The lands near the sea are conven-

 from Bethlehem
 an Indian village, the modern Wyalusing in Bradford County, Pennsylvania

3 primary inner impulse

iently situated for fishing; the lands near the rivers where the tides flow, and some above, are in many places fertile, and not mountainous, while the running of the tides makes passing up and down easy with any kind of traffic. Those natives have in some places, for trifling considerations, sold their inheritance so favorably situated, and in other places been driven back by superior force; so that in many places as their way of clothing themselves is now altered from what it was, and they are far remote from us, they have to pass over mountains, swamps, and barren deserts where traveling is very troublesome, in bringing their skins and furs to trade with us.

By the extending of English settlements, and partly by English hunters, the wild beasts they chiefly depend on for a subsistence are not so plentiful as they were; and people too often, for the sake of gain, open a door for them to waste their skins and furs in purchasing a liquor which tends to the ruin of them and their families. . . .

We reached the Indian settlement at Wyoming, and here we were told that an Indian runner had been at that place a day or two before us, and brought news of the Indians taking an English fort westward and destroying the people, and that they were endeavoring to take another; and also that another Indian runner came there about the middle of the night before we got there, who came from a town about ten miles from Wehaloosing, and brought news that some Indian warriors from distant parts came to that town with two English scalps, and told the people that it was war with the English.

Our guides took us to the house of a very ancient man; and soon after we had put in our baggage, there came a man from another Indian house some distance off, and I perceiving there was a man near the door, went out; and he having a tomahawk under his matchcoat 5 out of sight, as I approached him he took it in his hand. I however went forward, and speaking to him in a friendly way perceived he understood some English: my companion then coming out, we had some talk with him concerning the nature of our visit in these parts; and then he going into the house with us, and talking with our guides, soon appeared friendly, and sat down and smoked his pipe. Though his taking his hatchet in his hand at the instant I drew near to him had a disagreeable appearance, I believe he had no other intent than to be in readiness in case any violence was offered to him. . . .

&lt;sup>4</sup> This was apparently only a rumor, but four or five days later Forts Presque Isle, Le Boeuf, and Venango, as well as posts at Carlisle and Bedford, all in Pennsylvania, were taken by the Indians.
<sup>5</sup> A mantle or coat, originally of furs, worn by Indians; the word is of Indian origin, but printed and pronounced to appear like an English word.

On the 14th day of the sixth month, we sought out and visited all the Indians hereabouts that we could meet with, they being chiefly in one place about a mile from where we lodged, in all perhaps twenty. I expressed the care I had on my mind for their good, and told them that true love had made me willing thus to leave my family to come and see the Indians, and speak with them in their houses. Some of them appeared kind and friendly. So we took our leave of these Indians and went up the river Susquehanna about three miles, to the house of an Indian called Jacob January, who had killed his hog; and the women were making a store of bread, and preparing to move up the river. Here our pilots left their canoe when they came down in the spring, which lying dry, was leaky; so that we being detained some hours, had a good deal of friendly conversation with the family, and eating dinner with them, we made them some small presents. Then putting our baggage in the canoe, some of them pushed slowly up the stream, and the rest of us rode our horses: and swimming them over a creek called Lahawahamunk, we pitched our tent above it, there being a shower in the evening; and in a sense of God's goodness in helping me in my distress, sustaining me under trials and inclining my heart to trust in him, I lay down in an humble, bowed frame of mind, and had a comfortable night's lodging. . . .

On the 17th day, parting from Job Chilaway, we went on and reached Wehaloosing about the middle of the afternoon; and the first Indian we saw was a woman of a modest countenance, with a Bible, who first spake to our guide; and then with a harmonious voice expressed her gladness at seeing us, having before heard of our coming. By the direction of our guide we sat down on a log, and he went to the town to tell the people we were come. My companion and I sitting thus together in a deep inward stillness, the poor woman came and sat near us; and great awfulness coming over us, we rejoiced in a sense of God's love manifested to our poor souls. After a while we heard a conch-shell blow several times, and then came John Curtis 2 and another Indian man, who kindly invited us into a house near the town, where we found, I suppose, about sixty people sitting in silence. After sitting a short time, I stood up and in some tenderness of spirit acquainted them with the nature of my visit, and that a concern for their good had made me willing to come thus far to see them; all in a few short sentences, which some of them understanding interpreted to the others, and there appeared gladness amongst them. Then I showed them my certificate, <sup>3</sup> which was explained to them; and the Moravian who overtook us on the way, being now here, hade me welcome.

<sup>2</sup> an Indian, not mentioned before

On the 18th day we rested ourselves in this forenoon; and the Indians knowing that the Moravian and I were of different religious societies, and as some of their people had encouraged him to come and stay awhile with them, were, I believe, concerned that no jarring or discord might be in their meetings; and they I suppose, having conferred together, acquainted me that the people at my request. would at any time come together and hold meetings; and also told me, that they expected the Moravian would speak in their settled meetings, which are commonly held morning and near evening. I found a liberty in my heart to speak to the Moravian, and told him of the care I felt on my mind for the good of these people; and that I believed no ill effects would follow if I sometimes spoke in their meetings when love engaged me thereto. without calling them together at times when they did not meet of course: whereupon he expressed his goodwill toward my speaking at any time, all that I found in my heart to say. So near evening I was at their meeting, where the pure Gospel love was felt, to the tendering 4 of some of our hearts; and the interpreters endeavoring to acquaint the people with what I said in short sentences, found some difficulty. as none of them were quite perfect in the English and Delaware tongues, so they helped one another, and we labored along, Divine love attending. Afterward, feeling my mind covered with the spirit of prayer, I told the interpreters that I found it in my heart to pray to God, and believed if I prayed aright, he would hear me, and expressed my willingness for them to omit interpreting; so our meeting ended with a degree of Divine love. Before the people went out, I observed Papunehang, the man who had been zealous in laboring for a reformation in that town, being then very tender, 5 spoke to one of the interpreters; and I was afterward told that he said in substance: "I love to feel where words come from." 1

&lt;sup>1</sup> an Indian from Wehaloosing who understood English and had met and befriended them before

<sup>3</sup> his credentials from the Society of Friends; carried by all those sent out by the Quakers

<sup>4</sup> the making tender 5 much moved

On the 19th day and first of the week, this morning in the meeting the Indian who came with the Moravian, being also a member of that society, prayed; and then the Moravian spake a short time to the people. In the afternoon they coming together, and my heart being filled with a heavenly care for their good, I spake to them awhile by interpreters; but none of them being perfect in the work, and I feeling the current of love run strong, told the interpreters that I believed some of the people would understand me, and so I proceeded. In which exercise, I believe the Holy Ghost wrought on some hearts to edification, where all the words were not understood. I looked upon it as a time of divine favor, and my heart was tendered and truly thankful before the Lord; and after I sat down, one of the interpreters seemed spirited 2 to give the Indians the substance of what I had said

Before our first meeting this morning, I was led to meditate on the manifold difficulties of these Indians, 3 who, by the permission of the Six Nations dwell in these parts; and a near sympathy with them was raised in me, and my heart being enlarged in the love of Christ, I thought that the affectionate care of a good man for his only brother in affliction does not exceed what I then felt for that people. I came to this place through much trouble; and though through the mercies of God, I believed that if I died in the journey, it would be well with me, yet the thoughts of falling into the hands of Indian warriors, were in times of weakness afflicting to me; and being of a tender constitution of body, the thoughts of captivity amongst them were at times grievous; as supposing that they, being strong and hardy, might demand service of me beyond what I could well bear; but the Lord alone was my keeper, and I believed if I went into captivity it would be for some good end; and thus from time to time, my mind was centred in resignation, in which I always found quietness. And now, this day, though I had the same dangerous wilderness between me and home, I was inwardly joyful that the Lord had strengthened me to come on this visit, and manifested a fatherly care over me in my poor lowly condition, when in mine own eyes I appeared inferior to many amongst the Indians.

<sup>2</sup> inspired, prompted
<sup>3</sup> These were the Delawares, of Algonquin stock, who had been subdued by the Six Nations, or Iroquois, and were allowed by them to live in these parts only upon humiliating terms.

When the last-mentioned meeting was ended, it being night, Papunehang went to bed; and one of the interpreters sitting by me, I observed that Papunehang spake with an harmonious voice, I suppose, a minute or two: and asking the interpreter, was told that 'he was expressing his thankfulness to God for the favors he had received that day; and prayed that he would continue to favor him with that same which he had experienced in that meeting." Though Papunehang had before agreed to receive the Moravians and join with them, he still appeared kind and loving to us....

The 21st day. This morning in meeting, my heart was enlarged in pure love amongst them, and in short plain sentences expressed several things that rested upon me, which one of the interpreters gave the people pretty readily; after which the meeting ended in supplication, and I had cause humbly to acknowledge the loving-kindness of the Lord toward us; and then I believed that a door remained open for the faithful disciples of Jesus Christ to labor amongst these people.

I now feeling my mind at liberty to return, took my leave of them in general, at the conclusion of what I said in meeting; and so we prepared to go homeward: but some of their most active men told us, that when we were ready to move, the people would choose to come and shake hands with us; which those who usually came to meeting did; and from a secret draught in my mind, I went amongst some who did not use to go to meeting, and took my leave of them also.

From CHAPTER XI

[VOYAGE TO ENGLAND]

Having been some time under a religious concern 5 to prepare for crossing the seas in order to visit Friends in the northern parts of England, and more particularly in Yorkshire; after weighty consideration, I thought it expedient to inform Friends at our Monthly Meeting at Burlington of it; who having unity with me therein, gave me a certificate. And I afterward communicated the same to our Quarterly Meeting, and they likewise certified their concurrence therewith. Some time after which, at the General Spring Meeting of ministers and elders, I thought it my duty to acquaint them

This was significant to Woolman and accorded with his Quaker belief that the divine message comes into man's heart direct from its source—that the spirit may apprehend without words.

&lt;sup>4</sup> drawing, inclination <sup>5</sup> solicitude amounting to obligation of the religious exercise which attended my mind; with which they likewise signified their unity by a certificate, dated the 24th day of the third month, 1772, directed to Friends in Great Britain. . . .

I believe a communication by sea from one part of the world to some other parts of it is at times consistent with the will of our heavenly Father, and to educate some youth in the practice of sailing, I believe may be right. But how lamentable is the present corruption of the world! how impure are the channels through which trade hath a conveyance! how great is that danger to which poor lads are now exposed, when placed on shipboard to learn the art of sailing!

Five lads training up for the seas were now on board this ship, two of them brought up amongst our Society, and one of whom hath a right amongst Friends, by name James Nayler, to whose father, James Nayler, mentioned in Sewel's <sup>1</sup> History appears to have been uncle. I often feel a tenderness of heart toward these poor lads; and at times look at them as though they were my children according to the flesh.

O that all may take heed and beware of covetousness! O that all may learn of Christ, who was meek and low of heart! then in faithfully following him, he will teach us to be content with food and raiment, without respect to the customs or honors of this world. Men thus redeemed, will feel a tender concern for their fellow creatures, and a desire that those in the lowest stations may be assisted and encouraged; and where owners of ships attain to the perfect law of liberty, and are doers of the word, these will be blessed in their deeds.

A ship at sea commonly sails all night, and the seamen take their watches four hours at a time. Rising to work in the night, is not commonly pleasant in any case; but in dark rainy nights it is very disagreeable, even though each man were furnished with all conveniences. But if men must go out at midnight to help manage the ship in the rain, and having small room to sleep and lay their garments in, are often beset to furnish themselves for the watch; their garments or something relating to their business being wanting, and not easily found, when from the urgency occasioned by high winds, they are hastened and called up suddenly,—here is a trial of patience on the poor sailors, and the poor lads their companions.

If after they have been on deck several hours in the night and come down into the steerage soaking wet, and are so closely stowed that proper convenience for change of garment is not easily come at, but for want of proper room their wet garments thrown in heaps, and sometimes, through much crowding, are trodden under foot, in going to their lodgings and getting out of them, and great difficulties at times, each one to find his own,—here are trials on the poor sailors.

Now as I have been with them in my lodge, 2 my heart hath often yearned for them, and tender desires been raised in me, that all owners and masters of vessels may dwell in the love of God, and therein act uprightly; and by seeking less for gain, and looking carefully to their ways, may earnestly labor to remove all cause of provocation from the poor seamen, either to fret or use excess of strong drink; for indeed the poor creatures at times, in the wet and cold, seem to apply to strong drink to supply the want of other conveniences. Great reformation in the world is wanting, and the necessity of it amongst those who do business on great waters, hath at this time been abundantly opened before me.

The 8th day of the fifth month. This morning the clouds gathered, the wind blew strong from the south-eastward, and before noon increased to a degree that made sailing appear dangerous. The seamen then bound up some of their sails and took down some; and the storm increasing, they put the dead lights, so called, into the cabin windows, and lighted a lamp as at night. The wind now blew vehemently, and the sea wrought to such a degree that an awful seriousness prevailed in the cabin, in which I spent, I believe, about seventeen hours; for I believed the poor wet toiling seamen had need of all the room in the crowded steerage, and the cabin passengers had given me frequent invitations. They ceased now from sailing, and put the vessel in the posture called lying-to.

My mind in this tempest, through the gracious assistance of the Lord, was preserved in a good degree of resignation; and I felt at times a few words in his love to my ship-mates, in regard to the all-sufficiency of Him who formed the great deep, and whose care is so extensive that a sparrow falls not without his notice. Thus in a tender frame of mind I spoke to them of the necessity of our yielding, in true obedience, to the instructions of our heavenly Father, who sometimes through adversities intendeth our refinement.

Sewel, William: The History of the Rise, Increase ... of the People Called Quakers. Printed in Dutch, Amsterdam, 1717; in English, London, 1722

&lt;sup>2</sup> He took passage in the forecastle, with the sailors, going on board May 1, 1772.

About eleven o'clock at night I went out on the deck, when the sea wrought exceedingly, and the high foaming waves, all around, had in some sort the appearance of fire, but did not give much, if any, light. The sailor then at the helm said he lately saw a corposant 1 at the head of the mast. About this time I observed the master of the ship ordered the carpenter to keep on the deck; and though he said little, I apprehended his care was that the carpenter with his axe might be in readiness in case of any extremity. Soon after this, the vehemency of the wind abated, and before morning they again put the ship under sail.

The 2nd day of the sixth month. Last evening the seamen found bottom at about seventy fathoms. This morning there was a fair wind, and pleasant. And as I sat on deck my heart was overcome with the love of Christ and melted into contrition before him; and in this state, the prospect of that work, to which I have felt my mind drawn when in my native land, being in some degree opened before me, I felt like a little child; and my cries were put up to my heavenly Father for preservation, that in an humble dependence on him, my soul may be strengthened in his love, and kept inwardly waiting for his counsel.

This afternoon we saw that part of England called the Lizard. Some dunghill fowls yet remained of those the passengers took for their sea-store: I believe about fourteen perished in the storms at sea, by the waves breaking over the quarter-deck, and a considerable number with sickness, at different times. I observed the cocks crew coming down the Delaware, and while we were near the land; but afterward, I think I did not hear one of them crow till we came near the land in England, when they again crowed a few times.

In observing their dull appearance at sea, and the pining sickness of some of them, I often remembered the fountain of goodness, who gave being to all creatures, and whose love extends to caring for the sparrows; and I believe where the love of God is verily perfected, and the true spirit of government watchfully attended to, a tenderness toward all creatures made subject to us will be experienced, and a care felt in us that we do not lessen that sweetness of life, in the animal creation, which the great Creator intends for them under our government.

The 4th day of the month. Wet weather, high winds, and so dark that we could see but a little way. I perceived our seamen were apprehensive of missing the channel which I understood was narrow. In a while it grew lighter, and they saw the land, and they knew where we were. Thus the Father of mercies was pleased to try us with the sight of dangers, and then graciously from time to time deliver from them; thus sparing our lives, that in humility and reverence we may walk before him, and put our trust in him.

About noon a pilot came off from Dover, where my beloved friend Samuel Emlen <sup>2</sup> went on shore, and thence to London, about seventy-two miles by land; but I felt easy in staying in the ship.

The 7th day of the month, and first of the week. . . . Had a head wind up the Thames; sometimes lay at anchor, and saw many ships passing, and some at anchor near, and had large opportunity of feeling the spirit in which the poor bewildered sailors too generally live. That lamentable degeneracy, which so much prevails among the people employed on the seas, so affected my heart that I may not easily convey to another the feeling I have had.

The present state of the sea-faring life in general, appears so opposite to that of a pious education; so full of corruption, and extreme alienation from God; so full of examples the most dangerous to young people, that in looking toward a young generation, I feel a care for them, that they may have an education different from the present education of lads at sea; and that all of us who are acquainted with the pure Gospel spirit, may lay this case to heart, may remember the lamentable corruptions which attend the conveyance of merchandise across the seas, and so abide in the love of Christ, that being delivered from the love of money, from the entangling expenses of a curious, delicate, and luxurious life, we may learn contentment with a little; and promote the sea-faring life no further, than that spirit which leads into all truth attends us in our proceedings.

From CHAPTER XII

[AN EXPERIENCE DURING SICKNESS]

In a time of sickness with the pleurisy, a little upward of two years and a half ago, I was brought so near the gates of death that I forgot my name: being then desirous to know who I was, I saw a mass of matter of a dull

a ball of light, sometimes seen during a storm

<sup>2</sup> the friend with whom he had crossed

gloomy color, between the south and the east. and was informed that this mass was human beings in as great misery as they could be, and live; and that I was mixed in with them, and that henceforth I might not consider myself as a distinct or separate being. In this state I remained several hours. I then heard a soft melodious voice, more pure and harmonious than any I had heard before. I believed it was the voice of an angel who spake to the other angels, and the words were these. John Woolman is dead. I soon remembered that I once was John Woolman; and being assured that I was alive in the body. I greatly wondered what that heavenly voice could mean. I believed beyond doubting that it was the voice of an holy angel: but as yet it was a mystery to me.

I was then carried in spirit to the mines where poor oppressed people were digging rich treasures for those called Christians; and I heard them blaspheme the name of Christ, at which I was grieved: for his name to me was precious. Then I was informed that these heathens were told that those who oppressed them were the followers of Christ; and they said amongst themselves, "If Christ directed them to use us in this sort, then Christ is a cruel tvrant." All this time the song of the angel remained a mystery; and in the morning, my dear wife and some others coming to my bedside. I asked them if they knew who I was: and they telling me I was John Woolman, thought I was light-headed: for I told them not what the angel said, nor was I disposed to talk much to any one, but was very desirous to get so deep that I might understand this mystery.

My tongue was often so dry that I could not speak till I had moved it about and gathered some moisture, and as I lay still for a time, at length I felt Divine power prepare my mouth that I could speak; and then I said, "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life that I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

Then the mystery was opened; and I perceived there was joy in heaven over a sinner who had repented; and that that language (John Woolman is dead) meant no more than the death of my own will. <sup>1</sup>

[CLEANLINESS]

Having of late traveled <sup>2</sup> often in wet weather through narrow streets in towns and villages where were dirtiness under foot, and the scent arising from that filth which more or less infects the air of all thickly settled towns, and I being but weakly, have felt distress both in body and mind, with that which is impure.

In these journeys I have been where much cloth hath been dved, and sundry times walked over ground where much of the dye stuffs have drained away. Here I have felt a longing in my mind that people might come into cleanness of spirit, cleanness of person, and cleanness about their houses and garments. Some who are great carry delicacy to a great height themselves, and vet real cleanliness is not generally promoted. Dyes being invented partly to please the eve and partly to hide dirt, I have felt in this weak state, traveling in dirtiness and affected with unwholesome scents, a strong desire that the practice of dyeing cloth to hide dirt may be more fully considered. To hide dirt in our garments appears opposite to real cleanliness. To wash garments and keep them sweet, appears cleanly. Through giving way to hiding dirt in our garments, a spirit which would cover that which is disagreeable is strengthened. Real cleanness becometh a holy people, but hiding that which is not clean by coloring our garments appears contrary to the sweetness of sincerity. Through some sorts of dyes, cloth is less useful; and if the value of dve-stuffs, the expense of dveing, and the damage done to cloth were all added together, and that expense applied to keep all sweet and clean, how much more cleanly would people be.

1756-1772 1774-5

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN 1706-1790

The first American writer to be read widely abroad, as well as the first to be universally read in America was Franklin, who was born and reared in Boston under strict Puritan influences, but lived much of his life in Philadelphia, London, and Paris, and became the most widely experienced citizen of the nation he helped to form. His services at home and abroad were rendered in the spirit of a practical philanthropist and public servant. His interests extended from the sweeping of streets, the warming of houses, the founding of schools and libraries, to experiments in and application of electric science, and to the affairs of nations. He was agent in London for the colonies of Pennsylvania. Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Georgia, and general spokesman for America before the British government. He was one of the committee to draft the Declaration of Independence. Almost immediately he was sent as special agent to France, where, largely through his wit, good sense, and personal popularity, he was of inestimable service to the colonies. He was made member and medalist of the Royal Society, 1753, LL.D. of the Universities of Edinburgh and Oxford, 1762, and president (governor) of Pennsylvania, 1785-1788. Franklin wrote his autobiography during short intervals of leisure in the last twenty years of his life. The first parts were intended for his family only. The latter parts were written for possible publication. Though written with no artistic intent, the book is of absorbing interest, truly modern in spirit, and truly native to the soil, the story of the first ambitious, industrious, "self-made" American who has left a record of himself. Franklin's published works consisted of essays, scientific and political pamphlets, monographs, and reports. The most complete edition of these, together with his letters and autobiography, was published in ten volumes. 1910.

&lt;sup>1</sup> However this experience might be explained and classified by psychology, to Woolman it was of vital importance.

&lt;sup>2</sup> In England; these paragraphs are under the last date of entry in his journal. Three weeks later he died of smallpox.

Franklin was the first noteworthy American writer to come under Addison's influence. (See p. 92.) The style that he attained is probably more like Defoe's than Addison's, clear, direct, unemotional, lacking the imagination and urbanity of the Spectator, but possessing a humor of which Defoe is void, and graced with the mellowness of age and the ripeness of experience that a broad contact with men and affairs alone can give. In the graceful and fanciful "bagatelles" (See p. 112.) written late in life under the influence of French refinement and wit there is an indication of what graces of style Franklin might have acquired had his life been cast in different outward circumstances. But we need not lament Franklin's limitations: his robust directness of speech was tonic to his countrymen. Americans, moreover, will always be debtors to his forward-looking constructive bent of mind, his keenly curious and sagacious intellect, and his gift of humor. His humor is often of the pioneer type reflecting the attitude of one who uses it as a shield, one quite aware that he must meet life cheerfully or else succumb. In this aspect Franklin is the first of a long line of American humorists chief among whom is Mark Twain. Universally read as he was, he doubtless had an influence on American expression of which the epigrammatic terseness of Emerson is perhaps one result.

Biography: P. Russell, Benjamin Franklin, The First Civilized American, 1926; J. T. Morse (AS); L. Swift (BB); J. B. McMaster (AML). Criticism: Sherman; More (Shel. 4); Chubb; M. Tudury, "Poor Richard," Bookm. 64:580-4; P. Guedalla, "Dr. Ben Franklin," Forum 75:37-49; R. Bache, "Apprentice Comes to Philadelphia," Outlook, 133:133-135; H. S. Pritchett, "Tale of Two Cities," Scrib. M. 76:470-5; A. D. Dickinson, "Benjamin Franklin, Bookman," Bookm. 53:197-205.

From his AUTOBIOGRAPHY

Twyford at the Bishop of St. Asaph's, 1771

Dear Son: 1 I have ever had pleasure in obtaining any little anecdotes of my ancestors. You may remember the inquiries I made among the remains of my relations when you were with me in England, and the journey I undertook for that purpose. Imagining it may be equally agreeable to you to know the circumstances of my life, many of which you are yet unacquainted with, and expecting the enjoyment of a week's uninterrupted leisure in my present country retirement, 2 I sit down to write them for you. To which I have besides some other inducements. Having emerged from the poverty and obscurity in which I was born and bred, to a state of affluence and some degree of reputation in the world, and having gone so far through life with a considerable share of felicity, the conducing means I made use of, which with the blessing of God so well succeeded, my posterity may like to know, as they may find some of them suitable to their own situations, and therefore fit to be imitated.

That felicity, when I reflected on it, has induced me sometimes to say, that were it offered to my choice, I should have no objection to a repetition of the same life from its beginning, only asking the advantages authors have in a second edition to correct some faults of the first. So I might, besides correcting the faults, change some sinister accidents and events of it for others more favorable. But though this were denied, I should still accept the offer. Since such a repetition is not to be expected, the next thing most like living one's life over again seems to be a recollection of that life, and to make that recollection as durable as possible by putting it down in writing.

Hereby, too, I shall indulge the inclination so natural in old men, to be talking of themselves and their own past actions; and I shall indulge it without being tiresome to others, who, through respect to age, might conceive themselves obliged to give me a hearing, since this may be read or not as anyone pleases. And, lastly (I may as well confess it, since my denial of it will be believed by nobody), perhaps I shall a good deal gratify my own vanity. Indeed, I scarce ever heard or saw the introductory words, "Without vanity I may say," etc., but some vain thing immediately followed. Most people dislike vanity in others, whatever share they have of it themselves; but I give it

William Franklin, royalist governor of New Jersey as guest of Dr. Jonathan Shipley, bishop of St. Asaph's, at Twyford, Hampshire, England

fair quarter wherever I meet with it, being persuaded that it is often productive of good to the possessor, and to others that are within his sphere of action; and therefore in many cases, it would not be altogether absurd if a man were to thank God for his vanity among the other comforts of life. . . .

Josiah, my father, married young, and carried his wife with three children into New England, about 1682. The conventicles 1 having been forbidden by law, and frequently disturbed, induced some considerable men of his acquaintance to remove to that country, and he was prevailed with to accompany them thither, where they expected to enjoy their mode of religion with freedom. By the same wife he had four children more born there, and by a second wife ten more, in all seventeen; of which I remember thirteen sitting at one time at his table, who all grew up to be men and women, and married: I was the youngest son, and the youngest child but two, and was born in Boston. New England. My mother, the second wife, was Abiah Folger, daughter of Peter Folger, one of the first settlers of New England, of whom honorable mention is made by Cotton Mather, in his church history of that country, entitled Magnalia Christi Americana, as "a godly, learned Englishman," if I remember the words rightly. I have heard that he wrote sundry small occasional pieces, but only one of them was printed, which I saw now many years since. It was written in 1675, in the homespun verse of that time and people, and addressed to those then concerned in the government there. It was in favor of liberty of conscience, and in behalf of the Baptists, Quakers, and other sectaries that had been under persecution, ascribing the Indian wars, and other distresses that had befallen the country, to that persecution, as so many judgments of God to punish so heinous an offense, and exhorting a repeal of those uncharitable laws. The whole appeared to me as written with a good deal of decent plainness and manly freedom. The six concluding lines I remember, though I have forgotten the two first of the stanza; but the purport of them was, that his censures proceeded from good-will, and therefore he would be known to be the author.

"Because to be a libeller (says he)
I hate it with my heart;
From Sherburne town, where now I dwell
My name I do put here;
Without offense your real friend,
It is Peter Folgier."

My elder brothers were all put apprentices to different trades. I was put to the grammar school at eight years of age, my father intending to devote me, as the tithe 2 of his sons, to the service of the Church. My early readiness in learning to read (which must have been very early, as I do not remember when I could not read), and the opinion of all his friends that I should certainly make a good scholar, encouraged him in this purpose of his. My uncle Benjamin, too, approved of it, and proposed to give me all his short-hand volumes of sermons, I suppose as a stock to set up with, if I would learn his character. 3 I continued, however, at the grammar school not quite one year, though in that time I had risen gradually from the middle of the class of that year to be the head of it, and farther was removed into the next class above it, in order to go with that into the third at the end of the year. But my father, in the mean time, from a view of the expense of a college education, which having so large a family he could not well afford, and the mean living many so educated were afterwards able to obtain-reasons that he gave to his friends in my hearing-altered his first intention, took me from the grammar school, and sent me to a school for writing and arithmetic, kept by a then famous man, Mr. George Brownell, very successful in his profession generally, and that by mild, encouraging methods. Under him I acquired fair writing pretty soon, but I failed in the arithmetic, and made no progress in it. At ten years old I was taken home to assist my father in his business, which was that of a tallow-chandler and soap-boiler; a business he was not bred to, but had assumed on his arrival in New England, and on finding his dyeing trade would not maintain his family, being in little request. Accordingly, I was employed in cutting wick for the candles, filling the dipping mould and the moulds for cast candles, attending the shop, going of errands, etc.

I disliked the trade, and had a strong inclination for the sea, but my father declared against it; however, living near the water, I was much in and about it, learned early to swim well, and to manage boats; and when in a boat or canoe with other boys, I was commonly allowed to govern, especially in any case of difficulty; and upon other occasions I was generally a leader among the boys, and sometimes led them into scrapes, of which I will mention one instance, as it shows an early projecting public spirit, though not then justly conducted.

&lt;sup>1</sup> religious meetings, especially of persons dissenting from doctrines of the church of England

&lt;sup>2</sup> tenth, or one of ten (in reference to the Jewish custom of giving to Jehovah one tenth of all income)
<sup>3</sup> system of short-hand

There was a salt-marsh that bounded part of the mill-pond, on the edge of which, at high water, we used to stand to fish for minnows. By much trampling, we had made it a mere quagmire. My proposal was to build a wharf there fit for us to stand upon, and I showed my comrades a large heap of stones, which were intended for a new house near the marsh, and which would very well suit our purpose. Accordingly, in the evening, when the workmen were gone, I assembled a number of my playfellows, and working with them diligently, like so many emmets, sometimes two or three to a stone, we brought them all away and built our little wharf. The next morning the workmen were surprised at missing the stones, which were found in our wharf. Inquiry was made after the removers; we were discovered and complained of: several of us were corrected by our fathers; and, though I pleaded the usefulness of the work, mine convinced me that nothing was useful which was not honest.

I think you may like to know something of his person and character. He had an excellent constitution of body, was of middle stature, but well set, and very strong; he was ingenious, could draw prettily, was skilled a little in music, and had a clear, pleasing voice, so that when he played psalm tunes on his violin and sung withal, as he sometimes did in an evening after the business of the day was over, it was extremely agreeable to hear. He had a mechanical genius, too, and, on occasion, was very handy in the use of other tradesmen's tools; but his great excellence lay in a sound understanding and solid judgment in prudential matters, both in private and public affairs. In the latter, indeed, he was never employed, the numerous family he had to educate and the straitness of his circumstances keeping him close to his trade; but I remember well his being frequently visited by leading people, who consulted him for his opinion in affairs of the town or of the church he belonged to, and showed a good deal of respect for his judgment and advice; he was also much consulted by private persons about their affairs when any difficulty occurred, and frequently chosen an arbitrator between contending parties. At his table he liked to have, as often as he could, some sensible friend or neighbor to converse with, and always took care to start some ingenious or useful topic for discourse, which might tend to improve the minds of his children. By this means he turned our attention to what was good, just, and prudent in the conduct of life; and little or no notice was ever taken of what related to the victuals on the table, whether it was well or ill dressed, in or out of season, of good or bad flavor, preferable or inferior to this or that other thing of the kind, so that I was brought up in such a perfect inattention to those matters as to be quite indifferent what kind of food was set before me, and so unobservant of it, that to this day if I am asked I can scarce tell a few hours after dinner what I dined upon. This has been a convenience to me in traveling, where my companions have been sometimes very unhappy for want of a suitable gratification of their more delicate, because better instructed, tastes and appetites.

My mother had likewise an excellent constitution; she suckled all her ten children. I never knew either my father or mother to have any sickness but that of which they died, he at 89, and she at 85 years of age. They lie buried together at Boston, where I some years since placed a marble over their grave, with this inscription:

JOSIAH FRANKLIN and ARIAH his wife. lie here interred. They lived lovingly together in wedlock fifty-five years. Without an estate, or any gainful employment, by constant labor and industry, with God's blessing, they maintained a large family comfortably. and brought up thirteen children and seven grandchildren reputably. From this instance, reader, be encouraged to diligence in thy calling, be encouraged to diligence in thy calling and distrust not Providence.

He was a pious and prudent man; she, a discreet and virtuous woman.

Their youngest son, in filial regard to their memory, places this stone.

J. F. born 1655, died 1744, Ætat 89.

J. F. born 1655, died 1744, Ætat 89.
A. F. born 1667, died 1752, — 85.

By my rambling digressions I perceive myself to be grown old. I used to write more methodically. But one does not dress for private company as for a public ball. 'Tis perhaps only negligence.

To return: I continued thus employed in my father's business for two years, that is, till I was twelve years old; and my brother John, who was bred to that business, having left my father, married, and set up for himself at Rhode Island, there was all appearance that I was destined to supply his place, and become a tallow-chandler. But my dislike to the trade continuing, my father was under apprehensions that if he did not find one for me more agreeable. I should break away and get to sea, as his son Iosiah had done, to his great vexation. He therefore sometimes took me to walk with him, and see joiners, bricklayers, turners, braziers, etc., at their work, that he might observe my inclination and endeavor to fix it on some trade or other on land. It has ever since been a pleasure to me to see good workmen handle their tools, and it has been useful to me, having learned so much by it as to be able to do little jobs myself in my house when a workman could not readily be got, and to construct little machines for my experiments, while the intention of making the experiment was fresh and warm in my mind. My father at last fixed upon the cutler's trade, and my uncle Benjamin's son Samuel, who was bred to that business in London, being about that time established in Boston, I was sent to be with him some time on liking. But his expectations of a fee 1 with me displeasing my father, I was taken home again.

From a child I was fond of reading, and all the little money that came into my hands was ever laid out in books. Pleased with the Pilgrim's Progress, my first collection was of John Bunyan's works in separate little volumes. I afterward sold them to enable me to buy R. Burton's Historical Collections; they were small chapmen's 2 books, and cheap, 40 or 50 in all. My father's little library consisted chiefly of books in polemic divinity, most of which I read. and have since often regretted that, at a time when I had such a thirst for knowledge, more proper books had not fallen in my way, since it was now resolved I should not be a clergyman. Plutarch's Lives there was in which I read abundantly, and I still think that time spent to great advantage. There was also a book of Defoe's, called an Essay on Projects, and another of Dr. Mather's called Essays to do Good, 3 which perhaps gave me a turn of thinking that had an influence on some of the principal future events of my life.

This bookish inclination at length determined my father to make me a printer, though he had already one son (James) of that profession. In 1717 my brother James returned from England with a press and letters to set up his business in Boston. I liked it much better than that of my father, but still had a hankering for the sea. To prevent the apprehended effect of such an inclination, my father was impatient to have me bound to my brother. I stood out some time, but at last was persuaded, and signed the indentures when I was yet but twelve years old. I was to serve as an apprentice till I was twentyone years of age, only I was to be allowed journeyman's wages during the last year. In a little time I made great proficiency in the business, and became a useful hand to my brother. I now had access to better books. An acquaintance with the apprentices of booksellers enabled me sometimes to borrow a small one. which I was careful to return soon and clean. Often I sat up in my room reading the greatest part of the night, when the book was borrowed in the evening and to be returned early in the morning, lest it should be missed or wanted.

And after some time an ingenious tradesman, 4 Mr. Matthew Adams, who had a pretty 5 collection of books, and who frequented our printing-house, took notice of me, invited me to his library, and very kindly lent me such books as I chose to read. I now took a fancy to poetry, and made some little pieces; my brother, thinking it might turn to account, encouraged me, and put me on composing occasional ballads. One was called The Lighthouse Tragedy, and contained an account of the drowning of Captain Worthilake, with his two daughters; the other was a sailor's song, on the taking of Teach 6 (or Blackbeard) the pirate. They were wretched stuff, in the Grubstreet-ballad style; 7 and when they were printed he sent me about the town to sell them. The first sold wonderfully, the event being recent, having made a great noise. This flattered my vanity; but my father discouraged me by ridiculing my performances, and telling me verse-makers were generally beggars. escaped being a poet, most probably a very bad one; but as prose writing has been of great use to me in the course of my life, and was a principal means of my advancement, I shall tell you how, in such a situation, I acquired what little ability I have in that way.

Apprentices or their guardians were often required to pay a fee to the master served, in addition to the services rendered.

&lt;sup>2</sup> peddlers'
<sup>3</sup> The title is Bonifacius. An Essay, etc.

intelligent shopkeeper or, perhaps, mechanic

Trather fine

Edward Teach or Thatch, "Blackbeard," was trapped and killed on the Carolina coast in 1718.

in the style of the hack writers who lived in Grub Street, London

There was another bookish lad in the town. John Collins by name, with whom I was intimately acquainted. We sometimes disputed, and very fond we were of argument, and very desirous of confuting one another, which disputatious turn, by the way, is apt to become a very bad habit, making people often extremely disagreeable in company by the contradiction that is necessary to bring it into practice; and thence, besides souring and spoiling the conversation, is productive of disgusts and perhaps enmities where you may have occasion for friendship. I had caught it by reading my father's books of dispute about religion. Persons of good sense, I have since observed, seldom fall into it, except lawyers, university men, and men of all sorts that have been bred at Edinburgh. 1

A question was once, somehow or other, started between Collins and me, of the propriety of educating the female sex in learning, and their abilities for study. 2 He was of opinion that it was improper, and that they were naturally unequal to it. I took the contrary side, perhaps a little for dispute's sake. He was naturally more eloquent, had a ready plenty of words; and sometimes, as I thought, bore me down more by his fluency than by the strength of his reasons. As we parted without settling the point, and were not to see one another again for some time, I sat down to put my arguments in writing, which I copied fair and sent to him. He answered, and I replied. Three or four letters of a side had passed, when my father happened to find my papers and read them. Without entering into the discussion, he took occasion to talk to me about the manner of my writing; observed that, though I had the advantage of my antagonist in correct spelling and pointing (which I owed to the printing-house), I fell far short in elegance of expression, in method, and in perspicuity, of which he convinced me by several instances. I saw the justice of his remarks, and thence grew more attentive to the manner in writing, and determined to endeavor at improvement.

About this time I met with an odd volume of the Spectator. It was the third. I had never before seen any of them. I bought it, read it over and over, and was much delighted with it. I thought the writing excellent, and wished, if possible, to imitate it. With this view I took some of the papers, and, making short hints of the sentiment in each sentence, laid them by a few days, and then, without looking at the book, tried to complete the papers again. by expressing each hinted sentiment at length, and as fully as it had been expressed before, in any suitable words that should come to hand. Then I compared my Spectator with the original, discovered some of my faults, and corrected them. 8 But I found I wanted 4 a stock of words, or a readiness in recollecting and using them, which I thought I should have acquired before that time if I had gone on making verses: since the continual occasion for words of the same import, but of different length, to suit the measure, or of different sound for the rime, would have laid me under a constant necessity of searching for variety, and also have tended to fix that variety in my mind, and make me master of it. Therefore I took some of the tales and turned them into verse; and, after a time, when I had pretty well forgotten the prose, turned them back again. I also sometimes jumbled my collections of hints into confusion, and after some weeks endeavored to reduce them into the best order, before I began to form the full sentences and complete the This was to teach me method in the arrangement of thoughts. By comparing my work afterwards with the original, I discovered many faults and amended them; but I sometimes had the pleasure of fancying that, in certain particulars of small import, I had been lucky enough to improve the method or the language, and this encouraged me to think I might possibly in time come to be a tolerable English writer, of which I was extremely ambitious. My time for these exercises and for reading was at night, after work, or before it began in the morning, or on Sundays. . . . And now it was that, being on some occasion made ashamed of my ignorance in figures, which I had twice failed in learning when at school, I took Cocker's book of arithmetic, and went through the whole by myself with great ease. I also read Seller's and Shermy's books of navigation, and became acquainted with the little geometry they contain; but never proceeded far in that science. And I read about this time Locke 5 On Human Understanding,

&lt;sup>4</sup> Even the good-natured Franklin must have a characteristic eighteenth century fling at the Scotch.
<sup>2</sup> Perhaps Franklin got the idea from Defoe's Essay on Projects, London, 1697.

Sixty years later, Samuel Johnson in his life of Addison said, "Whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison." Franklin does not attain to the grace and urbanity of Addison; but external polish would ill suit Franklin's material, and the manly vigor and directness of his style are notable.

<sup>4</sup> lacked
6 John Locke (1632-1704); the Essay is fundamental in its analysis of the mind and was the inspirer of modern philosophical method.

and the Art of Thinking, by Messrs. du Port Royal. 1

While I was intent on improving my language. I met with an English grammar (I think it was Greenwood's), at the end of which there were two little sketches of the arts of rhetoric and logic, the latter finishing with a specimen of a dispute in the Socratic method; and soon after I procured Xenophon's Memorable Things of Socrates, wherein there are many instances of the same method. I was charmed with it adopted it, dropped my abrupt contradiction and positive argumentation, and put on the humble inquirer and doubter. And being then, from reading Shaftesbury and Collins, 2 become a real doubter in many points of our religious doctrine, 3 I found this method safest for myself and very embarrassing to those against whom I used it; therefore I took a delight in it, practiced it continually, and grew very artful and expert in drawing people, even of superior knowledge, into concessions, the consequences of which they did not foresee, entangling them in difficulties out of which they could not extricate themselves, and so obtaining victories that neither myself nor my cause always deserved. I continued this method some few years, but gradually left it, retaining only the habit of expressing myself in terms of modest diffidence: never using, when I advanced anything that may possibly be disputed, the words certainly, undoubtedly, or any others that give the air of positiveness to an opinion; but rather say. I conceive or apprehend a thing to be so and so: it appears to me, or I should think it so or so, for such and such reasons; or I imagine it to be so; or it is so, if I am not mistaken. This habit, I believe, has been of great advantage to me when I have had occasion to inculcate my opinions, and persuade men into measures that I have been from time to time engaged in promoting; and, as the chief ends of conversation are to inform or to be informed, to please or to persuade, I wish wellmeaning, sensible men would not lessen their power of doing good by a positive, assuming manner, that seldom fails to disgust, tends to create opposition, and to defeat every one of those purposes for which speech was given to us, to wit, giving or receiving information or pleasure. For if you would inform, a positive and dogmatical manner in advancing your sentiments may provoke contradiction and prevent a candid attention. If you wish information and improvement from the knowledge of others. and yet at the same time express yourself as firmly fixed in your present opinions, modest. sensible men who do not love disputation will probably leave you undisturbed in the possession of your error. And by such a manner you can seldom hope to recommend yourself in pleasing your hearers, or to persuade those whose concurrence you desire.

. . . . . . .

I have been the more particular in this description of my journey, and shall be so of my first entry into that city, that you may in your mind compare such unlikely beginnings with the figure I have since made there. I was in my working dress, my best clothes being to come round by sea. I was dirty from my journey; my pockets were stuffed out with shirts and stockings, and I knew no soul nor where to look for lodging. I was fatigued with traveling, rowing, and want of rest. I was very hungry; and my whole stock of cash consisted of a Dutch dollar, and about a shilling in copper. The latter I gave the people of the boat for my passage, who at first refused it on account of my rowing; but I insisted on their taking it. A man being sometimes more generous when he has but a little money than when he has plenty, perhaps through fear of being thought to have but little.

Then I walked up the street, gazing about till near the market-house I met a boy with bread. I had made many a meal on bread, and, inquiring where he got it, I went immediately to the baker's he directed me to, in Second Street, and asked for biscuit, intending such as we had in Boston; but they, it seems, were not made in Philadelphia. Then I asked for a

&lt;sup>1</sup> The Messrs. du Port Royal were a number of French religious recluses of the seventeenth century whose philosophical works were well known in Europe.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Earl of Shaftesbury and Anthony Collins, eight-eenth century philosophical writers of the rationalistic or deistic school; by the strictly orthodox philosophers they were regarded as little better than infidels.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Even without reading Shaftesbury and Collins, Franklin's mind would doubtless have rejected such religious doctrine as is shown in Michael Wigglesworth's Day of Doom (cf. pp. 29-34).

Franklin's printer brother, James, to whom he was bound apprentice and who was a hard master, fell out with the Boston authorities, who ordered "that James Franklin should no longer print the paper called The New England Courant." Releasing Benjamin from his apprenticeship, he continued to print the paper, but in the younger brother's name. He treated Benjamin so severely, however, that the lad, now seventeen years old, ran away by sea to New York to seek his fortune. The city must then have been about as Madam Knight describes it (cf. pp. 48-56). Not finding work here, but hearing of possible employment in Philadelphia, he pushed on afoot across New Jersey. The paragraph finds him just arrived in the Quaker city.

three-penny loaf, and was told they had none such. So not considering or knowing the difference of money, 1 and the greater cheapness nor the names of his bread, I bade him give me three-penny worth of any sort. He gave me, accordingly, three great puffy rolls. I was surprised at the quantity, but took it, and, having no room in my pockets, walked off with a roll under each arm, and eating the other. Thus I went up Market Street as far as Fourth Street, passing by the door of Mr. Read, my future wife's father; when she, standing at the door, saw me, and thought I made. as I certainly did, a most awkward, ridiculous appearance. Then I turned and went down Chestnut Street and part of Walnut Street, eating my roll all the way, and coming round, found myself again at Market Street wharf. near the boat I came in, to which I went for a draught of the river water; and being filled with one of my rolls, gave the other two to a woman and her child that came down the river in the boat with us, and were waiting to go farther.

Thus refreshed. I walked again up the street. which by this time had many clean-dressed people in it, who were all walking the same way. I joined them, and thereby was led into the great meeting-house of the Ouakers, near the market. I sat down among them, and after looking round a while and hearing nothing said, being very drowsy through labor and want of rest the preceding night, I fell fast asleep, and continued so till the meeting broke up, when one was kind enough to rouse me. This was. therefore, the first house I was in or slept in, in Philadelphia.

I believe I have omitted mentioning that, in my first voyage from Boston, being becalmed off Block Island, our people set about catching cod, and hauled up a great many. Hitherto I had stuck to my resolution of not eating animal food, and on this occasion I considered, with my master Tryon, 2 the taking every fish as a kind of unprovoked murder, since none of them had, or ever could do us any injury that might justify the slaughter. All this seemed very reasonable. But I had formerly been a great lover of fish, and when this came hot out of the frying-pan, it smelt admirably well. I balanced some time between principle and inclination, till I recollected that, when the fish were opened. I saw smaller fish taken out of their stomachs: then thought I, "If you eat one another, I don't see why we mayn't eat you." So I dined upon cod very heartily, and continued to eat with other people, returning only now and then occasionally to a vegetable diet. So convenient a thing it is to be a reasonable creature, since it enables one to find or make a reason for everything one has a mind to do.

... I now began to think 3 of getting a little money beforehand, and, expecting better work, I left Palmer's to work at Watt's near Lincoln's Inn Fields, a still greater printing-house. Here I continued all the rest of my stay in London.

At my first admission into this printing-house I took to working at press, imagining I felt a want of the bodily exercise I had been used to in America, where presswork is mixed with composing. I drank only water; the other workmen, near fifty in number, were great guzzlers of beer. On occasion, I carried up and down stairs a large form of types in each hand, when others carried but one in both hands. They wondered to see, from this and several instances, that the Water-American, as they called me, was stronger than themselves, who drank strong beer! We had an ale-house boy who attended always in the house to supply the workmen. My companion at the press drank every day a pint before breakfast, a pint at breakfast with his bread and cheese, a pint between breakfast and dinner, a pint at dinner, a pint in the afternoon about six o'clock, and another when he had done his day's work. I thought it a detestable custom; but it was necessary, he supposed, to drink strong beer, that he might be strong to labor. I endeavored to convince him that the bodily strength afforded by beer could only be in proportion to the grain or flour of the barley dissolved in the water of which it was made; that there was more flour in a pennyworth of bread; and therefore, if he would eat that with a pint of water, it would give him more strength than a

There was so little English money in colonial circulation that there was no fixed standard of exchange.
 Bread was dearer in Boston than in Philadelphia, which was surrounded by fertile lands.
 a vegetarian propagandist whose system Franklin had been following quart of beer. He drank on, however, and had four or five shillings to pay out of his wages every Saturday night for that muddling liquor: an expense I was free from. And thus these poor devils keep themselves always under.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Meanwhile Franklin had been befriended by Sir William Keith, governor of the province, a man "who wished to please everybody." He induced Franklin to go to London to procure for himself a new printing outfit on Keith's credit. Arriving in London, Franklin found that Keith had no credit there. He at once turned to his trade, however, earned and saved money, and, boy though he was—he had not yet reached his majority—made the acquaintance of such men as Sir Hans Sloane, afterwards founder of the British Museum, and Dr. Mandeville, author of The Fable of the Bees. The whole experience was greatly educative to The whole experience was greatly educative to the lad.

Watts, after some weeks, desiring to have me in the composing-room. I left the pressmen: a new bien venu i or sum for drink, being five shillings, was demanded of me by the compositors. I thought it an imposition, as I had paid below; the master thought so too, and forbad my paying it. I stood out two or three weeks. was accordingly considered as an excommunicate, and had so many little pieces of private mischief done me, by mixing my sorts, 2 transposing my pages, breaking my matter, 3 etc., etc.. if I were ever so little out of the room, and all ascribed to the chapel a ghost, which they said ever haunted those not regularly admitted, that, notwithstanding the master's protection, I found myself obliged to comply and pay the money, convinced of the folly of being on ill terms with those one is to live with continually.

I was now on a fair footing with them, and soon acquired considerable influence. I proposed some reasonable alterations in their chapel laws, and carried them against all opposition. From my example, a great part of them left their muddling breakfast of beer, and bread, and cheese, finding they could with me, be supplied from a neighboring house with a large porringer of hot water-gruel, sprinkled with pepper, crumbed with bread, and a bit of butter in it, for the price of a pint of beer, viz., three This was a more comfortable as half-pence. well as cheaper breakfast, and kept their heads Those who continued sotting with beer all day were often, by not paying, out of credit at the alehouse, and used to make interest with me to get beer; their light, as they phrased it, being out. I watched the pay-table on Saturday night, and collected what I stood engaged for them, having to pay sometimes near thirty shillings a week on their accounts. This, and my being esteemed a pretty good riggite, that is, a jocular verbal satirist, supported my consequence in the society. My constant attendance (I never making a St. Monday 5) recommended me to the master; and my uncommon quickness at composing occasioned my being put upon all work of dispatch, which was generally better paid. So I went on now very agreeably.

Before I enter upon my public appearance in business, it may be well to let you know the then state of my mind with regard to my principles and morals, that you may see how far those influenced the future events of my life. My parents had early given me religious impressions, and brought me through my childhood piously in the Dissenting way. But I was scarce fifteen when, after doubting by turns of several points, as I found them disputed in the different books I read, I began to doubt of revelation itself. Some books against deism fell into my hands: they were said to be the substance of sermons preached at Boyle's Lectures. It happened that they wrought an effect on me quite contrary to what was intended by them: for the arguments of the deists, which were quoted to be refuted, appeared to me much stronger than the refutations; in short, I soon became a thorough deist. My arguments perverted some others, particularly Collins and Ralph; but each of them having afterwards wronged me greatly without the least compunction, and recollecting Keith's conduct towards me (who was another freethinker), and my own towards Vernon and Miss Read, which at times gave me great trouble, I began to suspect that this doctrine, though it might be true, was not very useful. My London pamphlet, which had for its motto these lines of Dryden:

"Whatever is, is right. Though purblind man Sees but a part o' the chain, the nearest link: His eyes not carrying to the equal beam, That poises all above"; " and from the attributes of God, his infinite wisdom, goodness, and power, concluded that nothing could possibly be wrong in the world, and that vice and virtue were empty distinctions, no such things existing, appeared now not so clever a performance as I once thought it; and I doubted whether some error had not insinuated itself unperceived into my argument, so as to infect all that followed, as is common in metaphysical reasonings.

I grew convinced that truth, sincerity, and integrity in dealings between man and man were of the utmost importance to the felicity of life; and I formed written resolutions, which still remain in my journal book, to practice them ever while I lived. Revelation had indeed welcome

 a printer's cant name for a printing-house a holiday after a Sunday's drinking spree: jocularly, as if a saint's day

<sup>6</sup> Franklin quotes inaccurately. The passage is: Whatever is, is in its causes just; Since all things are by fate. But purblind man Sees but a part o' the chain; the nearest links; His eyes not carrying to that equal beam, That poises above all. Dryden, Oedipus, III, i, 284.

no weight with me, as such: but I entertained an opinion that, though certain actions might not be bad because they were forbidden by it. or good because it commanded them, yet probably these actions might be forbidden because they were bad for us, or commanded because they were beneficial to us, in their own natures, all the circumstances of things considered. And this persuasion, with the kind hand of Providence, or some guardian angel, or accidental favorable circumstances and situations, or all together, preserved me, through this dangerous time of youth, and the hazardous situations I was sometimes in among strangers, remote from the eye and advice of my father, without any willful gross immorality or injustice, that might have been expected from my want of religion. I say willful, because the instances I have mentioned had something of necessity in them, from my youth, inexperience, and the knavery of others. I had, therefore, a tolerable character to begin the world with; I valued it properly, and determined to preserve it.

It was about this time 1 I conceived the bold and arduous project of arriving at moral perfection. I wished to live without committing any fault at any time; I would conquer all that either natural inclination, custom, or company might lead me into. As I knew, or thought I knew, what was right and wrong, I did not see why I might not always do the one and avoid the other. But I soon found I had undertaken a task of more difficulty than I had imagined. While my care was employed in guarding against one fault, I was often surprised by another; habit took the advantage of inattention: inclination was sometimes too strong for reason. I concluded, at length, that the mere speculative conviction that it was our interest to be completely virtuous was not sufficient to prevent our slipping: and that the contrary habits must be broken, and good ones acquired and established, before we can have any dependence on a steady, uniform rectitude of conduct. For this purpose I therefore contrived the following method.

In the various enumerations of the moral virtues I had met with in my reading, I found the catalogue more or less numerous, as different writers included more or fewer ideas under the same name. Temperance, for example, was by some confined to eating and drinking, while by others it was extended to mean the moderating every other pleasure, appetite, inclination, or passion, bodily or mental, even to our avarice and ambition. I proposed to myself, for the sake of clearness, to use rather more names, with fewer ideas annexed to each, than a few names with more ideas; and I included under thirteen names of virtues all that at any time occurred to me as necessary or desirable, and annexed to each a short precept, which fully expressed the extent I gave to its meaning.

These names of virtues, with their precepts

1. Temperance.

Eat not to dullness: drink not to elevation.

2. SILENCE.

Speak not but what may benefit others or yourself; avoid trifling conversation.

3. ORDER.

Let all your things have their places; let each part of your business have its time.

4. RESOLUTION.

Resolve to perform what you ought; perform without fail what you resolve.

5. FRUGALITY.

Make no expense but to do good to others or yourself; i.e., waste nothing.

6. INDUSTRY.

Lose no time; be always employed in something useful; cut off all unnecessary actions.

7. SINCERITY.

Use no hurtful deceit; think innocently and justly; and, if you speak, speak accordingly.

8. JUSTICE.

Wrong none by doing injuries, or omitting the benefits that are your duty.

Moderation.

Avoid extremes; forbear resenting injuries so much as you think they deserve.

10. CLEANLINESS.

Tolerate no uncleanliness in body, clothes, or habitation.

11. TRANQUILITY.

Be not disturbed at trifles, or at accidents common or unavoidable.

12. CHASTITY.

13. HUMILITY.

Imitate Tesus and Socrates.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Franklin was now back in Philadelphia, married, and settled in business.

C.

T

C

Н

My intention being to acquire the habitude of all these virtues. I judged it would be well not to distract my attention by attempting the whole at once, but to fix it on one of them at a time; and, when I should be master of that. then to proceed to another, and so on, till I should have gone through the thirteen; and as the previous acquisition of some might facilitate the acquisition of certain others, I arranged them with that view, as they stand above. Temperance first, as it tends to procure that coolness and clearness of head, which is so necessary where constant vigilance was to be kept up, and guard maintained against the unremitting attraction of ancient habits, and the force of perpetual temptations. This being acquired and established. Silence would be more easy; and my desire being to gain knowledge at the same time that I improved in virtue, and considering that in conversation it was obtained rather by the use of the ears than of the tongue. and therefore wishing to break a habit I was getting into of prattling, punning, and joking, which only made me acceptable to trifling company, I gave Silence the second place. This and the next, Order, I expected would allow me more time for attending to my project and my studies. Resolution, once become habitual, would keep me firm in my endeavors to obtain all the subsequent virtues; Frugality and Industry freeing me from my remaining debt, and producing affluence and independence, would make more easy the practice of Sincerity and Justice, etc., etc. Conceiving then, that, agreeably to the advice of Pythagoras in his Golden Verses. 1 daily examination would be necessary. I contrived the following method for conducting that examination. 2

I made a little book, in which I allotted a page for each of the virtues. I ruled each page with red ink, so as to have seven columns, one for each day of the week, marking each column with a letter for the day. I crossed these columns with thirteen red lines, marking the beginning of each line with the first letter of one of the virtues, on which line, and in its proper column, I might mark, by a little black spot, every fault I found upon examination to have been committed respecting that virtue upon that day.

I determined to give a week's strict attention to each of the virtues successively. Thus, in

Form of the Pages

|    | S.  | M | Т. | W. | T. | . F. | S. |
|----|-----|---|----|----|----|------|----|
| T  |     |   |    |    |    |      |    |
| S. | *   | * |    | *  |    | *    |    |
| O. | * * | * | *  |    | *  | *    | *  |
| R. |     |   | *  |    |    | *    |    |
| F. |     | * |    |    | *  |      |    |
| I. |     |   | *  |    |    |      |    |
| S. |     |   |    |    |    |      |    |
| J. | -   |   |    |    |    |      |    |
| M. |     |   |    |    |    |      |    |

the first week, my great guard was to avoid every the least offense against Temperance. leaving the other virtues to their ordinary chance, only marking every evening the faults of the day. Thus, if in the first week I could keep my first line, marked T, clear of spots, I supposed the habit of that virtue so much strengthened, and its opposite weakened, that I might venture extending my attention to include the next, and for the following week keep both lines clear of spots. Proceeding thus to the last, I could go through a course complete in thirteen weeks, and four courses in a year. And like him who, having a garden to weed, does not attempt to eradicate all the bad herbs at once, which would exceed his reach and his strength, but works on one of the beds at a time, and, having accomplished the first, proceeds to a second, so I should have, I hoped, the encouraging pleasure of seeing on my pages the progress I made in virtue, by clearing successively my lines of their spots, till in the end, by a number of courses, I should be happy in viewing a clean book, after a thirteen weeks' daily examination.

This my little book had for its motto these lines from Addison's Cato: 3

Pythagoras was a Greek philosopher of the sixth century B.C. The Golden Verses may be of a later date.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Franklin, in common with most mid-eighteenth century Englishmen, took an intellectual and utilitarian attitude toward morality, virtue, and religion.

&quot;Here will I hold. If there's a power above us (And that there is, all nature cries aloud Thro' all her works), He must delight in virtue; And that which he delights in must be happy."

&lt;sup>3</sup> a tragedy founded on the death of the philosopher and patriot, Cato, 95-46 B.C.

Another from Cicero,

"O vitae Philosophia dux! O virtutum indagatrix expultrixque vitiorum! Unus dies, bene et ex praeceptis tuis actus, peccanti immortalitati est anteponendus." <sup>1</sup>

Another from the Proverbs of Solomon, speaking of wisdom or virtue:

"Length of days is in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honor. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." iii, 16, 17.

And conceiving God to be the fountain of wisdom, I thought it right and necessary to solicit his assistance for obtaining it; to this end I formed the following little prayer, which was prefixed to my tables of examination, for daily use.

"O powerful Goodness! bountiful Father! merciful Guide! Increase in me that wisdom which discovers my truest interest. Strengthen my resolutions to perform what that wisdom dictates. Accept my kind offices to thy other children as the only return in my power for thy continual favors to me."

I used also sometimes a little prayer which I took from Thomson's 2 poems, viz.:

"Father of light and life, thou Good Supreme! O teach me what is good; teach me Thyself! Save me from folly, vanity, and vice, From every low pursuit; and fill my soul With knowledge, conscious peace, and virtue pure; Sacred, substantial, never-fading bliss!"

The precept of Order requiring that every part of my business should have its allotted time, one page in my little book contained the following scheme of employment for the twenty-four hours of a natural day.

8 9 10 11 Work.

Noon

{ 12 } Read, or overlook my { 1 } accounts, and dine.

I entered upon the execution of this plan for self-examination, and continued it with occasional intermissions for some time. I was surprised to find myself so much fuller of faults than I had imagined; but I had the satisfaction of seeing them diminish. To avoid the trouble of renewing now and then my little book, which, by scraping out the marks on the paper of old faults to make room for new ones in a new course, became full of holes, I transferred my tables and precepts to the ivory leaves of a memorandum book, on which the lines were drawn with red ink, that made a durable stain, and on those lines I marked my faults with a black lead-pencil, which marks I could easily wipe out with a wet sponge. After a while I went through one course only in a year, and afterward only one in several years, till at length I omitted them entirely, being employed in voyages and business abroad, with a multiplicity of affairs that interfered; but I always carried my little book with me.

My scheme of ORDER gave me the most trouble; and I found that, though it might be practicable where a man's business was such as to leave him the disposition of his time, that of a journeyman printer, for instance, it was not possible to be exactly observed by a master, who must mix with the world, and often receive people of business at their own hours. Order, too, with regard to places for things, papers, etc., I found extremely difficult to acquire. I had not been early accustomed to it, and, having an exceeding good memory, I was not so sensible of the inconvenience attending want of method. This article, therefore, cost me so much painful attention, and my faults in it vexed me so much, and I made so little progress in amendment, and had such Ophilosophy, guide of life! O searcher-out of virtue and expeller of vice! One day lived well and by thy precepts is to be preferred to an immortality of sin.

&lt;sup>2</sup> James Thomson, 1700-1748, author of The Seasons

frequent relapses, that I was almost ready to give up the attempt, and content myself with a faulty character in that respect, like the man who, in buying an axe of a smith, my neighbor, desired to have the whole of its surface as bright as the edge. The smith consented to grind it bright for him if he would turn the wheel; he turned, while the smith pressed the broad face of the axe hard and heavily on the stone, which made the turning of it very fatiguing. The man came every now and then from the wheel to see how the work went on and at length would take his axe as it was. without farther grinding. "No," said the smith. "turn on, turn on; we shall have it bright by and by; as yet, it is only speckled." "Yes." says the man, "but I think I like a speckled axe best." And I believe this may have been the case with many, who, having, for want of some such means as I have employed, found the difficulty of obtaining good and breaking bad habits in other points of vice and virtue, have given up the struggle, and concluded that "a speckled axe was best"; 1 for something, that pretended to be reason, was every now and then suggesting to me that such extreme nicety as I exacted of myself might be a kind of foppery in morals, which, if it were known, would make me ridiculous; that a perfect character might be attended with the inconvenience of being envied and hated; and that a benevolent man should allow a few faults in himself. to keep his friends in countenance.

In truth, I found myself incorrigible with respect to Order; and now I am grown old, and my memory bad, I feel very sensibly the want of it. But, on the whole, though I never arrived at the perfection I had been so ambitious of obtaining, but fell far short of it, yet I was, by the endeavor, a better and a happier man than I otherwise should have been if I had not attempted it; as those who aim at perfect writing by imitating the engraved copies, though they never reach the wished-for excellence of those copies, their hand is mended by the endeavor, and is tolerable while it continues fair and legible.

It may be well my posterity should be informed that to this little artifice, with the blessing of God, their ancestor owed the constant felicity of his life, down to his 79th year, in which this is written. What reverses may attend the remainder is in the hand of Providence; but, if they arrive, the reflection on past happiness enjoyed ought to help his bearing them with more resignation. To Temperance he ascribes his long-continued health, and what is still left to him of a good constitution; to Industry and Frugality, the early easiness of his circumstances and acquisition of his fortune. with all that knowledge that enabled him to be a useful citizen, and obtained for him some degree of reputation among the learned: to Sincerity and Justice, the confidence of his country, and the honorable employs it conferred upon him; and to the joint influence of the whole mass of the virtues, even in the imperfect state he was able to acquire them, all that evenness of temper, and that cheerfulness in conversation, which makes his company still sought for, and agreeable even to his younger acquaintance. I hope, therefore, that some of my descendants may follow the example and reap the benefit. 2

It will be remarked that, though my scheme was not wholly without religion, there was in it no mark of any of the distinguishing tenets of any particular sect. I had purposely avoided them; for, being fully persuaded of the utility and excellency of my method, and that it might be serviceable to people in all religions, and intending some time or other to publish it, I would not have anything in it that should prejudice any one, of any sect, against it. I purposed writing a little comment on each virtue, in which I would have shown the advantages of possessing it, and the mischiefs attending its opposite vice; and I should have called my book THE ART OF VIRTUE, because it would have shown the means and manner of obtaining virtue, which would have distinguished it from the mere exhortation to be good, that does not instruct and indicate the means, but is like the apostle's man of verbal charity, who only without showing to the naked and hungry how or where they might get clothes or victuals, exhorted them to be fed and clothed.—James ii, 15, 16.

But it so happened that my intention of writing and publishing this comment was never fulfilled. I did, indeed, from time to time, put down short hints of the sentiments, reasonings, etc., to be made use of in it, some of which I have still by me; but the necessary close attention to private business in the earlier part of my life, and public business since, have occasioned my postponing it; for, it being connected in my mind with a great and extensive project. 1 that required the whole man to execute, and which an unforeseen succession of employs prevented my attending to, it has hitherto remained unfinished.

Franklin had a faculty of acquiring and coining sayings like those of Lincoln in their homespun humor and shrewd knowledge of life.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The manly, sincere modesty of such passages as these gives us confidence in all of Franklin's estimates of himself and his fellow men.

In this piece it was my design to explain and enforce this doctrine, that vicious actions are not hurtful because they are forbidden. but forbidden because they are hurtful, the nature of man alone considered: that it was, therefore, every one's interest to be virtuous who wished to be happy even in this world; and I should, from this circumstance (there being always in the world a number of rich merchants, nobility, states, and princes, who have need of honest instruments for the management of their affairs. and such being so rare), have endeavored to convince young persons that no qualities were so likely to make a poor man's fortune as those of probity and integrity. 2

My list of virtues contained at first but twelve: but a Ouaker friend having kindly informed me that I was generally thought proud: that my pride showed itself frequently in conversation; that I was not content with being in the right when discussing any point, but was overbearing and rather insolent, of which he convinced me by mentioning several instances; I determined endeavoring to cure mvself, if I could, of this vice or folly among the rest, and I added Humility to my list, giving an extensive meaning to the word.

I cannot boast of much success in acquiring the reality of this virtue, but I had a good deal with regard to the abbearance of it. I made it a rule to forbear all direct contradiction to the sentiments of others, and all positive assertion of my own. I even forbid myself, agreeably to the old laws of our Junto, 3 the use of every word or expression in the language that imported a fixed opinion, such as certainly, undoubtedly, etc., and I adopted, instead of them, I conceive, I apprehend, or I imagine a thing to be so or so: or it so appears to me at present. When another asserted something that I thought an error I denied myself the pleasure of contradicting him abruptly, and of showing immediately some absurdity in his proposition; and in answering I began by observing that in certain cases or circumstances his opinion would be right, but in the present case there appeared or seemed to me some difference, etc. I soon found the advantage of this change in my manner; the conversations I engaged in went on more pleasantly. modest way in which I proposed my opinions procured them a readier reception and less contradiction: I had less mortification when I was found to be in the wrong, and I more easily prevailed with others to give up their mistakes and join with me when I happened to be in the right.

young man.

And this mode, which I at first put on with some violence to natural inclination, became at length so easy, and so habitual to me, that perhaps for these fifty years past no one has ever heard a dogmatical expression escape me. And to this habit (after my character of integrity) I think it principally owing that I had early so much weight with my fellow-citizens when I proposed new institutions, or alterations in the old, and so much influence in public councils when I became a member: for I was but a bad speaker, never eloquent, subject to much hesitation in my choice of words, hardly correct in language, and vet I generally carried my points. 4

In reality, there is, perhaps, no one of our natural passions so hard to subdue as pride. Disguise it, struggle with it, beat it down, stiffe it, mortify it as much as one pleases, it is still alive, and will every now and then peep out and show itself; you will see it, perhaps, often in this history; for, even if I could conceive that I had completely overcome it, I should probably be proud of my humility.

In 1732 I first published my Almanac, under the name of Richard Saunders; it was continued by me about twenty-five years, commonly called Poor Richard's Almanac. I endeavored to make it both entertaining and useful; and it accordingly came to be in such demand, that I reaped considerable profit from it, vending annually near ten thousand. And observing that it was generally read, scarce any neighborhood in the province being without it, I considered it as a proper vehicle for conveying instruction among the common people, who bought scarcely any other books; I therefore filled all the little spaces that occurred between the remarkable days in the calendar with proverbial sentences. chiefly such as inculcated industry and frugality as the means of procuring wealth, and thereby securing virtue; it being more difficult for a man in want to act always honestly, as,

<sup>1</sup> Franklin, like Bolingbroke and other English deists of the time, had in mind the founding of a new religious sect whose creed was to be much the same as that of the deists.

In this coldly practical view of morality, Franklin is expressing the views of his generation of Englishmen, who valued religion chiefly as a cheap and convenient police force in society.

a debating club that Franklin had organized when a

<sup>4</sup> See what Jefferson says of Franklin's speeches, on page 157.

to use here one of those proverbs, it is hard for an empty sack to stand ubright.

These proverbs, which contained the wisdom of many ages and nations, I assembled and formed into a connected discourse prefixed to the Almanac of 1757, as the harangue of a wise old man to the people attending an auction. The bringing all these scattered counsels thus into a focus enabled them to make greater im-The piece, being universally approved, was copied in all the newspapers of the continent; reprinted in Britain on a broad side, to be stuck up in houses: two translations were made of it in French, and great numbers bought by the clergy and gentry, to distribute gratis among their poor parishioners and tenants. In Pennsylvania, as it discouraged useless expense in foreign superfluities, some thought it had its share of influence in producing that growing plenty of money which was observable for several years after its publication.

. . . . . . .

In 1739 arrived among us from Ireland the Reverend Mr. Whitefield, 1 who had made himself remarkable there as an itinerant preacher. He was at first permitted to preach in some of our churches; but the clergy, taking a dislike to him, soon refused him their pulpits, and he was obliged to preach in the fields. multitudes of all sects and denominations that attended his sermons were enormous, and it was matter of speculation to me, who was one of the number, to observe the extraordinary influence of his oratory on his hearers, and how much they admired and respected him, notwithstanding his common abuse of them, by assuring them they were naturally half beasts and half devils. It was wonderful to see the change soon made in the manners of our inhabitants. From being thoughtless or indifferent about religion, it seemed as if all the world were growing religious, so that one could not walk through the town in an evening without hearing psalms sung in different families of every street.

And it being found inconvenient to assemble in the open air, subject to its inclemencies, the building of a house to meet in was no sooner proposed, and persons appointed to receive contributions, but sufficient sums were soon received to procure the ground and erect the building, which was one hundred feet long and seventy broad, about the size of Westminster Hall; <sup>2</sup> and the work was carried on with such spirit as to be finished in a much shorter time than could have been expected. Both house and ground were vested in trustees, expressly for the use of any preacher of any religious persuasion who might desire to say something to the people at Philadelphia; the design in building not being to accommodate any particular sect, but the inhabitants in general; so that even if the Mufti <sup>3</sup> of Constantinople were to send a missionary to preach Mohammedanism to us, he would find a pulpit at his service.

Mr. Whitefield, in leaving us, went preaching all the way through the colonies to Georgia. The settlement of that province had lately been begun, but instead of being made with hardy, industrious husbandmen accustomed to labor. the only people fit for such an enterprise, it was with families of broken shop-keepers and other insolvent debtors, many of indolent and idle habits, taken out of the jails, 4 who, being set down in the woods, unqualified for clearing land, and unable to endure the hardships of a new settlement, perished in numbers, leaving many helpless children unprovided for. The sight of their miserable situation inspired the benevolent heart of Mr. Whitefield with the idea of building an Orphan House there, in which they might be supported and educated. Returning northward, he preached up this charity, and made large collections, for his eloquence had a wonderful power over the hearts and purses of his hearers, of which I myself was an instance.

I did not disapprove of the design, but, as Georgia was then destitute of materials and workmen, and it was proposed to send them from Philadelphia at a great expense, I thought it would have been better to have built the house here, and brought the children to it. This I advised; but he was resolute in his first project, rejected my counsel, and I therefore redused to contribute. I happened soon after to attend one of his sermons, in the course of which I perceived he intended to finish with a collection, and I silently resolved he should get nothing from me. I had in my pocket a handful of copper money, three or four silver dollars,

George Whitefield, 1714-70, the celebrated English evangelist and pulpit orator of the Methodist movement in the English church; in religious temperament he was the opposite of Franklin. This was the first of his three tours to America.

&lt;sup>2</sup> a hall famous in English history, adjoining the Houses of Parliament in Westminster; it covers an area 68 by 290 feet.

*a high Mohammedan civil official
*This passage is not wholly unbiased. Oglethorpe's motives in founding Georgia were philanthropic and his colony may have contained a good many unworthy persons; but the colonists were for the main part chosen with especial care for their usefulness in colonial development.

and five pistoles 1 in gold. As he proceeded I began to soften, and concluded to give the coppers. Another stroke of his oratory made me ashamed of that, and determined me to give the silver; and he finished so admirably, that I emptied my pocket wholly into the collector's dish, gold and all. At this sermon there was also one of our club, who, being of my sentiments respecting the building in Georgia, and suspecting a collection might be intended, had, by precaution, emptied his pockets before he came from home. Towards the conclusion of the discourse, however, he felt a strong desire to give, and applied to a neighbor, who stood near him, to borrow some money for the purpose. The application was unfortunately [made] to perhaps the only man in the company who had the firmness not to be affected by the preacher. His answer was, "At any other time, Friend Hopkinson, I would lend to thee freely; but not now, for thee seems to be out of thy right senses.

Some of Mr. Whitefield's enemies affected to suppose that he would apply these collections to his own private emolument; but I, who was intimately acquainted with him (being employed in printing his Sermons and Journals, etc.), never had the least suspicion of his integrity, but am to this day decidedly of opinion that he was in all his conduct a perfectly honest man; and methinks my testimony in his favor ought to have the more weight, as we had no religious connection. He used, indeed, sometimes to pray for my conversion, but never had the satisfaction of believing that his prayers were heard. Ours was a mere civil friendship, sincere on both sides, and lasted to his death.

The following instance will show something of the terms on which we stood. Upon one of his arrivals from England at Boston he wrote to me that he should come soon to Philadelphia, but knew not where he could lodge when there. as he understood his old friend and host, Mr. Benezet, was removed to Germantown. My answer was. "You know my house: if you can make shift with its scanty accommodations, you will be most heartily welcome." He replied, that if I made that kind offer for Christ's sake, I should not miss of a reward. And I returned, "Don't let me be mistaken; it was not for Christ's sake, but for your sake." One of our common acquaintance jocosely remarked, that, knowing it to be the custom of the saints. when they received any favor, to shift the burden of the obligation from off their own a Spanish gold coin worth about four dollars shoulders, and place it in heaven, I had contrived to fix it on earth.

The last time I saw Mr. Whitefield was in London, when he consulted me about his Orphan House concern, and his purpose of appropriating it to the establishment of a college.

He had a loud and clear voice, and articulated his words and sentences so perfectly, that he might be heard and understood at a great distance, especially as his auditories, however numerous, observed the most exact silence. He preached one evening from the top of the Court-house steps, which are in the middle of Market Street, and on the west side of Second Street, which crosses it at right angles. Both streets were filled with his hearers to a considerable distance. Being among the hindmost in Market Street, I had the curiosity to learn how far he could be heard, by retiring backwards down the street towards the river; and I found his voice distinct till I came near Front Street, when some noise in that street obscured it. Imagining then a semicircle of which my distance should be the radius, and that it were filled with auditors, to each of whom I allowed two square feet, I computed that he might well be heard by more than thirty thou-This reconciled me to the newspaper accounts of his having preached to twenty-five thousand people in the fields, and to the ancient histories of generals haranguing whole armies, of which I had sometimes doubted.

By hearing him often, I came to distinguish easily between sermons newly composed, and those which he had often preached in the course of his travels. His delivery of the latter was so improved by frequent repetitions that every accent, every emphasis, every modulation of voice was so perfectly well turned and well placed that, without being interested in the subject, one could not help being pleased with the discourse; a pleasure of much the same kind with that received from an excellent piece of music. This is an advantage itinerant preachers have over those who are stationary, as the latter cannot well improve their delivery of a sermon by so many rehearsals.

His writing and printing from time to time gave great advantage to his enemies; unguarded expressions, and even erroneous opinions, delivered in preaching, might have been afterwards explained or qualified by supposing others that might have accompanied them, or they might have been denied; but litera scripta manet. <sup>2</sup> Critics attacked his writings violently, and with so much appearance of reason as to diminish the number of his votaries and prevent their increase; so that I am of the opinion if he had never written anything, he would have left behind him a much more numerous and important sect, and his reputation might in that case have been still growing, even after his death, as there being nothing of his writing on which to found a censure and give him a lower character, his proselytes would be left at liberty to feign for him as great a variety of excellencies as their enthusiastic admiration might wish him to have possessed.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;The written word endures."

In order of time, I should have mentioned before, that having, in 1742, invented an open stove for the better warming of rooms, and at the same time saving fuel, as the fresh air admitted was warmed in entering, I made a present of the model to Mr. Robert Grace, one of my early friends, who, having an ironfurnace, found the casting of the plates for these stoves a profitable thing, as they were growing in demand. To promote that demand. I wrote and published a pamphlet, entitled "An Account of the new-invented Pennsylvania Fireplaces; wherein their Construction and Manner of Operation is particularly explained: their Advantages above every other Method of warming Rooms demonstrated; and all Objections that have been raised against the Use of them answered and obviated," etc. This pamphlet had a good effect. Governor Thomas was so pleased with the construction of this stove, as described in it, that he offered to give me a patent for the sole vending of them for a term of years; but I declined it from a principle which has ever weighed with me on such occasions, viz., That, as we enjoy great advantages from the inventions of others, we should be glad of an opportunity to serve others by any invention of ours; and this we should do freely and generously.

An ironmonger in London, however, assuming a good deal of my pamphlet, and working it up into his own, and making some small changes in the machine, which rather hurt its operation, got a patent for it there, and made, as I was told, a little fortune by it. And this is not the only instance of patents taken out for my inventions by others, though not always with the same success, which I never contested, as having no desire of profiting by patents myself, and hating disputes. The use of this and the neighboring colonies, has been, and is, a great saving of wood to the inhabitants.

The British government, not choosing to permit the union of the colonies as proposed at Albany: 1 and to trust that union with their defense, lest they should thereby grow too military and feel their own strength, suspicions and jealousies at this time being entertained of them, sent over General Braddock with two regiments of regular English troops for that purpose. He landed at Alexandria in Virginia, and thence marched to Frederictown, in Maryland, where he halted for carriages. Our Assembly apprehending, from some information, that he had conceived violent prejudices against them, as averse to the service, wished me to wait upon him, not as from them, but as postmaster-general, under the guise of proposing to settle with him the mode of conducting with most celerity and certainty the despatches between him and the governors of the several provinces, with whom he must necessarily have continual correspondence, and of which they proposed to pay the expense. My son accompanied me on this journey.

We found the general at Frederictown, waiting impatiently for the return of those he had sent through the back parts of Maryland and Virginia to collect wagons. I stayed with him several days, dined with him daily, and had full opportunity of removing all his prejudices, by the information of what the Assembly had before his arrival actually done, and were still willing to do, to facilitate his operations. When I was about to depart, the returns of wagons to be obtained were brought in, by which it appeared that they amounted only to twenty-five, and not all of those were in serviceable condition. The general and all the officers were surprised, declared the expedition was then at an end, being impossible, and exclaimed against the ministers for ignorantly landing them in a country destitute of the means of conveying their stores, baggage, etc., not less than one hundred and fifty wagons being necessary.

I happened to say I thought it was pity they had not been landed rather in Pennsylvania, as in that country almost every farmer had his wagon. The general eagerly laid hold of my words, and said, "Then you, sir, who are a man of interest there, can probably procure them for us; and I beg you will undertake it." I asked what terms were to be offered the owners of the wagons; and I was desired to put on paper the terms that appeared to me necessary. This I did, and they were agreed to, and a commission and instructions accordingly prepared immediately.

At a congress of commissioners from the different colonies, convened in Albany in 1754 to consider ways of defending the colonies against the French and Indians, Franklin had proposed a plan for uniting the colonies in a Federal union. The historian Fiske speaks of the plan as one showing great foresight and wisdom.

This general was, I think, a brave man, and might probably have made a figure as a good officer in some European war. But he had too much self-confidence, too high an opinion of the validity of regular troops, and too mean a one of both Americans and Indians. George Croghan, our Indian interpreter, joined him on his march with one hundred of those people, who might have been of great use to his army as guides, scouts, etc., if he had treated them kindly; but he slighted and neglected them, and they gradually left him.

In conversation with him one day, he was giving me some account of his intended prog-"After taking Fort Duquesne," says he, "I am to proceed to Niagara; and, having taken that, to Frontenac, if the season will allow time; and I suppose it will, for Duquesne can hardly detain me above three or four days; and then I see nothing that can obstruct my march to Niagara." Having before revolved in my mind the long line his army must make in their march by a very narrow road, to be cut for them through the woods and bushes, and also what I had read of a former defeat of fifteen hundred French. who invaded the Iroquois country, I had conceived some doubts and some fears for the event of the campaign. But I ventured only to say, "To be sure, sir, if you arrive well before Duquesne, with these fine troops, so well provided with artillery, that place not yet completely fortified, and as we hear with no very strong garrison, can probably make but a short resistance. The only danger I apprehend of obstruction to your march is from ambuscades of Indians, who, by constant practice, are dexterous in laying and executing them; and the slender line, near four miles long, which your army must make, may expose it to be attacked by surprise in its flanks, and to be cut like a thread into several pieces, which, from their distance, cannot come up in time to support each other."

He smiled at my ignorance, and replied, "These savages may, indeed, be a formidable enemy to your raw American militia, but upon the king's regular and disciplined troops, sir, it is impossible they should make any impression." I was conscious of an impropriety in my disputing with a military man in matters of his profession, and said no more. The enemy, however, did not take the advantage of his army which I apprehended its long line of march exposed it to, but let it advance without interruption till within nine miles of the place; and then, when more in a body (for it had just passed a river, where the front had halted till all were come over), and in a more open part of the woods than any it had passed. attacked its advanced guard by a heavy fire from behind trees and bushes, which was the first intelligence the general had of an enemy's being near him. This guard being disordered, the general hurried the troops up to their assistance, which was done in great confusion, through wagons, baggage, and cattle; and presently the fire came upon their flank: the officers, being on horseback, were more easily distinguished, picked out as marks, and fell very fast; and the soldiers were crowded together in a huddle, having or hearing no orders, and standing to be shot at till two thirds of them were killed; and then, being seized with a panic, the whole fled with precipitation.

The wagoners took each a horse out of his team and scampered; their example was immediately followed by others; so that all the wagons, provisions, artillery, and stores were left to the enemy. The general, being wounded, was brought off with difficulty; his secretary, Mr. Shirley, was killed by his side; and out of eighty-six officers, sixty-three were killed or wounded, and seven hundred and fourteen men killed out of cleven hundred. These eleven hundred had been picked men from the whole army; the rest had been left behind with Colonel Dunbar, who was to follow with the heavier part of the stores, provisions, and baggage. The flyers, not being pursued, arrived at Dunbar's camp, and the panic they brought with them instantly seized him and all his people; and, though he had now above one thousand men, and the enemy who had beaten Braddock did not at most exceed four hundred Indians and French together, instead of proceeding, and endeavoring to recover some of the lost honor, he ordered all the stores, ammunition, etc., to be destroyed, that he might have more horses to assist his flight towards the settlements, and less lumber to remove. He was there met with requests from the governors of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, that he would post his troops on the frontier, so as to afford some protection to the inhabitants; but he continued his hasty march through all the country, not thinking himself safe till he arrived at Philadelphia, where the inhabitants could protect him. This whole transaction gave us Americans the first suspicion that our exalted ideas of the prowess of British regulars had not been well founded.

In their first march, too, from their landing till they got beyond the settlements, they had plundered and stripped the inhabitants, totally ruining some poor families, besides insulting, abusing, and confining the people if they remonstrated. This was enough to put us out of conceit of such defenders, if we had really wanted any. How different was the conduct of our French friends in 1781, who, during a march through the most inhabited part of our country from Rhode Island to Virginia, near seven hundred miles, occasioned not the smallest complaint for the loss of a pig, a chicken, or even an apple.

Captain Orme, who was one of the general's aides-de-camp, and, being grievously wounded, was brought off with him, and continued with him to his death, which happened in a few days, told me that he was totally silent all the first day, and at night only said, "Who would have thought it?" That he was silent again the following day, saying only at last, "We shall better know how to deal with them another time"; and died in a few minutes after.

The next day being fair, we continued our march and arrived at the desolated Gnadenhut. There was a saw-mill near, round which were left several piles of boards, with which we soon hutted ourselves; an operation the more necessary at that inclement season as we had no tents. Our first work was to bury more effectually the dead we found there, who had been half interred by the country people.

The next morning our fort was planned and marked out, the circumference measuring four hundred and fifty-five feet, which would require as many palisades to be made of trees, one with another, of a foot diameter each. Our axes, of which we had seventy, were imediately set to work to cut down trees, and, our men being dexterous in the use of them, great dispatch was made. Seeing the trees fall so fast. I had the curiosity to look at my watch when two men began to cut a pine; in six minutes they had it upon the ground. and I found it of fourteen inches diameter. Each pine made three palisades of eighteen feet long, pointed at one end. While these were preparing, our other men dug a trench all round, of three feet deep, in which the palisades were to be planted; and our wagons. the bodies being taken off, and the fore and hind wheels separated by taking out the pin which united the two parts of the perch, we had ten carriages, with two horses each, to bring the palisades from the woods to the spot. When they were set up, our carpenters built a stage of boards all round within, about six feet high, for the men to stand on when to fire through the loopholes. We had one swivel gun, which we mounted on one of the angles. and fired it as soon as fixed, to let the Indians know, if any were within hearing, that we had such pieces; and thus our fort, if such a magnificent name may be given to so miserable a stockade, was finished in a week, though it rained so hard every other day that the men could not work.

This gave me occasion to observe, that, when men are employed they are best contented; for on the days they worked they were goodnatured and cheerful, and, with the consciousness of having done a good day's work, they spent the evening jollily; but on idle days they were mutinous and quarrelsome, finding fault with their pork, the bread, etc., and in continual ill-humor, which put me in mind of a sea-captain, whose rule it was to keep his men constantly at work; and when his mate once told him that they had done everything, and there was nothing further to employ them about, "Oh," says he, "make them scour the anchor."

This kind of fort, however contemptible, is a sufficient defense against Indians, who have no cannon. Finding ourselves now posted securely, and having a place to retreat to on occasion, we ventured out in parties to scour the adjacent country. We met with no Indians. but we found the places on the neighboring hills where they had lain to watch our proceedings. There was an art in their contrivance of those places that seems worth mention. It being winter, a fire was necessary for them; but a common fire on the surface of the ground would by its light have discovered their position at a distance. They had therefore dug holes in the ground about three feet diameter and somewhat deeper; we saw where they had with their hatchets cut off the charcoal from

After Braddock's defeat, the governor of Pennsylvania, knowing Franklin to be a man who would carry through what he undertook, gave into his hands the defense of the whole northwestern frontier of the colony, furnishing him with signed blank commissions for this purpose. Franklin raised a force, with one detachment of which he advanced to erect a fort at Gnadenhut, a Moravian village in the wilderness which had been burnt by the Indians.

the sides of burnt logs lying in the woods. With these coals they had made small fires in the bottom of the holes, and we observed among the weeds and grass the prints of their bodies, made by their laying all round, with their legs hanging down in the holes to keep their feet warm, which with them is an essential point. This kind of fire, so managed, could not discover them, either by its light, flame, sparks, or even smoke: it appeared that their number was not great, and it seems they saw we were too many to be attacked by them with prospect of advantage.

We had for our chaplain a zealous Presbyterian minister, Mr. Beatty, who complained to me that the men did not generally attend his prayers and exhortations. When they enlisted, they were promised, besides pay and provisions, a gill of rum a day, which was punctually served out to them, half in the morning and the other half in the evening; and I observed they were as punctual in attending to receive it; upon which I said to Mr. Beatty, "It is, perhaps, below the dignity of your profession to act as steward of the rum, but if you were to deal it out and only just after prayers, you would have them all about you." He liked the thought, undertook the office, and, with the help of a few hands to measure out the liquor, executed it to satisfaction, and never were prayers more generally and more punctually attended; so that I thought this method preferable to the punishment inflicted by some military laws for non-attendance on divine service.

Before I proceed in relating the part I had in public affairs under this new governor's 1 administration, it may not be amiss here to give some account of the rise and progress of my philosophical reputation.

In 1746, being at Boston, I met there with a Dr. Spence, who was lately arrived from Scotland, and showed me some electric experiments. They were imperfectly performed, as he was not very expert; but, being on a subject quite new to me, they equally surprised and pleased me. Soon after my return to Philadelphia, our library company received from Mr. P. Collinson, Fellow of the Royal Society of London, a present of a glass tube, 2 with some account of the use of it in making such experiments.

<sup>1</sup> Captain Denny
<sup>2</sup> Franklin had been influential in founding the Philadelphia Public Library some twenty-five years before. The Royal Society, founded in 1660, was the oldest scientific association in England. The glass tubes used in these primitive but important electrical experiments for producing frictional electrical experiments for producing frictional electricity were some two feet and a half long and three inches in diameter.

I eagerly seized the opportunity of repeating what I had seen at Boston; and, by much practice, acquired great readiness in performing those, also, which we had an account of from England, adding a number of new ones. I say much practice, for my house was continually full, for some time, with people who came to see these new wonders.

To divide a little this incumbrance among my friends. I caused a number of similar tubes to be blown at our glass-house, with which they furnished themselves, so that we had at length several performers. Among these, the principal was Mr. Kinnersley, an ingenious neighbor, who, being out of business. I encouraged to undertake showing the experiments for money, and drew up for him two lectures, in which the experiments were ranged in such order, and accompanied with such explanations in such method, as that the foregoing should assist in comprehending the following. He procured an elegant apparatus for the purpose, in which all the little machines that I had roughly made for myself were nicely formed by instrumentmakers. His lectures were well attended, and gave great satisfaction; and after some time he went through the colonies, exhibiting them in every capital town, and picked up some money. In the West India islands, indeed, it was with difficulty the experiments could be made, from the general moisture of the air.

Obliged as we were to Mr. Collinson for his present of the tube, etc., I thought it right he should be informed of our success in using it, and wrote him several letters containing accounts of our experiments. He got them read in the Royal Society, where they were not at first thought worth so much notice as to be printed in their Transactions. One paper, which I wrote for Mr. Kinnersley, on the sameness of lightning with electricity, I sent to Dr. Mitchel, an acquaintance of mine, and one of the members also of that society, who wrote me word that it had been read but was laughed at by the connoisseurs. The papers, however, being shown to Dr. Fothergill, 3 he thought them of too much value to be stifled, and advised the printing of them. Mr. Collinson then gave them to Cave 4 for publication in his Gentleman's Magazine; but he chose to print them separately in a pamphlet, and Dr. Fothergill wrote the preface. Cave, it seems, judged

John Fothergil, M.D., F.R.S., ever afterward a warm friend, especially during Franklin's residence in London as agent of the colonics Edward Cave founded the Gentleman's Magazine in 1731. This monthly was devoted to politics, literature, science, and art, and was the most influential publication of the day in Great Britain.

rightly for his profit, for by the additions that arrived afterward, they swelled to a quarto volume, which has had five editions, and cost him nothing for copy-money.

It was, however, some time before those papers were much taken notice of in England. A copy of them happening to fall into the hands of the Count de Buffon. 1 a philosopher deservedly of great reputation in France, and, indeed, all over Europe, he prevailed with M. Dalibard to translate them into French, and they were printed at Paris. The publication offended the Abbé Nollet, preceptor in Natural Philosophy to the royal family, and an able experimenter, who had formed and published a theory of electricity, which then had the general vogue. He could not at first believe that such a work came from America, and said it must have been fabricated by his enemies at Paris, to decry his system. Afterwards, having been assured that there really existed such a person as Franklin at Philadelphia, which he had doubted, he wrote and published a volume of Letters, chiefly addressed to me, defending his theory, and denying the verity of my experiments, and of the positions deduced from them.

I once purposed answering the Abbé, and actually began the answer; but, on consideration that my writings contained a description of experiments which any one might repeat and verify, and if not to be verified, could not be defended; or of observations offered as conjectures, and not delivered dogmatically, therefore not laying me under any obligation to defend them; and reflecting that a dispute between two persons, writing in different languages, might be lengthened greatly by mistranslations, and thence misconceptions of one another's meaning, much of one of the Abbé's letters being founded on an error in the translation, I concluded to let my papers shift for themselves, believing it was better to spend what time I could spare from public business in making new experiments, than in disputing about those already made. I therefore never answered M. Nollet, and the event gave me no cause to repent my silence; for my friend M. le Roy, of the Royal Academy of Sciences, took up my cause and refuted him; my book was translated into the Italian, German, and Latin languages; and the doctrine it contained was by degrees universally adopted by the philosophers of Europe, in preference to that of the Abbé; so that he lived to see himself the last of his sect, except Monsieur B----.

of Paris. his élève 2 and immediate disciple. What gave my book the more sudden and general celebrity, was the success of one of its proposed experiments, made by Messrs. Dalibard and De Lor at Marly, for drawing lightning from the clouds. This engaged the public attention everywhere. M. De Lor, who had an apparatus for experimental philosophy, and lectured in that branch of science. undertook to repeat what he called the Philadelphia Experiments; and, after they were performed before the king and court, all the curious of Paris flocked to see them. I will not swell this narrative with an account of that capital experiment, nor of the infinite pleasure I received in the success of a similar one I made soon after with a kite at Philadelphia, as both are to be found in the histories of electricity.

Dr. Wright, an English physician, when at Paris, wrote to a friend, who was of the Royal Society, an account of the high esteem my experiments were in among the learned abroad, and of their wonder that my writings had been so little noticed in England. The society, on this, resumed the consideration of the letters that had been read to them; and the celebrated Dr. Watson 3 drew up a summary account of them, and of all I had afterwards sent to England on the subject, which he accompanied with some praise of the writer. This summary was then printed in their Transactions; and some members of the society in London, particularly the very ingenious Mr. Canton, having verified the experiment of procuring lightning from the clouds by a pointed rod, and acquainting them with the success, they soon made me more than amends for the slight with which they had before treated me. Without my having made any application for that honor, they chose me a member, and voted that I should be excused the customary payments, which would have amounted to twenty-five guineas; and ever since have given me their Transactions gratis. They also presented me with the gold medal of Sir Godfrey Copley for the year 1753, the delivery of which was accompanied by a very handsome speech of the president, Lord Macclesfield, wherein I was highly honored. 4

1791, 1817, 1868 1771-1789

&lt;sup>2</sup> pupil <sup>3</sup> Sir William Watson, 1715-1787, F.R.S., physician and scientist

<sup>4</sup> The remainder of the Autobiography includes a brief account of Franklin's further services to Penn-sylvania at home, and the beginning of his career as agent for the colony in London, closing with the year 1757.

<sup>1</sup> a celebrated French scientist, 1707-1788

THE WAY TO WEALTH

PREFACE TO POOR RICHARD IMPROVED: 1 1758

Courteous Reader: I have heard that nothing gives an author so great pleasure as to find his works respectfully quoted by other learned authors. This pleasure I have seldom enjoyed, for, though I have been, if I may say it without vanity, an eminent author (of almanacs) annually now a full quarter of a century, my brother authors in the same way, for what reason I know not, have ever been very sparing in their applauses and no other author has taken the least notice of me; so that, did not my writings produce me some solid pudding, the great deficiency of praise would have quite discouraged me.

I concluded at length that the people were the best judges of my merit, for they buy my works; and, besides, in my rambles where I am not personally known, I have frequently heard one or other of my adages repeated with "As Poor Richard says" at the end on 't; this gave me some satisfaction, as it showed not only that my instructions were regarded, but discovered likewise some respect for my authority; and I own that, to encourage the practice of remembering and repeating those wise sentences, I have sometimes quoted myself with great gravity.

Judge then how much I must have been gratified by an incident I am going to relate to you. I stopped my horse lately where a great number of people were collected at a vendue 2 of merchant goods. The hour of sale not being come, they were conversing on the badness of the times, and one of the company called to a plain, clean old man with white locks, "Pray, Father Abraham, what think you of the Won't these heavy taxes quite ruin

<sup>1</sup> Poor Richard's Almanac, first issued for the year 1733 by Franklin under the pseudonym of "Richard Saunders," continued to appear regularly until 1758. The witty and philosophic maxims which were inserted to fill spaces at the top or bottom of the pages, though by no means all original with Franklin (see p. 100), were so well chosen to fit the tastes of the average reader of the time that the tastes of the average reader of the time that the almanac came to have the unprecedented sale of ten thousand annually. The death of a rival almanac-maker in 1748 gave Franklin the opportunity of imitating "his well-known Method, of giving two pages to each Month," and so of changing the title to Poor Richard Improved. In the preface to the last number, that of 1758, Franklin gathered together the most striking of the sayings of the earlier twenty-five issues. This preface has been reprinted (so Paul Leicester Ford reckons) at least four hundred times, under such various headings as "Father Abraham's Speech" and "The Way to Wealth," and has been translated into thirteen languages, including the Chinese.

2 auction

the country? How shall we be ever able to pay them? What would you advise us to?" Father Abraham stood up and replied, "If you'd have my advice, I'll give it you in short; for A word to the wise is enough, and Many words won't fill a bushel, as Poor Richard says." They joined in desiring him to speak his mind, and gathering round him, he proceeded as follows:

"Friends," says he, "and neighbors, the taxes are indeed very heavy, and if those laid on by the government were the only ones we had to pay, we might more easily discharge them; but we have many others, and much more grievous to some of us. We are taxed twice as much by our idleness, three times as much by our pride, and four times as much by our folly; and from these taxes the commissioners cannot ease or deliver us by allowing an abatement. However, let us hearken to good advice, and something may be done for us; God helps them that help themselves, as Poor Richard says in his almanac of 1733.

"It would be thought a hard government that should tax its people one tenth part of their time, to be employed in its service; but idleness taxes many of us much more if we reckon all that is spent in absolute sloth, or doing of nothing, with that which is spent in idle employments or amusements, that amount to nothing. Sloth, by bringing on diseases, absolutely shortens life. Sloth, like rust, consumes faster than labor wears, while the used key is always bright, as Poor Richard says. But dost thou love life? Then do not squander time, for that's the stuff life is made of, as Poor Richard says. How much more than is necessary do we spend in sleep, forgetting that The sleeping fox catches no poultry, and that There will be sleeping enough in the grave, as Poor Richard says. If time be of all things the most precious, wasting time must be, as Poor Richard says, the greatest prodigality; since, as he elsewhere tells us, Lost time is never found again, and what we call time enough always proves little enough. Let us, then, up and be doing, and doing to the purpose; so by diligence shall we do more with less perplexity. Sloth makes all things difficult, but industry, all things easy, as Poor Richard says; and, He that riseth late must trot all day and shall scarce overtake his business at night; while Laziness travels so slowly that Poverty soon overtakes him, as we read in Poor Richard, who adds, Drive thy business, let not that drive thee; and, Early to bed, and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise.

"So what signifies wishing and hoping for better times? We may make these times better if we bestir ourselves. Industry need not wish. as Poor Richard says, and he that lives upon hope will die fasting. There are no gains without pains; then help, hands, for I have no lands: or, if I have, they are smartly taxed. And as Poor Richard likewise observes. He that hath a trade hath an estate; and he that hath a calling, hath an office of profit and honor; but then the trade must be worked at and the calling well followed, or neither the estate nor the office will enable us to pay our taxes. If we are industrious, we shall never starve; for, as Poor Richard says, At the workingman's house hunger looks in, but dares not enter. Nor will the bailiff or the constable enter; for Industry pays debts, while despair increaseth them, says Poor Richard.-What though you have found no treasure, nor has any rich relation left you a legacy; Diligence is the mother of good luck, as Poor Richard says, and God gives all things to Industry. Then plow deep while sluggards sleep, and you shall have corn to sell and to keep, says Poor Dick. Work while it is called today, for you know not how much you may be hindered tomorrow, which makes Poor Richard say, One today is worth two tomorrows; and farther, Have you somewhat to do tomorrow, do it today. If you were a servant, would you not be ashamed that a good master should catch you idle? Are you, then, your own master? Be ashamed to catch yourself idle, as Poor Dick says. When there is so much to be done for yourself, your family, your country, and your gracious King, be up by peep of day. Let not the sun look down and say, Inglorious here he lies. Handle your tools without mittens; remember that The cat in gloves catches no mice, as Poor Richard says. 'Tis true there is much to be done, and perhaps you are weak-handed; but stick to it steadily, and you will see great effects; for, Constant dropping wears away stones; and, By diligence and patience the mouse ate in two the cable; and, Little strokes fell great oaks, as Poor Richard says in his almanac, the year I cannot just now remember.

"Methinks I hear some of you say, Must a man afford himself no leisure? I will tell thee, my friend, what Poor Richard says: Employ thy time well, if thou meanest to gain leisure; and since thou art not sure of a minute, throw not away an hour. Leisure is time for doing something useful; this leisure the diligent man will obtain, but the lazy man never; so that, as Poor Richard says, A life of leisure and a life of laziness are two things. Do you imagine that sloth will afford you more comfort than labor? No, for as Poor Richard says, Trouble springs from idleness, and grievous toil from needless ease. Many, without labor, would live by their wits only, but they break for want of stock. Whereas industry gives comfort and plenty and respect. Fly pleasures and they'll follow you. The diligent spinner has a large shift; and now I have a sheep and a cow, everybody bids me good morrow. All which is well said by Poor Richard.

"But with our industry we must likewise be steady, settled, and careful, and oversee our own affairs with our own eyes, and not trust too much to others: for, as Poor Richard says:

I never saw an oft-removed tree, Nor yet an oft-removed family, That throve so well as those that settled be.

And again, Three removes is as bad as a fire; and again, Keep thy shop, and thy shop will keep thee; and again, If you would have your business done, go; if not, send. And again,

He that by the plow would thrive, Himself must either hold or drive.

And again, The eye of a master will do more work than both his hands; and again, Want of care does us more damage than want of knowledge; and again, Not to oversee workmen is to leave them your purse open. Trusting too much to others' care is the ruin of many; for, as the Almanac says. In the affairs of this world men are saved, not by faith, but by the want of it. But a man's own care is profitable; for, saith Poor Dick, Learning is to the studious, and riches to the careful, as well as Power to the bold, and heaven to the virtuous. And, farther, If you would have a faithful servant and one that you like, serve yourself. And again, he adviseth to circumspection and care, even in the smallest matters, because sometimes, A little neglect may breed great mischief; adding, For want of a nail the shoe was lost, for want of a shoe the horse was lost, and for want of a horse the rider was lost, being overtaken and slain by the enemy; all for want of care about a horseshoe nail.

"So much for industry, friends, and attention to one's own business; but to these we must add frugality, if we would make our industry more certainly successful. A man may, if he knows not how to save as he gets, keep his nose all his life to the grindstone, and die not worth a groat at last. A fat kitchen makes a lean will, as Poor Richard says; and

Many estates are spent in the getting, Since women for tea forsook spinning and knitting, And men for punch forsook hewing and splitting.

If you would be wealthy, says he, in another Almanac, Think of saving as well as of getting. The Indies have not made Spain rich, because her outgoes are greater than her incomes.

"Away, then, with your expensive follies, and you will not then have so much cause to complain of hard times, heavy taxes, and chargeable families; for, as Poor Dick says,

Women and wine, game and deceit, Make the wealth small, and the wants great.

And farther, What maintains one vice would bring up two children. You may think, perhaps that a little tea or a little punch now and then, diet a little more costly, clothes a little finer, and a little entertainment now and then, can be no great matter; but remember what Poor Richard says, Many a little makes a mickle; and farther, Beware of little expenses; A small leak will sink a great ship; and again, Who dainties love shall beggars prove; and moreover, Fools make feasts and wise men eat them.

"Here you are all got together at this vendue of fineries and knick knacks. You call them goods; but, if you do not take care, they will prove evils to some of you. You expect they will be sold cheap, and perhaps they may for less than they cost; but, if you have no occasion for them, they must be dear to you. Remember what Poor Richard says; Buy what thou hast no need of, and ere long thou shalt sell thy necessaries. And again, At a great pennyworth pause awhile. He means that perhaps the cheapness is apparent only, and not real; or, the bargain, by straitening thee in thy business, may do thee more harm than good. For in another place he says, Many have been ruined by buying good pennyworths. Again, Poor Richard says, 'Tis foolish to lay out money in a purchase of repentance; and yet this folly is practiced every day at vendues for want of minding the Almanac. Wise men, as Poor Dick says, learn by others' harms, fools scarcely by their own; but Felix quem facirent aliena pericula cautum. 1 Many a one, for the sake of finery on the back have gone with a hungry belly, and half-starved their families. and satins, scarlet and velvets, as Poor Richard says, put out the kitchen fire.

"These are not the necessaries of life; they can scarcely be called the conveniences; and yet, only because they look pretty, how many "Happy the man whom the experiences of others make cautious."

mankind thus become more numerous than the natural; and as Poor Dick says, For one poor person there are an hundred indigent. By these and other extravagancies the genteel are reduced to poverty, and forced to borrow of those whom they formerly despised, but who, through industry and frugality, have maintained their standing; in which case it appears plainly that, A plowman on his legs is higher than a gentleman on his knees, as Poor Richard says. Perhaps they have had a small estate left them which they knew not the getting of; they think, 'Tis day and will never be night: that a little to be spent out of so much is not worth minding: a child and a fool, as Poor Richard says, imagine twenty shillings and twenty years can never be spent, but, Always take out of the meal tub and never putting in, soon comes to the bottom; then as Poor Dick says, When the well's dry, they know the worth of water. But this they might have known before, if they had taken his advice. If you would know the value of money, go and try to borrow some; for, he that goes a borrowing goes a sorrowing; and, indeed, so does he that lends to such people, when he goes to get it in again. Poor Dick farther advises and says:

want to have them. The artificial wants of Fond pride of dress is sure a very curse; Ere fancy you consult, consult your purse.

And again, Pride is as loud a beggar as want, and a great deal more saucy. When you have bought one fine thing, you must buy ten more, that your appearance may be all of a piece; but Poor Dick says, 'Tis easier to suppress the first desire than to satisfy all that follow it. And 'tis as truly folly for the poor to ape the rich, as for the frog to swell in order to equal the ox.

Great estates may venture more, But little boats should keep near shore.

'Tis, however, a folly soon punished; for, Pride that dines on vanity, sups on contempt, as Poor Richard says. And in another place, Pride breakfasted with Plenty, dined with Poverty, and supped with Infamy. And, after all, of what use is this pride of appearance, for which so much is risked, so much is suffered? It cannot promote health or ease pain; it makes no increase of merit in the person, it creates envy, it hastens misfortune.

What is a butterfly? At best He's but a caterpillar dressed. The gaudy fop's his picture just.

as Poor Richard says.

"But what madness must it be to run in debt for these superfluities! We are offered by the terms of this vendue six months' credit; and that, perhaps, has induced some of us to attend it, because we cannot spare the ready money, and hope now to be fine without it. But ah. think what you do when you run in debt: you give to another power over your liberty. If you cannot pay at the time, you will be ashamed to see your creditor; you will be in fear when you speak to him: you will make poor, pitiful, sneaking excuses, and by degrees come to lose your veracity, and sink into base, downright lying: for, as Poor Richard says, The second vice is lying, the first is running in debt. And again to the same purpose, Lying rides upon debt's back; whereas a freeborn Englishman ought not to be ashamed or afraid to see or speak to any man living. But poverty often deprives a man of all spirit and virtue. 'Tis hard for an empty bag to stand upright, as Poor Richard truly says.

"What would you think of that prince, or that government, who should issue an edict forbidding you to dress like a gentleman or a gentlewoman, on pain of imprisonment or servitude? Would you not say that you are free. have a right to dress as you please, and that such an edict would be a breach of your privileges and such a government tyrannical? And yet you are about to put yourself under that tyranny, when you run in debt for such dress. Your creditor has authority, at his pleasure, to deprive you of your liberty by confining you in jail for life, or to sell you for a servant, if you should not be able to pay him. When you have got your bargain, you may, perhaps, think little of payment! But, Creditors, Poor Richard tells us, have better memories than debtors; and in another place says, Creditors are a superstitious sect, great observers of set days and times. The day comes round before you are aware, and the demand is made before you are prepared to satisfy it; or, if you bear your debt in mind, the term, which at first seemed so long, will, as it lessens, appear extremely short. Time will seem to have added wings to his heels as well as shoulders. Those have a short Lent, saith Poor Richard, who owe money to be paid at Easter. Then, since as he says, The borrower is a slave to the lender, and the debtor to the creditor, disdain the chain, preserve your freedom; and maintain your independency; be industrious and free; be frugal and free. At present, perhaps, you may think yourself in thriving circumstances, and that you can bear a little extravagance without injury; but

For age and want save while you may; No morning sun lasts a whole day, as Poor Richard says. Gain may be temporary and uncertain, but ever, while you live, expense is constant and certain; and, 'Tis easier to build two chimneys than to keep one in fuel, as Poor Richard says. So Rather go to bed supperless than rise in debt.

Get what you can, and what you get, hold; 'Tis the stone that will turn all your lead into gold, as Poor Richard says. And when you have got the philosopher's stone, sure you will no longer complain of bad times or the difficulty of paying taxes.

"This doctrine, my friends, is reason and wisdom; but, after all, do not depend too much upon your own industry and frugality and prudence, though excellent things; for they may all be blasted, without the blessing of Heaven; and, therefore, ask that blessing humbly, and be not uncharitable to those that at present seem to want it, but comfort and help them. Remember Job suffered, and was afterward prosperous.

"And now, to conclude, Experience keeps a dear school, but fools will learn in no other, and scarce in that; for, it is true, We may give advice, but we cannot give conduct, as Poor Richard says. However, remember this: They that won't be counseled can't be helped, as Poor Richard says; and farther that, If you will not hear Reason, she'll surely rap your knuckles."

Thus the old gentleman ended his harangue. The people heard it, and approved the doctrine, and immediately practiced the contrary, just as if it had been a common sermon; for the vendue opened and they began to buy extravagantly notwithstanding his cautions, and their own fear of taxes. I found the good man had thoroughly studied my almanacs, and digested all I had dropped on these topics during the course of five-and-twenty years. The frequent mention he made of me must have tired any one else; but my vanity was wonderfully delighted with it, though I was conscious that not a tenth part of the wisdom was my own which he ascribed to me, but rather the gleanings I had made of the sense of all ages and nations. However, I resolved to be the better for the echo of it; and, though I had at first determined to buy stuff for a new coat, I went away resolved to wear my old one a little longer. Reader, if thou wilt do the same, thy profit will be as great as mine. I am, as ever, thine to serve thee.

RICHARD SAUNDERS.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN FRANKLIN AND

Midnight, October 22, 1780.

Franklin. Eh! Oh! Eh! What have I done to merit these cruel sufferings?

Gout. Many things; you have ate and drank 2 too freely, and too much indulged those less of yours in their indolence.

Franklin. Who is it that accuses me?

Gout. It is I, even I, the Gout.

Franklin. What! my enemy in person?

Gout. No. not your enemy.

Franklin. I repeat it; my enemy; for you would not only torment my body to death, but ruin my good name; you reproach me as a glutton and a tippler; now all the world, that knows me, will allow that I am neither the one nor the other.

Gout. The world may think as it pleases; it is always very complaisant to itself, and sometimes to its friends; but I very well know that the quantity of meat and drink proper for a man who takes a reasonable degree of exercise, would be too much for another who never takes any.

Franklin. I take—Eh! Oh!—as much exercise—Eh!—as I can, Madam Gout. You know my sedentary state, and on that account, it would seem, Madam Gout, as if you might spare me a little, seeing it is not altogether my own fault.

Gout. Not a jot; your rhetoric and your politeness are thrown away; your apology avails nothing. If your situation in life is a sedentary one, your amusements, your recreations, at least, should be active. You ought to walk or ride; or, if the weather prevents that, play at billiards. But let us examine your course of life. While the mornings are long, and you have leisure to go abroad, what do you do? Why, instead of gaining an appetite for breakfast by salutary exercise, you amuse yourself with books, pamphlets, or newspapers, which commonly are not worth the reading. Yet you eat an inordinate breakfast, four dishes of tea with cream, and one or two buttered toasts, with slices of hung beef, which I fancy are not things the most easily digested. Immediately afterward you sit down to write at your desk, or converse with persons who apply to you on business. Thus the time passes till one, without any kind of bodily exercise. But all this I could pardon in regard, as you say, to your sedentary condition. But what is your practice after dinner? Walking in the beautiful gardens of those friends with whom you have dined would be the choice of men of sense; yours is to be fixed down to chess, where you are found engaged for two or three hours! This is your perpetual recreation, which is the least eligible of any for a sedentary man, because, instead of accelerating the motion of the fluids, 3 the rigid attention it requires helps to retard the circulation and obstruct internal secretions. Wrapt in the speculations of this wretched game, you destroy your constitution. What can be expected from such a course of living, but a body replete with stagnant humors, ready to fall a prey to all kinds of dangerous maladies, if I, the Gout, did not occasionally bring you relief by agitating those humors, and so purifying or dissipating them? If it was in some nook or alley in Paris, deprived of walks, that you played awhile at chess after dinner, this might be excusable; but the same taste prevails with you in Passy, Auteuil, Montmartre, or Sanoy, 4 places where there are the finest gardens and walks, a pure air, beautiful women, and most agreeable and instructive conversation; all which you might enjoy by frequenting the walks. But these are rejected for this abominable game of chess. Fie, then, Mr. Franklin! But amidst my instructions, I had almost forgot to administer my wholesome corrections; so take that twinge,-and that.

Franklin. Oh! Eh! Oh! Ohhh! As much instruction as you please, Madam Gout, and as many reproaches; but pray, madam, a truce with your corrections!

Gout. No, sir, no,—I will not abate a particle of what is so much for your good,—therefore—

Franklin. Oh! Ehhh!—It is not fair to say I take no exercise, when I do very often, going out to dine and returning in my carriage.

Gout. That, of all imaginable exercises, is the most slight and insignificant, if you allude to the motion of a carriage suspended on springs. By observing the degree of heat obtained by different kinds of motion, we may form an estimate of the quantity of exercise given by each. Thus, for example, if you turn out to walk in winter with cold feet, in an hour's

&lt;sup>1</sup> It is an interesting indication of the flexibility of Franklin's mind and the buoyancy of his spirit that he could in old age, with the fate of a nation often balancing in his hand, compose this playful little essay.

&lt;sup>2</sup> These forms were not incorrect in Franklin's time.

Any of the animal fluids: an echo of an old theory of medicine that the human body contained four humors, or fluids—blood, phlegm, yellow bile (choler), and black bile (melancholy); health depended upon keeping these active, and in the right proportions.

<sup>4</sup> places in which Franklin resided or which he visited time you will be in a glow all over: ride on horseback, the same effect will scarcely be perceived by four hours' round trotting; but if you loll in a carriage, such as you have mentioned. you may travel all day, and gladly enter the last inn to warm your feet by a fire. Flatter vourself then no longer, that half an hour's airing in your carriage deserves the name of exercise. Providence has appointed few to roll in carriages, while he has given to all a pair of legs, which are machines infinitely more commodious and serviceable. Be grateful, then. and make a proper use of yours. Would you know how they forward the circulation of your fluids, in the very action of transporting you from place to place: observe when you walk. that all your weight is alternately thrown from one leg to the other; this occasions a great pressure on the vessels of the foot, and repels their contents; when relieved, by the weight being thrown on the other foot, the vessels of the first are allowed to replenish, and by a return of this weight, this repulsion again succeeds; thus accelerating the circulation of the blood. The heat produced in any given time, depends on the degree of this acceleration; the fluids are shaken, the humors attenuated, the secretions facilitated, and all goes well; the cheeks are ruddy, and health is established. Behold your fair friend 1 at Auteuil, a lady who received from bounteous nature more really useful science, than half a dozen such pretenders to philosophy as you have been able to extract from all your books. When she honors you with a visit, it is on foot. She walks all hours of the day, and leaves indolence, and its concomitant maladies, to be endured by her horses. In this see at once the preservative of her health and personal charms. But when you go to Auteuil, you must have your carriage, though it is no further from Passy to Auteuil than from Auteuil to Passy.

Franklin. Your reasonings grow very tiresome.

Gout. I stand corrected. I will be silent and continue my office; take that, and that.

Franklin. Oh! Ohh! Talk on, I pray you! Gout. No, no; I have a good number of twinges for you tonight, and you may be sure of some more tomorrow.

Franklin. What, with such a fever! I shall go distracted. Oh! Eh! Can no one bear it for me?

Gout. Ask that of your horses; they have served you faithfully.

<sup>1</sup> Madam Helvetius, one of Franklin's intimate circle

Franklin. How can you so cruelly sport with my torments?

Gout. Sport! I am very serious. I have here a list of offences against your own health distinctly written, and can justify every stroke inflicted on you.

Franklin Read it then

Gout. It is too long a detail; but I will briefly mention some particulars.

Franklin. Proceed. I am all attention.

Gout. Do you remember how often you have promised yourself, the following morning, a walk in the grove of Boulogne, in the garden de la Muette, or in your own garden, and have violated your promise, alleging at one time it was too cold, at another too warm, too windy, too moist, or what else you pleased; when in truth it was too nothing, but your insuperable love of ease?

Franklin. That I confess may have happened occasionally, probably ten times in a year.

Gout. Your confession is very far short of the truth; the gross amount is one hundred and ninety-nine times.

Franklin. Is it possible?

Gout. So possible, that it is fact; you may rely on the accuracy of my statement. You know M. Brillon's 2 gardens, and what fine walks they contain; you know the handsome flight of an hundred steps, which lead from the terrace above to the lawn below. You have been in the practice of visiting this amiable family twice a week, after dinner, and it is a maxim of your own, that "a man may take as much exercise in walking a mile, up and down stairs, as in ten on level ground." What an opportunity was here for you to have had exercise in both these ways! Did you embrace it, and how often?

Franklin. I cannot immediately answer that question.

Gout. I will do it for you; not once.

Franklin. Not once?

Gout. Even so. During the summer you went there at six o'clock. You found the charming lady with her lovely children and friends eager to walk with you, and entertain you with their agreeable conversation; and what has been your choice? Why, to sit on the terrace, satisfying yourself with the fine prospect, and passing your eye over the beauties of the garden below, without taking one step to descend and walk about in them. On the contrary, you call for tea and the chessboard; and lo! you are occupied in your seat till nine o'clock, and that besides two hours' play after dinner; and then, instead of walking home, which would have bestirred you a little, you step into your carriage. How absurd to suppose that all this carelessness can be reconcilable with health, without my interposition!

<sup>2</sup> a French neighbor of Franklin's

Franklin. I am convinced now of the justness of Poor Richard's remark, that "Our debts and our sins are always greater than we think for"

Gout. So it is. You philosophers are sages in your maxims, and fools in your conduct.

Franklin. But do you charge among my crimes, that I return in a carriage from Mr. Brillon's?

Gout. Certainly; for, having been seated all the while, you cannot object the fatigue of the day, and cannot want therefore the relief of a carriage.

Franklin. What then would you have me do with my carriage?

Gout. Burn it if you choose; you would at least get heat out of it once in this way; or, if you dislike that proposal, here's another for you; observe the poor peasants, who work in the vineyards and grounds about the villages of Passy, Auteuil, Chaillot, etc.; you may find every day, among these deserving creatures, four or five old men and women, bent and perhaps crippled by weight of years, and too long and too great labor. After a most fatiguing day, these people have to trudge a mile or two to their smoky huts. Order your coachman to set them down. This is an act that will be good for your soul; and, at the same time, after your visit to the Brillons', if you return on foot, that will be good for your body.

Franklin. Ah! how tiresome you are!

Gout. Well, then, to my office; it should not be forgotten that I am your physician. There.

Franklin. Ohhh! what a devil of a physician! Gout. How ungrateful you are to say so! Is it not I who, in the character of your physician, have saved you from the palsy, dropsy, and apoplexy? one or other of which would have done for you long ago, but for me.

Franklin. I submit, and thank you for the past, but entreat the discontinuance of your visits for the future; for, in my mind, one had better die than be cured so dolefully. Permit me just to hint, that I have also not been unfriendly to you. I never feed physician or quack of any kind, to enter the list against you; if then you do not leave me to my repose, it may be said you are ungrateful too.

Gout. I can scarcely acknowledge that as any objection. As to quacks, I despise them; they may kill you indeed, but cannot injure me. And, as to regular physicians, they are at last convinced that the gout, in such a subject as you are, is no disease, but a remedy; and wherefore cure a remedy?—but to our business,—there Franklin. Oh! oh!—for Heaven's sake leave me! and I promise faithfully never more to play at chess, but to take exercise daily, and live temperately.

Gout. I know you too well. You promise fair; but, after a few months of good health, you will return to your old habits; your fine promises will be forgotten like the forms of last year's clouds. Let us then finish the account, and I will go. But I leave you with an assurance of visiting you again at a proper time and place; for my object is your good, and you are sensible now that I am your real friend.

1780

HECTOR ST. JOHN DE CRÈVE-COEUR 1735-1812

Crèvecoeur was born of a good family in Caen, Normandy. At the age of eighteen or ninetcen he came to America and entered the service of Montcalm in New France. As a surveyor and maker of maps, he apparently explored and mapped regions about the Great Lakes, and became acquainted with Upper Canada and the Ohio country. After about five years he came to New York, was naturalized, married, and settled in the forest region of Orange county, New York, about sixty miles from the city and twenty miles from West Point. In the Revolution he tried to remain neutral but, inclining toward the Royalist party, he retired to New York City. The British there thought him a spy, and after imprisoning him sent him to England where he was exchanged for a British prisoner and deported to France. After the war he returned to New York as French consul, serving for ten years. He died in France.

Though details of his early American life are uncertain, we may accept his own words: "I was never but a simple Surveyor of lands, a cultivator of my own grounds, or a wanderer through the forests of this country, in company with some of the natives." Evidently, few men of his day knew so much of French and British America from Lake Huron to the West Indies. His accounts of rural America, generally optimistic, sometimes tragic, show him to have been a close observer, with a love for the picturesque. He was touched with but not wholly won by Rousseau's doctrine that man is inherently good, was born free, but is corrupted by society. He never wholly mastered the English language, and his writings have been a good deal edited. But despite this fact, and despite his tendency to idealize too greatly rural provincial life, his observations give us the best picture of this life extant. His Letters from an American Farmer were published in London, 1782, and with additions from his manuscripts and variations by different editors, have been issued in many editions in America and upon the Continent. His Sketches of Eighteenth Century America were published from manuscripts in the hands of his French descendants, 1925.

For extracts from Crèvecoeur manuscripts, see the following, edited by H. L. Bourdin and S. T. Williams: "Crèvecoeur the Loyalist," Nation 121: 328-30, and "Crèvecoeur on the Susquehanna," Vale R. ns 14:552-84.

Biography: Julia Post Mitchell, 1916. Comment and criticism: H. L. Bourdin and S. T. Williams, "The American Farmer Returns," No. Am. 222:135-40; P. H. Boynton, "A Colonial Farmer's Letters," New Repub. 3:168-70; W. B. Blake, "Some Eighteenth Century Travelers in America," Dial 52:5-9; H. W. Boynton, "Letters from an American Farmer," Atlan. 94:847-8.

From LETTERS FROM AN AMERICAN FARMER

LETTER III. WHAT IS AN AMERICAN

I wish I could be acquainted with the feelings and thoughts which must agitate the heart and present themselves to the mind of an enlightened Englishman when he first lands on this continent. He must greatly rejoice that he lived at a time to see this fair country discovered and settled; he must necessarily feel a share of national pride when he views the chain of settlements which embellishes these extended shores. When he says to himself, this is the work of my countrymen who, when convulsed by factions, afflicted by a variety of miseries and wants, restless and impatient, took refuge here. They brought along with them their national genius, to which they principally owe what liberty they enjoy and what substance they possess. Here he sees the industry of his native country displayed in a new manner, and traces in their works the embryos of all the arts, sciences, and ingenuity which flourish in Europe. Here he beholds fair cities, substantial villages, extensive fields, an immense country filled with decent houses, good roads, orchards, meadows, and bridges, where an hundred years ago all was wild, woody and uncultivated! What a train of pleasing ideas this fair spectacle must suggest; it is a prospect which must inspire a good citizen with the most heartfelt pleasure. The difficulty consists in the manner of viewing so extensive a scene. He is arrived on a new continent; a modern society offers itself to his contemplation, different from what he had hitherto seen. It is not composed, as in Europe, of great lords who possess everything, and of a herd of people who have nothing. Here are no aristocratical families, no courts, no kings, no bishops, no ecclesiastical dominion, no invisible power giving to a few a very visible one; no great manufacturers employing thousands, no great refinements of luxury. The rich and the poor are not so far removed from each other as they are in Europe. Some few towns excepted, we are all tillers of the earth, from Nova Scotia to West Florida. We are a people of cultivators, scattered over an immense territory, communicating with each other by means of good roads and navigable rivers, united by the silken bands of mild government, all respecting the laws, without dreading their power, because they are equitable. We are all animated with the spirit of an industry which is unfettered and unrestrained, because each person works for himself. If he travels through our rural districts he views not the hostile castle, and the haughty mansion, contrasted with the clay-built hut and miserable cabin, where cattle and men help to keep each other warm, and dwell in meanness, smoke, and indigence. A pleasing uniformity of decent competence appears throughout our habitations. The meanest of our loghouses is a dry and comfortable habitation. Lawver or merchant are the fairest titles our towns afford: that of a farmer is the only appellation of the rural inhabitants of our country. It must take some time ere he can reconcile himself to our dictionary, which is but short in words of dignity, and names of honor. There, on a Sunday, he sees a congregation of respectable farmers and their wives, all clad in neat homespun, well mounted, or riding in their own humble wagons. There is not among them an esquire, saving the unlettered magistrate. There he sees a parson as simple as his flock, a farmer who does not riot on the labor of others. We have no princes, for whom we toil, starve, and bleed: we are the most perfect society now existing in the world. Here man is free as he ought to be; nor is this pleasing equality so transitory as many others are. Many ages will not see the shores of our great lakes replenished with inland nations, nor the unknown bounds of North America entirely peopled. Who can tell how far it extends? Who can tell the millions of men whom it will feed and contain? for no European foot has as yet traveled half the extent of this mighty continent! . . .

In this great American asylum, the poor of Europe have by some means met together, and in consequence of various causes; to what purpose should they ask one another what countrymen they are? Alas, two thirds of them had no country. Can a wretch who wanders about, who works and starves, whose life is a continual scene of sore affliction or pinching penury: can that man call England or any other kingdom his country? A country that had no bread for him, whose fields procured him no harvest, who met with nothing but the frowns of the rich, the severity of the laws, with jails and punishments: who owned not a single foot of the extensive surface of this planet? No! urged by a variety of motives, here they came. Everything has tended to regenerate them; new laws, a new mode of living, a new social system; here they are become men; in Europe they were as so many useless plants, wanting vegetative mould, and refreshing showers; they withered, and were mowed down by want, hunger, and war; but now by the power of transplantation, like all other plants they have taken root and flourished! Formerly they were not numbered in any civil lists of their country. except in those of the poor; here they rank as citizens. . . . . What then is the American, this new man? He is either an European, or the descendant of an European, hence that strange mixture of blood, which you will find in no other country. I could point out to you a family whose grandfather was an Englishman, whose wife was Dutch, whose son married a French woman, and whose present four sons have now four wives of different nations. He is an American, who leaving behind him all his ancient prejudices and manners, receives new ones from the new mode of life he has embraced, the new government he obeys, and the new rank he holds. He becomes an American by being received in the broad lap of our great Alma Mater. Here individuals of all nations are melted into a new race of men, whose labors and posterity will one day cause great changes in the world. Americans are the western pilgrims, who are carrying along with them that great mass of arts, sciences, vigor, and industry which began long since in the East; they will finish the great circle. The Americans were once scattered all over Europe; here they are incorporated into one of the finest systems of population which has ever appeared, and which will hereafter become distinct by the power of the different climates they inhabit. The American ought therefore to love this country much better than that wherein he or his forefathers were born. Here the rewards of his industry follow with equal steps the progress of his labor; his labor is founded on the basis of nature, self-interest; can it want a stronger allurement? Wives and children, who before in vain demanded of him a morsel of bread. now, fat and frolicsome, gladly help their father to clear those fields whence exuberant crops are to arise to feed and to clothe them all: without any part being claimed, either by a despotic prince, a rich abbot, or a mighty lord. Here religion demands but little of him; a small voluntary salary to the minister, and gratitude to God: can he refuse these? The American is a new man, who acts upon new principles; he must therefore entertain new ideas, and form new opinions. From involuntary idleness, servile dependence, penury, and useless labor, he has passed to toils of a very different nature, rewarded by ample subsistence.—This is an Ámerican.

From SKETCHES OF EIGHTEENTH CENTURY AMERICA

[VARIOUS RURAL SUBJECTS]

. . . . . I think we have made most rapid strides, considering that the country was but a huge wilderness fifty years ago without a path. You'd be astonished, were I to tell you the extent of its cleared ground, of its meadows, the number of its houses, inhabitants, etc. I have often amused myself with making an estimate of the sum of labor and then comparing it with the original and present value of the land. This fair estimate would be the strongest proof of our industry, an industry which the people of the South cannot boast of. for the evenness and fertility of their land are very superior to ours. There they labor with slaves; here we do everything ourselves. There they enjoy a variety of pleasures and pastimes; here we know of none except our frolics and going to the meeting on a Sunday.

The name "frolic" may perhaps scandalize you and make you imagine that we meet to riot together. Lest you should misunderstand me, give me leave to explain myself. I really know among us of no custom which is so useful and tends so much to establish the union and the little society which subsists among us. Poor as we are, if we have not the gorgeous balls, the harmonious concerts, and the shrill horn of Europe, yet, we dilate our hearts as well with the simple negro fiddle, and with our rum and water, as you do with your delicious wines. In the summer it often happens that either through sickness or accident some families are not able to do all they must do. Are we afraid, for instance, that we shall not be able to break up our summer fallow? In due time we invite a dozen neighbors who will come with their teams and finish it all in one day. At dinner we give them the hest victuals our farm affords; these are feasts the goodness of which greatly depends on the knowledge and ability of our wives. Pies, puddings, fowls, roasted and boiled-nothing is spared that can evince our gratitude. In the evening the same care is repeated, after which young girls and lads generally come from all parts to unite themselves to the assembly. As they have done no work, they generally come after supper and partake of the general dance. I have never been so happy in my life as when I have assisted at these simple merriments, and indeed they are the only ones I know. Each returns home happy and is satisfied, and our work is done.

If any of our wives are unable to spin that quantity of flax which was intended, they give out one pound to every one of their acquaintances. The youngsters take the same quantity. which they get spun by their sweethearts. The day is fixed when they all bring home the yarn to the house and receive in return a hearty supper and a dance. Can there be anything more harmless or more useful? The same is done for every species of labor. When my father 1 built his house he had had the stones previously pitched in large heaps, and the winter following he invited upwards of thirty people who came with their sleighs and horses. and brought him in one day upwards of five hundred loads. Had he been obliged to have done that himself, or to have hired it done. it would have cost him more than the house. We generally invite the minister of the precinct who partakes of the pleasures of the day, and who sanctifies by his presence the wellmeant labors of our people. Thus we help one another; thus by our single toils at home and our collective strength we remove many obstacles which no single family could do. Many swamps have been cleared in this manner to the great joy of the possessors who were not able to hire the work done.

.... Would you believe that the great electrical discoveries of Mr. Franklin have not only preserved our barns and our houses from the fire of heaven but have even taught our wives to multiply their chickens? The invisible effects of thunder are powerfully felt in the egg.

If, when a hen is hatching, there happens a great storm, not one chicken will appear. (I can express myself but very imperfectly.) To prevent this electrical mischief our wives, without going through a course of lectures, have been taught to place a piece of iron in the bottom of their hens' nests in such a manner that it touches the ground. By what magic I know not, but all the mischief is prevented. and the eggs bring prosperous chickens. Can the name of that distinguished, useful citizen be mentioned by an American without feeling a double sentiment: that of pleasure inspired by our calling him our countryman, and that of gratitude? Before the erection of his iron conductors, the mischiefs occasioned in Pennsylvania and everywhere else by the thunder annually amounted to a great sum. Now everyone may rest secure. These rods fetch from the clouds (strange to tell) that powerful fire and convey it into the earth alongside the very house which it would have consumed, had it accidentally fallen on the roof. Happy Pennsylvania! Thou Oueen of Provinces! Among the many useful citizens thou hast already produced, Benjamin Franklin is one of the most eminent of thy sons.

You have often admired our two-horse wag-They are extremely well-contrived and executed with a great deal of skill: and they answer with ease and dispatch all the purposes of a farm. A well-built wagon, when loaded, will turn in a very few more feet than its length, which is sixteen feet including the length of the tongue. We have room in what is called their bodies to carry five barrels of flour. We commonly put in them a ton of hav and often more. The load is built on shelvings fixed on their sides. A ladder of \( \sic \) stands erect in the front. [The hay is held in place] by means of a boom, one end of which passes through the ladder, and the other end [of which] is brought tight down and fastened to a staple in the hindmost axle-tree. Thus the whole is secured. We can carry twenty-five green oak rails, two thirds of a cord of wood, three thousand pounds of dung. In short there is no operation that ought to be performed on a farm but what is easily accomplished with one of these. We can lengthen them as we please, and bring home the body of a tree twenty or thirty feet long. We commonly carry with them thirty bushels of wheat and at sixty pounds to the bushel this makes a weight of eighteen hundred pounds, with which we can go forty miles a day with two horses.

<sup>1</sup> perhaps father-in-law

On a Sunday it becomes the family coach. We then take off the common, plain sides and fix on it others which are handsomely painted. The after-part, on which either our names or ciphers are delineated, hangs down back, suspended by neat chains. If it rains, flat hoops made on purpose are placed in mortises, and a painted cloth is spread and tied over the whole. Thus equipped, the master of the family can carry six persons either to church or to meetings. When roads are good we can travel seven miles an hour. In order to prevent too great shakings, our seats are suspended on wooden springs-a simple but very useful mechanism. These inventions and [this] neatness we owe to the original Dutch settlers. I do not know where an American farmer can possibly enjoy more dignity as a father or as a citizen than when he thus carries with him his wife and family all clad in good, neat homespun clothes, manufactured within his own house, and trots along with a neat pair of fat horses of his own raising. The single-horse Irish car, with wheels not above two feet high, must appear very inferior to our wagons, and yet several people from that country have told me that the whole internal trade of that kingdom is effected with no other carriages. Exclusive of these middlesized wagons there are many public ones, driven by six horses, which carry great burthens. In the southern provinces, where the roads are level, they use no other. We generally pay for ours from fifty to sixty dollars. The Dutch build them with timber which has been previously three years under water and then gradually seasoned. . . .

.... It is in this [the winter] season that the hospitality of the Americans is most conspicuous. The severity of the climate requires that all our doors should be opened to the frozen traveler, and indeed we shut them not by night or by day at any time of the year. The traveler when cold has a right to stop and warm himself at the first house he sees. He freely goes to the fire, which is kept a-burning all night. There he forgets the keenness of the cold; he smokes his pipe; drinks of the cider which is often left on the hearth; and departs in peace. We always sleep in these rooms; at least I do, and have often seen mine full when I was in my bed. On waking I have sometimes spoken to them; at other times it was a silent meeting. The reasons which force these people to travel in these dreadful nights is that they may be able to return home the same day. They are farmers carrying their produce to the market, and their great distance from it obliges them to set out sometimes at twelve o'clock. Far from being uneasy at seeing my house thus filled while my wife and I are abed, I think it, on the contrary, a great compliment, when I consider that by thus stopping they convince me that they have thought my house and my fire better than that of my neighbors.

THOMAS GODFREY 1736-1765

Godfrey, the first American dramatist, was born in Philadelphia. His father, a friend of Franklin, was a glazier and mathematician who died when the son was thirteen years old, leaving him to be a watchmaker's apprentice. After a short experience as a soldier, Godfrey removed to North Carolina, where, about 1759, he wrote The Prince of Parthia, a blank verse tragedy, the first drama written in America. This with his poems was printed in Philadelphia, 1765, but was not acted until 1767.

Godfrey's lyrics, though conventional and imitative, following the eighteenth century models, are quite as good as many of their type produced at the same time by poets of reputation in England. They show America awakening to artistic self-consciousness.

For Prince of Parthia, see A. H. Quinn, Representative American Plays, 1917.

THE INVITATION

Damon. 1 Haste, Sylvia, haste, my charming

Let's leave these fashionable toys:
Let's seek the shelter of some shade,
And revel in ne'er fading joys.
See, Spring in livery gay appears,
And winter's chilly blasts are fled;
Each grove its leafy honors rears,
And meads their lovely verdure spread.

Sylvia. Yes, Damon, glad I'll quit the town;
Its gayeties now languid seem:
Then sweets to luxury unknown
We'll taste, and sip the untainted stream.
In Summer's sultry noon-tide heat
I'll lead thee to the shady grove,
There hush thy cares, or pleased repeat
Those yows that won my soul to love.

Damon. When o'er the mountain peeps the dawn.

And round her ruddy beauties play,
I'll wake my love to view the lawn,
Or hear the warblers hail the day.
But without thee the rising morn
In vain awakes the cooling breeze:

Damon and Sylvia are conventional pastoral names for shepherd and shepherdess.

20

In vain does nature's face adorn-Without my Sylvia nought can please.

Sylvia. At night, when universal gloom Hides the bright prospects from our view. When the gay groves give up their bloom And verdant meads their lovely hue. Though fleeting specters round me move. 30 When in thy circling arms I'm prest, I'll hush my rising fears with love. And sink in slumber on thy breast.

Damon. The new-blown rose, whilst on its leaves

Yet the bright scented dew-drop's found. Pleased on thy bosom whilst it heaves, Shall shake its heavenly fragrance round. Then mingled sweets the sense shall raise. Then mingled beauties catch the eve: What pleasure on such charms to gaze, What rapture 'mid such sweets to lie!

Sylvia. How sweet thy words! But. Damon. cease.

Nor strive to fix me ever here: Too well you know these accents please, That oft have filled my ravished ear. Come, lead me to these promised joys That dwelt so lately on thy tongue; Direct me by thy well-known voice, And calm my transports with thy song! 1758 1758

A DITHYRAMBIC ON WINE

Come! let Mirth our hours employ, The jolly God inspires; The rosy juice our bosom fires, And tunes our souls to joy. See, great Bacchus 1 now descending, Gay, with blushing honors crowned; Sprightly Mirth and Love attending, Around him wait, In smiling state— Let Echo resound Let Echo resound The joyful news all around.

 $\Pi$

Fond Mortals come, if love perplex, In wine relief you'll find; Who'd whine for woman's giddy sex More fickle than the wind?

If beauty's bloom thy fancy warms. Here see her shine. Clothed in superior charms: 20 More lovely than the blushing morn, When first the opening day Bedecks the thorn. And makes the meadows gay. Here see her in her crystal shrine: See and adore: confess her all divine. The Queen of Love and Joy Heed not thy Chloe's 2 scorn-This sparkling glass. With winning grace. 30 Shall ever meet thy fond embrace. And never, never, never clov. No never, never clov.

TTT

Here, Poet, see, Castalia's 3 spring-

Come, give me a bumper, I'll mount to the skies. Another, another—'Tis done! I arise: On fancy's wing. I mount, I sing, And now, sublime, Parnassus' lofty top I climb-40 But hark! what sounds are these I hear. Soft as the dream of her in love. Or zephyrs whispering through the grove? And now, more solemn far than funeral woe. The heavy numbers flow! And now again.

The varied strain. Grown louder and bolder, strikes quick on the And thrills through every vein.

TV

'Tis Pindar's 4 song! 50 His softer notes the fanning gales Waft across the spicy vales. While through the air, Loud whirlwinds bear The harsher notes along. Inspired by wine, He leaves the lazy crowd below, Who never dared to peep abroad, And, mounting to his native sky,

For ever there shall shine. No more I'll plod The beaten road;

60

<sup>2</sup> conventional pastoral name for a young woman
 <sup>3</sup> A spring upon Mount Parnassus; it was sacred to Apollo, god of poetry, and to the Muses.
 <sup>4</sup> Pindar, a Greek lyric poet of the fifth century, B.C., wrote hymns in honor of Dionysus, the Greek god of wine. Pindar's poetry is not, however, characteristically bacchanalian.

<sup>1</sup> god of wine and revelry

70

Like him inspired, like him I'll mount high; Like his my strain shall flow.

Haste, ye mortals! leave your sorrow; Let pleasure crown today-tomorrow Vield to fate. Join the universal chorus.

Bacchus reigns Ever great:

Bacchus reigns Ever glorious-

Hark! the joyful groves rebound. Sporting breezes catch the sound, And tell to hill and dale around-

"Bacchus reigns"-While far away. The busy echoes die away. 1

PHILLIS WHEATLEY c 2 1754-1784

Phillis, a negro slave just from Africa, was bought in Boston in 1761 by John Wheatley, a resident of the city. She was about seven years old. Showing remarkable precocity, she was encouraged in study and made much of for her ability to write verses. She went with the family to London in 1773, where in the same year her poems were published, dedicated to the Countess of Huntingdon. She died in Boston. It is interesting that one in her situation could so far master the verse form and appropriate the literary vocabulary and phraseology of the day that her work will bear not unfavorable comparison with much of the poetry then current in England and America.

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE WILLIAM,

EARL OF DARTMOUTH, 3 HIS MAJESTY'S PRINCIPAL SECRETARY OF STATE FOR NORTH AMERICA, ETC.

Hail; happy day, when, smiling like the Fair freedom rose New England to adorn; The northern clime beneath her genial ray, Dartmouth, congratulates thy blissful sway; Elate with hope her race no longer mourns,

1"As our Poet appears so warm on his subject it may not be amiss to remark here, that he never drault any wine, and that his bumpers are all ideal, which may serve, perhaps, as a refutation of that noted adage, that a water drinker can never he a good Dithyrambic Poet." Duycknick's note in his Cyclopaedia of American Literature.

2 L. circa, about
3 The people of Boston, in the commercial distress brought upon them by the repressive measures of the English government, hoped much from the Earl of Dartmouth, who was a man of great integrity and piety. He had before this been president of the Board of Trade and Foreign Plantations in London, the organization that had controlled the colonies. controlled the colonies.

Each soul expands, each grateful bosom burns, While in thine hand with pleasure we behold The silken reins, and freedom's charms unfold. Long lost to realms beneath the northern skies She shines supreme, while hated faction dies: Soon as appeared the goddess long desired, 11 Sick at the view, she languished and expired; Thus from the splendors of the morning light The owl in sadness seeks the caves of night.

No more, America, in mournful strain Of wrongs, and grievances unredressed complain:

No longer shall thou dread the iron chain, Which wanton tyranny with lawless hand Had made, and with it meant to enslave the

Should you, my lord, while you peruse my Wonder from whence my love of freedom sprung.

Whence flow the wishes for the common good. By feeling hearts alone best understood, I, young in life, by seeming cruel fate Was snatched from Afric's fancied happy seat: What pangs excruciating must molest, What sorrows labor in my parents' breast? Steeled was that soul, and by no misery moved, That from a father seized his babe beloved; Such such my case. And can I then but pray Others may never feel tyrannic sway?

For favors past, great sir, our thanks are due.

And thee we ask thy favors to renew, Since in thy power, as in thy will before, To soothe the griefs, which thou didst once deplore.

May heavenly grace the sacred sanction give To all thy works, and thou forever live Not only on the wings of fleeting fame, Though praise immortal crowns the patriot's

But to conduct to heaven's refulgent fane, May fiery coursers sweep the ethereal plain, And bear thee upwards to that blest abode, Where, like the prophet, thou shalt find thy God.

1773

HIS EXCELLENCY GENERAL WASHINGTON

Celestial Choir! 4 enthroned in realms of light, Columbia's scenes of glorious toils I write. While freedom's cause her anxious breast alarms,

4 the Muses

She flashes dreadful in refulgent arms.

See mother earth her offspring's fate bemoan, And nations gaze at scenes before unknown! See the bright beams of heaven's revolving Involved in sorrows and the veil of night!

The goddess comes, she moves divinely fair,
Olive and laurel binds her golden hair:

Wherever shines this native of the skies.

Unnumbered charms and recent graces rise.

Muse! bow propitious while my pen relates How pour her armies through a thousand gates,

As when Aeolus <sup>1</sup> heaven's fair face deforms, Enwrapped in tempest and a night of storms; Astonished ocean feels the wild uproar,

The refluent surges beat the sounding shore; Or thick as leaves in autumn's golden reign, <sup>19</sup> Such, and so many, moves the warrior's train. In bright array they seek the work of war, Where high unfurled the ensign waves in air. Shall I to Washington their praise recite? Enough thou knowest them in the fields of fight.

Thee, first in place and honors,—we demand The grace and glory of thy martial band. Famed for thy valor, for thy virtues more, Hear every tongue thy guardian aid implore!

One century scarce performed its destined round, 29

When Gallic powers <sup>2</sup> Columbia's fury found; And so may you, whoever dares disgrace The land of freedom's heaven-defended race! Fixed are the eyes of nations on the scales, For in their hopes Columbia's arm prevails. Anon Britannia droops the pensive head, While round increase the rising hills of dead. Ah! cruel blindness to Columbia's state! Lament thy thirst of boundless power too late.

Proceed, great chief, with virtue on thy side, Thy every action let the goddess guide. <sup>40</sup> A crown, a mansion, and a throne that shine With gold unfading, Washington! be thine.

1776

TIMOTHY DWIGHT 1752-1817

Dwight, Trumbull, and Barlow were among a group of young men living in or near Hartford, Yale graduates, and known as the "Hartford Wits" (intellectuals). Some of them had been tutors at Yale, and were aware of the shortcomings of the infant United States in educational methods and in literature. They instituted some reforms in the Yale courses of study, and in their writings sought mostly to develop an energetic style and to write upon American subjects.

Dwight was born at Northampton, Massachusetts, a grandson of Jonathan Edwards. Although he is said to have been able to pass the Yale entrance examinations at the age of seven, he did not enter until the maturer age of thirteen. He was chosen tutor at nineteen. He entered the ministry in 1777 and served as chaplain in the American army. From 1795 until his death at New Haven he was president of Yale College and one of the most influential men in its history. His published works include The Conquest of Canaan, 1785; The Triumph of Infidelity, 1788; Greenfield Hill, 1794; Travels in New England and New York, 1821-1822.

Perhaps Dwight wished to be remembered for his poetry. Though some of Dwight's verse consists of social satire, and his themes are often American, he was less successful in poetry than Trumbull and Barlow. He will be known to students of American social history through his Travels, which are painstaking, accurate, and still readable, containing valuable observations and statistics.

L. Hayward, "An Early Writer of New England Travels," New Eng. M. ns 23:256-62.

COLUMBIA 3

Columbia, Columbia, to glory arise,
The queen of the world, and the child of the skies:

Thy genius commands thee; with rapture behold,

While ages on ages thy splendors unfold. Thy reign is the last and the noblest of time; Most fruitful thy soil, most inviting thy clime; Let the crimes of the East ne'er encrimson thy name:

Be freedom and science and virtue thy fame.

To conquest and slaughter let Europe aspire, Whelm nations in blood, and wrap cities in fire:

Thy heroes the rights of mankind shall defend, And triumphs pursue them, and glory attend. A world is thy realm: for a world be thy laws, Enlarged as thine empire, and just as thy cause:

On Freedom's broad basis that empire shall rise

Extend with the main, and dissolve with the skies.

Fair Science her gates to thy sons shall unbar, And the east see thy morn hide the beams of her star:

New bards and new sages, unrivaled, shall soar To fame unextinguished when time is no more; To thee, the last refuge of virtue designed, 21 Shall fly from all nations the best of mankind;

&lt;sup>1</sup> god of the winds
<sup>2</sup> The forces of France (ancient Gaul) in America were overcome in the French and Indian War.

&lt;sup>3</sup> composed when Dwight was stationed, as chaplain in the Revolutionary army, at West Point

Here, grateful to Heaven, with transport shall bring

Their incense, more fragrant than odors of spring.

Nor less shall thy fair ones to glory ascend, And genius and beauty in harmony blend; The graces of form shall awake pure desire,

And the charms of the soul ever cherish the fire:

Their sweetness unmingled, 1 their manners re-

And virtue's bright image instamped on the

When peace and soft rapture shall teach life to glow.

And light up a smile in the aspect of woe.

Thy fleets to all regions thy power shall display,

The nations admire, and the ocean obey; Each shore to thy glory its tribute unfold,

And the East and the South yield their spices and gold.

As the day-spring abounded, thy splendor shall

And earth's little kingdoms before thee shall bow:

While the ensigns of union, in triumph unfurled, Hush the tumult of war, and give peace to the world.

Thus, as down a lone valley, with cedars o'erspread.

From war's dread confusion I pensively strayed—

The gloom from the face of fair heaven retired, The winds ceased to murmur, the thunders expired;

Perfumes, as of Eden, flowed sweetly along, And a voice, as of angels, enchantingly sung: "Columbia, Columbia, to glory arise,

The queen of the world, and the child of the skies."

1777

From THE TRIUMPH OF INFIDELITY

THE SMOOTH DIVINE 2

There smiled the smooth Divine, unused to wound

<sup>1</sup> unalloyed
<sup>2</sup> This selection is part of a long poetical satire called The Triumph of Infidelity, 1788, dedicated to M. Voltaire. Professor Wendell points out that the poem is directed specifically against the new liberalism of belief already growing up in Boston, centering in the worship at King's Chapel with its liturgy newly modified in 1785.

The sinner's heart with hell's alarming sound. No terrors on his gentle tongue attend; No grating truths the nicest ear offend.

hat strange new-birth, that methodistic

Nor in his heart nor sermons found a place.

Plato's fine tales he clumsily retold.

Trite, fireside, moral seesaws, dull as old;

His Christ and Bible placed at good remove, Guilt hell-deserving, and forgiving love.

'T was best, he said, mankind should cease to Good fame required it; so did peace within.

Their honors, well he knew, would ne'er be driven;

But hoped they still would please to go to heaven.

Each week he paid his visitation dues; 4

Coaxed, jested, laughed; rehearsed the private news:

Smoked with each goody, thought her cheese excelled:

Her pipe he lighted, 5 and her baby held.

Or placed in some great town, with lacquered shoes

Trim wig, and trimmer gown, and glistening hose,

He bowed, talked politics, learned manners mild,

Most meekly questioned, and most smoothly smiled:

At rich men's jests laughed loud, their stories praised:

Their wives' new patterns gazed, and gazed, and

Most daintily on pampered turkeys dined:

Nor shrunk with fasting, nor with study pined: Yet from their churches saw his brethren driven.

Who thundered truth, and spoke the voice of heaven.

Chilled trembling guilt in Satan's headlong path, Charmed the feet back, and roused the ear of death

"Let fools," he cried, "starve on, while prudent I Snug in my nest shall live, and snug shall die."

1788

3 The doctrines of the necessity of the new birth or conversion and of the presence in the heart of divine grace were fundamental with Methodism, and Methodism was held somewhat in contempt by the most liberal persons of other sects.

pastoral calls due
 Smoking was not unusual among women of the common people.

10

20

LOVE TO THE CHURCH 1

I love thy kingdom, Lord,
The house of thine abode,
The church our blest Redeemer saved
With his own precious blood.

I love thy church, O God! Her walls before thee stand, Dear as the apple of thine eye, And graven on thy hand.

If e'er to bless thy sons
My voice or hands deny,
These hands let useful skill forsake,
This voice in silence die.

For her my tears shall fall,
For her my prayers ascend;
To her my cares and toils be given
Till toils and cares shall end.

If e'er my heart forget Her welfare or her woe, Let every joy this heart forsake,' And every grief o'erflow.

Beyond my highest joy
I prize her heavenly ways,
Her sweet communion, solemn vows,
Her hymns of love and praise.

Jesus, thou friend divine,
Our Saviour and our King,
Thy hand from every snare and foe
Shall great deliverance bring.

Sure as thy truth shall last,
To Zion shall be given
The brightest glories earth can yield,
And brighter bliss of heaven.

1800

JOHN TRUMBULL 1750-1831

Trumbull, a wide-awake educator and politician, seeing faults in the education and government of his day, was one of the first and ablest of American satirists. He was born in an intellectual and prominent Connecticut family at Watertown, entered Yale in his fourteenth year, and was appointed tutor in 1771. He studied law with John Adams in Boston, was a member of the Connecticut legislature, and judge of the Connecticut Superior Court 1801-1825. His chief poems are The Progress of Dulness, 1772, and M'Fingal, 1775-83. Throughout

This hymn, founded on Psalm exxxvii, is perhaps the best of the Puritan hymns. his life he was a contributor of political articles to the press. His Poems were published in 1820.

It is by the political and social satire M'Fingal that Trumbull will long have a place in American literature. This poem was undertaken, the author says, "with a political view, at the instigation of some of the leading members of the first Congress. who urged him to compose a satirical poem on the events of the campaign in the year 1775." He aimed to express, "in a poetical manner, a general account of the American contest, . . . and with as much impartiality as possible satirize the follies and extravagances of my countrymen as well as of their enemies." The first three cantos were published in Philadelphia in 1775 during the session of Congress. The indebtedness of Trumbull to Samuel Butler's Hudibras (1663), a satire upon the English Puritans, is very evident, both in form and manner, yet Trumbull's wit is quite his own. Thirty editions were printed within a few years. Tyler thinks M'Fingal" one of the world's masterpieces in political badinage," and also "a genuine embodiment of the spirit and life of a people."

M. C. Tyler, Three Men of Letters, 1895.

From M'FINGAL <sup>2</sup> Canto I

THE TOWN-MEETING, A. M.

When Yankees, skilled in martial rule, 3 First put the British troops to school; Instructed them in warlike trade, And new maneuvers of parade. The true war-dance of Yankee reels, And manual exercise of heels: Made them give up, like saints complete, The arm of flesh, and trust the feet. And work, like Christians undissembling, Salvation out, by fear and trembling; Taught Percy fashionable races. 4 And modern modes of Chevy Chases: From Boston, in his best array, Great 'Squire M'FINGAL took his way, And graced with ensigns of renown, Steered homeward to his native town.

His high descent our heralds trace

<sup>2</sup> M'Fingal represents the typical loyalist magistrate, assiduous in his support of law lest his office be taken from him. The mock epic or mock heroic of which this poem is a type, burlesques the heroic epic in structure, phrase, and diction, often producing its best effects by a mingling of the lofty and the commonplace.

This opening passage refers especially to the flight of the British regular troops before the colonial minute men from Concord to Boston, April 19, 1775. Sir Hugh Percy, in command of the British forces on this retreat, was said to be descended from the chieftain who led the English against the Scotch in the battle of Otterburn or, as it is often called, Chevy Chase, in 1388.

10

From Ossian's famed Fingalian race: 1 For though their name some part may lack, Old Fingal spelled it with a MAC; Which great Macpherson, with submission, We hope will add the next addition.

His fathers flourished in the Highlands Of Scotia's fog-benighted islands; Whence gained our 'Squire two gifts by right, Rebellion and the second-sight. 2 Of these, the first, in ancient days, Had gained the noblest palm of praise, 'Gainst kings stood forth and many a crowned head With terror of its might confounded;

Till rose a king with potent charm 3 His foes by meekness to disarm, Whom every Scot and Jacobite Strait fell in love with at first sight: Whose gracious speech with aid of pensions, Hushed down all murmurs of dissensions, And with the sound of potent metal Brought all their buzzing swarms to settle; Who rained his ministerial manna, 4 Till loud Sedition sung hosanna; The grave lords-bishops and the kirk United in the public work; Rebellion, from the northern regions. With Bute and Mansfield 5 swore allegiance, All hands combined to raze, as nuisance, Of church and state the constitutions, 6 Pull down the empire, on whose ruins They meant to edify their new ones; Enslave the American wildernesses, And rend the provinces in pieces. . With these our 'Squire, among the valiant'st.

With these our 'Squire, among the valiant'st,

1 James Macpherson, a Scotchman, published in 1762 an epic poem, Fingal, which he said was the work of Ossian, son of Fingal, a Celtic chieftain. The poem, though founded on epic fragments, is probably a forgery, the work of Macpherson or his friends. According to Scotch custom, Ossian should properly be called Ossian Mac Fingal (son of Fingal). The last word in 1. 22 should probably read edition in reference to the great popularity of Macpherson's work.

2 The Highlanders had supported the Stuarts against the established kings of the House of Hanover. Second-sight, a kind of clairvoyance, was long believed in among them. The fourth canto of M'Fingal is the vision of the squire.

3 George III had begun his reign in the hope of reducing parties and leaders to his own will by means of royal patronage. By the Whigs he was thought too favorably inclined toward the Scotch, who had generally supported the Jacobites, followers of James (Jacobus) Stuart and his heirs, in their endeavor to put back the Stuarts on the English throne.

4 offices and pensions

5 John Stuart, Earl of Bute, was prime minister in 1762-3. James Mansfield, solicitor-general, was greatly disliked by the colonists, since his official duties often bore against them; and since they also suspected him of favoring the Catholics.

6 The English ministers had proposed to "reform the American charters," an interference the colonists greatly dreaded.

greatly dreaded.

Employed his time, and tools, and talents. And found this new rebellion pleasing As his old king-destroying treason. .

The Town, our hero's scene of action, 110 Had long been torn by feuds of faction. And as each party's strength prevails, It turned up different, heads or tails; With constant rattling, in a trice, Showed various sides, as oft as dice. As that famed weaver, wife to Ulysses By night her day's-work picked in pieces, And though she stoutly did bestir her, Its finishing was ne'er the nearer: So did this town with ardent zeal 120 Weave cobwebs for the public weal, Which when completed, or before, A second vote in pieces tore. They met, made speeches full long-winded. Resolved, protested and rescinded; Addresses signed; then chose committees To stop all drinking of Bohea teas; 8 With winds of doctrine veered about, And turned all Whig committees out. 9 Meanwhile our hero, as their head, 130 In pomp the Tory faction led, Still following, as the 'Squire should please, Successive on, like files of geese.

And now the town was summoned, greeting, To grand parading of town-meeting; A show, that strangers might appall, As Rome's grave senate did the Gaul. 10 High o'er the rout, on pulpit stairs, Mid den of thieves in house of prayers, (That house, which loth a rule to break Served heaven but one day in the week, Open the rest for all supplies Of news, and politics, and lies) Stood forth the constable; and bore His staff, like Mercury's wand of yore, 11 Waved potent round, the peace to keep, As that laid dead men's souls to sleep. Above and near the hermetic staff, The moderator's 12 upper half In grandeur o'er the cushion bowed, Like Sol half seen behind a cloud.

Penelope, in the twenty years' absence of her husband, Ulysses, was courted by many suitors. To these she declared that she would not marry until she had finished weaving a certain rich robe. Each night she would unravel what she had woven by day until she had delayed her suitors for three years. Odyssey, xix, 140.

suntil the tax on tea should be abolished

The colonial Whigs stood for more liberal ideas than the colonial Tories.

There is a legend that when in 390 B.C. the victorious Gauls entered Rome, they were for a moment overawed by the sight of the Roman senators seated in their official seats in the Forum.

11 See any classical encyclopedia.

12 chairman's

10

30

Beneath stood voters of all colors. Whigs, Tories, orators, and brawlers; With every tongue in either faction Prepared like minute-men for action: Where truth and falsehood, wrong and right. Draw all their legions forth to fight. With equal uproar scarcely rave Opposing winds in Aeolus' cave: Such dialogues with earnest face 160 Held never Balaam with his ass.

CANTO II

THE TOWN-MEETING, P. M. 1

The Sun, who never stops to dine. Two hours had passed the mid-way line, And driving at his usual rate. Lashed on his downward car of state. And now expired the short vacation, And dinner o'er in epic fashion, While all the crew, beneath the trees, Eat pocket-pies, or bread and cheese, (Nor shall we, like old Homer, 2 care To versify their bill of fare) Each active party, feasted well, Thronged in, like sheep, at sound of bell; With equal spirit took their places, And meeting oped with three Oh Yesses: 3 When first, the daring Whigs to oppose, Again the great M'Fingal rose, Stretched magisterial arm amain, And thus resumed the accusing strain.

"Ye Whigs attend, and hear affrighted The crimes whereof ye stand indicted; The sins and follies past all compass, That prove you guilty, or non compos. I leave the verdict to your senses, And jury of your consciences; Which though they're neither good nor true, Must yet convict you and your crew.

"Ungrateful sons! a factious band, That rise against your parent land! Ye viper race, that burst in strife The genial womb that gave you life, Tear with sharp fangs and forked tongue The indulgent bowels whence ye sprung; And scorn the debt and obligation, You justly owe the British nation,

<sup>1</sup> The assembling of the voters of the township for an all-day's session or "town meeting" with an hour's interval for luncheon is a custom still observed

Which since you cannot pay, your crew Affect to swear was never due. "Did not the deeds of England's primate 4 First drive your fathers to this climate, Whom jails and fines and every ill 40 Forced to their good against their will? Ye owe to their obliging temper The peopling your new-fangled empire. While every British act and canon Stood forth your causa sine qua non. 5 Who'd seen, except for these restraints. Your witches, Quakers, Whigs, and saints, Or heard of Mather's famed Magnalia, 6 If Charles and Laud had chanced to fail you? 7 Did they not send your charters o'er. And give you lands you owned before. 8 Permit you all to spill your blood, And drive out heathen where you could: On these mild terms, that, conquest won, The realm you gained should be their own? And when of late attacked by those, Whom her connection made your foes, Did they not then, distressed by war. Send generals to your help from far, o Whose aid you owned, in terms less haughty, And thankfully o'er paid your quota? Sav. at what period did they grudge To send you governor or judge, With all their missionary crew, 10 To teach you law and gospel too? They brought all felons in the nation To help you on in population: Proposed their bishops to surrender, And made their priests a legal tender. Who only asked, in surplice clad, 70 The simple tithe 11 of all you had: And now, to keep all knaves in awe, Have sent their troops to establish law, And with gunpowder, fire and ball, Reform your people, one, and all.

interval for luncheon is a custom still observed in some states.

Homer sometimes particularizes carefully the kinds and abundance of food at the feasts of his heroes.

"Oyez," or "Oyes," meaning "Hear ye!" from the French verb ouir, hear, is the call of the crier for attention at the beginning of a session of court or town meeting.

William Laud, primate of England 1633-40, by his rigorous policy toward nonconformists caused thousands of them to settle in the colonies.

<sup>5</sup> indispensable cause or condition
6 Cotton Maher's Magnalia Christi Americana; or Ecclesiastical History of New England. See p. 40 ff.
7 Charles I was very slow to grant political rights to the colonists. 8 The colonists felt that they had fully won their domain by force of conquest and that they held it more rightfully thus than by grace of the English sovereign.

sovereign.

The generals sent over by England were often, like Braddock, incompetent to face the situations of colonial warfare. The colonies, nevertheless, supplied more than their quota of troops.

There were now some two hundred and fifty Episcopal clergymen in the colonies, all missionaries under charge of the bishop of London. The colonists greatly feared that a bishop would be sent to America, with authority over the churches and having temporal as well as spiritual powers, as in England. England.

<sup>11</sup> A tenth part; in England the church was supported by a tax of one-tenth the produce of the soil.

Yet when their insolence and pride Have angered all the world beside: When fear and want at once invade, Can you refuse to lend them aid. And rather risk your heads in fight. Q٨ Than gratefully throw in your mite? Can they for debts make satisfaction, Should they dispose their realm at auction. And sell off Britain's goods and land all To France and Spain, by inch of candle? 1 Shall good King George, with want oppressed. Insert his name in bankrupt list. And shut up shop, like failing merchant, That fears the bailiffs should make search in't: With poverty shall princes strive, And nobles lack whereon to live? Have they not racked their whole inventions To feed their brats on posts and pensions; 2 Made their Scotch friends with taxes groan. And picked poor Ireland to the bone: Yet have on hand, as well deserving, Ten thousand bastards, left for starving? And can you now, with conscience clear, Refuse them an asylum here, And not maintain, in manner fitting, 100 These genuine sons of mother Britain?"

CANTO III

THE LIBERTY POLE 3

Now warm with ministerial ire. Fierce sallied forth our loyal 'Squire, And on his striding steps attends His desperate clan of Tory friends. When sudden met his wrathful eye A pole ascending through the sky, Which numerous throngs of Whiggish race Were raising in the market-place. Not higher school-boy's kites aspire, Or royal mast, or country spire; Like spears at Brobdignagian 4 tilting, Or Satan's walking-staff in Milton. And on its top, the flag unfurled Waved triumph o'er the gazing world; Inscribed with inconsistent types Of liberty and thirteen stripes. 5

By auction; a custom at auctions was to receive bids while a small section of candle burned, the highest offer before the falling of the wick being accepted.
This refers to the creation of offices for the illegitimate offspring of the British aristocracy.
Meanwhile, just when the debate between M'Fingal and the Whigs had waxed so hot as almost to lead to blows, a shouting from without had caused a sudden adjournment of the assembly.
Brobdingnag, or Brobdignag, was a land of giants described in Swift's Gulliver's Travels; Satan's staff, taller than a "pine hewn on Norwegian hills," is mentioned in Paradise Lost, i, 292.
a satirical allusion to slavery

5 a satirical allusion to slavery

Beneath, the crowd without delay The dedication-rites essay, And gladly pay, in ancient fashion, 20 The ceremonies of libation; While briskly to each patriot lip Walks eager round the inspiring flip: 6 Delicious draught! whose powers inherit The quintessence of public spirit; Which whose tastes, perceives his mind To nobler politics refined: Or roused to martial controversy. As from transforming cups of Circe; 7 Or warmed with Homer's nectared liquor, 30 That filled the veins of gods with ichor. At hand for new supplies in store, The tavern opes its friendly door, Whence to and fro the waiters run. Like bucket-men at fires in town. Then with three shouts that tore the sky, 'Tis consecrate to Liberty. To guard it from the attacks of Tories, A grand committee culled of four is: Who foremost on the patriot spot, 40 Had brought the flip, and paid the shot. By this, M'Fingal with his train Advanced upon the adjacent plain,

And full with loyalty possessed. Poured forth the zeal that fired his breast. "What mad-brained rebel gave commission, To raise this May-pole of sedition? Like Babel, reared by bawling throngs, With like confusion too of tongues, To point at heaven and summon down 50 The thunders of the British crown? Say, will this paltry pole secure Your forfeit heads from Gage's power? Attacked by heroes brave and crafty, Is this to stand your ark of safety; Or driven by Scottish laird and laddie, Think ye to rest beneath its shadow? When bombs, like fiery serpents, fly, And balls rush hissing through the sky, Will this vile pole, devote to freedom, Save like the Tewish pole in Edom; " Or like the brazen snake of Moses, Cure your cracked skulls and battered noses?

"Ye dupes to every factious rogue And tavern-prating demagogue, Whose tongue but rings, with sound more full, a liquor made of spirits sweetened and mixed with beer, and heated by stirring with a hot iron By means of an enchanted liquor and other charms, Circe changed the companions of Ulysses into swine: Odyssey x. Nectar was the drink of the Homeric gods, ichor the liquid that filled their veins.

8 When the fugitive Israelites, encamped in Edom, were bitten by serpents, Moses raised on a standard a serpent of brass upon which those who had been bitten might look and be saved from death. Numbers xxi, 6-9.

On the empty drumhead of his skull; Behold you not what noisy fools Use you, worse simpletons, for tools? For liberty, in your own by-sense, 1 70 Is but for crimes a patent license. To break of law the Egyptian yoke. 2 And throw the world in common stock; 3 Reduce all grievances and ills To Magna Charta of your wills; Establish cheats and frauds and nonsense. Framed to the model of your conscience; Cry justice down, as out of fashion, And fix its scale of depreciation: 4 Defy all creditors to trouble ye, 80 And keep new years of Jewish jubilee; 5 Drive judges out, like Aaron's calves, 6 By jurisdiction of white staves, 7 And make the bar and bench and steeple Submit to our sovereign lord, the people: By plunder rise to power and glory, And brand all property, as Tory; Expose all wares to lawful seizures By mobbers or monopolizers; Break heads and windows and the peace. For your own interest and increase; Dispute and pray and fight and groan For public good, and mean your own: Prevent the law by fierce attacks From quitting scores upon your backs; Lay your old dread, the gallows, low, And seize the stocks, 8 your ancient foe, And turn them to convenient engines To wreak your patriotic vengeance; While all, your rights who understand, 100 Confess them in their owner's hand; And when by clamors and confusions, Your freedom's grown a public nuisance, Cry "Liberty," with powerful yearning, As he does "Fire!" whose house is burning; Though he already has much more Than he can find occasion for. While every clown, that tills the plains, Though bankrupt in estate and brains, By this new light transformed to traitor, 110 Forsakes his plow to turn dictator, by-path.

A coined word meaning, apparently, nonsense; cf. by-path.

the law, which all must bear as the Israelites bore the yoke of Egyptian slavery reduce all ranks to a common level

Congress ascertained the course of the depreciation of the Continental currency by what was called the scale of depreciation.

Every fiftieth year was by Jewish law a year of jubilee in which all slaves were set free, debts canceled, and all property was returned to its original owners. owners.

<sup>6</sup> Moses destroyed—he did not drive out—the calf made by Aaron and worshiped by the idolators.
 <sup>7</sup> In some cases, the colonists armed with white staves, symbols of order, had driven the King's judges from the bench.

8 instruments of punishment

Starts an haranguing chief of Whigs. And drags you by the ears, like pigs. All bluster, armed with factious license, New-born at once to politicians. Each leather-appropriate dunce, grown wise, Presents his forward face to advise, And tattered legislators meet. From every workshop through the street. His goose the tailor finds new use in, 120 To patch and turn the Constitution: The blacksmith comes with sledge and grate To iron-bind the wheels of state: The quack forbears his patients' souse, 9 To purge the Council and the House; The tinker guits his molds and doxies, To cast 10 assembly-men and proxies. From dunghills deep of blackest hue, Your dirt-bred patriots spring to view. To wealth and power and honors rise. 130 Like new-winged maggots changed to flies. And fluttering round in high parade, Strut in the robe, or gay cockade.

For in this ferment of the stream The dregs have worked up to the brim. And by the rule of topsy-turvies, The scum stands foaming on the surface. You've caused your pyramid to ascend, And set it on the little end. Like Hudibras, your empire's made, Whose crupper had o'ertopped his head, 11 You've pushed and turned the whole world up-Side down, and got yourselves at top, While all the great ones of your state Are crushed beneath the popular weight; Nor can you boast, this present hour, The shadow of the form of power. For what's your Congress or its end? A power, to advise and recommend; To call forth troops, adjust your quotas— And yet no soul is bound to notice; To pawn your faith to the utmost limit, 160 But cannot bind you to redeem it; And when in want no more in them lies. Than begging from your state-assemblies; 12 Can utter oracles of dread, Like Friar Bacon's brazen head, 13 But when a faction dares dispute 'em, Has ne'er an arm to execute 'em:

<sup>9</sup> apparently a copious draught of medicine <sup>10</sup> Perhaps, to add up votes; legislative votes were often cast by proxy.

1 The reference is to the grotesque figure of the knight,
Hudibras. See Hudibras, I, i, 294.

2 Under the Articles of Confederation, Congress could advise but could not enforce its wishes.

13 Poors, Pagers, a Franciscan month of the thirteenth

<sup>13</sup> Roger Bacon, a Franciscan monk of the thirteenth century, was said to have made a brazen head that could utter oracles.

170

290

As though you chose supreme dictators, And put them under conservators. You've but pursued the self-same way With Shakspere's Trinculo in the play; 1 "You shall be vicerovs here, 'tis true, But we'll be vicerovs over you." What wild confusion hence must ensue? Though common danger yet cements you: So some wrecked vessel, all in shatters, Is held up by surrounding waters, But stranded, when the pressure ceases. Falls by its rottenness to pieces.

Such is the government you chose; For this you bade the world be foes: For this, so marked for dissolution. You scorn the British constitution. That constitution formed by sages, The wonder of all modern ages: Which owns no failure in reality. Except corruption and venality: And merely proves the adage just. 200 That best things spoiled corrupt to worst: So man supreme in earthly station, And mighty lord of this creation, When once his corse is dead as herring. Becomes the most offensive carrion. And sooner breeds the plague, 'tis found, Than all beasts rotting on the ground.

Rise then, my friends, in terror rise.

And sweep this scandal from the skies. You'll see their Dagon, 2 though well jointed, Will shrink before the Lord's anointed; And like old Tericho's proud wall, 3 Before our ram's-horns prostrate fall." This said, our 'Squire, yet undismayed, Called for the constable to aid, And bade him read, in nearer station, The riot-act and proclamation. He swift advancing to the ring, 299 Began, "Our Sovereign Lord, the King"-When thousand clamorous tongues he hears, And clubs and stones assail his ears. To fly was vain; to fight was idle; By foes encompassed in the middle, His hope, in stratagems, he found, And fell right craftily to ground; Then crept to seek an hiding place, 'Twas all he could, beneath a brace;

Where soon the conquering crew espied him. And where he lurked, they caught and tied

At once with resolution fatal Both Whigs and Tories rushed to battle Instead of weapons, either band Seized on such arms as came to hand. And as famed Ovid paints the adventures Of wrangling Lapithae and Centaurs, 1 Who at their feast, by Bacchus led. Threw bottles at each other's head; And these arms failing in their scuffles. Attacked with andirons, tongs and shovels: So clubs and billets, staves and stones Met fierce, encountering every sconce. And covered o'er with knobs and pains Each void receptacle for brains: Their clamors rend the skies around. The hills rebellow to the sound; 5 And many a groan increased the din From battered nose and broken shin. M'Fingal, rising at the word, Drew forth his old militia sword; Thrice cried "King George," as erst in distress. Knights of romance invoked a mistress: And brandishing the blade in air. Struck terror through the opposing war. The Whigs, unsafe within the wind Of such commotion, shrunk behind. With whirling steel around addressed, Fierce through their thickest throng he pressed. (Who rolled on either side in arch. Like Red Sea waves in Israel's march) 340 And like a meteor rushing through. Struck on their pole a vengeful blow. Around, the Whigs, of clubs and stones Discharged whole volleys, in platoons, That o'er in whistling fury fly; But not a foe dares venture nigh. And now perhaps with glory crowned Our 'Squire had felled the pole to ground. Had not some Power, a Whig at heart, 350 Descended down and took their part; (Whether 'twere Pallas, Mars or Iris, 6 'Tis scarce worth while to make inquiries) Who at the nick of time alarming, Assumed the solemn form of Chairman, Addressed a Whig, in every scene The stoutest wrestler on the green, And pointed where the spade was found,

At the marriage of Pirithous, king of the Lapithae, to Hippodamia, the Centaurs, who were guests, attempted violence to the bride, and a battle ensued.
Cf. Pope's Rape of the Lock, Canto v, 40-51.
The passage is strongly reminiscent of The Iliad and

The drunken Stephano proposes to make the monster, Caliban, and Trinculo, the jester, viceroys. Tempest, III, ii, 102.
 The idol of Dagon, chief god of the Philistines, had the figure of a man joined to the tail of a fish.

I Samuel v, 1-5.

<sup>3</sup> The walls of the heathen city Jericho fell at the blast of the trumpets of the besieging army of Israelites. Joshua vi. 20.

other epics where the gods and goddesses take personal part in the contests of men. As mock-epic the poem is at its best here, and compares favorably, with Hudibras or with Pope's Rape of the Lock.

Late used to set their pole in ground. And urged, with equal arms and might. 360 To dare our 'Squire to single fight. The Whig thus armed, untaught to yield, Advanced tremendous to the field: Nor did M'Fingal shun the foe, But stood to brave the desperate blow; While all the party gazed, suspended To see the deadly combat ended: And Tove in equal balance weighed The sword against the brandished spade. He weighed: but lighter than a dream. 370 The sword flew up, and kicked the beam. Our 'Squire on tiptoe rising fair Lifts high a noble stroke in air, Which hung not, but like dreadful engines, Descended on his foe in vengeance. But ah! in danger, with dishonor The sword perfidious fails its owner: That sword, which oft had stood its ground. By huge trainbands encircled round; And on the bench, with blade 1 right loyal, Had won the day at many a trial. Of stones and clubs had braved the alarms. Shrunk from these new Vulcanian arms. 2 The spade so tempered from the sledge. Nor keen nor solid harmed its edge, Now met it, from his arm of might, Descending with steep force to smite; The blade snapped short—and from his hand, With rust embrowned the glittering sand. Swift turned M'Fingal at the view, 390 And called to aid the attendant crew, In vain: the Tories all had run. When scarce the fight was well begun; Their setting wigs he saw decreased Far in the horizon toward the west. Amazed he viewed the shameful sight. And saw no refuge, but in flight: But age unwieldy checked his pace, Though fear had winged his flying race; For not a trifling prize at stake; 400 No less than great M'Fingal's back. With legs and arms he worked his course, Like rider that outgoes his horse, And labored hard to get away, as Old Satan struggling on through chaos; 3 Till looking back, he spied in rear The spade-armed chief advanced too near: Then stopped and seized a stone, that lay An ancient landmark near the way;

<sup>1</sup> In New England, judges wore swords when presiding on the bench.

<sup>2</sup> The arms of Achilles were forged by Vulcan, the shield, the spear of Hector recoiled, xviii; xxii, 290. From

3 on his journey from the gates of hell through chaos to the bounds of the starry universe: Paradise Lost, ii, 880-1055

Nor shall we as old bards have done. 410 Affirm it weighed an hundred ton: But such a stone, as at a shift A modern might suffice to lift. Since men, to credit their enigmas. Are dwindled down to dwarfs and pigmies, And giants exiled with their cronies . To Brobdignags and Patagonias. But while our hero turned him round. And tugged to raise it from the ground. The fatal spade discharged a blow 420 Tremendous on his rear below: His bent knee failed, and void of strength Stretched on the ground his manly length. Like ancient oak o'erturned, he lay. Or tower to tempests fallen a prev. Or mountain sunk with all his pines. Or flower the plow to dust consigns, And more things else—but all men know 'em, If slightly versed in epic poem. At once the crew, at this dread crisis, 430 Fall on, and bind him, ere he rises; And with loud shouts and joyful soul, Conduct him prisoner to the pole. When now the mob in lucky hour Had got their enemies in their power, They first proceed, by grave command, To take the constable in hand. Then from the pole's sublimest top The active crew let down the rope, At once its other end in haste bind, 440 And make it fast upon his waistband: Till like the earth, as stretched on tenter, 4 He hung self-balanced on his center. Then upwards, all hands hoisting sail, They swung him, like a keg of ale, Till to the pinnacle in height He vaulted, like balloon or kite. As Socrates of old at first did To aid philosophy get hoisted, And found his thoughts flow strangely clear, Swung in a basket in mid air: 5 Our culprit thus, in purer sky, With like advantage raised his eye, And looking forth in prospect wide, His Tory errors clearly spied, And from his elevated station, With bawling voice began addressing. "Good gentlemen and friends and kin, For Heaven's sake hear, if not for mine! I here renounce the Pope, the Turks, 460 The King, the Devil and all their works;

4 Cloth when first woven or after dying is stretched on In his comedy The Clouds Aristophanes figures Socrates suspended in a basket above the earth in order to enjoy a finer and clearer atmosphere for philosophic speculation philosophic speculation.

And will, set me but once at ease,
Turn Whig or Christian, what you please;
And always mind your rules so justly,
Should I live long as old Methuselah,
I'll never join in British rage,
Nor help Lord North, nor General Gage;
Nor lift my gun in future fights,
Nor take away your charter-rights;
Nor overcome your new-raised levies,
Destroy your towns, nor burn your navies;
Nor cut your poles down while I've breath,
Though raised more thick than hatchel-teeth: ¹
But leave King George and all his elves
To do their conquering work themselves."
This said, they lowered him down in state,

This said, they lowered him down in state,
Spread at all points, like falling cat;
But took a vote first on the question,
That they'd accept this full confession,
And to their fellowship and favor,
Restore him on his good behavior.

480

Not so our 'Squire submits to rule. But stood, heroic as a mule. "You'll find it all in vain," quoth he, "To play your rebel tricks on me. All punishments the world can render. Serve only to provoke the offender: The will gains strength from treatment horrid, As hides grow harder when they're curried. No man e'er felt the halter draw, 490 With good opinion of the law; Or held in method orthodox His love of justice, in the stocks; Or failed to lose by sheriff's shears At once his loyalty and ears. 2 Have you made Murray 3 look less big. Or smoked old Williams to a Whig? Did our mobbed Oliver quit his station. Or heed his vows of resignation? Has Rivington, in dread of stripes, 500 Ceased lying since you stole his types? And can you think my faith will alter, By tarring, whipping or the halter? I'll stand the worst; for recompense I trust King George and Providence. And when with conquest gained I come, Arrayed in law and terror home, Ye'll rue this inauspicious morn, And curse the day when ye were born, In Job's high style of imprecations, 4

<sup>2</sup> Cropping the ears was a punishment not unknown in New England.

' Job cursed the day in which he was born. Job iii, 2 ff.

With all his plagues, without his patience." Meanwhile beside the pole, the guard A bench of justice had prepared. Where sitting round in awful sort The grand committee hold their court: While all the crew, in silent awe, Wait from their lips the lore of law. Few moments with deliberation They hold the solemn consultation: When soon in judgment all agree, 520 And clerk proclaims the dread decree; "That 'Squire M'Fingal having grown The vilest Tory in the town. And now in full examination Convicted by his own confession, Finding no tokens of repentance. This court proceeds to render sentence: That first the mob a slip-knot single Tie round the neck of said M'Fingal, And in due form do tar him next. 530 And feather, as the law directs; Then through the town attendant ride him In cart with constable beside him. And having held him up to shame, Bring to the pole, from whence he came." Forthwith the crowd proceed to deck With haltered noose M'Fingal's neck. While he in peril of his soul Stood tied half-hanging to the pole; Then lifting high the ponderous jar. 540 Poured o'er his head the smoking tar. With less profusion once was spread Oil on the Tewish monarch's head, 5 That down his beard and vestments ran. And covered all his outward man. As when (so Claudian sings) the gods And earth-born giants fell at odds. The stout Enceladus 6 in malice Tore mountains up to throw at Pallas: And while he held them o'er his head, The river, from their fountains fed. 550 Poured down his back its copious tide. And wore its channels in his hide: So from the high-raised urn the torrents Spread down his side their various currents: His flowing wig, as next the brim, First met and drank the sable stream; Adown his visage stern and grave Rolled and adhered the viscid wave; With arms depending as he stood, 560 Each cuff capacious holds the flood; From nose and chin's remotest end, The tarry icicles descend: Till all o'erspread, with colors gay,

Perhaps the author has in mind Psalms cxxxiii, 2.
 If so the reference is not exact.
 Enceladus was one of the giants who disputed the sovereignty of Zeus, and Athene (Pallas).

&lt;sup>1</sup> an implement consisting of a board thickly set with sharp spikes, used in separating the fibers of flax or hemp

The men mentioned here were all prominent loyalists of Boston or New York, most of whom were mobbed. Oliver was "smoked" in a room with a covered chimney. Rivington, a New York printer and publisher, was mobbed and his press destroyed.

650

660

He glittered to the western ray. Like sleet-bound trees in wintry skies. Or Lapland idol carved in ice. And now the feather-bag displayed Is waved in triumph o'er his head. And clouds him o'er with feathers missive, 570 And down, upon the tar, adhesive: Not Maia's son, 1 with wings for ears. Such plumage round his visage wears: Nor Milton's six-winged angel 2 gathers Such superfluity of feathers. Now all complete appears our 'Squire, Like gorgon or chimaera dire: 3 Nor more could boast on Plato's plan 4 To rank among the race of man. Or prove his claim to human nature. 580 As a two-legged, unfeathered creature.

Then on the fatal cart, in state They raised our grand Duumvirate. And as at Rome a like committee, Who found an owl within their city, With solemn rites and grave processions At every shrine performed lustrations, 5 And, lest infection might take place From such grim fowl with feathered face, All Rome attends him through the street 590 In triumph to his country seat: With like devotion all the choir Paraded round our awful 'Squire; In front the martial music comes Of horns and fiddles, fifes and drums, With jingling sound of carriage bells, And treble creak of rusted wheels. Behind, the crowd, in lengthened row With proud procession, closed the show. And at fit periods every throat 600 Combined in universal shout; And hailed great Liberty in chorus, Or bawled "Confusion to the Tories." Not louder storm the welkin braves From clamors of conflicting waves; Less dire in Lybian wilds the noise When ravening lions lift their voice; Or triumphs at town-meetings made, On passing votes to regulate trade. 6

Thus having borne them round the town, Last at the pole they set them down; And to the tavern take their way To end in mirth the festal day.

<sup>1</sup> Mercury of the winged cap <sup>2</sup> Raphael: Paradise Lost, v, 277

And now the mob. dispersed and gone. Left 'Squire and constable alone. The constable with rueful face Leaned sad and solemn o'er a brace: And fast beside him, cheek by jowl, Stuck 'Squire M'Fingal 'gainst the pole, Glued by the tar to his rear applied. 620 Like barnacle on vessel's side. But though his body lacked physician. His spirit was in worse condition. He found his fears of whips and ropes By many a dram outweighed his hopes. As men in iail without mainprize 7 View everything with other eyes. And all goes wrong in church and state. Seen through perspective of the grate: So now M'Fingal's second-sight 630 Beheld all things in gloomier light: His visual nerve, well purged with tar, Saw all the coming scenes of war. As his prophetic soul grew stronger, He found he could hold in no longer. First from the pole, as fierce he shook, His wig from pitchy durance broke. His mouth unglued, his feathers fluttered His tarred skirts cracked, and thus he uttered. "Ah, Mr. Constable, in vain

We strive 'gainst wind and tide and rain! Behold my doom! this feathery omen Portends what dismal times are coming. Now future scenes, before my eyes, And second-sighted forms arise. I hear a voice, that calls away, And cries 'The Whigs will win the day.' My beckoning genius gives command, And bids me fly the fatal land; Where changing name and constitution, Rebellion turns to revolution, While loyalty, oppressed, in tears,

Stands trembling for its neck and ears. "Go, summon all our brethren, greeting, To muster at our usual meeting; There my prophetic voice shall warn 'em Of all things future that concern 'em, And scenes disclose on which, my friend, Their conduct and their lives depend. There I—but first 'tis more of use, From this vile pole to set me loose; Then go with cautious steps and steady, While I steer home and make all ready." 8 1775

1775

&lt;sup>3</sup> Paradise Lost, ii, 628 <sup>4</sup> Plato described man as a featherless biped. An owl found in Rome was regarded as a prodigy of evil omen and, after being taken from temple to temple where sacrifices were performed, was released in a wood outside the city.
 In early colonial days, prices were regulated by townmeetings or the "general court" of the colony.

surety, bail
 The fourth and last canto tells of a secret meeting of Tories at night in M'Fingal's cellar, at which the squire recounts visions that have come to him, and prophesies the Revolution and the complete triumph of the Whigs. See notes 3, p. 123. and 2, p. 124.

JOEL BARLOW 1755-1812

Barlow was born at Reading, Connecticut, and was educated at Dartmouth, and at Yale, where he graduated in 1778 and was for a brief period tutor. He then for a time studied law, but was soon in the army as chaplain. After the war he led the life of a lawyer, agitator, and officeholder, actively supported the principles of the French Revolution in France and in London. He was later consul at Algiers. At the time of his death he was minister plenipotentiary to France and on a special mission to Poland to treat with Napoleon, then on his Russian campaign. His chief literary works are The Vision of Columbus, 1787, expanded into The Columbiad, 1807, and The Hasty Pudding, 1796.

Barlow's heavier pieces fall lamentably short of the true epic stride that they attempted. Like Dwight's they are but imitations of an imitation, following pseudo-classic models. The Hasty Pudding is more successful. It expresses Barlow's serious desire to promote simplicity of diet and manners among his countrymen; wishing to make his appeal popular, he put it in the playful form of the mock-heroic. The poem was written when Barlow was on a mission from the French government to Savoy in 1792-3, and was dedicated to Mrs. Washington.

Life and Letters of Joel Barlow by C. B. Todd, 1886; see also Three Men of Letters, M. C. Tyler, 1895.

THE HASTY PUDDING

CANTO I

Ye Alps audacious, through the heavens that rise,

To cramp the day and hide me from the skies; Ye Gallic flags, that o'er their heights unfurled, Bear death to kings and freedom to the world, I sing not you. A softer theme I choose, A virgin theme, unconscious of the muse, But fruitful, rich, well suited to inspire The purest frenzy of poetic fire.

Despise it not, ye bards to terror steeled, Who hurl your thunders round the epic field; <sup>10</sup> Nor ye who strain your midnight throats to Joys that the vineyard and the stillhouse bring; Or on some distant fair your notes employ, And speak of raptures that you ne'er enjoy. <sup>2</sup> I sing the sweets I know, the charms I feel, My morning incense, and my evening meal,—The sweets of Hasty Pudding. Come, dear bowl, Glide o'er my palate, and inspire my soul. The milk beside thee, smoking from the kine, Its substance mingled, married in with thine, <sup>20</sup> Shall cool and temper thy superior heat, And save the pains of blowing while I eat.

Oh! could the smooth, the emblematic song Flow like thy genial juices o'er my tongue, Could those mild morsels in my numbers chime, And, as they roll in substance, roll in rime, No more thy awkward, unpoetic name Should shun the muse or prejudice thy fame; But, rising grateful to the accustomed ear, 29 All bards should catch it, and all realms revere!

Assist me first with pious toil to trace Through wrecks of time, thy lineage and thy race:

Declare what lovely squaw, in days of yore, (Ere great Columbus sought thy native shore) First gave thee to the world; her works of fame Have lived indeed, but lived without a name. Some tawny Ceres, <sup>3</sup> goddess of her days,

First learned with stones to crack the well-dried maize,

Through the rough sieve to shake the golden shower,

In boiling water stir the yellow flour:

40
The yellow flour, bestrewed and stirred with haste.

Swells in the flood and thickens to a paste, Then puffs and wallops, rises to the brim, Drinks the dry knobs that on the surface swim; The knobs at last the busy ladle breaks, And the whole mass its true consistence takes.

Could but her sacred name, unknown so long.
Rise, like her labors, to the son of song,
To her, to them I'd consecrate my lays,
And blow her pudding with the breath of praise.

If 'twas Oella whom I sang before, '
I here ascribe her one great virtue more.
Not through the rich Peruvian realms alone
The fame of Sol's sweet daughter should be known.

But o'er the world's wide climes should live secure,

Far as his rays extend, as long as they endure.

Dear Hasty Pudding, what unpromised joy
Expands my heart, to meet thee in Savoy! 5
Doomed o'er the world through devious paths to Each clime my country, and each house my home,

My soul is soothed, my cares have found an end;

<sup>3</sup> goddess of agriculture and harvest
<sup>4</sup> Oella, imagined to be the daughter of a Peruvian chief, had been celebrated by Barlow in The Vision of Columbus as the inventor of spinning.

Indian corn was then, as now, grown on the southern slopes of Savoy.

France was at this time the exponent of liberty, standing alone against the rest of Europe.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Barlow asks consideration from epic, convivial, and lyric poets.

I greet my long-lost, unforgotten friend.

For thee through Paris, that corrupted town, How long in vain I wandered up and down, Where shameless Bacchus, 1 with his drenching hoard.

Cold from his cave usurps the morning board. London is lost in smoke and steeped in tea; No Yankee there can lisp the name of thee; The uncouth word, a libel on the town, Would call a proclamation from the crown. To climes oblique, that fear the sun's full rays.

Chilled in their fogs, exclude the generous maize:

A grain whose rich, luxuriant growth requires Short, gentle showers, and bright, ethereal fires.

But here, though distant from our native shore.

With mutual glee, we meet and laugh once

The same! I know thee by that yellow face, That strong complexion of true Indian race, Which time can never change, nor soil impair, Nor Alpine snows, nor Turkey's morbid air; 80 For endless years, through every mild domain, Where grows the maize, there thou art sure to reign.

But man, more fickle, the bold licence claims,

In different realms to give thee different names. Thee the soft nations round the warm Levant Polanta call; the French, of course, Polanta. E'en in thy native regions, how I blush To hear the Pennsylvanians call thee Mush! On Hudson's banks, while men of Belgic 2 spawn Insult and eat thee by the name Suppawn. All spurious appellations, void of truth; I've better known thee from my earliest youth: Thy name is Hasty Pudding! thus my sire Was wont to greet thee fuming from his fire; And while he argued in thy just defense With logic clear he thus explained the sense: "In haste the boiling caldron, o'er the blaze, Receives and cooks the ready powdered maize; In haste 'tis served, and then in equal haste, With cooling milk, we make the sweet re-

No carving to be done, no knife to grate
The tender ear and wound the stony plate;
But the smooth spoon, just fitted to the lip,
And taught with art the yielding mass to dip,
By frequent journeys to the bowl well stored,

 1 god of wine and revelry
 2 referring to the Dutch settlers of New York, from the Low Countries, indeed, but not from Belgium Performs the hasty honors of the board."
Such is thy name, significant and clear,
A name, a sound to every Yankee dear,
But most to me, whose heart and palate chaste
Preserve my pure, hereditary taste.

There are who strive to stamp with disrepute

The luscious food, because it feeds the brute; In tropes of high-strained wit, while gaudy

Compare thy nursling, man, to pampered pigs; With sovereign scorn I treat the vulgar jest, Nor fear to share thy bounties with the beast. What though the generous cow gives me to quaff

The milk nutritious: am I then a calf?
Or can the genius of the noisy swine,
Though nursed on pudding, thence lay claim to mine?

Sure the sweet song I fashion to thy praise, Runs more melodious than the notes they raise.

My song, resounding in its grateful glee, No merit claims: I praise myself in thee. My father loved thee through his length of

For thee his fields were shaded o'er with maize; From thee what health, what vigor he possessed.

Ten sturdy freemen from his loins attest;
Thy constellation ruled my natal morn,
And all my bones were made of Indian corn.
Delicious grain, whatever form it take,
To roast or boil, to smother or to bake,
In every dish 'tis welcome still to me,
But most, my Hasty Pudding, most in thee.

Let the green succotash with thee contend; Let beans and corn their sweetest juices blend; Let butter drench them in its yellow tide, And a long slice of bacon grace their side; Not all the plate, how famed soe'er it be, Can please my palate like a bowl of thee. <sup>140</sup> Some talk of hoe-cake, fair Virginia's pride! Rich johnny-cake this mouth has often tried; Both please me well, their virtues much the same,

Alike their fabric, as allied their fame, Except in dear New England, where the last Receives a dash of pumpkin in the paste, To give it sweetness and improve the taste. But place them all before me, smoking hot, The big, round dumpling, rolling from the pot; The pudding of the bag, whose quivering breast, With suet lined, leads on the Yankee feast; 151 The charlotte brown, within whose crusty sides A belly soft the pulpy apple hides;

The yellow bread whose face like amber glows, And all of Indian that the bakepan knows,— You tempt me not; my favorite greets my eves.

To that loved bowl my spoon by instinct flies.

CANTO II

To mix the food by vicious rules of art,
To kill the stomach and to sink the heart,
To make mankind to social virtue sour,
Cram o'er each dish, and be what they devour;
For this the kitchen muse first framed her book, Commanding sweats to stream from every cook:

Children no more their antic gambols tried, And friends to physic wondered why they died.

Not so the Yankee: his abundant feast, With simples furnished and with plainness dressed.

A numerous offspring gathers round the board, And cheers alike the servant and the lord; Whose well-bought hunger prompts the joyous taste,

And health attends them from the short repast.

While the full pail rewards the milkmaid's

The mother sees the morning caldron boil;
To stir the pudding next demands their care;
To spread the table and the bowls prepare;
To feed the household as their portions cool
And send them all to labor or to school.

Yet may the simplest dish some rules impart, For nature scorns not all the aids of art. E'en Hasty Pudding, purest of all food, May still be bad, indifferent, or good, As sage experience the short process guides, Or want of skill, or want of care presides. Whoe'er would form it on the surest plan, To rear the child and long sustain the man; To shield the morals while it mends the size, And all the powers of every food supplies,— 30 Attend the lesson that the muse shall bring, Suspend your spoons, and listen while I sing.

But since, O man! thy life and health demand

Not food alone, but labor from thy hand, First, in the field, beneath the sun's strong rays, Ask of thy mother earth the needful maize; She loves the race that courts her yielding soil, And gives her bounties to the sons of toil.

When now the ox, obedient to thy call, Repays the loan that filled the winter stall, Pursue his traces o'er the furrowed plain, And plant in measured hills the golden grain. But when the tender germ begins to shoot, And the green spire declares the sprouting root, Then guard your nursling from each greedy foe, The insidious worm, the all-devouring crow. A little ashes sprinkled round the spire, Soon steeped in rain, will bid the worm retire; The feathered robber with his hungry maw Swift flies the field before your man of straw, 50 A frightful image, such as schoolboys bring When met to burn the Pope or hang the King.

Thrice in the season, through each verdant row,

Wield the strong plowshare and the faithful hoe:

The faithful hoe, a double task that takes,
To till the summer corn and roast the winter cakes.

Slow springs the blade, while checked by chilling rains,

Ere yet the sun the seat of Cancer <sup>1</sup> gains; But when his fiercest fires emblaze the land, Then start the juices, then the roots expand; <sup>60</sup> Then, like a column of Corinthian mold, The stalk struts upward and the leaves unfold; The bushy branches all the ridges fill, Entwine their arms, and kiss from hill to hill. Here cease to vex them; all your cares are done:

Leave the last labors to the parent sun; Beneath his genial smiles, the well-dressed field, When autumn calls, a plenteous crop shall yield.

Now the strong foliage bears the standards high,

And shoots the tall top-gallants to the sky; 70 The suckling ears their silky fringes bend, And pregnant grown, their swelling coats distend:

The loaded stalk, while still the burden grows, O'erhangs the space that runs between the rows; High as a hop-field waves the silent grove, A safe retreat for little thefts of love, When the pledged roasting-ears invite the maid

To meet her swain beneath the new-formed shade;

His generous hand unloads the cumbrous hill, And the green spoils her ready basket fill; 80 Small compensation for the twofold bliss, The promised wedding, and the present kiss.

Slight depredations these; but now the moon Calls from his hollow tree the sly raccoon; And while by night he bears his prize away,

<sup>1</sup> The sun enters the zodiacal sign of Cancer on June 21.

The bolder squirrel labors through the day. Both thieves alike, but provident of time A virtue rare, that almost hides their crime. Then let them steal the little stores they can. And fill their granaries from the toils of man: 90 We've one advantage where they take no part— With all their wiles, they ne'er have found the

To boil the Hasty Pudding; here we shine Superior far to tenants of the pine: This envied boon to man shall still belong. Unshared by them in substance or in song.

At last the closing season browns the plain. And ripe October gathers in the grain; Deep-loaded carts the spacious corn-house fill; The sack distended marches to the mill: The laboring mill beneath the burden groans, And showers the future pudding from the

Till the glad housewife greets the powdered gold,

And the new crop exterminates the old. Ah who can sing what every wight must feel, The joy that enters with the bag of meal, A general jubilee pervades the house, Wakes every child and gladdens every mouse.

CANTO III

The days grow short; but though the falling

To the glad swain proclaims his day's work

Night's pleasing shades his various tasks pro-

And yield new subjects to my various song. For now, the corn-house filled, the harvest

The invited neighbors to the husking come; A frolic scene, where work, and mirth, and play, Unite their charms to chase the hours away.

Where the huge heap lies centered in the hall, The lamp suspended from the cheerful wall, 10 Brown, corn-fed nymphs, and strong, hardhanded beaux, Alternate ranged, extend in circling rows, Assume their seats, the solid mass attack; The dry husks rustle, and the corncobs crack; The song, the laugh, alternate notes resound, And the sweet cider trips in silence round.

The laws of husking every wight can tell; And sure no laws he ever keeps so well: For each red ear a general kiss he gains, With each smut ear she smuts the luckless swains:

But when to some sweet maid a prize is cast. Red as her lips and taper as her waist. She walks the round and culls one favored

Who leaps the luscious tribute to bestow. Various the sport, as are the wits and brains Of well-pleased lasses and contending swains: Till the vast mound of corn is swept away. And he that gets the last ear wins the day.

Meanwhile, the housewife urges all her care, The well-earned feast to hasten and prepare. 30 The sifted meal already waits her hand, The milk is strained, the bowls in order stand. The fire flames high; and as a pool—that takes The headlong stream that o'er the milldam breaks-

Foams, roars, and rages with incessant toils. So the vexed caldron rages, roars, and boils.

First with clean salt she seasons well the food.

Then strews the flour, and thickens all the Long o'er the simmering fire she lets it stand: To stir it well demands a stronger hand: The husband takes his turn: and round and round

The ladle flies; at last the toil is crowned; When to the board the thronging huskers pour, And take their seats as at the corn before.

There still I leave them to their feast.

More useful matters to my faithful song. For rules there are, though ne'er unfolded yet, Nice rules and wise, how pudding should be ate.

Some with molasses line the luscious treat, 49 And mix, like bards, the useful with the sweet. A wholesome dish, and well deserving praise, A great resource in those bleak wintry days, When the chilled earth lies buried deep in snow, And raging Boreas 1 dries the shivering cow.

Blest cow! thy praise shall still my notes employ,

Great source of health, the only source of joy; Mother 2 of Egypt's god,—but sure, for me, Were I to leave my God, I'd worship thee. How oft thy teats these pious hands have pressed!

How oft thy bounties proved my only feast! 60 How oft I've fed thee with my favorite grain! And roared, like thee, to see thy children slain!

1 the north wind

<sup>2</sup> Barlow is perhaps a little confused in his Egyptian mythology. The cow was consecrated to Isis, the goddess of beauty and fertility.

Ye swains who know her various worth to prize.

Ah! house her well from winter's angry skies.

Potatoes, pumpkins, should her sadness cheer,

Corn from your crib, and mashes from your beer:

When spring returns, she'll well acquit the loan.

And nurse at once your infants and her own. Milk then with pudding I should always choose; To this in future I confine my muse,

Till she in haste some further hints unfold, Well for the young, nor useless to the old. First in your bowl the milk abundant take, Then drop with care along the silver lake Your flakes of pudding; these at first will hide Their little bulk beneath the swelling tide; But when their growing mass no more can sink, When the soft island looms above the brink, Then check your hand; you've got the portion

So taught our sires, and what they taught is true.

There is a choice in spoons. Though small appear

The nice distinction, yet to me 'tis clear.

The deep-bowled Gallic spoon, contrived to scoop

In ample draughts the thin, diluted soup, Performs not well in those substantial things, Whose mass adhesive to the metal clings; Where the strong labial muscles must embrace The gentle curve, and sweep the hollow space With ease to enter and discharge the freight, A bowl less concave, but still more dilate, 90 Becomes the pudding best. The shape, the size, A secret rests, unknown to vulgar eyes. Experienced feeders can alone impart A rule so much above the lore of art. These tuneful lips that thousand spoons have

With just precision could the point decide, Though not in song; the muse but poorly

In cones, and cubes, and geometric lines; Yet the true form, as near as she can tell, Is that small section of a goose-egg shell, Which in two equal portions shall divide The distance from the center to the side.

Fear not to slaver; 'tis no deadly sin.

Like the free Frenchman, from your joyous chin

Suspend the ready napkin; or, like me, Poise with one hand your bowl upon your knee; Just in the zenith your wise head project, Your full spoon, rising in a line direct, Bold as a bucket, heeds no drops that fall; The wide-mouthed bowl will surely catch them all!

1792-93

1796

[ANONYMOUS] HALE IN THE BUSH 1

The breezes went steadily through the tall pines,

A-saying "Oh! hu-ush!" a-saying "Oh!

As stilly stole by a bold legion of horse,

For Hale in the bush, for Hale in the bush.

"Keep still!" said the thrush, as she nestled her young

In a nest by the road, in a nest by the road; "For the tyrants are near, and with them appear What bodes us no good, what bodes us no good."

The brave captain heard it, and thought of his home

In a cot by the brook, in a cot by the brook; With mother and sister and memories dear,

He so gaily forsook, he so gaily forsook.

Cooling shades of the night were coming apace, The tattoo had beat, the tattoo had beat: The noble one sprang from his dark lurking-

To make his retreat, to make his retreat.

He warily trod on the dry rustling leaves, As he passed through the wood, as he passed through the wood,

And silently gained his rude launch on the

As she played with the flood, as she played with the flood.

The guards of the camp on that dark dreary night.

Had a murderous will, had a murderous will: They took him and bore him afar from the shore.

To a hut on the hill, to a hut on the hill.

No mother was there, nor a friend who could cheer.

In that little stone cell, in that little stone cell:

This anonymous ballad is a tribute to Nathan Hale, hanged as a spy Sept. 22, 1776. Hale's last words were, "I regret that I have but one life to lose for my country." But he trusted in love from his Father above-In his heart all was well, in his heart all was

An ominous owl with his solemn bass voice Sat moaning hard by, sat moaning hard by: "The tyrant's proud minions most gladly re-

For he must soon die, for he must soon die."

The brave fellow told them, no thing he restrained ---

The cruel gen'ral: the cruel gen'ral!-His errand from camp, of the ends to be gained. And said that was all, and said that was all.

They took him and bound him and bore him away.

Down the hill's grassy side, down the hill's grassy side.

'T was there the base hirelings, in royal array, His cause did deride, his cause did deride. 40

Five minutes were given, short moments, no

For him to repent, for him to repent. He prayed for his mother—he asked not another.-

To heaven he went, to heaven he went.

The faith of a martyr the tragedy showed, As he trod the last stage, as he trod the last

And Britons will shudder at gallant Hale's

As his words do presage, as his words do presage:

"Thou pale king of terrors, thou life's gloomy

Go frighten the slave, go frighten the slave; Tell tyrants, to you their allegiance they owe-No fears for the brave, no fears for the brave!"

1776

FRANCIS HOPKINSON 1737-1791

Hopkinson, the writer of essays, poems, and much Revolutionary satire, was born in Philadelphia and attended the school that has become the University of Pennsylvania. He had the advantage of residence in England for two years where he saw much of social life. He studied law, rose in his profession, was a member of the Continental Congress from New Jersey, and a signer of the Declaration of Independence; and later was judge of the admiralty court of Pennsylvania.

Hopkinson was a man of much versatility and vivacity, an artist and a musician-composer. He was the author of some didactic poetry, and of lyrics that followed the conventional English fashion of the time. During the Revolution he was active in writing newspaper articles, partisan verse, and all kinds of satire both in prose and verse for the cause of independence. Of these pieces. "The Battle of the Kegs" is most worth preservation. Among the titles of his works are A Pretty Story, 1774; The Prophecy, 1776; The Political Catechism, 1777. His writings were collected in three volumes, 1792.

Biography and criticism: G. E. Hastings, Life and Works of F. Hopkinson, 1926. See also A. R. Marble, Heralds of American Literature.

THE BATTLE OF THE KEGS 1

Gallants, attend, and hear a friend Trill forth harmonious ditty: Strange things I'll tell, which late befell In Philadelphia city.

'Twas early day, as poets say, Just when the sun was rising. A soldier stood on a log of wood And saw a thing surprising.

As in amaze he stood to gaze, The truth can't be denied, sir, He spied a score of kegs or more Come floating down the tide, sir.

A sailor, too, in jerkin blue, This strange appearance viewing. First damned his eyes, in great surprise, Then said, "Some mischief's brewing:

"These kegs, I'm told, the rebels hold, Packed up like pickled herring; And they're come down to attack the town, In this new way of ferrying."

The soldier flew, the sailor too, And scared almost to death, sir, Wore out their shoes to spread the news, And ran till out of breath, sir.

Now up and down throughout the town Most frantic scenes were acted;

<sup>1</sup> The incident on which the ballad was founded took place during Sir William Howe's occupation of Philadelphia (1777-1778) while Washington was at Valley Forge.

"The ballad was occasioned by a real incident.
Certain machines, in the form of kegs, charged with gunpowder, were sent down the river to annoy the British shipping then at Philadelphia. The danger of these machines being discovered, the British manned the wharfs and shipping, and discharged their small arms and cannons at every-thing they saw floating in the river during the ebb tide."—Hopkinson's note.

10

30 40

60

And some ran here and others there, Like men almost distracted.

Some fire cried, which some denied, But said the earth had quaked; And girls and boys, with hideous noise, Ran through the streets half naked.

Sir William, he, snug as a flea, Lay all this time a snoring, Nor dreamed of harm, as he lay warm,

Now in a fright he starts upright, Awaked by such a clatter; He rubs his eyes and boldly cries, "For God's sake, what's the matter?"

At his bedside he then espied
Sir Erskine at command, sir:
Upon one foot he had one boot,
And t'other in his hand, sir.

"Arise, arise!" Sir Erskine cries;
"The rebels, more 's the pity,
Without a boat are all afloat
And ranged before the city.

"The motley crew, in vessels new, With Satan for their guide, sir, Packed up in bags, or wooden kegs, <sup>1</sup> Come driving down the tide, sir,

"Therefore prepare for bloody war: These kegs must all be routed, Or surely we despised shall be, And British courage doubted."

The royal band now ready stand, All ranged in dread array, sir, With stomachs stout, to see it out, And make a bloody day, sir.

The cannons roar from shore to shore, The small arms make a rattle; Since wars began, I'm sure no man Ere saw so strange a battle.

The rebel dales, the rebel vales,
With rebel trees surrounded,
The distant woods, the hills and floods,
With rebel echoes sounded.

The fish below swam to and fro,
Attacked from every quarter:
"Why sure," thought they, "the devil's to pay
"Mongst folks above the water"

The kegs, 't is said, though strongly made Of rebel staves and hoops, sir, Could not oppose their powerful foes, The conquering British troops, sir.

From morn till night these men of might Displayed amazing courage,
And when the sun was fairly down
Retired to sup their porridge.

80

An hundred men, with each a pen, Or more, upon my word, sir, It is most true would be too few Their valor to record, sir.

Such feats did they perform that day Against those wicked kegs. sir, That years to come, if they get home, They'll make their boasts and brags, sir. 1778

PATRICK HENRY 1736-1799

Henry, a native Virginian, was unsuccessful in business, but rose quickly into prominence when at twenty-four he entered upon the practice of law. He was a member of the Virginia legislature, and of the Continental Congress, 1774; and a delegate to the Virginia Revolutionary Convention at Richmond, 1775. There he introduced the resolution, opposed by influential delegates, that the colony of Virginia "be immediately put into a posture of defense," and made the speech given below in its support. Few Americans felt at that date that such a step was necessary or advisable. Henry had for months believed it to be inevitable.

This speech was extemporaneous. Those who heard it were struck with the powerful effect that it had upon the assembly. When frequent reading or declamation of such a piece has made us deaf to its appeal, we should exert the imagination and read it as for the first time, calling up the circumstances that brought it forth. Such a fresh, unprejudiced attitude should reveal in this speech the terse brevity, the absence of turgid phrases, the fineness and elevation of spirit that belong to great oratory.

Henry was Governor of Virginia 1776-1779, and 1784-1786. He refused office after 1791 and retired from the practice of law.

M. C. Tyler, Patrick Henry (AS), 1890.

SPEECH IN THE VIRGINIA CONVEN-TION, 1775 <sup>2</sup>

Mr. President:-

No man thinks more highly than I do of the patriotism, as well as abilities, of the very worthy gentlemen who have just addressed the house. <sup>3</sup> But different men often see the same subject in different lights; and, therefore, I hope it will not be thought disrespectful to those gentlemen, if, entertaining as I do opinions of a character very opposite to theirs. I shall speak forth my sentiments freely, and without reserve. This is no time for ceremony. The question before the house is one of awful moment to this country. For my own part, I consider it as nothing less than a question of freedom or slavery. And in proportion to the magnitude of the subject ought to be the freedom of the debate. It is only in this way that we can hope to arrive at truth, and fulfill the great responsibility which we hold to God and our country. Should I keep back my opinions at such a time, through fear of giving offense, I should consider myself as guilty of treason towards my country, and of an act of disloyalty toward the Majesty of Heaven, which I revere above all earthly kings.

3 the convention assembled

<sup>1</sup> Note the pronunciation of keg.

<sup>2</sup> The convention met March 20-26.

Mr. President, it is natural to man to indulge in the illusions of hope. We are apt to shut our eyes against a painful truth, and listen to the song of that siren till she transforms us into beasts. Is this the part of wise men, engaged in a great and arduous struggle for liberty? Are we disposed to be of the number of those who having eyes see not, and having ears hear not, the things which so nearly concern their temporal salvation? For my part, whatever anguish of spirit it may cost, I am willing to know the whole truth; to know the worst and to provide for it.

I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience. I know of no way of judging of the future but by the past. And judging by the past, I wish to know what there has been in the conduct of the British ministry for the last ten years, to justify those hopes with which gentlemen have been pleased to solace themselves and the house? Is it that insidious smile with which our petition has been lately received? it not, sir: it will prove a snare to your feet. Suffer not yourselves to be betrayed with a kiss. Ask yourselves how this gracious reception of our petition comports with those warlike preparations which cover our waters and darken our land. 1 Are fleets and armies necessary to a work of love and reconciliation? Have we shown ourselves so unwilling to be reconciled that force must be called in to win back our love? Let us not deceive ourselves, sir. These are the implements of war and subjugation—the last arguments to which kings resort. I ask gentlemen, sir, What means this martial arrav. if its purpose be not to force us to submission? Can gentlemen assign any other possible motive for it? Has Great Britain any enemy in this quarter of the world, to call for all this accumulation of navies and armies? No sir she has none. They are meant for us: they can be meant for no other. They are sent over to bind and rivet upon us those chains which the British ministry have been so long forging. And what have we to oppose to them? Shall we try argument? Sir, we have been trying that for the last ten years. Have we anything new to offer upon the subject? Nothing. We have held the subject up in every light of which it is capable; but it has been all in vain. Shall we resort to entreaty and humble supplication? What terms shall we find which have not been already exhausted? Let us not, I beseech you, sir, deceive ourselves longer.

Sir, we have done everything that could be done to avert the storm which is now coming on. We have petitioned; we have remonstrated; we have supplicated; we have prostrated ourselves before the throne, and have implored its interposition to arrest the tyrannical hands of the ministry and Parliament. Our petitions have been slighted; our remonstrances have produced additional violence and insult; our supplications have been disregarded; and we have been spurned with contempt from the foot of the throne! In vain, after these things, may we indulge the fond hope of peace and reconciliation. There is no longer any room for hope. If we wish to be free, if we mean to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending, if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged, and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained we must fight! I repeat it, sir, we must fight! An appeal to arms and to the God of Hosts is all that is left us!

They tell us, sir, that we are weak-unable to cope with so formidable an adversary. But when shall we be stronger? Will it be the next week, or the next year? Will it be when we are totally disarmed, and when a British guard shall be stationed in every house? Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs, and hugging the delusive phantom of hope until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot? Sir, we are not weak, if we make a proper use of those means which the God of nature hath placed in our power. Three millions of people, armed in the holy cause of liberty, and in such a country as that which we possess, are invincible by any force which our enemy can send against us. Besides, sir, we shall not fight our battles alone. There is a just God who presides over the destinies of nations, and who will raise up friends to fight our battles for us. The battle, sir, is not to the strong alone; it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave. Besides, sir, we have no election. 1 If we were base enough to desire it, it is now too late to retire from the contest. There is no retreat but in submission and slavery! Our chains are forged! their clanking may be heard on the plains of Boston! The war is inevitable—and let it come! I repeat it, sir, let it come!

&lt;sup>1</sup> The Boston garrison was constantly being augmented, and war vessels were gathering in constantly in-creasing numbers in Boston harbor, the chief British naval rendezvous for North America.

It is in vain, sir, to extenuate the matter. Gentlemen may cry, Peace, Peace-but there is no peace. 2 The war is actually begun! The next gale that sweeps from the north will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms! Our brethren are already in the field! Why stand we here idle? What is it that gentlemen wish? What would they have? Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it. Almighty God! I know not what course others may take: but as for me, give me liberty or give me death! 1775

THOMAS PAINE 1737-1809

Born in England, Paine entered business after having received a common-school education, and was afterwards appointed to the British excise service. In 1774 he came to America and enlisted as a volunteer under Washington. His service to the Revolutionary cause was as a pamphleteer rather than as a soldier; but since this was of inestimable value, he was rewarded for it both by Congress and by the states of Pennsylvania and New York. He returned to Europe, was engaged in the French Revolution, and became a citizen of France; but disagreeing with the faction in power he was obliged to return to America. He arrived in this country greatly reduced in circumstances, shattered in health and, because of his deistic views, under suspicion of being an atheist. Aside from some verse, Paine wrote Common Sense, 1776; The Crisis (a periodical), 1776-1783; The Rights of Man, 1791; The Age of Reason, 1794.

Paine may be considered as an agitator born, in opposition to things that are, eager for a contest, negative and destructive. There is no proof that he possessed any faculty of constructive statesmanship or any skill in social organization. But he was a man of vision, a maker of phrases and a coiner of watchwords. Though his arguments were often absurdly unsound, he appealed to the American populace so directly and was so easily understood that he made thousands of converts to the cause of independence.

See G. Bradford, Damaged Souls, 1923; same, Harber 146:369-78; E. F. Wyatt, "Our First Internationalist," New Repub. 48:90-92; Outlook 94: 334-5, 608,

From COMMON SENSE 3

THOUGHTS ON THE PRESENT STATE OF THE AMERICAN AFFAIRS

In the following pages I offer nothing more than simple facts, plain arguments, and common sense: and have no other preliminaries to settle with the reader, than that he will divest himself of prejudice and prepossession, and will suffer his reason and his feelings to determine for themselves; that he will put on, or rather that he will not put off the true character of a man, and generously enlarge his views beyond the present day.

Volumes have been written on the subject of the struggle between England and America. Men of all ranks have embarked in the controversy, from different motives, and with various designs: but all have been ineffectual, and the period of debate is closed. Arms, as the last resource, must decide the contest; the appeal was the choice of the king, and the continent hath accepted the challenge.

It has been reported of the late Mr. Pelham 1 (who, though an able minister was not without his faults) that on his being attacked in the house of commons, on the score that his measures were only of a temporary kind, replied, "they will last my time." Should a thought so fatal and unmanly possess the colonies in the present contest, the name of ancestors will be remembered by future generations with detestation.

The sun never shone on a cause of greater worth. 'Tis not the affair of a city, a county, a province, or a kingdom, but of a continent of at least one eighth part of the habitable globe. 'Tis not the concern of a day, a year, or an age; posterity are virtually involved in the contest, and will be more or less affected even to the end of time, by the proceedings now. Now is the seedtime of continental union. faith and honor. The least fracture now will be like a name engraved with the point of a pin on the tender rind of a young oak; the

2 Jeremiah vi, 14 1 choice

Paine had been in the colonies scarcely two years when he wrote Common Sense.
 Thomas Pelham, Duke of Newcastle, 1693-1768, member of various English ministries wound will enlarge with the tree, and posterity read it in full grown characters.

By referring the matter from argument to arms, a new area for politics is struck; a new method of thinking bath arisen. All plans, proposals, etc., prior to the nineteenth of April, i.e., to the commencement of hostilities, are like the almanacs of last year: which, though proper then, are superseded and useless now. Whatever was advanced by the advocates on either side of the question then, terminated in one and the same point, viz., a union with Great Britain: the only difference between the parties was the method of effecting it; the one proposing force, the other friendship; but it hath so far happened that the first has failed. and the second has withdrawn her influence.

As much hath been said of the advantages of reconciliation, which, like an agreeable dream, hath passed away and left us as we were, it is but right that we should examine the contrary side of the argument, and inquire into some of the many material injuries which these colonies sustain, and always will sustain, by being connected with and dependent on Great Britain. To examine that connection and dependence, on the principles of nature and common sense, to see what we have to trust to, if separated, and what we are to expect, if dependent.

I have heard it asserted by some, that as America has flourished under her former connection with Great Britain, the same connection is necessary towards her future happiness, and will always have the same effect. Nothing can be more fallacious than this kind of argument. We may as well assert that because a child has thrived upon milk, that it is never to have meat. or that the first twenty years of our lives is to become a precedent for the next twenty. But even this is admitting more than is true, for I answer roundly that America would have flourished as much, and probably much more, had no European power had anything to do with her. The articles of commerce by which she has enriched herself, are the necessaries of life, and will always have a market while eating is the custom of Europe.

But she has protected us, say some. That she hath engrossed us is true, and defended the continent at our expense as well as her own, is admitted, and she would have defended Turkey from the same motives, viz., for the sake of trade and dominion.

Alas! we have been long led away by ancient prejudices, and made large sacrifices to superstition. We have boasted the protection of Great Britain, without considering that her motive was interest not attachment; and that she did not protect us from our enemies on our account, but from her enemies on her own account, from those who had no quarrel with us on any other account, and who will always be our enemies on the same account. Let Britain waive her pretensions to the continent, or the continent throw off the dependence, and we should be at peace with France and Spain, were they at war with Britain. The miseries of Hanover's last war ought to warn us against connections. 1

It hath lately been asserted in Parliament. that the colonies have no relation to each other but through the parent country, i.e., that Pennsylvania and the Jerseys, and so on for the rest, are sister colonies by the way of England; this is certainly a very roundabout way of proving relationship, but it is the nearest and only true way of proving enemyship, if I may so call it. France and Spain never were, nor perhaps ever will be, our enemies as Americans, but as our being the subjects of Great Britain.

But Britain is the parent country, say some. Then the more shame upon her conduct. Even brutes do not devour their young, nor savages make war upon their families: wherefore, the assertion, if true, turns to her reproach; but it happens not to be true, or only partly so, and the phrase parent or mother country hath been jesuitically adopted by the King and his parasites, with a low papistical design of gaining an unfair bias on the credulous weakness of our minds. Europe, and not England, is the parent country of America. This new world hath been the asylum for the persecuted lovers of civil and religious liberty from every part of Europe. Hither have they fled, not from the tender embraces of the mother, but from the cruelty of the monster; and it is so far true of England, that the same tyranny which drove the first emigrants from home, pursues their descendants still.

In this extensive quarter of the globe, we forget the narrow limits of three hundred and sixty miles (the extent of England 2) and carry our friendship on a larger scale; we claim brotherhood with every European Christian, and triumph in the generosity of the sentiment.

It is pleasant to observe by what regular

&lt;sup>1</sup> From 1714 to 1837 Hanover was ruled by the sovereigns of England (the House of Hanover). In 1756 George II allied himself with Frederick the Great in the Seven Years' War. The next year, after the defeat of his son, the Duke of Cumberland, he gave Hanover to the French and made no attempt to recover it, though it was restored by the treaty of 1763.

<sup>2</sup> the distance from north to south of England proper

gradations we surmount local prejudices, as we enlarge our acquaintance with the world. A man born in any town in England divided into parishes, will naturally associate most with his fellow parishioners (because their interests in many cases will be common) and distinguish him by the name of neighbor; if he meet him but a few miles from home, he drops the narrow idea of a street, and salutes him by the name of townsman; if he travel out of the county, and meets him in any other, he forgets the minor divisions of street and town, and calls him countryman, i.e., county-man; but if in their foreign excursions they should associate in France or any other part of Europe, their local remembrance would be enlarged into that of Englishmen. And by a just parity of reasoning all Europeans meeting in America, or any other quarter of the globe, are countrymen; for England, Holland, Germany, or Sweden, when compared with the whole, stand in the same places on the larger scale which the divisions of street, town, and county do on the smaller one; distinctions too limited, for continental minds. Not one third of the inhabitants, even of this province, are of English descent. 1 Wherefore, I reprobate the phrase of parent or mother country applied to England only, as being false, selfish, narrow and ungenerous.

But, admitting that we were all of English descent, what does it amount to? Nothing. Britain, being now an open enemy, extinguishes every other name and title: and to say that reconciliation is our duty, is truly farcical. The first king of England, of the present line (William the Conqueror) was a Frenchman, and half the peers of England are descendents from the same country; wherefore, by the same method of reasoning, England ought to be governed by France.

Much hath been said of the united strength of Britain and the colonies, that in conjunction they might bid defiance to the world. But this is mere presumption; the fate of war is uncertain, neither do the expressions mean any-is full of scurrilous abuse of the English people, and resorts to such stupid arguments as the denial of the English origin of the Americans. Not one third of the people, even of Pennsylvania, are of English descent, argues Paine, as if Pennsylvania had been pre-eminent among the colonies for its English blood, and not, as in reality, perhaps the least English of all the thirteen save New York. But along with all this stuff there was a sensible and striking statement of the practical state of the case between England and the colonies. The reasons were shrewdly and vividly set forth for looking upon reconciliation as hopeless, and for seizing the present moment to declare to the world what the logic of events was already fast making an accomplished fact." The American Revolution, i, 174.

thing; for this continent would never suffer itself to be drained of inhabitants, to support the British arms in either Asia, Africa, or Europe. <sup>2</sup>

Besides, what have we to do with setting the world at defiance? Our plan is commerce, and that, well attended to, will secure us the peace and friendship of all Europe; because it is the interest of all Europe to have America a free port. Her trade will always be a protection, and her barrenness of gold and silver secure her from invaders.

I challenge the warmest advocate for reconciliation, to show a single advantage that this continent can reap, by being connected with Great Britain. I repeat the challenge; not a single advantage is derived. Our corn will fetch its price in any market in Europe, and our imported goods must be paid for, buy them where we will.

But the injuries and disadvantages which we sustain by that connection, are without number: and our duty to mankind at large, as well as to ourselves, instructs us to renounce the alliance; because any submission to or dependence on Great Britain tends directly to involve this continent in European wars and quarrels; and sets us at variance with nations, who would otherwise seek our friendship, and against whom we have neither anger nor complaint. As Europe is our market for trade, we ought to form no partial connection with any part of it. It is the true interest of America to steer clear of European contentions, which she never can do, while, by her dependence on Britain, she is made the make-weight in the scale of British

Europe is too thickly planted with kingdoms to be long at peace, and whenever a war breaks out between England and any foreign power, the trade of America goes to ruin, because of her connection with Britain. The next war may not turn out like the last, and should it not. the advocates for reconciliation now will be wishing for separation then, because neutrality, in that case, would be a safer convoy than a man-of-war. Everything that is right or natural pleads for separation. The blood of the slain, the weeping voice of nature cries, "'Tis time to part." Even the distance at which the Almighty hath placed England and America, is a strong and natural proof that the authority of the one over the other was never the design of Heaven. The time likewise at which the continent was discovered, adds weight to the argument, and the manner in which it was peopled increases the force of it. The Reformation was preceded by the discovery of America, as if the Almighty graciously meant to open a sanctuary to the persecuted in future years, when home should afford neither friendship nor safety.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The World War of 1914-1918 shows Paine's forecast to be untrue, but we must remember that after our Revolution England took pains to endear herself to her remaining colonies.

The authority of Great Britain over this continent, is a form of government which sooner or later must have an end; and a serious mind can draw no true pleasure by looking forward, under the painful and positive conviction that what he calls "the present constitution," is merely temporary. As parents, we can have no joy, knowing that this government is not sufficiently lasting to insure anything which we may bequeathe to posterity; and by a plain method of argument, as we are running the next generation into debt, we ought to do the work of it; otherwise we use them meanly and pitifully. In order to discover the line of our duty rightly. we should take our children in our hand, and fix our station a few years farther into life; that eminence will present a prospect which a few present fears and prejudices conceal from our sight....

It is repugnant to reason, and the universal order of things, to all examples from former ages, to suppose that this continent can longer remain subject to any external power. most sanguine in Britain do not think so. The utmost stretch of human wisdom cannot, at this time, compass a plan short of separation, which can promise the continent even a year's Reconciliation is now a fallacious security. dream. Nature hath deserted the connection. and art cannot supply her place. For, as Milton wisely expresses, "never can true reconcilement grow, where wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep." 2

Every quiet method for peace hath been ineffectual. Our prayers have been rejected with disdain; and only tended to convince us that nothing flatters vanity, or confirms obstinacy in kings more than repeated petitioning-nothing hath contributed more than this very measure to make the kings of Europe absolute: witness Denmark and Sweden. Wherefore, since nothing but blows will do, for God's sake let us come to a final separation, and not leave the next generation to be cutting throats, under the violated unmeaning names of parent and child.

To say they will never attempt it again, is idle and visionary; we thought so at the repeal of the Stamp Act, yet a year or two undeceived us: as well may we suppose that nations which have been once defeated, will never renew the quarrel.

As to government matters, it is not in the power of Britain to do this continent justice: the business of it will soon be too weighty and intricate to be managed with any tolerable degree of convenience by a power so distant from us, and so very ignorant of us; for if they cannot conquer us, they cannot govern us. To be always running three or four thousand miles with a tale or a petition, waiting four or five months for an answer, which when obtained, requires five or six more to explain it in, will in a few years be looked upon as folly and childishness-there was a time when it was proper, and there is a proper time for it to cease.

Small islands, not capable of protecting themselves, are the proper objects for kingdoms to take under their care; but there is something absurd in supposing a continent to be perpetually governed by an island. In no instance hath nature made the satellite larger than its primary planet; and as England and America, with respect to each other, reverses the common order of nature, it is evident that they belong to different systems: England to Europe —America to itself.

I am not induced by motives of pride, party, or resentment, to espouse the doctrine of separation and independence; I am clearly, positively, and conscientiously persuaded that it is the true interest of this continent to be so; that everything short of that is mere patchwork: that it can afford no lasting felicity.that it is leaving the sword to our children, and shrinking back at a time when going a little further would have rendered this continent the glory of the earth.

A government of our own is our natural right: and when a man seriously reflects on the precariousness of human affairs, he will become convinced that it is infinitely wiser and safer to form a constitution of our own in a cool, deliberate manner, while we have it in our power, than to trust such an interesting event to time and chance. If we omit it now. some Masaniello 3 may hereafter arise, who, laying hold of popular disquietudes, may collect together the desperate and the discontented, and by assuming to themselves the powers of government, finally sweep away the liberties of the continent like a deluge. Should the government of America return again into the hands of Britain, the tottering situation of things will be a temptation for some desperate adventurer to try his fortune; and in such a case, what relief can Britain give? Ere she could hear the news, the fatal business might be done; and ourselves suffering like the wretched Britons under the oppression of the Conqueror. Ye that oppose independence now. ye know not what ye do; ye are opening a door to eternal tyranny, by keeping vacant the seat of government. There are thousands and tens of thousands who would think it glorious to expel from the continent that barbarous and hellish power which hath stirred up the Indians and negroes to destroy us 1—the cruelty hath a double guilt: it is dealing brutally by us, and treacherously by them.

&lt;sup>1</sup> the movement in the sixteenth century against the authority of the Roman Catholic church <sup>2</sup> Paradise Lost, iv, 98

Masaniello (Tomaso Aniello), 1622-1647, a Neapolitan fisherman, led a revolt against the Spanish viceroy of Naples which was successful in bringing relief from oppressive taxation.

To talk of friendship with those in whom our reason forbids us to have faith, and our affections, wounded through a thousand pores, instruct us to detest, is madness and folly. Every day wears out the little remains of kindred between us and them; and can there be any reason to hope that as the relationship expires the affection will increase, or that we shall agree better when we have ten times more and greater concerns to quarrel over than ever?

Ye that tell us of harmony and reconciliation can ve restore to us the time that is past? Can ve give to prostitution its former innocence? Neither can ye reconcile Britain and America. The last cord now is broken, the people of England are presenting addresses against us. There are injuries which nature cannot forgive: she would cease to be nature if she did. As well can the lover forgive the ravisher of his mistress, as the continent forgive the murders of Britain. The Almighty hath implanted in us these unextinguishable feelings, for good and wise purposes. They are the guardians of his image in our hearts, and distinguish us from the herd of common animals. The social compact would dissolve, and justice be extirpated from the earth, or have only a casual existence were we callous to the touches of affection. robber and the murderer would often escape unpunished, did not the injuries which our tempers sustain provoke us into justice.

O! ye that love mankind! Ye that dare oppose, not only the tyranny, but the tyrant, stand forth! Every spot of the old world is overrun with oppression. Freedom hath been haunted round the globe. Asia, and Africa, have long expelled her. Europe regards her like a stranger, and England hath given her warning to depart. O receive the fugitive, and prepare in time an asylum for mankind.

1775 1776

&lt;sup>1</sup> In the Revolution, Great Britain employed Indian tribes to attack and ravage outlying settlements Some renegade negro slaves may also have been thus employed.

FROM THE REVOLUTION TO THE CIVIL WAR

In THE period between the Revolution and the Civil War the new nation grew rapidly, at first into a body of loosely-joined and ever-expanding geographical units, then into two great sections with sharply divergent interests, to be brought together only after the pain of civil war. In literature the line separating the sections was fainter than in political and social life; North and South alike were prevailingly romantic in tone and technique. Poe, the great genius of the South, and in Europe the most widely acclaimed of American poets before Whitman, was at one with the New England poets in avoiding realism; he is apart from them in his insistent pursuit of beauty as an end in itself, and in his shunning moral themes so strongly characteristic of Emerson and Longfellow. Cooper, the Northerner, and Simms, the Southerner, alike stress the picturesque in narrative, the conflict of savage and settler.

There is a division to be noted in the literature of the period; but it is one of time, not of geography. The independence secured by the Revolution at first showed only faintly in our literature. The scenes of Brown and Cooper and Irving and Bryant were American scenes; but Brown was inspired by the English "Gothic" novel then in vogue, especially by the tales of Mrs. Radcliffe; Cooper, giving a vigorous picture of the contact and conflict between Indian and White, yet followed closely the method of his great forerunner in the historical novel, Sir Walter Scott; Irving, in style, took Addison and Goldsmith as his models; and Bryant was especially stimulated by Wordsworth's veneration of nature. What this first great group of American writers did was to give body and dignity to American literature.

In the group that followed, the New England writers of the middle of the century, Longfellow, Emerson, Whittier, Hawthorne, Thoreau, Holmes, and Lowell, the native undercurrent mounted. That it was in some sense a local current—Emerson and Thoreau and Hawthorne are New England to the core—made for the sharper distinctness of the native element: even Longfellow, who frankly followed in the footsteps of Irving as a reporter of European culture to the New World, is distinctly American in point of view: to Holmes, "Boston was the hub of the Universe." Lacking, perhaps, the many-hued vitality that springs only from such a depth of subsoil as the long ages have given to European literature, the new American literature, nevertheless, showed a fine elevation, a carefulness of standards, a clarity that compensated for lack of complexity; its voice was distinct and clear-toned if not deep or richly resonant. In spirit, the New England literature of this period showed an odd combination of Puritanism and Romance.

In the fifties the shadow of the coming of the Civil War and of approaching social changes affected our literature deeply; the outstanding Puritan theme of individual righteousness receded before the questions forced on the nation by the division between North and South; and as the era closed, the growing democracy of America and the world, the emergence to prominence of the "common man," produced the prophet of the new order in Whitman, breaker of molds and acclaimer of the worker and the crowd. Whitman is deeply symbolical of the changes to come in the sixty-odd years after 1865.

GEORGE WASHINGTON 1732-1799

Although Washington has impressed himself upon the world's imagination as a personality and an administrator rather than as a writer, his political maxims are worthy of thoughtful consideration, and are admirable examples of the style of much political literature of his day. Notwithstanding his advantages as son of a well-to-do planter, he received but a meager schooling, mostly in mathematics and surveying. His services in the French and Indian War gave him excellent experience, especially in the discipline and organization of the British army. Afterwards he lived for ten years the life of a Virginia planter, modeled on that of the English country gentleman of the time, engaged in the rotation of crops, the improvement of stock, and the development of plantation industries. He was the wealthiest man in the colonies. In the Revolution he was the principal commander on the American side. After the Revolution, during which his estate had suffered neglect, he resumed the life in which he most delighted. Soon, however, he was called to preside over the Constitutional Convention, and in 1789 became the first President under the Constitution. His administration was marked by violent political controversies, sometimes engendered and always intensified by the French Revolution, then in progress. Washington's policy favored a strong central government free from foreign alliances, for the United States was in his day a weak nation amply secure in its geographical isolation.

The Farewell Address is the most carefully written of all Washington's papers. The President consulted Madison and Hamilton in its preparation, and to the latter is largely due its style, as a comparison of the formality of its manner with the simplicity of that of Washington's other papers will show. Washington's mode of expression, though involved, is dignified, strong, and to the point, especially in such letters as that written to Congress from Valley Forge appealing for relief.

Biography: H. C. Lodge (AS); recent: Diaries of G. Washington, 4 vols., 1925; R. Hughes, G. Washington, the Human Being and the Hero, 2 vols., 1926, 1927. Criticism: J. C. Fitzpatrick, "The George Washington Scandals," Scrib. M. 81: 389-95; W. N. Brigance, "Bible of the Isolationists," Ind. 118:213-15; "Washington Dismounted from his High Horse," Lit. Digest 87:50-52, Dec. 12. 1925.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS

Valley Forge, 23 December, 1777.

SIR,

Full as I was in my representation of the matters in the commissary's department yesterday, fresh and more powerful reasons oblige me to add that I am now convinced beyond a doubt, that, unless some great and capital change suddenly takes [place] in that line, this army must inevitably be reduced to one or other of these three things: starve, dissolve, or disperse in order to obtain subsistence in the best manner they can. Rest assured, Sir, this is not an exaggerated picture, and that I have abundant reason to suppose what I say.

Yesterday afternoon, receiving information that the enemy in force had left the city, and were advancing toward Derby with the apparent design to forage, and draw subsistence from that part of the country, I ordered the troops to be in readiness, that I might give every opposition in my power; when behold, to my great mortification, I was not only informed but convinced that the men were unable to stir on account of provision, and that a dangerous mutiny, begun the night before, and which with difficulty was suppressed by the spirited exertions of some officers, was still much to be apprehended for want of this article. This brought forth the only commissary in the purchasing line in this camp; and, with him, this melancholy and alarming truth, that he had not a single hoof of any kind to slaughter, and not more than twenty-five barrels of flour! From hence form an opinion of our situation when I add that he could not tell when to expect any.

All I could do under these circumstances. was to send out a few light parties to watch and harass the enemy, whilst other parties were instantly detached different ways to collect, if possible, as much provision as would satisfy the present pressing wants of the soldiery. But will this answer? No. Sir: three or four days of bad weather would prove our destruction. What then is to become of the army this winter? And if we are so often without provisions now, what is to become of us in the spring, when our force will be collected, with the aid perhaps of militia to take advantage of an early campaign, before the enemy can be reinforced? These are considerations of great magnitude, meriting the closest attention; and they will, when my own reputation is so intimately connected with the event and to be affected by it, justify my saying that the present commissaries are by no means equal to the execution of the office, or that the disaffection of the people is past all belief. The misfortune, however, does in my opinion proceed from both causes; and, though I have been tender heretofore of giving any opinion, or lodging complaints, as the change in that department took place contrary to my judgment, and the consequences thereof were predicted; yet, finding that the inactivity of the army, whether for want of provisions, clothes, or other essentials, is charged to my account, not only by the common vulgar but by those in power, it is time to speak plain in exculpation of myself. With truth, then, I can declare that no man in my opinion ever had his measures more impeded than I have, by every department of the army.

Since the month of July we have had no assistance from the quartermaster-general, and to want of assistance from this department the commissary-general charges great part of his deficiency. To this I am to add that, notwith-standing it is a standing order, and often repeated, that the troops shall always have two days' provisions by them, that they might be ready at any sudden call; yet an opportunity has scarcely ever offered, of taking an advantage of the enemy, that has not been either totally obstructed, or greatly impeded, on this account. And this, the great and crying evil, is not all. The soap, vinegar, and other articles allowed by Congress, we see none of, nor have we seen them, I believe, since the battle of Brandywine. The first, indeed, we have now little occasion for: few men having more than one shirt, many only the moiety of one, and some none at all. In addition to which, as a proof of the little benefit received from a clothier-general, and as a further proof of the inability of an army, under the circumstances of this, to perform the common duties of soldiers (besides a number of men confined to hospitals for want of shoes, and others in farmers' houses on the same account) we have, by a field-return this day made, no less than two thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight men now in camp unfit for duty, because they are barefoot and otherwise naked. By the same return it appears that our whole strength in Continental troops, including the eastern brigades, which have joined us since the surrender of General Burgoyne, exclusive of the Maryland troops sent to Wilmington, amounts to no more than eight thousand two hundred in camp fit for duty; notwithstanding which, and that since the 4th instant our numbers fit for duty, from the hardships and exposures they have undergone, particularly on account of blankets (numbers having been obliged, and still are, to sit up all night by fires, instead of taking comfortable rest in a natural and common way), have decreased near two thousand

We find gentlemen, without knowing whether the army was really going into winter-quarters or not (for I am sure no resolution of mine would warrant the Remonstrance 2), reprobating the measure as much as if they thought the soldiers were made of stocks or stones, and equally insensible of frost and snow; and moreover, as if they conceived it easily practicable for an inferior army, under the disadvantages I have described ours to be, which are by no means exaggerated, to confine a superior one, in all respects well-appointed and provided for a winter's campaign, within the city of Philadelphia, and to cover from depredation and waste the States of Pennsylvania and Jersey.

 Sept. 11, 1777
 alluding to the Memorial, or Remonstrance, of the legislature of Pennsylvania, respecting his going into winter-quarters

But what makes this matter still more extraordinary in my eye is that these very gentlemen-who were well apprized of the nakedness of the troops from ocular demonstration, who thought their own soldiers worse clad than others, and who advised me near a month ago to postpone the execution of a plan I was about to adopt, in consequence of a resolve of Congress for seizing clothes, under strong assurances that an ample supply would be collected in ten days agreeably to a decree of the State (not one article of which, by the by, is yet come to hand)-should think a winter's campaign, and the covering of these States from the invasion of an enemy, so easy and practicable a business. I can assure those gentlemen that it is a much easier and less distressing thing to draw remonstrances in a comfortable room by a good fireside, than to occupy a cold bleak hill, and sleep under frost and snow, without clothes or blankets. However, although they seem to have little feeling for the naked and distressed soldiers, I feel superabundantly for them, and, from my soul, I pity those miseries, which it is neither in my power to relieve or prevent.

It is for these reasons, therefore, that I have dwelt upon the subject; and it adds not a little to my other difficulties and distress to find that much more is expected of me than is possible to be performed, and that upon the ground of safety and policy I am obliged to conceal the true state of the army from public view, and thereby expose myself to detraction and calumny. The honorable committee of Congress went from camp fully possessed of my sentiments respecting the establishment of this army, the necessity of auditors of accounts, the appointment of officers, and new arrangements. I have no need, therefore, to be prolix upon these subjects, but I refer to the committee. I shall add a word or two to show, first, the necessity of some better provision for binding the officers by the tie of interest to the service, as no day nor scarce an hour passes without the offer of a resigned commission 1 (otherwise I much doubt the practicability of holding the army together much longer, and in this I shall probably be thought the more sincere when I freely declare that I do not myself expect to derive the smallest benefit from any establishment that Congress may adopt, otherwise than as a member of the community at large in the good which I am persuaded will result from the measure, by making better officers and better troops); and, secondly, to point out the necessity of making the appointments and arrangements without loss of time. We have not more than three months in which to prepare a great deal of business. If we let these slip or waste, we shall be laboring under the same difficulties all next campaign as we have been this, to rectify mistakes and bring things to order.

Military arrangement, and movements in consequence, like the mechanism of a clock. will be imperfect and disordered by the want of a part. In a very sensible degree have I experienced this in the course of the last summer, several brigades having no brigadiers appointed to them till late, and some not at all; by which means it follows that an additional weight is thrown upon the shoulders of the Commander-in-chief, to withdraw his attention from the great line of his duty. The gentlemen of the committee, when they were at camp, talked of an expedient for adjusting these matters, which I highly approved and wish to see adopted: namely, that two or three members of the Board of War, or a committee of Congress. should repair immediately to camp, where the best aid can be had, and with the commanding officer, or a committee of his appointment, prepare and digest the most perfect plan that can be devised for correcting all abuses and making new arrangements: considering what is to be done with the weak and debilitated regiments, if the States to which they belong will not draft men to fill them, for as to enlisting soldiers it seems to me to be totally out of the question; together with many other things that would occur in the course of such a conference; and, after digesting matters in the best manner they can, to submit the whole to the ultimate determination of Congress.

If this measure is approved, I would earnestly advise the immediate execution of it, and that the commissary-general of purchases, whom I rarely see, may be directed to form magazines without a moment's delay in the neighborhood of this camp, in order to secure provisions for us in case of bad weather. The quartermastergeneral ought also to be busy in his department. In short, there is as much to be done in preparing for a campaign, as in the active part of it. Everything depends upon the preparation that is made in the several departments, and the success or misfortunes of the next campaign will more than probably originate with our activity or supineness during this winter.

I have the honor to be, &c.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The House of Commons of North Carolina passed a resolution that any officer resigning at such a critical period without "good and sufficient reasons" should never again hold office in the state.

FAREWELL ADDRESS

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES 1 Friends and Fellow-Citizens.

The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country: and that, in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply. I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but act under am supported by 2 a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in, the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard. to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. 3 The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained hold office.

for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. 4 In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions. contributed towards the organization and administration of the government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious, in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself: and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary. I have the consolation to believe that while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is intended to terminate the career of my public life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions agitated in every direction were liable to mislead, amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging, in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism, the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to the grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution which is the work of your hands may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the

&lt;sup>1</sup> This address, delivered September 17, 1706, has, in common regard, a place beside the Monroe Doc-trine and the Declaration of Independence, second only to the Constitution.

This should probably read "but am supported by" or "but act under and supported by." The text is from the copy in Washington's letter book.

Washington was deeply sincere in his reluctance to people of these States under the auspices of liberty may be made complete, by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption, of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

<sup>4</sup> upon his first inauguration

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger. natural to that solicitude, urge me on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all-important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsels. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion. 1

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity in every shape. of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes, and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that vou should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the Palladium 2 of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it

when he took farewell of the army
 Safeguard: the image of Pallas, the Palladium, fell from heaven, and so long as it was preserved in the citadel, protected Troy from destruction.

can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts. <sup>3</sup>

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. name of AMERICAN, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together. The independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint councils and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North in an unrestrained intercourse 4 with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation envigorated; and while it contributes in different ways to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West. already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water will more and more find, a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort, and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest. as one nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength, or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, 1 must be intrinsically precarious.

After the Revolution and before the adoption of the Constitution, some of the states had enacted tariffs against others. Local commercial interests were leading to disruption.

&lt;sup>3</sup> During the last days of the Confederation it seemed probable that New England would form a separate union. It is difficult today to comprehend the state of public opinion toward government in Washington's time. The masses were intensely democratic; the aristocracy felt that government should be chiefly in their own hands; and there was little desire in either class to sacrifice rights or privileges to the common good. There was no experience in more than local self-government; and few but Washington and his immediate associates grasped the idea of national unity or clearly saw what the relations of our nation to others should be. The marvel is that these few men held their own till a new generation with larger ideas than those of their fathers made the compact secure.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined in the united mass of means and efforts cannot fail to find greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and what is of inestimable value. they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves. which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government, which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? 2 Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations, Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate, of the treaty with Spain. 3 and in the universal satisfaction at that event throughout the United States a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi; they have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain 4 and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the Union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such there are, who would sever them from their brethren, and connect them with aliens?

The United States government had failed for years to secure from Spain the right to navigate the Mississippi, a privilege indispensable to Tennessee and Kentucky. These communities, feeling deeply the neglect of their interests in the East, secretly intrigued with Spain and were with difficulty kept within the union.
Much as Washington strove for power in the central government, he could scarcely have foreseen the scope of the central government of today, with an oversight not merely regulative, but also scientific and industrial.

a signed at Madrid, October, 1795, and allowing the free navigation of the Mississippi

Jay's famous treaty with England brought about, in June, 1796, the surrender of the remaining posts of the British in the Northwest.

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute. They must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances in all times have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, 1 by the adoption of a constitution of government better calculated than your former for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This Government, the offspring of our own choice. uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government, presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws. all combinations and associations. 2 under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force; to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation, the will of a party; 3 often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community, and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual in-the Articles of Confederation

3 Notwithstanding Washington's strong feeling, party had already gained permanent foothold in the terests. However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely in the course of time and things, to become potent engines by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion

Towards the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited. remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country: that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests, in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

Clubs of citizens framed on the model of the Jacobin Club of Paris had been formed throughout the country to propagate the ideas of the French Revolution and to express sympathy with France in her struggle with the nations of Europe allied against her.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms, kindles the animosity of one part against another, foments occasionally riot and insurrection. It opens the doors to foreign influence and corruption which find a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another. <sup>1</sup>

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchical cast, patriotism may look with indulgence if not with favor upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be by force of public opinion to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest, instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those entrusted with its administration. to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create. whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart. is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories. and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eves. 2 To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government.

War had almost been thrust upon the country through the imprudence of Genet, minister from France, who through the press appealed directly to the party in America favoring alliance with his country.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The proper division of the government into legislative, executive, and judicial departments, so that one should not encroach upon another, had been a most difficult task.

The rule indeed extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible; avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it: avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt. not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty. it is essential that you should practically bear in mind that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant: that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate. 1

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded: and that in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed and bloody contests. The nation prompted by ill-will and resentment sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So likewise a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists. and infusing into one the enmities of the other. betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions; by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, illwill, and a disposition to retaliate, in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld. And it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation), facility to betray, or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption or infatuation.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The "Whisky Rebellion" of 1794 was an insurrection caused by a tax levied by Congress.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, I conjure you to believe me, fellowcitizens, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial; else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another. cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence therefore it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships, or emmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest guided by our justice shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world; so far I mean as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity. and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied, as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations. But if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare, by which they have been dictated.

How far in the discharge of my official duties I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you, and to the world. To myself the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, <sup>1</sup> my proclamation of the 22d of April 1793 is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice and by that of your representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take and was bound in duty and interest to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it, with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat, in which I promise myself to realize without alloy the sweet enjoyment of partaking in the midst of my fellow-citizens the benign influence of good laws under a free government, the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

United States, September 19th, 1796

THOMAS JEFFERSON 1743-1826

Perhaps more than any other American of his day, not excepting even Franklin, Jefferson was a world-citizen, responsive to the ideas and forces most active in European life before and during the French Revolution. He was born at Shadwell, Albemarle County, Virginia, and died at his estate, Monticello, near Charlottesville, Virginia. He had a good classical schooling, was two years at William and Mary College, studied and practiced law, and early entered public life in the Virginia legislature. He was member of the Continental Congress, governor of Virginia, 1779-81, United States minister to France, 1785-1789, vice president under Adams, and President, 1801-1809. Tefferson's political faith rested in the people as a directly active governing force, a faith opposed to that of Washington, who placed greater reliance on a strong central government. His writings are nearly all political, though his intellectual interests were of great range. He was a student of the classics, of modern languages, Indian dialects, Anglo-Saxon, geology, the sciences, and architecture. He was the founder of the University of Virginia. It is interesting that

&lt;sup>1</sup> The war between France and the nations of Europe ending with Napoleon in control of France; Washington's proclamation of neutrality was a severe blow to American sympathizers with France.

Jefferson's style, like that of his friend Paine, and his English contemporary Godwin—all three leaders in liberal thought—is one of plain, direct simplicity. Biography: J. T. Morse (AS). Recent: F. W. Hirst, Life and Letters of T. Jefferson, 1926; P. Wilstach, Jefferson at Monticello, 1926. Also, for an interesting contemporary picture, G. Ticknor, Life, Letters and Correspondence, 2 vols. 1909, vol. 1. p. 34 ff

From his AUTOBIOGRAPHY 1

[CONGRESS UNDER THE CONFEDERATION 2]

Our body was little numerous but very contentious. Day after day was wasted on the most unimportant questions. My colleague Mercer was one of those afflicted with the morbid rage of debate, of an ardent mind, prompt imagination, and copious flow of words: he heard with impatience any logic which was not his own. Sitting near me on some occasion of a trifling but wordy debate, he asked how I could sit in silence hearing so much false reasoning which a word should refute. I observed to him that to refute indeed was easy, but to silence impossible. That in measures brought forward by myself I took the laboring oar, as was incumbent on me; but that in general I was willing to listen. If every sound argument or objection was used by some one or other of the numerous debaters it was enough: if not, I thought it sufficient to suggest the omission without going into a repetition of what had been already said by others. That this was a waste and abuse of the time and patience of the house which could not be justified. And I believe that if the members of deliberative bodies were to observe this course generally, they would do in a day what takes them a week; and it is really more questionable than may at first be thought whether Bonaparte's dumb legislature 3 which said nothing and did much may not be preferable to one which talks much and does nothing. I served with General Washington in the legislature of Virginia before the Revolution, and during it with Dr. Franklin in Congress. I never heard either of them speak ten minutes at a time. nor to any but the main point which was to decide the question. They laid their shoulders to the great points, knowing that the little ones would follow of themselves. If the present Congress errs in too much talking, how can it be otherwise in a body to which the people send one hundred and fifty lawyers whose trade it is to question everything, yield nothing, and talk by the hour? That one hundred and fifty lawyers should do business together ought not to be expected. But to return again to our subject.

[THE FRENCH REVOLUTION 4]

[July 12, 1789] The King 5 was now completely in the hands of men 6 the principal among whom had been noted through their lives for the Turkish despotism of their characters, and who were associated around the King as proper instruments for what was to be executed. The news of this change began to be known at Paris about one or two o'clock. In the afternoon a body of about one hundred German cavalry 7 were advanced and drawn up in the Place Louis XV. and about two hundred Swiss posted at a little distance in their rear. This drew people to the spot, who thus accidentally found themselves in front of the troops. merely at first as spectators; but as their numbers increased their indignation rose. They retired a few steps and posted themselves on and behind large piles of stones, large and small, collected in that Place for a bridge which was to be built adjacent to it. In this position, happening to be in my carriage on a visit, I passed through the lane they had formed, without interruption. But the moment after I had passed, the people attacked the cavalry with stones. They charged, but the advantageous position of the people, and the showers of stones, obliged the horse to retire and quit the field altogether, leaving one of their number on the ground, and the Swiss in their rear not moving to their aid. This was the signal for universal insurrection, and this body of cavalry, to avoid being massacred, retired towards Versailles. 8 The people now armed themselves with such weapons as they could find in armorers' shops and private houses, and with bludgeons, and were roaming all night through all parts of the city, without any decided object.

s royal residence and military headquarters ten miles from Paris

&lt;sup>1</sup> The autobiography is a condensed narrative written when Jefferson was seventy-seven years of age, and comes down only to the death of Franklin in

&lt;sup>2</sup> the Congress under the Articles of Confederation, session of 1784

When Bonaparte obtained control of France the national assembly voted without debate the decrees he proposed.

&lt;sup>4</sup> Jefferson was minister to France, 1785-1789, and, as may be inferred from his account, strongly sympathized with the revolution there.
<sup>5</sup> Louis XVI

the newly formed reactionary ministry appointed at the dismissal of Necker whom the people trusted. The king, distrusting French troops, had surrounded himself with mercenaries.

The next day (13th.) the Assembly pressed on the King to send away the troops, to permit the bourgeoisie 1 of Paris to arm for the preservation of order in the city, and offered to send a deputation from their body to tranquilize them; but their propositions were refused. A committee of magistrates and electors of the city are appointed by those bodies to take upon them its government. The people now openly joined by the French guards force the prison of St. Lazare, release all the prisoners, and take a great store of corn, which they carry to the Corn-market. 2 Here they get some arms, and the French guards 3 begin to form and train The City-committee determined to raise forty-eight thousand bourgeoisie, or rather to restrain their numbers to forty-eight thousand. On the 14th, they send one of their members (Mons. de Corny) to the Hôtel des Invalides, 4 to ask arms for their Garde-Bourgeoisie. 5 He was followed by, and he found there a great collection of people. The Governor of the Invalides came out and represented the impossibility of his delivering arms without the orders of those from whom he received them. De Corny advised the people then to retire, and retired himself; but the people took possession of the arms. It was remarkable that not only the Invalides themselves made no opposition, but that a body of five thousand foreign troops within four hundred vards never M. de Corny and five others were then sent to ask arms of M. de Launay, governor of the Bastile. 6 They found a great collection of people already before the place, and they immediately planted a flag of truce, which was answered by a like flag hoisted on the parapet. The deputation prevailed on the people to fall back a little, advanced themselves to make their demand of the Governor, and in that instant a discharge from the Bastile killed four persons, of those nearest to the The deputies retired. I happened deputies. to be at the house of M. de Corny when he returned to it, and received from him a narrative of these transactions. On the retirement of the deputies, the people rushed forward and almost in an instant were in possession of a fortification defended by one hundred men, of infinite strength, which in other times had stood several regular sieges, and had never been taken. How they forced their entrance has never been explained. They took all the arms. discharged the prisoners, and such of the garrison as were not killed in the first moment of fury, carried the Governor and Lt. Governor to the Place de Grève (the place of public execution), cut off their heads, and sent them through the city in triumph to the Palais Royal. 8 About the same instant a treacherous correspondence having been discovered in M. de Flesselles. Prévôt des Marchands. 9 they seized him in the Hôtel de Ville where he was in the execution of his office, and cut off his head. These events carried imperfectly to Versailles were the subject of two successive deputations from the Assembly to the King, to both of which he gave dry and hard answers, for nobody had as yet been permitted to inform him truly and fully of what had passed at Paris. But at night the Duke de Liancourt forced his way into the King's bed chamber and obliged him to hear a full and animated detail of the disasters of the day in Paris. He went to bed fearfully impressed. The decapitation of de Launav worked powerfully through the night on the whole aristocratic party insomuch that in the morning those of the greatest influence on the Count d'Artois 10 represented to him the absolute necessity that the King should give up everything to the Assembly. This according with the depositions of the King, he went about eleven o'clock, accompanied only by his brothers, to the Assembly and there read to them a speech in which he asked their interposition to re-establish order. Although couched in terms of some caution yet the manner in which it was delivered made it evident that it was meant as a surrender at discretion. He returned to the Chateau 11 afoot accompanied by the Assembly. They sent off a deputation to quiet Paris, at the head of which was the Marquis de la Fayette who had the same morning been named Commandant en chef of the Milice Bourgeoise, and Mons. Bailly, former President of the States General, 12 was called for as Prévôt des Marchands. The demolition of the Bastile was now ordered and begun. A body

1 the middle classes

&lt;sup>2</sup> The people were starving. <sup>3</sup> The Gardes Françaises, native French soldiers, sympathized with the revolutionists.

<sup>4</sup> Originally a home for disabled soldiers; arms were stored there.

&lt;sup>6</sup> citizen-guard, forming at first a kind of city militia <sup>6</sup> an ancient fortress, then used like the Tower of London, as the state prison: the visible sign of tyranny

&lt;sup>7</sup> Compare this matter-of-fact account with that of

&#x27;Compare this matter-of-fact account with that of Carlyle's French Revolution, I, v, 6.

*residence of the Duc d'Orléans, Louis Philippe, nicknamed "Egalité," representative of one branch of the Bourbon family, who at first sided with the revolutionists but later fell a victim to the Jacobins

onns
the chief city official
the chief city official
the chief city official
the chief city official the could residence at Versailles; the new national Assembly was in session near at hand.
the national legislature before the Revolution of the Swiss guards of the regiment of Ventimille, and the city horse guards joined the people. The alarm at Versailles increased. The foreign troops were ordered off instantly. Every minister resigned. The King confirmed Bailly as Prévôt des Marchands, wrote to Mr. Necker to recall him, sent his letter open to the Assembly to be forwarded by them, and invited them to go with him to Paris the next day to satisfy the city of his dispositions; and that night, and the next morning the Count d'Artois and M. de Montesson, a deputy connected with him. Madame de Polignac. Madame de Guiche. and the Count de Vaudreuil, favorites of the Oueen, the Abbé de Vermont her confessor, the Prince of Condé and Duke of Bourbon 1 fled. The King came to Paris, leaving the Queen in consternation for his return. Omitting the less important figures of the procession, the King's carriage was in the center, on each side of it the Assembly in two ranks afoot, at their head the M. de la Favette as Commander-in-chief on horseback, and Bourgeoise guards before and behind. About sixty thousand citizens of all forms and conditions, armed with the muskets of the Bastile and Invalides, as far as they would go, the rest with pistols, swords, pikes, pruning hooks, scythes etc. lined all the streets through which the procession passed, and with the crowds of people in the streets, doors and windows, saluted them everywhere with cries of "Vive la nation," but not a single "Vive le rov" was heard. The King landed at the Hôtel de Ville. There M. Bailly presented and put into his hat the popular cockade.2 and addressed him. The King being unprepared and unable to answer. Bailly went to him, gathered from him some scraps of sentences, and made out an answer, which he delivered to the audience as from the King. On their return the popular cries were "Vive le roy et la nation." He was conducted by a garde bourgeoise to his palace at Versailles, and thus concluded an amende honorable as no sovereign ever made, and no people ever received.

And here again was lost another precious occasion of sparing to France the crimes and cruelties through which she has since passed, and to Europe, and finally America the evils which flowed on them also from this mortal source. The King was now become a passive machine in the hands of the National Assembly, and had he been left to himself. he would have willingly acquiesced in whatever they should devise as best for the nation. A wise constitution would have been formed, hereditary in his line, himself placed at its head, with powers so large as to enable him to do all the good of his station, and so limited as to restrain him from its abuse. This he would have faithfully administered, and more than this I do not believe he ever wished. But he had a Oueen of absolute sway over his weak mind, and timid virtue; and of a character the reverse of his in all points. This angel, as gaudily painted in the rhapsodies of the Rhetor Burke, 3 with some smartness of fancy but no sound sense, was proud, disdainful of restraint, indignant at all obstacles to her will, eager in the pursuit of pleasure, and firm enough to hold to her desires or perish in their wreck. Her inordinate gambling and dissipations, with those of the Count d'Artois and others of her clique, had been a sensible item in the exhaustion of the treasury, which called into action the reforming hand of the nation; and her opposition to it, her inflexible perverseness, and dauntless spirit, led herself to the guillotine, and drew the King on with her, and plunged the world into crimes and calamities which will forever stain the pages of modern history. I have ever believed that had there been no Queen, there would have been no revolution. No force would have been provoked nor exercised. The King would have gone hand in hand with the wisdom of his sounder counselors, who, guided by the increased lights of the age, wished only, with the same pace, to advance the principles of their social institution. The deed which closed the mortal course of these sovereigns, I shall neither approve nor condemn. I am not prepared to say that the first magistrate of a nation cannot commit treason against his country, or is unamenable to its punishment: nor yet that where there is no written law, no regulated tribunal, there is not a law in our hearts, and a power in our hands, given for righteous employment in maintaining right, and redressing wrong. Of those who judged the King, many thought him wilfully criminal. many that his existence would keep the nation in perpetual conflict with the horde of kings who would war against a regeneration which might come home to themselves, and that it were better that one should die than all. I should not have voted with this portion of the legislature. I should have shut up the Queen

&lt;sup>1</sup> father and son, representing the Condé branch of the Bourbon family

the tri-colored rosette, the emblem of the Revolution

The student should by all means compare Jefferson's view with that of Edmund Burke in Reflections on the Revolution in France. Jefferson feels that Burke was in this case more a rhetorician than a historian.

in a convent, putting harm out of her power, and placed the King in his station, investing him with limited powers, which I verily believe he would have honestly exercised, according to the measure of his understanding. In this way no void would have been created, courting the usurpation of a military adventurer, nor occasion given for those enormities which demoralized the nations of the world, and destroyed, and is yet to destroy millions and millions of its inhabitants. There are three epochs in history signalized by the total extinction of national morality. The first was of the successors of Alexander, not omitting himself. The next the successors of the first Caesar, the third our own age. This was begun by the partition of Poland, 1 followed by that of the treaty of Pilnitz, 2 next the conflagration of Copenhagen; 3 then the enormities of Bonaparte partitioning the earth at his will, and devastating it with fire and sword; now the conspiracy of kings, the successors of Bonaparte, blasphemously calling themselves the Holy Alliance, 4 and treading in the footsteps of their incarcerated leader, 5 not yet indeed usurping the government of other nations avowedly and in detail, but controlling by their armies the forms in which they will permit them to be governed; and reserving in petto 6 the order and extent of the usurpations further meditated. But I will return from a digression, anticipated too in time, into which I have been led by reflection on the criminal passions which refused to the world a favorable occasion of saving it from the afflictions it has since suffered.

1829 1821

FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS March 4, 1801 7

Friends and Fellow-Citizens:-

Called upon to undertake the duties of the first executive office of our country, I avail in 1772 between Russia, Austria, and Prussia by which the Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia agreed, in 1792, to support in arms the cause of the French king

3 The victory of Nelson over the Danes in 1801, and the bombardment and partial destruction of Copenthe bombardment and partial de ruthless driving of Denhagen in 1807, marked the ruthless driving of Denmark by the allies from a position of neutrality in the great European struggle.

4 a compact formed by the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia in 1815, and joined later by nearly all the monarchs of Europe, for the avowed purpose of perpetuating the Christian religion, but really to perpetuate their own respective dynasties

5 Bonaparte, exiled to St. Helena

6 in the breast

6 in the breast Jefferson took the presidency as a Republican, or liberal, after the Federalists, or conservatives, had been in office for the first twelve years under the Constitution. His inaugural address is frequently entitled "Democracy Defined." myself of the presence of that portion of mv fellow-citizens which is here assembled, to express my grateful thanks for the favor with which they have been pleased to look towards me, to declare a sincere consciousness that the task is above my talents, and that I approach it with those anxious and awful presentiments which the greatness of the charge and the weakness of my powers so justly inspire. A rising nation spread over a wide and fruitful land. traversing all the seas with the rich productions of their industry, engaged in commerce with nations who feel power and forget right, advancing rapidly to destinies beyond the reach of mortal eye; when I contemplate these transcendant objects, and see the honor, the happiness, and the hopes of this beloved country committed to the issue and the auspices of this day, I shrink from the contemplation, and humble myself before the magnitude of the undertaking.

Utterly, indeed, should I despair, did not the presence of many whom I here see remind me that in the other high authorities provided by our constitution I shall find resources of wisdom, of virtue, and of zeal on which to rely under all difficulties. To you, then, gentlemen, who are charged with the sovereign functions of legislation, and to those associated with you, I look with encouragement for that guidance and support which may enable us to steer with safety the vessel in which we are all embarked, amidst the conflicting elements of a troubled

During the contest of opinion through which we have passed, the animation of discussions and of exertions has sometimes worn an aspect which might impose on strangers unused to think freely and to speak and to write what they think. But this being now decided by the voice of the nation, announced according to the rules of the Constitution, all will, of course, arrange themselves under the will of the law, and unite in common efforts for the common good. All too will bear in mind this sacred principle, that though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will, to be rightful, must be reasonable; that the minority possess their equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate would be oppression. Let us then, fellow-citizens, unite with one heart and one mind; let us restore to social intercourse that harmony and affection without which liberty, and even life itself, are but dreary things. And let us reflect that having

s Jefferson wrote it: "I look wth encorgmt for yt guidee & supprt weh m enable us to steer wth safety ye vess! in wch w'r all mbkd am<sup>dst</sup> yc confiets clemts of a trouble sea."

banished from our land that religious intolerance under which mankind so long bled and suffered, we have yet gained little if we countenance a political intolerance as despotic, as wicked, and capable of as bitter and bloody persecutions. During the throes and convulsions of the ancient world, during the agonizing spasms of infuriated man, seeking through blood and slaughter his long-lost liberty, it was not wonderful that the agitation of the billows should reach even this distant and peaceful shore: that this should be more felt and feared by some and less by others; and should divide opinions as to measures of safety. But every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle. We have called by different names brethren of the same principle. We are all Republicans; we are all Federalists. 1 If there be any among us who would wish to dissolve this Union, or to change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated, where reason is left free to combat it. I know, indeed, that some honest men have feared that a republican government cannot be strong: that this Government is not strong enough. But would the honest patriot, in the full tide of successful experiment, abandon a government which has so far kept us free and firm, on the theoretic and visionary fear that this Government, the world's best hope, may by possibility want energy to preserve itself? I trust not. I believe this, on the contrary, the strongest government on earth. I believe it the only one where every man, at the call of the law would fly to the standard of the law: would meet invasions of the public order as his own personal concern. Sometimes it is said that man cannot be trusted with the government of himself. Can he then, be trusted with the government of others? Or have we found angels in the form of kings to govern him? Let history answer this question.

Let us then, pursue with courage and confidence our own federal and republican principles, our attachment to union and representative government. Kindly separated by nature and a wide ocean from the exterminating havoc of one quarter of the globe; too high-minded to endure the degradations of the others; possessing a chosen country, with room enough for our descendants to the hundredth and thousandth generation; entertaining a due sense of our equal right to the use of our own faculties, to the acquisitions of our own industry, to honor and confidence from our fellow-citizens, resulting not from birth, but from our actions and their sense of them; enlightened by a benign religion, professed indeed and practiced in various forms yet all of them inculcating honesty. truth, temperance, gratitude, and the love of man, acknowledging and adoring an overruling Providence, which by all its dispensations proves that it delights in the happiness of man here and his greater happiness hereafter: with all these blessings, what more is necessary to make us a happy and a prosperous people? Still one thing more, fellow-citizens-a wise and frugal government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government; and this is necessary to close the circle of our felicities.

About to enter, fellow-citizens, on the exercise of duties which comprehend everything dear and valuable to you, it is proper you should understand what I deem the essential principle of this government, and consequently those which ought to shape its administration. I will compress them in the narrowest compass they will bear, stating the general principle but not all its limitations. Equal and exact justice to all men of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none: 2 the support of the state governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the general government in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; a jealous care of the right of election by the people; a mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lopped by the sword of revolution, where peaceable remedies are unprovided: absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority, the vital principle of republics, from which is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism; a well-disciplined militia, our best reliance in peace and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority—economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened; the honest payment of our debts, and sacred preservation of the public faith; encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce as its handmaid; the diffusion of information and arraignment of all abuses at the bar of the public reason; freedom of religion, freedom of the press, and freedom of person, under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected. These principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us, and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation. The wisdom of our sages and blood of our heroes have been devoted to their attainment; they should be the creed of our political faith; the text of civic instruction; the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust; and should we wander from them in moments of error or alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Jefferson's tact, and his moderation as President, gradually softened the prejudice of the great minority opposed to his theoretical principles of government.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Cf. Washington's words, p. 155.

I repair then, fellow-citizens, to the post which you have assigned me. With experience enough in subordinate stations to know the difficulties of this, the greatest of all, I have learned to expect that it will rarely fall to the lot of imperfect man to retire from this station with the reputation and the favor which bring him into it. Without pretensions to that high confidence you reposed in our first and greatest revolutionary character, whose preëminent services had entitled him to the first place in his country's love, and had destined for him the fairest page in the volume of faithful history, I ask so much confidence only as may give firmness and effect to the legal administration of your affairs. I shall often go wrong through defect of judgment. When right, I shall often be thought wrong by those whose positions will not command a view of the whole ground. I ask your indulgence for my own errors, which will never be intentional; and your support against the errors of others, who may condemn what they would not, if seen in all its parts. The approbation implied by your suffrage is a great consolation to me for the past; and my future solicitude will be to retain the good opinion of those who have bestowed it in advance, to conciliate that of others by doing them all the good in my power, and to be instrumental to the happiness and freedom of all.

Relying then on the patronage of your goodwill, I advance with obedience to the work, ready to retire from it whenever you become sensible how much better choice it is in your power to make. And may that Infinite Power which rules the destinies of the universe lead our councils to what is best, and give them a favorable issue for your peace and prosperity.

PHILIP FRENEAU 1752-1832

Freneau was the first American of our national period who showed any particular gift for poetic expression. He was born of Huguenot parentage in New York City. After graduating from Princeton College in 1771, he was often at sea between Philadelphia and the West Indies, and in 1780 was captured by the British and confined for a time in a prison ship. During the Revolution he wrote many patriotic lyrics and satires. Newspaper work and journalism in New York and Philadelphia occupied most of his active years, though in 1790 he was translator for the Department of State. He published volumes of poetry from 1786 to 1815. notably an edition from his own press at Monmouth, New Jersey, 1795, where he lived until his death.

Freneau was versatile and vivacious and was one of the first poets writing in English to express the new "romantic" attitude toward nature. Nothing like it had appeared before in America and little in England; for his first volume appeared in the same year with Burns's poems, and twelve years before the publication of Wordsworth and Coleridge's Lyrical Ballads. We may, therefore, well wish that his outward circumstances had been less turbulent, and that he had been favored with friends who were also stimulating and sympathetic critics of poetry. Some of his shorter pieces have a finish and a harmony between thought and form worthy of all praise. The House of Night, longer and more pretentious, lacks these qualities, but it shows genuine power of original imagination, and some passages are gorgeous beyond anything previous in American literature. The poem is uneven and in places crude; but we must remember that it was written when standards in American literature were not yet formed.

Works: F. L. Pattee, ed. 3 vols., 1902-7. See P. E. More (Shel. 5).

From THE HOUSE OF NIGHT 1

A VISION

Trembling I write my dream, and recollect A fearful vision at the midnight hour; So late, Death o'er me spread his sable wings, Painted with fancies of malignant power!

In explaining the poem Freneau says:

ADVERTISEMENT—This Poem is founded upon the authority of Scripture, inasmuch as these sacred books assert that "the last enemy that shall be conquered is Death." For the purposes of poetry he is here personified, and represented as on his dying bed. The scene is laid at a solitary palace (the time midnight), which, tho' before beautiful and joyous, is now become sad and gloomy, as being the abode and receptacle of Death. Its owner, an amiable, majestic youth, who had lately lost a beloved consort, nevertheless with a noble philosophical fortitude and humanity, entertains him in a friendly manner, and by employing Physicians, endeavors to restore him to health, altho' an enemy; convinced of the excellence and

Such was the dream the sage Chaldean saw Disclosed to him that felt heaven's vengeful

Such was the ghost, who through deep silence

Shall mortal man—be juster than his God? 1

Let others draw from smiling skies their theme, And tell of climes that boast unfading light. 10 I draw a darker scene, replete with gloom, I sing the horrors of the House of Night.

Stranger, believe the truth experience tells. Poetic dreams are of a finer cast Than those which o'er the sober brain diffused, Are but a repetition of some action past.

Fancy, I own thy power—when sunk in sleep Thou play'st thy wild delusive part so well You lift me into immortality. Depict new heavens, or draw the scenes of hell.

By some sad means, when reason holds no swav.

Lonely I roved at midnight o'er a plain Where murmuring streams and mingling rivers

Far to their springs, or seek the sea again.

Sweet vernal May! though then thy woods in Flourished, yet nought of this could fancy see, No wild pinks blessed the meads, no green the propriety of that divine precept, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink." He nevertheless, as if by a spirit of prophecy, informs this (fictitiously) wicked being of the certainty of his doom, and represents to him in a pathetic manner, the vanity of his expectations, either of a reception into the abodes of the just, or continuing longer to make havock of mankind upon earth. The patient finding his end approaching, composes his epitable, and orders it to be ening, composes his epitaph, and orders it to be engraved on his tombstone, hinting to us thereby that even Death and Distress have vanity; and would be remembered with honour after he is no more, altho' his whole life has been spent and along of dependent of the property of the state of the deeds of devastation and murder. He dies at deeds of devastation and multiple. It dies at last in the utmost agonies of despair, after agreeing with an avaricious Undertaker to intomb his bones. This reflects upon the inhumanity of those men, who, not to mention an enemy, would scarcely cover a departed friend with a little dust, without certainty of reward for so doing. The circumstances of his funeral are then recited, and the visionary and fabulous part of the poem disappears. It concludes with a few reflexions the interpretation of the property of the impropriety of a too great attachment to the present life, and incentives to such moral virtue as may assist in conducting us to a better.

And naked seemed to stand each lifeless tree.

Eliphaz told Job what he had seen and heard in a vision—of a spirit that said, "Shall mortal man be more just than God?" Job iv, 17.

Dark was the sky, and not one friendly star Shone from the zenith or horizon, clear, Mist sat upon the woods, and darkness rode In her black chariot, with a wild career.

And from the woods the late resounding note Issued of the loquacious whippoorwill. Hoarse, howling dogs, and nightly roving wolves Clamored from far-off cliffs invisible.

Rude, from the wide extended Chesapeake I heard the winds the dashing waves assail, And saw from far, by picturing fancy formed, The black ship traveling through the noisy gale.

At last, by chance and guardian fancy led. I reached a noble dome, 2 raised fair and high, And saw the light from upper windows flame, Presage of mirth and hospitality.

And by that light around the dome appeared A mournful garden of autumnal hue, Its lately pleasing flowers all drooping stood Amidst high weeds that in rank plenty grew.

The primrose there, the violet darkly blue, Daisies and fair narcissus ceased to rise. Gay spotted pinks their charming bloom with-

And polyanthus quenched its thousand dyes.

No pleasant fruit or blossom gaily smiled, Nought but unhappy plants or trees were seen, The yew, the myrtle, and the church-yard elm. The cypress, with its melancholy green, 3

There cedars dark, the osier, and the pine; Shorn tamarisks, and weeping willows grew. The poplar tall, the lotus, and the lime, GO And pyracantha did her leaves renew.

The poppy there, companion to repose, Displayed her blossoms that began to fall, And here the purple amaranthus rose With mint strong-scented, for the funeral.

And here and there with laurel shrubs between A tombstone lay, inscribed with strains of woe, And stanzas sad, throughout the dismal green, Lamented for the dead that slept below. 4

<sup>2</sup> the home of the "majestic youth" spoken of in the "advertisement"

&lt;sup>3</sup> characteristic eighteenth century graveyard trees <sup>4</sup> There follows the consultation of Death's physicians

Then up three winding stairs my feet were brought 89

To a high chamber, hung with mourning sad; The unsnuffed candles glared with visage dim, 'Midst grief, in ecstasy of woe run mad.

A wide leafed table stood on either side, Well fraught with phials, half their liquids

And from a couch, behind the curtain's veil, I heard a hollow voice of loud lament.

Turning to view the object whence it came, My frighted eyes a horrid form surveyed; Fancy, I own thy power—Death on the couch, With fleshless limbs, at rueful length, was laid.

And o'er his head flew jealousies and cares, 101 Ghosts, imps, and half the black Tartarian 1 crew.

Archangels damned, nor was their Prince remote

Borne on the vaporous wings of Stygian 2 dew.

Around his bed, by the dull flambeaux' glare, I saw pale phantoms—rage to madness vexed, Wan, wasting grief, and ever musing care, Distressful pain, and poverty perplexed.

Sad was his countenance, if we can call

That countenance, where only bones were seen
And eyes sunk in their sockets, dark and low,
And teeth, that only showed themselves to grin.

Reft was his skull of hair, and no fresh bloom Of cheerful mirth sat on his visage hoar: Sometimes he raised his head, while deep-drawn

Were mixed with words that did his fate deplore.

Oft did he wish to see the daylight spring, And often toward the window leaned to hear, Fore-runner of the scarlet-mantled morn, The early note of wakeful chanticleer. 3 120

"Death in this tomb his weary bones hath laid, "Sick of dominion o'er the human kind— 390

"Six thousand years * has sovereign sway been mine

"None, but myself, can real giory claim;
"Great Regent of the world I reigned alone,
"And princes trembled when my mandate came.

"Vast and unmatched throughout the world, my fame

"Takes place of gods, and asks no mortal date—5

"No; by myself, and by the heavens, I swear, "Not Alexander's name is half so great.

"Nor swords nor darts my prowess could withstand,

"All quit their arms, and bowed to my decree, "Even mighty Julius died beneath my hand, "For slaves and Caesars were the same to me!

"Traveler, wouldst thou his noblest trophies seek.

"Search in no narrow spot obscure for those; "The sea profound, the surface of all land "Is molded with the myriads of his foes."

Scarce had he spoke, when on the lofty dome Rushed from the clouds a hoarse resounding blast—

Round the four eaves so loud and sad it played As though all music were to breathe its last.

Warm was the gale, and such as travelers say Sport with the winds on Zaara's <sup>6</sup> barren waste; Black was the sky, a mourning carpet spread, Its azure blotted, and its stars o'ercast!

Lights in the air like burning stars were hurled. Dogs howled, heaven muttered, and the tempest blew.

The red half-moon peeped from behind a cloud As if in dread the amazing scene to view.

420

The mournful trees that in the garden stood Bent to the tempest as it rushed along, The elm, the myrtle, and the cypress sad More melancholy tuned its bellowing song.

No more that elm its noble branches spread,
The yew, the cypress, or the myrtle tree,
Rent from the roots the tempest tore them down,

And all the grove in wild confusion lay.

4 According to Jewish chronology, the creation and fall of man, and with it the beginning of the reign of death, took place four thousand years before the Christian era.

5 Death can scarcely conceive that he is not immortal, dateless, like the gods.

6 Sahara's

&quot;Behold what devastations he hath made, "Survey the millions by his arm confined.

&lt;sup>1</sup> pertaining to Tartarus, the abode of the wicked in Hades

&lt;sup>2</sup> Styx was one of the rivers of the lower world.
<sup>3</sup> There follow a description of the mortal sickness and agony of Death, and the directions he gives for his burial, ending with his epitaph in lines 389 ff.

Yet, mindful of his dread command I part 429 Glad from the magic dome—nor found relief; Damps from the dead hung heavier round my heart

While sad remembrance roused her stores of grief.

O'er a dark field I held my dubious way Where Jack-a-lanthorn walked his lonely round, Beneath my feet substantial darkness lay, And screams were heard from the distempered ground.

Nor looked I back, till to a far-off wood, Trembling with fear, my weary feet had sped— Dark was the night, but at the enchanted dome I saw the infernal windows flaming red.

And from within the howls of Death I heard, Cursing the dismal night that gave him birth, Damning his ancient sire, and mother sin, Who at the gates of hell, accursed, brought him forth. <sup>1</sup>

For fancy gave to my enraptured soul An eagle's eye, with keenest glance to see, And bade those distant sounds distinctly roll, Which, waking, never had affected me.

Oft his pale breast with cruel hand he smote, And tearing from his limbs a winding sheet, 450 Roared to the black skies, while the woods around

As wicked as himself, his words repeat.

Thrice toward the skies his meager arms he reared,

Invoked all hell, and thunders on his head, Bid lightnings fly, earth yawn, and tempests

And the sea wrap him in its oozy bed.

"My life for one cool draught!—O, fetch your springs,

Can one unfeeling to my woes be found! No friendly visage comes to my relief,
But ghosts impend, and specters hover round.

"Though humbled now, disheartened and distressed,

Yet when admitted to the peaceful ground, With heroes, kings, and conquerors I shall rest, Shall sleep as safely, and perhaps as sound."

Dim burnt the lamp, and now the phantom

Death

Gave his last groans in horror and despair—
"All hell demands me hence,"—he said, and threw

The red lamp hissing through the midnight air.

Trembling, across the plain my course I held, And found the graveyard, loitering through the gloom.

And in the midst, a hell-red, wandering light. Walking in fiery circles round the tomb.

Among the graves a spiry building stood, Whose tolling bell, resounding through the shade.

Sung doleful ditties to the adjacent wood, And many a dismal drowsy thing it said.

This fabric tall, with towers and chancels graced.

Was raised by sinners' hands in ages fled; The roof they painted, and the beams they braced.

And texts from scripture o'er the walls they spread: 480

But wicked were their hearts, for they refused To aid the helpless orphan, when distressed, The shivering, naked stranger they misused, And banished from their doors the starving guest.

By laws protected, cruel and profane,
The poor man's ox these monsters drove away:—

And left Distress to attend her infant train, No friend to comfort, and no bread to stay.

But Heaven looked on with keen, resentful eye, And doomed them to perdition and the grave. That as they felt not for the wretch distressed.

So Heaven no pity on their souls would have.

In pride they raised this building tall and fair, Their hearts were on perpetual mischief bent, With pride they preached, and pride was in their prayer,

With pride they were deceived, and so to hell they went.

At distance far approaching to the tomb, By lamps and lanthorns guided through the shade,

A coal-black chariot hurried through the gloom. Specters attending, in black weeds arrayed, 500

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Paradise Lost, ii, 749-790.

Whose woeful forms yet chill my soul with dread.

Each wore a vest in Stygian chambers wove. Death's kindred all-Death's horses they bestrode

And galloped fiercely, as the chariot drove.

Each horrid face a grisly mask concealed, Their busy eyes shot terror to my soul As now and then, by the pale lanthorn's glare, I saw them for their parted friend condole.

Before the hearse Death's chaplain seemed to

Who strove to comfort, what he could, the dead:

Talked much of Satan, and the land of woe, And many a chapter from the Scriptures read.

At last he raised the swelling anthem high, In dismal numbers seemed he to complain: The captive tribes that by Euphrates wept. 1 Their song was jovial to his dreary strain.

That done, they placed the carcass in the tomb, To dust and dull oblivion now resigned, Then turned the chariot toward the House of 519

Which soon flew off, and left no trace behind.

But as I stooped to write the appointed verse, Swifter than thought the airy scene decayed; Blushing the morn arose, and from the east With her gay streams of light dispelled the shade.

What is this Death, ye deep read Sophists, sav?---

Death is no more than one unceasing change; New forms arise, while other forms decay, Yet all is Life throughout creation's range.

The towering Alps, the haughty Appenine, The Andes, wrapped in everlasting snow, The Apalachian and the Ararat Sooner or later must to ruin go.

Hills sink to plains, and man returns to dust, That dust supports a reptile or a flower; Each changeful atom by some other nursed Takes some new form, to perish in an hour.

Too nearly joined to sickness, toils, and pains, (Perhaps for former crimes imprisoned here)

the Israelites, Psalms cxxxvii, 1

True to itself the immortal soul remains. And seeks new mansions in the starry sphere.

When Nature bids thee from the world retire. With joy thy lodging leave, a fated guest; In Paradise, the land of thy desire, Existing always, always to be blessed. 17762 1779, 1786

TO THE MEMORY OF THE BRAVE AMERICANS

Under General Greene, in South Caro-LINA, WHO FELL IN THE ACTION OF SEPTEMBER 8, 1781

At Eutaw Springs the valiant died; Their limbs with dust are covered o'er-Weep on, ye springs, your tearful tide; How many heroes are no more!

If in this wreck of ruin, they Can yet be thought to claim a tear. O smite your gentle breast, and say The friends of freedom slumber here!

Thou, who shalt trace this bloody plain, If goodness rules thy generous breast, Sigh for the wasted rural reign; Sigh for the shepherds sunk to rest!

10

Stranger, their humble graves adorn; You too may fall, and ask a tear: 'T is not the beauty of the morn That proves the evening shall be clear.—

They saw their injured country's woe, The flaming town, the wasted field; Then rushed to meet the insulting foe: 20 They took the spear—but left the shield.

Led by thy conquering genius, Greene, The Britons they compelled to fly; None distant viewed the fatal plain, None grieved in such a cause to die—

But, like the Parthians famed of old. Who, flying, still their arrows threw, These routed Britons, full as bold, Retreated, and retreating slew.

Now rest in peace our patriot band; Though far from nature's limits thrown, We trust they find a happier land, A brighter sunshine of their own. 1781

1781

10

1786

30

STANZAS

OCCASIONED BY THE RUINS OF A COUNTRY INN, UNROOFED AND BLOWN DOWN IN A STORM

Where now these mingled ruins lie A temple once to Bacchus <sup>1</sup> rose, Beneath whose roof, aspiring high, Full many a guest forgot his woes.

No more this dome, by tempests torn, Affords a social safe retreat; But ravens here, with eye forlorn, And clustering bats henceforth will meet.

The priestess of this ruined shrine, Unable to survive the stroke, Presents no more the ruddy wine, Her glasses gone, her china broke.

The friendly host, whose social hand Accosted strangers at the door, Has left at length his wonted stand, And greets the weary guest no more.

Old creeping Time, that brings decay,
Might yet have spared these moldering walls,
Alike beneath whose potent sway
A temple or a tavern falls.

Is this the place where mirth and joy, Coy nymphs, and sprightly lads were found? Indeed! no more the nymphs are coy, No more the flowing bowls go round.

Is this the place where festive song Deceived the wintry hours away? No more the swains the tune prolong, No more the maidens join the lay:

Is this the place where Nancy slept
In downy beds of blue and green?—
Dame Nature here no vigils kept,
No cold unfeeling guards were seen.

'T is gone!—and Nancy tempts no more, Deep, unrelenting silence reigns; Of all that pleased, that charmed before, The tottering chimney scarce remains!

Ye tyrant winds, whose ruffian blast
Through doors and windows blew too strong,
And all the roof to ruin cast,—
The roof that sheltered us so long,— god of conviviality

40

Your wrath appeased, I pray be kind
If Mopsus <sup>2</sup> should the dome renew;
That we again may quaff his wine,
Again collect our joyial crew.

1782

10 20 10

THE WILD HONEYSUCKLE

Fair flower, that dost so comely grow,
Hid in this silent, dull retreat,
Untouched by honied blossoms blow,
Unseen thy little branches greet:
No roving foot shall crush thee here,
No busy hand provoke a tear.

By Nature's self in white arrayed,
She bade thee shun the vulgar eye,
And planted here the guardian shade,
And sent soft waters murmuring by;
Thus quietly thy summer goes,
Thy days declining to repose.

Smit with those charms, that must decay, I grieve to see your future doom;
They died—nor were those flowers more gay,
The flowers that did in Eden bloom;
Unpitying frosts and Autumn's power
Shall leave no vestige of this flower.

From morning suns and evening dews
At first thy little being came:
If nothing once, you nothing lose,
For when you die you are the same;
The space between is but an hour,
The frail duration of a flower.

1786

THE INDIAN BURYING GROUND

In spite of all the learned have said,
I still my old opinion keep;
The posture that we give the dead
Points out the soul's eternal sleep.

Not so the ancients of these lands;—
The Indian, when from life released,
Again is seated with his friends,
And shares again the joyous feast.

His imaged birds, and painted bowl,
And venison, for a journey dressed,
Bespeak the nature of the soul,
Activity, that knows no rest.

<sup>2</sup> perhaps, as in idyllic poetry, used for the name of a countryman 20

30

40

1788

His bow for action ready bent. And arrows with a head of stone, Can only mean that life is spent. And not the old ideas gone.

Thou, stranger, that shalt come this way. No fraud upon the dead commit,-Observe the swelling turf, and say They do not lie, but here they sit.

Here still a lofty rock remains, On which the curious eve may trace (Now wasted half by wearing rains) The fancies of a ruder race

Here still an aged elm aspires. Beneath whose far-projecting shade (And which the shepherd still admires) The children of the forest played.

There oft a restless Indian queen (Pale Shebah 1 with her braided hair) And many a barbarous form is seen To chide the man that lingers there.

By midnight moons, o'er moistening dews, In habit for the chase arrayed. The hunter still the deer pursues. The hunter and the deer, a shade!

And long shall timorous fancy see The painted chief, and pointed spear, And reason's self shall bow the knee To shadows and delusions here.

THE PARTING GLASS

The man that joins in life's career And hopes to find some comfort here, To rise above this earthly mass,— The only way's to drink his glass.

But still, on this uncertain stage Where hopes and fears the soul engage, And while, amid the joyous band, Unheeded flows the measured sand, Forget not as the moments pass That time shall bring the parting glass!

In spite of all the mirth I've heard, This is the glass I always feared, The glass that would the rest destroy, The farewell cup, the close of joy!

With you, whom reason taught to think. I could for ages sit and drink: But with the fool, the sot, the ass. I haste to take the parting glass.

The luckless wight, that still delays His draught of joys to future days. Delays too long-for then, alas! Old age steps up, and—breaks the glass!

20

40

50

The nymph who boasts no borrowed charms. Whose sprightly wit my fancy warms,-What though she tends this country inn. And mixes wine, and deals out gin? With such a kind, obliging lass, I sigh to take the parting glass.

With him who always talks of gain 30 (Dull Momus, 2 of the plodding train), The wretch who thrives by others' woes. And carries grief where'er he goes,--With people of this knavish class The first is still my parting glass.

With those that drink before they dine. With him that apes the grunting swine, Who fills his page with low abuse, And strives to act the gabbling goose Turned out by fate to feed on grass-Boy, give me quick, the parting glass.

The man whose friendship is sincere, Who knows no guilt, and feels no fear,— It would require a heart of brass With him to take the parting glass!

With him who quaffs his pot of ale. Who holds to all an even scale, Who hates a knave in each disguise. And fears him not-whate'er his size-With him, well pleased my days to pass, May Heaven forbid the Parting Glass! 1790

ON A HONEY BEE

DRINKING FROM A GLASS OF WINE AND DROWNED THEREIN

Thou, born to sip the lake or spring, Or quaff the waters of the stream, Why hither come, on vagrant wing? Does Bacchus tempting seem,

<sup>2</sup> Momus, a god personifying mockery and ridicule

10

1 1 Kings, x

10

20 30

1809

10 20 30

40

Did he for you this glass prepare? Will I admit you to a share?

Did storms harass or foes perplex, Did wasps or king-birds bring dismay. Did wars distress, or labors vex. Or did you miss your way? A better seat you could not take Than on the margin of this lake.

Welcome!—I hail you to my glass: All welcome here you find; Here let the cloud of trouble pass, Here be all care resigned. This fluid never fails to please. And drown the griefs of men or bees.

What forced you here we cannot know. And you will scarcely tell.— But cheery we would have you go And bid a glad farewell: On lighter wings we bid you fly. — Your dart will now all foes defy.

Yet take not, oh! too deep a drink, And in this ocean die; Here bigger bees than you might sink, Even bees full six feet high. Like Pharaoh, then, you would be said To perish in a sea of red.

Do as you please, your will is mine; Enjoy it without fear. And your grave will be this glass of wine, Your epitaph—a tear; Go, take your seat in Charon's 1 boat; We'll tell the hive, you died affoat.

TO A CATY-DID

In a branch of willow hid Sings the evening Caty-did: From the lofty locust bough Feeding on a drop of dew, In her suit of green arrayed Hear her singing in the shade Caty-did, Caty-did!

While upon a leaf you tread, Or repose your little head, On your sheet of shadows laid, All the day you nothing said: Half the night your cheery tongue

the ferryman who carried the souls of the dead across the rivers of the underworld

Reveled out its little song. Nothing else but Caty-did.

From your lodgings on the leaf Did vou utter joy or grief?-Did vou only mean to say. I have had my summer's day. And am passing, soon, away To the grave of Caty-did:— Poor, unhappy Caty-did!

But you would have uttered more Had you known of nature's power-From the world when you retreat, And a leaf's your winding sheet, Long before your spirit fled. Who can tell but nature said. Live again, my Caty-did! Live and chatter, Caty-did.

Tell me, what did Caty do? Did she mean to trouble you? Why was Caty not forbid To trouble little Caty-did? Wrong indeed at you to fling, Hurting no one while you sing Caty-did! Caty-did! Caty-did!

Why continue to complain? Caty tells me, she again Will not give you plague or pain:-Caty says you may be hid Caty will not go to bed While you sing us Caty-did. Caty-did! Caty-did! Caty-did!

But while singing, you forgot To tell us what did Caty not: Caty did not think of cold. Flocks retiring to the fold. Winter, with his wrinkles old, Winter, that yourself foretold When you gave us Caty-did.

Stay securely in your nest; Caty now, will do her best, All she can to make you blest: But, you want no human aid-Nature, when she formed you, said, "Independent you are made, My dear little Caty-did: Soon vourself must disappear With the verdure of the year,—" And to go, we know not where, With your song of Caty-did.

60

1815

50

IOSEPH HOPKINSON 1770-1842

Joseph Hopkinson, who was born and died in Philadelphia, was the son of Francis Hopkinson, author of The Battle of the Kegs and other poems, page 137. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, studied and practiced law, was a member of Congress, 1815-1819, and from 1828 Judge of the United States District Court. He was chiefly influential in founding the Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts. His most popular song, "Hail Columbia," was written in 1798 when war with France was urged by a large party in America and was expected by all. The song, appealing to patriotic rather than party feelings, was immediately accepted by all factions.

HAIL COLUMBIA 1

Hail, Columbia! happy land!
Hail, ye heroes! heaven-born band!
Who fought and bled in freedom's cause,
Who fought and bled in freedom's cause,
And when the storm of war was gone,
Enjoyed the peace your valor won.
Let independence be our boast,

Let independence be our box Ever mindful what it cost; Ever grateful for the prize, Let its altar reach the skies.

> Firm, united, let us be, Rallying round our liberty; As a band of brothers joined, <sup>2</sup> Peace and safety we shall find.

Immortal patriots! rise once more:
Defend your rights, defend your shore:
Let no rude foe, with impious hand,
Let no rude foe, with impious hand,
Invade the shrine where sacred lies
Of toil and blood the well-earned prize.
While offering peace sincere and just,
In Heaven we place a manly trust,
That truth and justice will prevail,
And every scheme of bondage fail.

Firm, united, etc.

Sound, sound, the trump of fame!
Let Washington's great name
Ring through the world with loud applause;
Ring through the world with loud applause;
Let every clime to freedom dear,
Listen with a joyful ear.
With equal skill, and godlike power,
He governed in the fearful hour

Hopkinson wrote the song to a popular piece of music "President's March." Of horrid war; or guides, with ease, The happier times of honest peace.

Firm, united, etc.

Behold the chief who now commands, <sup>3</sup>
Once more to serve his country, stands—
The rock on which the storm will beat,
The rock on which the storm will beat;
But, armed in virtue firm and true,
His hopes are fixed on Heaven and you.

When hope was sinking in dismay, And glooms obscured Columbia's day, His steady mind, from changes free, Resolved on death or liberty.

> Firm, united, let us be, Rallying round our liberty; As a band of brothers joined, Peace and safety we shall find.

1798

10

1798

40

CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN 1771-1810

To Brown belongs the distinction of being the first American novelist. He was born in Philadelphia and died there of consumption in his fortieth year. He received a good classical schooling, studied law, but soon took up literary work in verse and prose; he was the first American to make imaginative literature his calling. He was the editor of several literary magazines, but his name is remembered for his novels, of which he wrote seven between 1797 and 1801. Of these the foremost are Wieland, 1798, and Arthur Mcrvyn, 1799, the latter being founded upon the actual experience of Brown in the yellow fever scourge in New York City.

Brown was a man of sensitive spirit, shy and dreamy, but a pleasing companion. He had high ideals in fiction which, from lack of first-class ability and robust health, he could never reach. In his day the "Gothic" novel was in vogue. A leading characteristic of this type of fiction was the portrayal of horror for horror's sake. Brown, in following Mrs. Radcliffe and "Monk" Lewis, English novelists of the "Gothic" vogue, went even beyond them in picturing how the senses and the intellect respond to situations of the utmost horror. He was, however, in some respects, a realist; the scenes of his novels and the incidents worked into them are American and in many cases record fact, or incidents taken for fact, as well as beliefs and superstitions current in the country in his time. The terrible tragedy in Wieland was doubtless suggested by a tale told in an American newspaper (See Nation 99:577-8) of the murder of a family by the father, a religious maniac. This novel, the best of Brown's, is formed of extraordinary incidents cast into a highly exciting plot. This plot too often depends on the chance coincidence of events, but shows great ingenuity on the author's part. The effects it produces are sometimes highly dramatic, and sometimes decidedly stagy. Woven into the story is an element of mystery on a higher plane than the merely ghastly, and never wholly solved. The atmosphere of the occult and the horrible in Brown may profitably be compared in detail with the like elements in the work of Hawthorne and Poe.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Throughout the eighteenth century joined and many other words of similar oi formation were pronounced to rime with find.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Congress had voted an army for the expected war and had placed Washington in command.

J. Erskine, Leading American Novelists, 1910; A. R. Marble, "Centenary of America's First Novelist," Dial 48:109-10; C. Van Doren, "Early American Realism," Nation 99:577-8.

From WIELAND 1

ΛR

THE TRANSFORMATION

CHAPTER XVI

As soon as I arrived in sight of the front of the house, my attention was excited by a light from the window of my own chamber. No appearance could be less explicable. A meeting was expected with Carwin; but that he preoccupied my chamber, and had supplied himself with light, was not to be believed. What motive could influence him to adopt this conduct? Could I proceed until this was explained? Perhaps, if I should proceed to a distance in front, someone would be visible. A sidelong but feeble beam from the window fell upon the piny copse As I eyed it, it sudwhich skirted the bank. denly became mutable, 2 and, after flitting to and fro for a short time, it vanished. I turned my eye again towards the window, and per-

The Wieland family is beset with mysterious phenomena. The first group of these, accompanied with the appearance of fire and attending the death of the father, are never fully explained, and lead the younger Wieland and his sister Clara to regard as connected with these and equally inexplicable, a second series consisting of mysterious voices. The latter are, in fact, produced by Carwin, a ventriloquist, who in wanton mischief imposes upon the family. Clara Wieland has every reason to fear Carwin as a villain in whose presence she is unsafe. Wieland, inheriting insanity, is played upon by Carwin through the voices until his mind suddenly gives way. In a religious mania he kills his wife, Catharine, who happens to be in his sister's house, and immediately goes home and destroys his own children.
The extract begins at this point. Clara, who and destroys his own children.

The extract begins at this point. Clara, who tells the tale throughout, is returning late at night to her own home, where she lives with a single servant. She is expecting yet fearing to meet Carwin there. It is actually his face that she sees and his voice that she hears. It hough she is really in no physical danger from Carwin, and he in fact tries to prevent her by means of his ventriloquial voice from entering the room where her sister-in-law lies murdered, she immediately concludes upon discovering the body that he has planned her own death, but by some mistake has killed her sister-in-law.

<sup>2</sup> Brown's pages abound in such indirect, sometimes quite obscure, phrasings. ceived that the light was still there; but the change which I had noticed was occasioned by a change in the position of the lamp or candle within. Hence, that some person was there was an unavoidable inference.

I paused to deliberate on the propriety of advancing. Might I not advance cautiously, and, therefore, without danger? Might I not knock at the door, or call, and be apprised of the nature of my visitant before I entered? I approached and listened at the door, but could hear nothing. I knocked at first timidly, but afterwards with loudness. My signals were unnoticed. I stepped back and looked, but the light was no longer discernible. Was it suddenly extinguished by a human agent? What purpose but concealment was intended? Why was the illumination produced, to be thus suddenly brought to an end? And why, since someone was there, had silence been observed?

These were questions the solution of which may be readily supposed to be entangled with danger. Would not this danger, when measured by a woman's fears, expand into gigantic dimensions? Menaces of death; the stunning exertions of a warning voice; the known and unknown attributes of Carwin; our recent interview in this chamber; the preappointment of a meeting at this place and hour,—all thronged into my memory. What was to be done?

Courage is no definite or steadfast principle. Let that man who shall purpose to assign motives to the actions of another blush at his folly and forbear. Not more presumptuous would it be to attempt the classification of all nature and the scanning of supreme intelligence. I gazed for a minute at the window, and fixed my eyes, for a second minute, on the ground. I drew forth from my pocket, and opened, a penknife. "This," said I, "be my safeguard and avenger. The assailant shall perish, or myself shall fall."

I had locked up the house in the morning, but had the key of the kitchen door in my pocket. I therefore determined to gain access behind. Thither I hastened, unlocked, and entered. All was lonely, darksome, and waste. Familiar as I was with every part of my dwelling, I easily found my way to a closet, drew forth a taper, a flint, tinder, and steel, and in a moment, as it were, gave myself the guidance and protection of light.

What purpose did I meditate? Should I explore my way to my chamber, and confront the being who had dared to intrude into this recess and had labored for concealment? By putting out the light did he seek to hide himself, or mean only to circumvent my incautious steps? Yet was it not more probable that he desired my absence by thus encouraging the supposition that the house was unoccupied? I would see this man in spite of all impediments: ere I died, I would see his face, and summon him to penitence and retribution; no matter at what cost an interview was purchased. Reputation and life might be wrested from me by another, but my rectitude and honor were in my own keeping, and were safe.

I proceeded to the foot of the stairs. At such a crisis my thoughts may be supposed at no liberty to range; yet vague images rushed into my mind of the mysterious interposition which had been experienced on the last night. 1 My case at present was not dissimilar; and, if my angel were not weary of fruitless exertions to save, might not a new warning be expected? Who could say whether his silence were ascribable to the absence of danger, or to his own absence?

In this state of mind, no wonder that a shivering cold crept through my veins; that my pause was prolonged; and that a fearful glance was thrown backward.

Alas! My heart droops, and my fingers are enervated; my ideas are vivid, but my language is faint: now know I what it is to entertain incommunicable sentiments. The chain of subsequent incidents is drawn through my mind, and, being linked with those which forewent, by turns rouse 2 up agonies and sink me into hopelessness.

Yet I will persist to the end. My narrative may be invaded by inaccuracy and confusion: but, if I live no longer, I will, at least, live to complete it. What but ambiguities, abruptnesses, and dark transitions, can be expected from the historian who is, at the same time, the sufferer of these disasters?

I have said that I cast a look behind. Some object was expected to be seen, or why should I have gazed in that direction? Two senses were at once assailed. The same piercing exclamation of "Hold! hold!" was uttered within the same distance of my ear. This it was that I heard. The airy undulation, and the shock given to my nerves, were real. Whether the spectacle which I beheld existed in my fancy or without might be doubted.

I had not closed the door of the apartment I had just left. The staircase, at the foot of which I stood, was eight or ten feet from the

when the mysterious voice, apparently of a guardian presence, had held her back from danger Brown's sentences are often, as here, loose and incorrect.

door, and attached to the wall through which the door led. My view, therefore, was sidelong, and took in no part of the room.

Through this aperture was a head thrust and drawn back with so much swiftness that the immediate conviction was, that thus much of a form ordinarily invisible had been unshrouded. The face was turned towards me. muscle was tense; the forehead and brows were drawn into vehement expression: the lips were stretched as in the act of shrieking, and the eyes emitted sparks, which, no doubt, if I had been unattended by a light, would have illuminated like the coruscations of a meteor. The sound and the vision were present, and departed together at the same instant; but the cry was blown into my ear, while the face was many paces distant.

This face was well suited to a being whose performances exceeded the standard of humanity: and yet its features were akin to those I had before seen. The image of Carwin was blended in a thousand ways with the stream of my thoughts. This visage was, perhaps, portrayed by my fancy. If so, it will excite no surprise that some of his lineaments were now discovered. Yet affinities were few and inconspicuous, and were lost amidst the blaze of opposite qualities.

What conclusion could I form? Be the face human or not, the intimation was imparted from above. 3 Experience had evinced the benignity of that being who gave it. Once he had interposed to shield me from harm, and subsequent events demonstrated the usefulness of that interposition. Now was I again warned to forbear. I was hurrying to the verge of the same gulf, and the same power was exerted to recall my steps. Was it possible for me not to obey? Was I capable of holding on in the same perilous career? Yes. Even of this I was capable!

The intimation was imperfect; it gave no form to my danger and prescribed no limits to my caution. I had formerly neglected it, and yet escaped. Might I not trust to the same issue? This idea might possess, though imperceptibly, some influence. I persisted; but it was not merely on this account. I cannot delineate the motives that led me on. I now speak as if no remnant of doubt existed in my mind as to the supernatural origin of these sounds; but this is owing to the imperfection of my language, for I only mean that the belief was more permanent and visited more frequently my sober meditations than its opposite.

<sup>3</sup> as if by her good angel

The immediate effects served only to undermine the foundations of my judgment and precipitate my resolutions. 1

I must either advance or return. I chose the former, and began to ascend the stairs. The silence underwent no second interruption. My chamber door was closed, but unlocked, and, aided by vehement efforts of my courage. I opened and looked in.

No hideous or uncommon object was discernible. The danger, indeed, might easily have lurked out of sight, have sprung upon me as I entered and have rent me with his iron talons; but I was blind to this fate, and advanced, though cautiously, into the room.

Still, everything wore its accustomed aspect. Neither lamp nor candle was to be found. Now. for the first time, suspicions were suggested as to the nature of the light which I had seen. Was it possible to have been the companion of that supernatural visage; a meteorous refulgence producible at the will of him to whom that visage belonged, and partaking of the nature of that which accompanied my father's death?

The closet was near, and I remembered the complicated horrors of which it had been productive. 2 Here, perhaps, was enclosed the source of my peril and the gratification of my curiosity. Should I adventure once more to explore its recesses? This was a resolution not easily formed. I was suspended in thought when, glancing my eye on the table, I perceived a written paper. Carwin's hand was instantly recognized, and, snatching up the paper, I read as follows:-

"There was folly in expecting your compliance with my invitation. Judge how I was disappointed in finding another in your place. I have waited, but to wait any longer would be perilous. I shall still seek an interview, but it must be at a different time and place; meanwhile. I will write this—How will you bear how inexplicable will be this transaction!—An event so unexpected,—a sight so horrible!"

Such was this abrupt and unsatisfactory script. The ink was yet moist; the hand was that of Carwin. Hence it was to be inferred that he had this moment left the apartment, or was still in it. I looked back, on the sudden expectation of seeing him behind me.

What other did he mean? What transaction had taken place adverse to my expectations? What sight was about to be exhibited? looked around me once more, but saw nothing which indicated strangeness. Again I remembered the closet, and was resolved to seek in that the solution of these mysteries. Here. perhaps, was enclosed the scene destined to awaken my horrors and baffle my foresight.

I have already said that the entrance into this closet was beside my bed, which, on two sides, was closely shrouded by curtains. that side nearest the closet the curtain was raised. As I passed along I cast my eve thither. I started, and looked again. I bore a light in my hand, and brought it nearer my eyes, in order to dispel any illusive mists that might have hovered before them. Once more I fixed my eyes upon the bed, in hope that this more steadfast scrutiny would annihilate the object which before seemed to be there.

This, then, was the sight which Carwin had predicted! This was the event which my understanding was to find inexplicable! This was the fate which had been reserved for me, but which, by some untoward chance, had befallen another!

I had not been terrified by empty menaces. Violation and death awaited my entrance into this chamber. Some inscrutable chance had led her hither before me, and the merciless fangs of which I was designed to be the prey had mistaken their victim, and had fixed themselves in her heart. But where was my safety? Was the mischief exhausted or flown? The steps of the assassin had just been here; they could not be far off; in a moment he would rush into my presence, and I should perish under the same polluting and suffocating grasp!

My frame shook, and my knees were unable to support me. I gazed alternately at the closet door and at the door of my room. At one of these avenues would enter the exterminator of my honor and my life. I was prepared for defense; but, now that danger was imminent, my means of defense and my power to use them were gone. I was not qualified by education and experience to encounter perils like these; or perhaps I was powerless because I was again assaulted by surprise, and had not fortified my mind by foresight and previous reflection against a scene like this.

Fears for my own safety again yielded place to reflections on the scene before me. I fixed my eves upon her countenance. My sister's 3 well-known and beloved features could not be concealed by convulsion or lividness. What direful illusion led thee hither? Bereft of thee. what hold on happiness remains to thy offspring and thy spouse? To lose thee by a common fate would have been sufficiently hard: but thus suddenly to perish,—to become the prey of this ghastly death! How will a spectacle like this be endured by Wieland? To die beneath his grasp would not satisfy thy enemy. This was mercy to the evils which he previously made thee suffer! After these evils death was a boon which thou besoughtest him to grant. He entertained no enmity against thee; I was the object of his treason: but by some tremendous mistake his fury was misplaced. But how comest thou hither? and where was Wieland in thy hour of distress?

<sup>1</sup> Such situations are the joy of the modern psychological ovelist. Brown merely states the real or supposed facts, without analysis, and gives the conclusion. Compare Poe and Hawthorne.

Pefore this, Carwin had concealed himself there and terrified Clara by means of the mysterious voice.

<sup>3</sup> sister-in-law's

I approached the corpse; I lifted the still flexible hand, and kissed the lips which were breathless. Her flowing drapery was discomposed. I restored it to order, and, seating myself on the bed, again fixed steadfast eyes upon her countenance. I cannot distinctly recollect the ruminations of that moment. I saw confusedly, but forcibly, that every hope was extinguished with the life of Catharine. All happiness and dignity must henceforth be banished from the house and name of Wieland; all that remained was to linger out in agonies a short existence and leave to the world a monument of blasted hopes and changeable fortune. Plevel 1 was already lost to me: vet. while Catharine lived, life was not a destestable possession. But now, severed from the companion of my infancy, the partaker of all my thoughts, my cares, and my wishes, I was like one set afloat upon a stormy sea and hanging his safety upon a plank; night was closing upon him, and an unexpected surge had torn him from his hold and overwhelmed him forever. 2

CHAPTER XXV

. . . . . . . . . . "Sister," said he, 3 in an accent mournful and mild, "I have acted poorly my part in this world. What thinkest

¹ Catharine's brother, whom Clara loved but who had been turned against Clara by Carwin ² The scene in its possibilities of physical terror is scarcely equaled elsewhere by Brown. Contrast his handling of it with that of the usual treatment of such scenes a century later. ³ In the interval, Wieland has been confined in a madhouse, possessed now with the idea that he must add Clara to his quota of religious sacrifices. Carwin, unaware of the tragedy for which he is partly responsible, comes to explain himself to Clara in her own house. He confesses the source of the voices but honestly disavows any criminal intent. At this moment Wieland himself appears, wild and tattered, just escaped from his keepers, and bent upon the death of Clara. At intervals he appears lucid. It is he who speaks. he appears fucid. It is he who speaks.

Shall I not do better in the next?" I could make no answer. The mildness of his tone astonished and encouraged me. I continued to regard him with wistful and anxious

"I think," resumed he, "I will try. My wife and my babes have gone before. Happy wretches! I have sent you to repose, and ought not to linger behind."

These words had a meaning sufficiently intelligible. I looked at the open knife in his hand and shuddered, but knew not how to prevent the deed which I dreaded. He quickly noticed my fears, and comprehended them. Stretching towards me his hand, with an air of increasing mildness, "Take it," said he; "fear not for thy own sake, nor for mine. The cup is gone by, and its transient inebriation is succeeded by the soberness of truth.

"Thou angel whom I was wont to worship! Fearest, thou, my sister, for thy life? Once it was the scope of my labors to destroy thee, but I was prompted to the deed by heaven; such, at least, was my belief. Thinkest thou that thy death was sought to gratify malevolence? No. I am pure from all stain. I believed that my God was my mover!

"Neither thee nor myself have I cause to injure. I have done my duty; and surely there is merit in having sacrificed to that all that is dear to the heart of man. If a devil has deceived me, he came in the habit of an angel. If I erred, it was not my judgment that deceived me, but my senses. In thy sight, Being of beings! I am still pure. Still will I look for my reward in thy justice!"

Did my ears truly report these sounds? If I did not err, my brother was restored to just perceptions. He knew himself to have been betrayed to the murder of his wife and children, to have been the victim of infernal artifice; yet he found consolation in the rectitude of his motives. He was not devoid of sorrow, for this was written on his countenance; but his soul was tranquil and sublime.

Perhaps this was merely a transition of his former madness into a new shape. Perhaps he had not yet awakened to the memory of the horrors which he had perpetrated. Infatuated wretch that I was! To set myself up as a model by which to judge of my heroic brother! My reason taught me that his conclusions were right; but, conscious of the impotence of reason over my own conduct, conscious of my cowardly rashness and my criminal despair, I doubted whether anyone could be steadfast and wise.

Such was my weakness, that even in the midst of these thoughts my mind glided into abhorrence of Carwin, and I uttered, in a low voice. "O Carwin! Carwin! what hast thou to answer for?"

My brother immediately noticed the involuntary exclamation. "Clara!" said he, "be thyself. Equity used to be a theme for thy eloquence. Reduce its lessons to practice, and be just to that unfortunate man. The instrument has done its work, and I am satisfied.

"I thank thee, my God, for this last illumination! My enemy is thine also. I deemed him to be man,—the man with whom I have often communed; but now thy goodness has unveiled to me his true nature. As the performer of thy behests, he is my friend."

My heart began now to misgive me. His mournful aspect had gradually yielded place to a serene brow. A new soul appeared to actuate his frame, and his eyes to beam with preternatural luster. These symptoms did not abate, and he continued:—

"Clara, I must not leave thee in doubt. I know not what brought about thy interview with the being whom thou callest Carwin. For a time I was guilty of thy error, and deduced from his incoherent confessions that I had been made the victim of human malice. He left us at my bidding, and I put up a prayer that my doubts should be removed. Thy eyes were shut and thy ears sealed to the vision that answered my prayer.

"I was indeed deceived. The form thou hast seen was the incarnation of a demon. The visage and voice which urged me to the sacrifice of my family were his. Now he personates a human form; then he was environed with the luster of heaven.

"Clara," he continued, advancing closer to me, "thy death must come. This minister is evil, but he from whom his commission was received is God. Submit then with all thy wonted resignation to a decree that cannot be reversed or resisted. Mark the clock. Three minutes are allowed to thee, in which to call up thy fortitude and prepare thee for thy doom." There he stopped.

Even now, when this scene exists only in memory, when life and all its functions have sunk into torpor, my pulse throbs, and my hairs uprise; my brows are knit, as then, and I gaze around me in distraction. I was unconquerably averse to death; but death, imminent and full of agony as that which was threatened, was nothing. This was not the only or chief inspirer of my fears.

For him, not for myself, was my soul tormented. I might die, and no crime, surpassing the reach of mercy, would pursue me to the presence of my Judge; but my assassin would survive to contemplate his deed, and that assassin was Wieland!

Wings to bear me beyond his reach I had not. I could not vanish with a thought. The door was open, but my murderer was interposed between that and me. Of self-defense I was incapable. The frenzy that lately prompted me to blood was gone: my state was desperate; my rescue was impossible.

The weight of these accumulated thoughts could not be borne. My sight became confused; my limbs were seized with convulsions; I spoke, but my words were half formed:—

"Spare me, my brother! Look down, righteous Judge! snatch me from this fate! take away this fury from him, or turn it elsewhere!"

Such was the agony of my thoughts that I noticed not steps entering my apartment. Supplicating eyes were cast upward; but when my prayer was breathed I once more wildly gazed at the door. A form met my sight; I shuddered as if the God whom I invoked were present. It was Carwin that again intruded, and who stood before me, erect in attitude and steadfast in look!

The sight of him awakened new and rapid thoughts. His recent tale was remembered; his magical transitions and mysterious energy of voice. Whether he were infernal or miraculous or human, there was no power and no need to decide. Whether the contriver or not of this spell, he was able to unbind it, and to check the fury of my brother. He had ascribed to himself intentions not malignant. Here now was afforded a test of his truth. Let him interpose, as from above; revoke the savage decree which the madness of Wieland has assigned to heaven, and extinguish forever this passion for blood!

My mind detected at a glance this avenue to safety. The recommendations it possessed thronged as it were together, and made but one impression on my intellect. Remoter effects and collateral dangers I saw not. Perhaps the pause of an instant had sufficed to call them up. The improbability that the influence which governed Wieland was external or human; the tendency of this stratagem to sanction so fatal an error or substitute a more destructive rage in place of this; the insufficiency of Carwin's mere muscular forces to counteract the efforts and restrain the fury of Wieland, might, at a second glance, have been discovered; but no second glance was allowed. My first thought hurried me to action, and, fixing my eyes upon Carwin, I exclaimed.—

"O wretch! once more hast thou come? Let it be to abjure thy malice; to counterwork this hellish stratagem; to turn from me and from my brother this desolating rage!

"Testify thy innocence or thy remorse; exert the powers which pertain to thee, whatever they be, to turn aside this ruin. Thou art the author of these horrors! What have I done to deserve thus to die? How have I merited this unrelenting persecution? I adjure thee, by that God whose voice thou hast dared to counterfeit, to save my life!

"Wilt thou then go?-leave me! Succorless!"

Carwin listened to my entreaties unmoved, and turned from me. He seemed to hesitate a moment,—then glided through the door. Rage and despair stifled my utterance. The interval of respite was past; the pangs reserved for me by Wieland were not to be endured; my thoughts rushed again into anarchy. Having received the knife from his hand, I held it loosely and without regard; but now it seized again my attention, and I grasped it with force.

He seemed to notice not the entrance or exit of Carwin. My gesture and the murderous weapon appeared to have escaped his notice. His silence was unbroken; his eye, fixed upon the clock for a time, was now withdrawn; fury kindled in every feature; all that was human in his face gave way to an expression supernatural and tremendous. I felt my left arm within his grasp.

Even now I hesitated to strike. I shrunk from his assault, but in vain.

Here let me desist. Why should I rescue this event from oblivion? Why should I paint this detestable conflict? Why not terminate at once this series of horrors?—Hurry to the verge of the precipice, and cast myself forever beyond remembrance and beyond hope?

Still I live; with this load upon my breast; with this phantom to pursue my steps; with adders lodged in my bosom, and stinging me to madness; still I consent to live!

Yes! I will rise above the sphere of mortal passions; I will spurn at the cowardly remorse that bids me seek impunity in silence, or comfort in forgetfulness. My nerves shall be newstrung to the task. Have I not resolved? I will die. The gulf before me is inevitable and near. I will die, but then only when my tale is at an end.

CHAPTER XXVI

My right hand, grasping the unseen knife, was still disengaged. It was lifted to strike. All my strength was exhausted but what was sufficient to the performance of this deed. Already was the energy awakened and the impulse given that should bear the fatal steel to his heart, when—Wieland shrunk back; his hand was withdrawn. Breathless with affright and desperation, I stood, freed from his grasp; unassailed: untouched.

Thus long had the power which controlled the scene forborne to interfere: but now his might was irresistible; and Wieland in a moment was disarmed of all his purposes. A voice, louder than human organs could produce, shriller than language can depict, burst from the ceiling and commanded him—to hold!

Trouble and dismay succeeded to the steadfastness that had lately been displayed in the looks of Wieland. His eyes roved from one quarter to another, with an expression of doubt. He seemed to wait for a further intimation.

Carwin's agency was here easily recognized. I had besought him to interpose in my defense. He had flown. I had imagined him deaf to my prayer, and resolute to see me perish; yet he disappeared merely to devise and execute the means of my relief.

Why did he not forbear when this end was accomplished. Why did his misjudging zeal and accursed precipitation overpass that limit? Or meant he thus to crown the scene, and conduct his inscrutable plots to this consummation?

Such ideas were the fruit of subsequent contemplation. This moment was pregnant with fate. I had no power to reason. In the career of my tempestuous thoughts, rent into pieces as my mind was by accumulating horrors, Carwin was unseen and unsuspected. I partook of Wieland's credulity, shook with his amazement, and panted with his awe.

Silence took place for a moment: so much as allowed the attention to recover its post. Then new sounds were uttered from above:—

"Man of errors! cease to cherish thy delusion; not heaven or hell, but thy senses, have misled thee to commit these acts. Shake off thy frenzy, and ascend into rational and human. Be lunatic no longer."

My brother opened his lips to speak. His tone was terrific 1 and faint. He muttered an appeal to heaven. It was difficult to comprehend the theme of his inquiries. They implied doubt as to the nature of the impulse that hitherto had guided him, and questioned whether he had acted in consequence of insane perceptions.

<sup>1</sup> terror-struck (loosely used)

To these interrogatories the voice, which now seemed to hover at his shoulder, loudly answered in the affirmative. Then uninterrupted silence ensued

Fallen from his lofty and heroic station; now finally restored to the perception of truth; weighed to earth by the recollection of his own deeds; consoled no longer by a consciousness of rectitude for the loss of offspring and wife,—a loss for which he was indebted to his own misguided hand,—Wieland was transformed <sup>1</sup> at once into the man of sorrows!

He reflected not that credit should be as reasonably denied to the last as to any former intimation; that one might as justly be ascribed to erring or diseased senses as the other. He saw not that this discovery in no degree affected the integrity of his conduct; that his motives had lost none of their claims to the homage of mankind; that the preference of supreme good, and the boundless energy of duty, were undiminished in his bosom.

It is not for me to pursue him through the ghastly changes of his countenance. Words he had none. Now he sat upon the floor, motionless in all his limbs, with his eyes glazed and fixed, a monument of woe.

Anon a spirit of tempestuous but undesigning activity seized him. He rose from his place and strode across the floor, tottering and at random. His eyes were without moisture, and gleamed with the fire that consumed his vitals. The muscles of his face were agitated by convulsions. His lips moved, but no sound escaped him.

That nature should long sustain this conflict was not to be believed. My state was little different from that of my brother. I entered, as it were, into his thoughts. My heart was visited and rent by his pangs. "Oh that thy frenzy had never been cured! that thy madness, with its blissful visions, would return! or, if that must not be, that thy scene would hasten to a close!—that death would cover thee with his oblivion!

"What can I wish for thee? Thou who hast vied with the great Preacher of thy faith in sanctity of motives, and in elevation above sensual and selfish? Thou whom thy fate has changed into parricide and savage! Can I wish for the continuance of thy being? No."

For a time his movements seemed destitute of purpose. If he walked; if he turned; if his fingers were entwined with each other; if his hands were pressed against opposite sides of his head with a force sufficient to crush it into pieces; it was to tear his mind from self-contemplation; to waste his thoughts on external objects.

Speedily this train was broken. A beam appeared to be darted into his mind which gave a purpose to his efforts. An avenue to escape presented itself; and now he eagerly gazed about him. When my thoughts became engaged by his demeanor, my fingers were stretched as by a mechanical force, and the knife, no longer heeded or of use, escaped from my grasp and fell unperceived on the floor. His eye now lighted upon it; he seized it with the quickness of thought.

I shrieked aloud, but it was too late. He plunged it to the hilt in his neck; and his life instantly escaped with the stream that gushed from the wound. He was stretched at my feet and my hands were sprinkled with his blood as he fell.

Such was thy last deed, my brother! For a spectacle like this was it my fate to be reserved! Thy eyes were closed—thy face ghastly with death—thy arms, and the spot where thou lyedst, <sup>2</sup> floated in thy life's blood! These images have not for a moment forsaken me. Till I am breathless and cold, they must continue to hover in my sight. . . .

1788 1798

WASHINGTON IRVING 1783-1859

Little that is new can be said regarding Irving. whose youthful wit softened into grace, and whose graciousness ripened into benignity; who gained the first continental recognition given an American author; and who was made by his government first of a long line of "literary diplomats" to represent it abroad. He was born of parents in comfortable circumstances, was privately educated, studied law but inclined toward literature. He traveled in Europe, 1805-1806, and was in journalism and business in New York until 1815, when he went to England on business, and remained in Europe for seventeen years. He was (1826-1832) attaché of the American legation at Madrid and secretary to that at London. He then settled at "Sunnyside," his little estate on the Hudson, but was United States minister to Spain, 1842-1846. His chief works are Knickerbocker's History of New York, 1809; Sketch-Book, 1819; Bracebridge Hall, 1822; Tales of a Traveller, 1824; History of Columbus, 1828; A

&lt;sup>1</sup> See the sub-title at the head of the selection.

<sup>2</sup> The form of the verb should be "layest."

Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, 1829; The Alhambra, 1832; Cravon Miscellanies, 1835; Astoria, 1836; Life of Goldsmith, 1849; Life of Washington, 1855-1859.

The qualities of Irving's style are obvious. In it are found the grace of Addison, humor and kindliness that reach the mark set by Goldsmith, and a zest born of new adventure.

Irving was fortunate in his ability to become a citizen of the world, to see the fineness in English life and to interpret it to Americans; and to give his fellow countrymen such an account of the lands overseas as to make them eager to find in the culture of Europe what he had discovered. In this service Irving's work was greatly fruitful, for it came forth in all its popularity in a period when many Americans were inclined to be jealous of other peoples, and to be filled with national selfconceit. But American literature owes an even greater debt to Irving's original and imaginative treatment of American themes.

C. D. Warner (AML), 1888; G. S. Hellman, W. Irving, Esq., 1925; Tuckerman (LJ); Macy; Payne; Chubb; H. S. Canby, "Irving as a Federalist," Sat. R. Lit. 3:461-3.

From A HISTORY OF NEW YORK, 1 BY DIEDRICH KNICKERBOCKER

Book III

IN WHICH IS RECORDED THE GOLDEN REIGN OF WOUTER VAN TWILLER

CHAPTER I

OF THE RENOWNED WOUTER VAN TWILLER. 2 HIS UNPARALLELED VIRTUES-AS LIKEWISE HIS UNUTTERABLE WISDOM IN THE LAW-CASE OF WANDLE SCHOONHOVEN AND BARENT BLEECKER-AND THE GREAT ADMIRATION OF THE PUBLIC THEREAT.

Grievous and very much to be commiserated is the task of the feeling historian, who writes the history of his native land. If it fall to his lot to be the recorder of calamity or crime, the mournful page is watered with his tears; nor can he recall the most prosperous and blissful born in Holland about 1580; governor of New Netherlands 1633-1637

<sup>1</sup> The Knickerbocker History of New York "from the beginning of the world to the end of the Dutch dynasty" was written and published, Irving says, as a "temporary jeu d'esprit" (play of wit). Its nominal author, Diedrich Knickerbocker, disappeared and left behind a manuscript which his peared and left benind a manuscript which his landlord seized and sold and which was finally published as the History. The old Dutch aristocracy of New York, or New Amsterdam as it was formerly called, at first felt itself scandalized at the free treatment of its ancestors, but for the most part soon forgave the author because of the shear good human of the whole work. See Principle sheer good humor of the whole work. See Irving's introduction to Rip Van Winkle, p. 188.

era, without a melancholy sigh at the reflection that it has passed away forever! I know not whether it be owing to an immoderate love for the simplicity of former times, or to that certain tenderness of heart incident to all sentimental historians; but I candidly confess that I cannot look back on the happier days of our city, which I now describe, without great dejection of spirit. With faltering hand do I withdraw the curtain of oblivion that veils the modest merit of our venerable ancestors, and as their figures rise to my mental vision, humble myself before their mighty shades.

Such are my feelings when I revisit the family mansion of the Knickerbockers, and spend a lonely hour in the chamber where hang the portraits of my forefathers, shrouded in dust, like the forms they represent. With pious reverence do I gaze on the countenances of those renowned burghers, who have preceded me in the steady march of existence, -whose sober and temperate blood now meanders through my veins, flowing slower and slower in its feeble conduits, until its current shall soon be stopped forever!

These, I say to myself, are but frail memorials of the mighty men who flourished in the days of the patriarchs; but who, alas, have long since moldered in that tomb towards which my steps are insensibly and irresistibly hastening! As I pace the darkened chamber and lose myself in melancholy musings, the shadowy images around me almost seem to steal once more into existence,-their countenances to assume the animation of life,-their eyes to pursue me in every movement! Carried away by the delusions of fancy, I almost imagine myself surrounded by the shades of the departed, and holding sweet converse with the worthies of antiquity! Ah, hapless Diedrich! born in a degenerate age, abandoned to the buffetings of fortune,-a stranger and a weary pilgrim in thy native land,-blest with no weeping wife, nor family of helpless children, but doomed to wander neglected through those crowded streets, and elbowed by foreign upstarts from those fair abodes where once thine ancestors held sovereign empire!

Let me not, however, lose the historian in the man, nor suffer the doting recollections of age to overcome me, while dwelling with fond garrulity on the virtuous days of the patriarchs. on those sweet days of simplicity and ease, which never more will dawn on the lovely island of Manna-hata. 3

&lt;sup>3</sup> Manhattan, the Indian name of the island on which New York stands

These melancholy reflections have been forced from me by the growing wealth and importance of New Amsterdam, which, I plainly perceive, are to involve it in all kinds of perils and disasters. Already, as I observed at the close of my last book, they had awakened the attentions of the mother-country. The usual mark of protection shown by mother-countries to wealthy colonies was forthwith manifested: a governor being sent out to rule over the province, and squeeze out of it as much revenue as possible. The arrival of a governor of course put an end to the protectorate of Oloffe the He appears, however, to have Dreamer, 1 dreamt to some purpose during his sway, as we find him afterwards living as a patroon 2 on a great landed estate on the banks of the Hudson: having virtually forfeited all right to his ancient appellation of Kortlandt or Lackland.

It was in the year of our Lord 1629 3 that Mynheer Wouter Van Twiller was appointed governor of the province of Nieuw Nederlandts. under the commission and control of their High Mightinesses the Lords States General of the United Netherlands, and the privileged West India Company.

This renowned old gentleman arrived at New Amsterdam in the merry month of Tune, the sweetest month in all the year; when dan Apollo 4 seems to dance up the transparent firmament,-when the robin, the thrush, and a thousand other wanton songsters, make the woods to resound with amorous ditties, and the luxurious little boblincon 5 revels among the clover blossoms of the meadows,-all which happy coincidence persuaded the old dames of New Amsterdam, who were skilled in the art of foretelling events, that this was to be a happy and prosperous administration.

The renowned Wouter (or Walter) Van Twiller was descended from a long line of Dutch burgomasters, who had successively dozed away their lives, and grown fat upon the bench of magistracy in Rotterdam; and who had comported themselves with such singular wisdom and propriety, that they were never either heard or talked of-which, next to being universally applauded, should be the object of ambition of all magistrates and rulers. There are two opposite ways by which some men make a figure in the world: one, by talking faster than they think, and the other, by holding their tongues and not thinking at all. By the first many a smatterer acquires the reputation of a man of quick parts: by the other, many a dunderpate, like the owl, the stupidest of birds, comes to be considered the very type of wis-This, by the way, is a casual remark. which I would not, for the universe, have it thought I apply to Governor Van Twiller. It is true he was a man shut up within himself. like an oyster, and rarely spoke, except in monosyllables: but then it was allowed he seldom said a foolish thing. So invincible was his gravity that he was never known to laugh or even to smile through the whole course of a long and prosperous life. Nay, if a joke were uttered in his presence, that set light-minded hearers in a roar, it was observed to throw him into a state of perplexity. Sometimes he would deign to inquire into the matter, and when, after much explanation, the joke was made as plain as a pike-staff, he would continue to smoke his pipe in silence, and at length, knocking out the ashes, would exclaim, "Well! I see nothing in all that to laugh about."

8 bobolink

With all his reflective habits, he never made up his mind on a subject. His adherents accounted for this by the astonishing magnitude of his ideas. He conceived every subject on so grand a scale that he had not room in his head to turn it over and examine both sides of it. Certain it is, that, if any matter were propounded to him on which ordinary mortals would rashly determine at first glance, he would put on a vague, mysterious look, shake his capacious head, smoke some time in profound silence, and at length observe, that 'he had his doubts about the matter'; which gained him the reputation of a man slow of belief and not easily imposed upon. What is more, it gained him a lasting name: for to this habit of the mind has been attributed his surname of Twiller; which is said to be a corruption of the original Twijfler, or, in plain English, Doubter.

The person of this illustrious old gentleman was formed and proportioned as though it had been molded by the hands of some cunning Dutch statuary, as a model of majesty and lordly grandeur. He was exactly five feet six inches in height, and six feet five inches in circumference. His head was a perfect sphere, and of such stupendous dimensions that Dame Nature, with all her sex's ingenuity, would have been puzzled to construct a neck capable of supporting it; wherefore she wisely declined the attempt, and settled it firmly on the top of his backbone, just between the shoulders.

Oloffe Van Kortland (Shortland or Lackland), leader of the Dutch in their first settlement of Manhattan

<sup>2</sup> landed proprietor
3 Irving's date is incorrect; see note 2, p. 178.
4 Apollo, the sun-god; dan, from Latin, dominus (cf.

His body was oblong and particularly capacious at bottom: which was wisely ordered by Providence, seeing that he was a man of sedentary habits, and very averse to the idle labor of walking. His legs were short, but sturdy in proportion to the weight they had to sustain: so that when erect he had not a little the appearance of a beer-barrel on skids. His face. that infallable index of the mind, presented a vast expanse, unfurrowed by any of those lines and angles which disfigure the human countenance with what is termed expression. small gray eyes twinkled feebly in the midst, like two stars of lesser magnitude in a hazy firmament, and his full-fed cheeks, which seemed to have taken toll of everything that went into his mouth, were curiously mottled and streaked with dusky red, like a spitzenburgh apple.

His habits were as regular as his person. He daily took his four stated meals, appropriating exactly an hour to each: he smoked and doubted eight hours, and he slept the remaining twelve of the four-and-twenty. Such was the renowned Wouter Van Twiller,-a true philosopher, for his mind was either elevated above, or tranquilly settled below, the cares and perplexities of this world. He had lived in it for years, without feeling the least curiosity to know whether the sun revolved round it, or it round the sun; and he had watched, for at least half a century, the smoke curling from his pipe to the ceiling, without once troubling his head with any of those numerous theories by which a philosopher would have perplexed his brain, in accounting for its rising above the surrounding atmosphere.

In his council he presided with great state and solemnity. He sat in a huge chair of solid oak, hewn in the celebrated forest of the Hague, fabricated by an experienced timmerman i of Amsterdam, and curiously carved about the arms and feet, into exact imitations of gigantic eagle's claws. Instead of a scepter he swayed a long Turkish pipe, wrought with jasmin and amber, which had been presented to a stadtholder 2 of Holland at the conclusion of a treaty with one of the petty Barbary powers. In this stately chair would he sit, and this magnificent pipe would he smoke, shaking his right knee with a constant motion, and fixing his eye for hours together upon a little print of Amsterdam, which hung in a black frame against the opposite wall of the council-chamber. Nay, it has even been said, that when any deliberation of extraordinary length and intricacy was on the carpet, the renowned Wouter would shut his eyes for full two hours at a time, that he might not be disturbed by external objects; and at such times the internal commotion of his mind was evinced by certain regular guttural sounds, which his admirers declared were merely the noise of conflict made by his contending doubts and opinions.

It is with infinite difficulty I have been enabled to collect these biographical anecdotes of the great man under consideration. The facts respecting him were so scattered and vague, and divers of them so questionable in point of authenticity, that I have had to give up the search after many, and decline the admission of still more, which would have tended to heighten the coloring of his portrait.

I have been the more anxious to delineate fully the person and habits of Wouter Van Twiller, from the consideration that he was not only the first, but also the best governor that ever presided over this ancient and respectable province; and so tranquil and benevolent was his reign, that I do not find throughout the whole of it a single instance of any offender being brought to punishment,—a most indubitable sign of a merciful governor, and a case unparalleled, excepting in the reign of the illustrious King Log, <sup>3</sup> from whom, it is hinted, the renowned Van Twiller was a lineal descendant.

The very outset of the career of this excellent magistrate was distinguished by an example of legal acumen that gave flattering presage of a wise and equitable administration. The morning after he had been installed in office, and at the moment that he was making his breakfast from a prodigious earthen dish filled with milk and Indian pudding, he was interrupted by the appearance of Wandle Schoonhoven. a very important old burgher of New Amsterdam, who complained bitterly of one Barent Bleecker, inasmuch as he refused to come to a settlement of accounts, seeing that there was a heavy balance in favor of the said Wandle. Governor Van Twiller, as I have already observed, was a man of few words; he was likewise a mortal enemy to multiplying writings-or being disturbed at his breakfast. Having listened attentively to the statement of Wandle Schoonhoven, giving an occasional grunt as he shoveled a spoonful of Indian pudding into his mouth,—

&lt;sup>1</sup> carpenter (Dutch)

<sup>2</sup> governor

A phlegmatic monarch; from the story of Aesop that the frogs, wishing a king, were given by Jove a log of wood. When they complained, they were given for monarch a stork, who ate them up.

either as a sign that he relished the dish, or comprehended the story,—he called unto him his constable, and pulling out of his breeches-pocket a huge jack-knife, dispatched it after the defendant as a summons, accompanied by his tobacco-box as a warrant.

This summary process was as effectual in those simple days as was the seal-ring of the great Haroun Alraschid among the true believers. The two parties being confronted before him, each produced a book of accounts, written in a language and character that would have puzzled any but a High-Dutch commentator, or a learned decipherer of Egyptian obelisks. The sage Wouter took them one after the other, and having poised them in his hands, and attentively counted over the number of leaves. fell straightway into a very great doubt, and smoked for half an hour without saying a word; at length, laying his finger beside his nose, and shutting his eyes for a moment, with the air of a man who has just caught a subtle idea by the tail, he slowly took his pipe from his mouth, puffed forth a column of tobacco smoke. and with marvelous gravity and solemnity pronounced, that, having carefully counted over the leaves and weighed the books, it was found. that one was just as thick and as heavy as the other: therefore, it was the final opinion of the court that the accounts were equally balanced: therefore, Wandle should give Barent a receipt, and Barent should give Wandle a receipt, and the constable should pay the costs.

This decision, being straightway made known, diffused general joy throughout New Amsterdam, for the people immediately perceived that they had a very wise and equitable magistrate to rule over them. But its happiest effect was, that not another lawsuit took place throughout the whole of his administration; and the office of constable fell into such decay, that there was not one of those losel scouts 2 known in the province for many years. I am the more particular in dwelling on this transaction, not only because I deem it one of the most sage and righteous judgments on record, and well worthy the attention of modern magistrates, but because it was a miraculous event in the history of the renowned Wouter-being the only time he was ever known to come to a decision in the whole course of his life.

2 worthless sleuths

CHAPTER II

CONTAINING SOME ACCOUNT OF THE GRAND COUNCIL OF NEW AMSTERDAM, AS ALSO DIVERS ESPECIAL GOOD PHILOSOPHICAL REASONS WHY AN ALDERMAN SHOULD BE FAT—WITH OTHER PARTICULARS TOUCHING THE STATE OF THE PROVINCE.

In treating of the early governors of the province, I must caution my readers against confounding them, in point of dignity and power, with those worthy gentlemen who are whimsically denominated governors in this enlightened republic,-a set of unhappy victims of popularity, who are, in fact, the most dependent, henpecked beings in the community; doomed to bear the secret goadings and corrections of their own party, and the sneers and revilings of the whole world beside; set up, like geese at Christmas holidays, to be pelted and shot at by every whipster and vagabond in the land. On the contrary, the Dutch governors enjoyed that uncontrolled authority vested in all commanders of distant colonies or territories. They were, in a manner, absolute despots in their little domains, lording it, if so disposed, over both law and gospel, and accountable to none but the mother-country; which it is well known is astonishingly deaf to all complaints against its governors, provided they discharge the main duty of their stationsqueezing out a good revenue. This hint will be of importance, to prevent my readers from being seized with doubt and incredulity, whenever, in the course of this authentic history, they encounter the uncommon circumstance of a governor acting with independence, and in opposition to the opinions of the multitude.

To assist the doubtful Wouter in the arduous business of legislation, a board of magistrates was appointed, which presided immediately over the police. This potent body consisted of a schout or bailiff, with powers between those of the present mayor and sheriff; five burgermeesters, who were equivalent to aldermen; and five schepens, who officiated as scrubs, subdevils, or bottle-holders to the burgermeesters, in the same manner as do assistant aldermen to their principals at the present day,—it being their duty to fill the pipes of the lordly burgermeesters, hunt the markets for delicacies for corporation dinners, and to discharge such other little offices of kindness as were occasionally required. It was, moreover, tacitly understood, though not specifically enjoined, that they should consider themselves as butts for the or "Aaron the Just," a celebrated Calif of Bagdad of the eighth century, well known through the Arabian Nights blunt wits of the burgermeesters, and should laugh most heartily at all their jokes; but this last was a duty as rarely called in action in those days as it is at present, and was shortly remitted, in consequence of the tragical death of a fat little schepen, who actually died of suffocation in an unsuccessful effort to force a laugh at one of burgermeester Van Zandt's best iokes.

In return for these humble services, they were permitted to say ves and no at the councilboard, and to have that enviable privilege, the run of the public kitchen,-being graciously permitted to eat, and drink, and smoke, at all those snug junketings and public gormandizings for which the ancient magistrates were equally famous with their modern successors. post of schepen, therefore, like that of assistant alderman, was eagerly coveted by all your burghers of a certain description, who have a huge relish for good feeding, and an humble ambition to be great men in a small way,—who thirst after a little brief authority, that shall render them the terror of the alms-house and the bridewell. 1—that shall enable them to lord it over obsequious poverty, vagrant vice, outcast prostitution, and hunger-driven dishonesty, -that shall give to their beck a houndlike pack of catchpolls and bumbailiffs 2—tenfold greater rogues than the culprits they hunt down! My readers will excuse this sudden warmth, which I confess is unbecoming of a grave historian,but I have a mortal antipathy to catchpolls, bumbailiffs, and little-great men.

The ancient magistrates of this city corresponded with those of the present time no less in form, magnitude, and intellect, than in prerogative and privilege. The burgomasters, like our aldermen, were generally chosen by weight. -and not only the weight of the body, but likewise the weight of the head. It is a maxim practically observed in all honest, plain-thinking, regular cities, that an alderman should be fat,—and the wisdom of this can be proved to a certainty. That the body is in some measure an image of the mind, or rather that the mind is molded to the body, like melted lead to the clay in which it is cast, has been insisted on by many philosophers, who have made human nature their peculiar study; for, as a learned gentleman of our own city observes, "there is a constant relation between the moral character of all intelligent creatures and their physical constitution, between their habits and the structure of their bodies." Thus we see that a lean, spare, diminutive body is generally accompanied by a petulant, restless, meddling mind: either the mind wears down the body. by its continual motion, or else the body, not affording the mind sufficient house-room, keeps it continually in a state of fretfulness, tossing and worrying about from the uneasiness of its situation. Whereas your round, sleek, fat, unwieldy periphery 3 is ever attended by a mind like itself, tranquil, torpid, and at ease; and we may always observe, that your well-fed, robustious 4 burghers are in general very tenacious of their ease and comfort, being great enemies to noise, discord, and disturbance,—and surely none are more likely to study the public tranquillity than those who are so careful of their own. Who ever hears of fat men heading a riot, or herding together in turbulent mobs?no-no; it is your lean, hungry men who are continually worrying society, and setting the whole community by the ears.

The divine Plato, 5 whose doctrines are not sufficiently attended to by philosophers of the present age, allows to every man three souls: one, immortal and rational, seated in the brain. that it may overlook and regulate the body; a second, consisting of the surly and irascible passions which, like belligerent powers, lie encamped around the heart; a third, mortal and sensual, destitute of reason, gross and brutal in its propensities, and enchained in the belly, that it may not disturb the divine soul by its ravenous howlings. Now, according to this excellent theory, what can be more clear than that your fat alderman is most likely to have the most regular and well-conditioned mind. His head is like a huge spherical chamber, containing a prodigious mass of soft brains, whereon the rational soul lies softly and snugly couched, as on a feather-bed; and the eyes, which are the windows of the bed-chamber, are usually half closed, that its slumberings may not be disturbed by external objects. A mind thus comfortably lodged, and protected from disturbance, is manifestly most likely to perform its functions with regularity and ease. By dint of good feeding, moreover, the mortal and malignant soul, which is confined in the belly, and which, by its raging and roaring, puts the irritable soul in the neighborhood of the heart in an intolerable passion, and thus renders men crusty and quarrelsome when hungry, is completely pacified, silenced, and put to rest, whereupon a host of honest, good-fellow quali-

&lt;sup>1</sup> The Bridewell prison, named from St. Bride's Well or spring near by, was a famous jail of London.
<sup>2</sup> contemptuous terms for sheriffs' officers, constables

a circumference 4 robust (rather than boisterous and violent, the usual meaning)

<sup>5</sup> in the Phoedrus

ties, and kind-hearted affections, which had lain perdu. 1 slyly peeping out of the loop-holes of the heart, finding this Cerberus 2 asleep, do pluck up their spirits, turn out one and all in their holiday suits, and gambol up and down the diaphragm,—disposing their possessor to laughter, good-humor, and a thousand friendly offices toward his fellow-mortals.

As a board of magistrates, formed on this principle, think but very little, they are the less likely to differ and wrangle about favorite opinions; and as they generally transact business upon a hearty dinner, they are naturally disposed to be lenient and indulgent in the administration of their duties. Charlemagne was conscious of this, and therefore ordered in his cartularies, 3 that no judge should hold a court of justice, except in the morning, on an empty stomach.—A pitiful rule, which I can never forgive, and which I warrant bore hard upon all the poor culprits in the kingdom. The more enlightened and humane generation of the present day have taken an opposite course, and have so managed that the aldermen are the best-fed men in the community: feasting lustily on the fat things of the land, and gorging so heartily on oysters and turtles, that in process of time they acquire the activity of the one, and the form, the waddle, and the green fat of the other. The consequence is, as I have just said, these luxurious feastings do produce such a dulcet equanimity and repose of the soul, rational and irrational, that their transactions are proverbial for unvarying monotony; and the profound laws which they enact in their dozing moments, amid the labors of digestion, are quietly suffered to remain as dead letters, and never enforced when awake. In a word, your fair, round-bellied burgomaster, like a full-fed mastiff, dozes quietly at the house-door, always at home, and always at hand, to watch over its safety; but as to electing a lean, meddling candidate to the office, as has now and then been done, I would as lief put a greyhound to watch the house, or a race-horse to draw an ox-wagon.

The burgomasters, then, as I have already mentioned, were wisely chosen by weight, and the schepens, or assistant aldermen, were appointed to attend upon them and help them eat; but the latter, in the course of time, when they had been fed and fattened into sufficient bulk of body and drowsiness of brain, became very eligible candidates for the burgomasters' chairs,

1 lost to sight, hidden having fairly eaten themselves into office, as a mouse eats his way into a comfortable lodgment in a goodly, blue-nosed, skimmed-milk. New England cheese.

Nothing could equal the profound deliberations that took place between the renowned Wouter and these his worthy compeers, unless it be the sage divans 4 of some of our modern corporations. They would sit for hours, smoking and dozing over public affairs, without speaking a word to interrupt that perfect stillness so necessary to deep reflection. Under the sober sway of Wouter Van Twiller and these his worthy coadjutors, the infant settlement waxed vigorous apace, gradually emerging from the swamps and forests, and exhibiting that mingled appearance of town and country, customary in new cities, and which at this day may be witnessed in the city of Washington, that immense metropolis, which makes so glorious an appearance on paper. 5

It was a pleasing sight, in those times, to behold the honest burgher, like a patriarch of vore, seated on the bench at the door of his whitewashed house, under the shade of some gigantic sycamore or overhanging willow. Here would he smoke his pipe of a sultry afternoon, enjoying the soft southern breeze, and listening with silent gratulation to the clucking of his hens, the cackling of his geese, and the sonorous grunting of his swine,-that combination of farmyard melody which may truly be said to have a silver sound, inasmuch as it conveys a certain assurance of profitable marketing.

The modern spectator, who wanders through the streets of this populous city, can scarcely form an idea of the different appearance they presented in the primitive days of the Doubter. The busy hum of multitudes, the shouts of revelry, the rumbling equipages of fashion, the rattling of accursed carts, and all the spiritgrieving sounds of brawling commerce, were unknown in the settlement of New Amsterdam. The grass grew quietly in the highways; the bleating sheep and frolicsome calves sported about the verdant ridge where now the Broadway loungers take their morning stroll; the cunning fox or ravenous wolf skulked in the woods where now are to be seen the dens of Gomez 6 and his righteous fraternity of moneybrokers; and flocks of vociferous geese cackled about the fields where now the great Tammany the watch-dog of the infernal regions records (here used as if law codes)

5 probably a money lender

Turkish, diwan; council of state 5 When the History was published, jealousy was still rife between New York, the first capital under the Constitution, and Washington, which had been the seat of government but nine years.

wigwam 1 and the patriotic tavern of Martling 2 echo with the wranglings of the mob.

In these good times did a true and enviable equality of rank and property prevail, equally removed from the arrogance of wealth, and the servility and heart-burnings of repining poverty; and, what in my mind is still more conducive to tranquillity and harmony among friends, a happy equality of intellect was likewise to be seen. The minds of the good burghers of New Amsterdam seemed all to have been cast in one mold, and to be those honest, blunt minds, which, like certain manufactures, are made by the gross, and considered as exceedingly good for common use.

Thus it happens that your true dull minds are generally preferred for public employ, and especially promoted to city honors; your keen intellects, like razors, being considered too sharp for common service. I know that it is common to rail at the unequal distribution of riches, as the great source of jealousies, broils, and heartbreakings; whereas, for my part, I verily believe it is the sad inequality of intellect that prevails, that embroils communities more than anything else; and I have remarked that your knowing people, who are so much wiser than anybody else, are eternally keeping society in a ferment. Happily for New Amsterdam, nothing of the kind was known within its walls; the very words of learning, education, taste, and talents were unheard of; a bright genius was an animal unknown, and a blue-stocking lady 3 would have been regarded with as much wonder as a horned frog or a fiery dragon. No man, in fact, seemed to know more than his neighbor, nor any man to know more than an honest man ought to know, who has nobody's business to mind but his own; the parson and the council clerk were the only men that could read in the community, and the sage Van Twiller always signed his name with a cross.

Thrice happy and ever to be envied little Burgh! existing in all the security of harmless insignificance,—unnoticed and unenvied by the world, without ambition, without vainglory, without riches, without learning, and all their train of carking cares;—and as of yore, in the better days of man, the deities were wont to visit him on earth and bless his rural habitations: so, we are told, in the sylvan days of New Amsterdam, the good St. Nicholas 4 would often make his appearance in his beloved city. of a holiday afternoon, riding jollily among the tree-tops, or over the roofs of the houses, now and then drawing forth magnificent presents from his breeches pockets, and dropping them down the chimneys of his favorites. Whereas, in these degenerate days of iron and brass. he never shows us the light of his countenance, nor ever visits us, save one night in the year, when he rattles down the chimneys of the descendants of patriarchs, confining his presents merely to the children, in token of the degeneracy of the parents.

Such are the comfortable and thriving effects of a fat government. The province of the New Netherlands, destitute of wealth, possessed a sweet tranquillity that wealth could never purchase. There were neither public commotions, nor private quarrels; neither parties, nor sects, nor schisms; neither persecutions, nor trials, nor punishments; nor were there counselors, attorneys, catchpolls, or hangmen. Every man attended to what little business he was lucky enough to have, or neglected it if he pleased. without asking the opinion of his neighbor. In those days nobody meddled with concerns above his comprehension; nor thrust his nose into other people's affairs; nor neglected to correct his own conduct, and reform his own character, in his zeal to pull to pieces the characters of others; -- but, in a word, every respectable citizen ate when he was not hungry, drank when he was not thirsty, and went regularly to bed when the sun set and the fowls went to roost, whether he was sleepy or not; all which tended so remarkably to the population of the settlement, that I am told every dutiful wife throughout New Amsterdam made a point of enriching her husband with at least one child a year, and very often a brace,—this superabundance of good things clearly constituting the true luxury of life, according to the favorite Dutch maxim, that, "more than enough constitutes a feast." Everything, therefore, went on exactly as it should do, and in the usual words employed by historians to express the welfare of a country, "the profoundest tranquillity and repose reigned throughout the province."

&lt;sup>1</sup> The home of the ostensibly fraternal and benevolent order of the Tammany Society or Columbian Order, an organization already in 1809 of much political influence; its views were opposite to those of Irving.

&lt;sup>2</sup> landlord of the tavern at the corner of Nassau and Spruce Streets, New York, where the Tammany political meetings were held

<sup>3</sup> a woman of intellectual ambition

<sup>4</sup> Irving has previously made him the patron saint of New York.

CHAPTER IX

HOW THE FORT GOED HOOP WAS FEARFULLY BE-LEAGUERED—HOW THE RENOWNED WOUTER FELL INTO A PROFOUND DOUBT, AND HOW HE FINALLY EVAPORATED.

I have already noticed, in a former chapter of my history, that the territories of the Nieuw Nederlandts extended on the east, quite to the Varsche or fresh, or Connecticut river. Here, at an early period, had been established a frontier post on the bank of the river, and called Fort Goed Hoop, not far from the site of the present fair city of Hartford. It was placed under the command of Jacobus Van Curlet, or Curlis, as some historians will have it,—a doughty soldier, of that stomachful class famous for eating all they kill. He was long in the body and short in the limb, as though a tall man's body had been mounted on a little man's legs. He made up for this turnspit construction by striding to such an extent that you would have sworn he had on the seven-leagued boots of Tack the Giant-killer; and so high did he tread on parade, that his soldiers were sometimes alarmed lest he should trample himself under foot.

But notwithstanding the erection of this fort and the appointment of this ugly little man of war as commander, the Yankees continued the interlopings hinted at in my last chapter, and at length had the audacity to squat themselves down within the jurisdiction of Fort Goed Hoop. <sup>1</sup>

The long-bodied Van Curlet protested with great spirit against these unwarrantable encroachments, couching his protest in Low Dutch, by way of inspiring more terror, and forthwith dispatched a copy of the protest to the governor at New Amsterdam, together with a long and bitter account of the aggressions of the enemy. This done, he ordered his men, one and all, to be of good cheer, shut the gate of the fort, smoked three pipes, went to bed, and awaited the result with a resolute and intrepid tranquillity that greatly animated his adherents, and no doubt struck sore dismay and affright into the hearts of the enemy.

Now it came to pass that about this time the renowned Wouter Van Twiller, full of years and honors, and council-dinners, had reached that period of life and faculty which, according to the great Gulliver, entitles a man to admission into the ancient order of Struldbruggs.<sup>2</sup>

He employed his time in smoking his Turkish pipe, amid an assemblage of sages, equally enlightened and nearly as venerable as himself. and who, for their silence, their gravity, their wisdom, and their cautious averseness to coming to any conclusion in business are only to be equaled by certain profound corporations which I have known in my time. Upon reading the protest of the gallant Jacobus Van Curlet. therefore, His Excellency fell straightway into one of the deepest doubts that ever he was known to encounter; his capacious head gradually drooped on his chest, he closed his eyes, and inclined his ear to one side, as if listening with great attention to the discussion that was going on in his belly.—and which all who knew him declared to be the huge court-house or council-chamber of his thoughts, forming to his head what the House of Representatives does to the Senate. An inarticulate sound, very much resembling a snore, occasionally escaped him: but the nature of this internal cogitation was never known, as he never opened his lips on the subject to man, woman, or child. In the mean time, the protest of Van Curlet lay quietly on the table, where it served to light the pipes of the venerable sages assembled in council: and in the great smoke which they raised, the gallant Jacobus, his protest, and his mighty Fort Goed Hoop were soon as completely beclouded and forgotten as is a question of emergency swallowed up in the speeches and resolutions of a modern session of Congress.

There are certain emergencies when your profound legislators and sage deliberative councils are mightily in the way of a nation, and when an ounce of hare-brained decision is worth a pound of sage doubt and cautious discussion. Such, at least, was the case at present; for, while the renowned Wouter Van Twiller was daily battling with his doubts, and his resolution growing weaker and weaker in the contest, the enemy pushed farther and farther into his territories, and assumed a most formidable appearance in the neighborhood of Fort Goed Hoop. Here they founded the mighty town of Pyquag, or, as it has since been called, Weathersfield, a place which, if we may credit the assertions of that worthy historian, John Tosselyn, Gent., 3 "hath been infamous by reason of the witches therein." And so daring did these men of Pyquag become, that they extended those plantations of onions, for which their town is illustrious, under the very noses

The paragraph is substantially true history.
 in the third part of Gulliver's Travels, beings gifted with bodily immortality, but nothing else

&lt;sup>3</sup> John Josselyn, born in England about 1600, wrote three books giving accounts of early voyages to New England, and descriptions of the country.

of the garrison of Fort Goed Hoop, insomuch that the honest Dutchmen could not look toward that quarter without tears in their eyes.

This crying injustice was regarded with proper indignation by the gallant Jacobus Van Curlet. He absolutely trembled with the violence of his choler and the exacerbations <sup>1</sup> of his valor, which were the more turbulent in their workings from the length of the body in which they were agitated. He forthwith proceeded to strengthen his redoubts, heighten his breastworks, deepen his fosse, <sup>2</sup> and fortify his position with a double row of abatis; <sup>3</sup> after which he dispatched a fresh courier with accounts of his perilous situation.

The courier chosen to bear the despatches was a fat, oily, little man, as being less liable to be worn out, or to lose leather on the journey; and to insure his speed, he was mounted on the fleetest wagon-horse in the garrison, remarkable for length of limb, largeness of bone, and hardness of trot, and so tall, that the little messenger was obliged to climb on his back by means of his tail and crupper. Such extraordinary speed did he make, that he arrived at Fort Amsterdam in a little less than a month, though the distance was full two hundred pipes, or about one hundred and twenty miles.

With an appearance of great hurry and business, and smoking a short traveling-pipe. he proceeded on a long swing-trot through the muddy lanes of the metropolis, demolishing whole batches of dirt-pies which the little Dutch children were making in the road: and for which kind of pastry the children of this city have ever been famous. On arriving at the governor's house, he climbed down from his steed, roused the gray-headed door-keeper. old Skaats, who, like his lineal descendant and faithful representative, the venerable crier of our court, was nodding at his post, rattled at the door of the council-chamber, and startled the members as they were dozing over a plan for establishing a public market.

At that very moment a gentle grunt, or rather a deep-drawn snore, was heard from the chair of the governor; a whiff of smoke was at the same instant observed to escape from his lips, and a light cloud to ascend from the bowl of his pipe. The council, of course, supposed him engaged in deep sleep, for the good of the community, and according to custom in all such cases established, every man bawled out silence, when, of a sudden, the door flew open, and the little courier straddled into the apartment, cased to the middle in a pair of Hessian boots, which he had got into for the sake of expedition. In his right hand he held forth the ominous dispatches, and with his left he grasped firmly the waistband of his galligaskins. 4 which had unfortunately given way in the exertion of descending from his horse. He stumped resolutely up to the governor, and with more hurry than perspicuity delivered his message. But fortunately his ill tidings came too late to ruffle the tranquillity of this most tranguil of rulers. His venerable Excellency had just breathed and smoked his last.—his lungs and his pipe having been exhausted together, and his peaceful soul having escaped in the last whiff that curled from his tobacco pipe. In a word, the renowned Walter the Doubter, who had so often slumbered with his contemporaries, now slept with his fathers. and Wilhelmus Kieft 5 governed in his stead.

<sup>1</sup> irritations, exasperations <sup>3</sup> ditch, moat

1808-09 1809

From THE SKETCH-BOOK THE AUTHOR'S ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF

I am of this mind with Homer, that as the snaile that crept out of her shel was turned eftsoons into a toad, and thereby was forced to make a stoole to sit on; so the traveller that stragleth from his owne country is in a short time transformed into so monstrous a shape, that he is faine to alter his mansion with his manners, and to live where he can, not where he would.

LYLY'S Euphues.

I was always fond of visiting new scenes. and observing strange characters and manners. Even when a mere child I began my travels. and made many tours of discovery into foreign parts and unknown regions of my native city, to the frequent alarm of my parents, and the emolument of the town-crier. As I grew into boyhood, I extended the range of my observations. My holiday afternoons were spent in rambles about the surrounding country. made myself familiar with all its places famous in history or fable. I knew every spot where a murder or robbery had been committed, or a ghost seen. I visited the neighboring villages, and added greatly to my stock of knowledge by noting their habits and customs, and conversing with their sages and great men.

1 loose breeches

&lt;sup>3</sup> a military defense of stakes or tree-tops planted in the earth with sharpened ends protruding toward the enemy

<sup>5</sup> third Dutch governor of New York

I even journeyed one long summer's day to the summit of the most distant hill, whence I stretched my eve over many a mile of terra incognita, 1 and was astonished to find how vast a globe I inhabited.

This rambling propensity strengthened with my years. Books of voyages and travels became my passion, and in devouring their contents, I neglected the regular exercises of the school. How wistfully would I wander about the pier-heads in fine weather, and watch the parting ships, bound to distant climes—with what longing eyes would I gaze after their lessening sails, and waft myself in imagination to the ends of the earth!

Further reading and thinking, though they brought this vague inclination into more reasonable bounds, only served to make it more decided. I visited various parts of my own country; and had I been merely a lover of fine scenery, I should have felt little desire to seek elsewhere its gratification, for on no country have the charms of nature been more prodigally lavished. Her mighty lakes, like oceans of liquid silver; her mountains, with their bright aërial tints; her valleys, teeming with wild fertility; her tremendous cataracts, thundering in their solitudes; her boundless plains, waving with spontaneous verdure: her broad, deep rivers, rolling in solemn silence to the ocean; her trackless forests, where vegetation puts forth all its magnificence; her skies, kindling with the magic of summer clouds and glorious sunshine;-no, never need an American look beyond his own country for the sublime and beautiful of natural scenery.

But Europe held forth the charms of storied and poetical association. There were to be seen the masterpieces of art, the refinements of highly cultivated society, the quaint peculiarities of ancient and local custom. My native country was full of youthful promise: Europe was rich in the accumulated treasures of age. Her very ruins told the history of times gone by, and every moldering stone was a chronicle. I longed to wander over the scenes of renowned achievement—to tread, as it were, in the footsteps of antiquity-to loiter about the ruined castle-to meditate on the falling tower-to escape, in short, from the commonplace realities of the present, and lose myself among the shadowy grandeurs of the past.

I had, beside all this, an earnest desire to see the great men of the earth. We have, it is true, our great men in America: not a city but has an ample share of them. I have mingled among them in my time, and been almost withered by the shade into which they cast me; for there is nothing so baleful to a small man as the shade of a great one, particularly the great man of a city. But I was anxious to see the great men of Europe: for I had read in the works of various philosophers, that all animals degenerated in America, and man among the number. A great man of Europe. thought I, must therefore be as superior to a great man of America as a peak of the Alps to a highland of the Hudson; and in this idea I was confirmed by observing the comparative importance and swelling magnitude of many English travelers among us, who, I was assured, were very little people in their own country. I will visit this land of wonders, thought I, and see the gigantic race from which I am degenerated.

It has been either my good or evil lot to have my roving passion gratified. I have wandered through different countries, and witnessed many of the shifting scenes of life. I cannot say that I have studied them with the eve of a philosopher; but rather with the sauntering gaze with which humble lovers of the picturesque stroll from the window of one print-shop to another, caught sometimes by the delineations of beauty. sometimes by the distortions of caricature, and sometimes by the loveliness of landscape. As it is the fashion for modern tourists to travel pencil in hand, and bring home their portfolios filled with sketches, I am disposed to get up a few for the entertainment of my friends. When, however, I look over the hints and memorandums I have taken down for the purpose, my heart almost fails me at finding how my idle humor has led me aside from the great objects studied by every regular traveler who would make a book. I fear I shall give equal disappointment with an unlucky landscape painter, who had traveled on the continent, but, following the bent of his vagrant inclination, had sketched in nooks, and corners, and byplaces. His sketch-book was accordingly crowded with cottages, and landscapes, and obscure ruins; but he had neglected to paint St. Peter's, or the Coliseum; the cascade of Terni, 2 or the bay of Naples; 3 and had not a single glacier or volcano in his whole collection. 1818-19 1819

<sup>1</sup> unknown land

&lt;sup>2</sup> A series of waterfalls near Terni, Italy, called Cascate delle Marmore; the total fall is nearly six hundred

<sup>3</sup> considered one of the most beautiful in the world

RIP VAN WINKLE

A POSTHUMOUS WRITING OF DIEDRICH KNICKERBOCKER <sup>1</sup>

By Woden, God of Saxons, From whence comes Wensday, that is Wodensday, Truth is a thing that ever I will keep Unto thylke day in which I creep into My sepulcher—

CARTWRIGHT.

The following Tale was found among the papers of the late Diedrich Knickerbocker, an old gentleman of New York, who was very curious in the Dutch history of the province, and the manners of the descendants from its primitive settlers. His historical researches, however, did not lie so much among books as among men; for the former are lamentably scanty on his favorite topics; whereas he found the old burghers, and still more their wives, rich in that legendary lore so invaluable to true history. Whenever, therefore, he happened upon a genuine Dutch family, snugly shut up in its low-roofed farmhouse under a spreading sycamore, he looked upon it as a little clasped volume of black-letter, 2 and studied it with the zeal of a book-worm.

The result of all these researches was a history of the province during the reign of the Dutch governors, which he published some years since. There have been various opinions as to the literary character of his work, and, to tell the truth, it is not a whit better than it should be. Its chief merit is its scrupulous accuracy, which indeed was a little questioned on its first appearance, but has since been completely established; and it is now admitted into all historical collections, as a book of unquestionable authority.

The old gentleman died shortly after the publication of his work, and now that he is dead and gone, it cannot do much harm to his memory to say that his time might have been much better employed in weightier labors. He, however, was apt to ride his hobby his own way; and though it did now and then kick up the dust a little in the eyes of his neighbors, and grieve the spirit of some

<sup>2</sup> Continuing the very transparent fiction of Diedrich Knickerbocker, as author of the tales here printed, as well as of the History of New York, Irving takes occasion to disavow any ill-natured intent in the ridicule they contain. Although the staid Dutch aristocracy had taken Irving's freedom with their ancestors somewhat unkindly, his readers in general relished the History all the more because of its satirical flavor; and as he hints, the growing frequency of the name Knickerbocker, not only on biscuits, but in other trade connections, showed the popularity of the vein he was working. Irving is not wholly original in the germ-idea of the twenty years' sleep, for it had appeared in oldworld literature several times in the twenty-four hundred years before Irving's day. Irving, however, adapts the idea completely to the characters and the time of which he writes, making it not only local in scene, but distinctly American in tone.

2 the print characteristic of fourteenth century Latin manuscripts and books friends, for whom he felt the truest deference and affection; yet his errors and follies are remembered "more in sorrow than in anger," and it begins to be suspected that he never intended to injure or offend. But however his memory may be appreciated by critics, it is still held dear by many folks whose good opinion is well worth having; particularly by certain biscuit-bakers, who have gone so far as to imprint his likeness on their new-year cakes; and have thus given him a chance for immortality, almost equal to the being stamped on a Waterloo Medal or a Queen Anne's Farthing. <sup>3</sup>]

Whoever has made a voyage up the Hudson must remember the Kaatskill Mountains. They are a dismembered branch of the great Appalachian family, and are seen away to the west of the river, swelling up to a noble height, and lording it over the surrounding country. Every change of season, every change of weather, indeed, every hour of the day, produces some change in the magical hues and shapes of these mountains, and they are regarded by all the good wives, far and near, as perfect barometers. When the weather is fair and settled, they are clothed in blue and purple, and print their bold outlines on the clear evening sky; but sometimes when the rest of the landscape is cloudless, they will gather a hood of gray vapors about their summits, which, in the last rays of the setting sun, will glow and light up like a crown of glory.

At the foot of these fairy mountains, the voyager may have descried the light smoke curling up from a village, whose shingle-roofs gleam among the trees, just where the blue tints of the upland melt away into the fresh green of the nearer landscape. It is a little village of great antiquity, having been founded by some of the Dutch colonists in the early times of the province, just about the beginning of the government of the good Peter Stuyvesant. 4 (may he rest in peace!) and there were some of the houses of the original settlers standing within a few years, built of small yellow bricks brought from Holland, having latticed windows and gable fronts, surmounted with weather-cocks.

In that same village, and in one of these very houses (which, to tell the precise truth, was sadly time-worn and weather-beaten) there lived many years since, while the country was yet a province of Great Britain, a simple good-

Waterloo medals were given regardless of rank to all British survivors of the battle of Waterloo. Queen Anne's farthing was a coin of Queen Anne's reign, supposed to be, but not in fact, excessively natured fellow, of the name of Rip Van Winkle. He was a descendant of the Van Winkles who figured so gallantly in the chivalrous days of Peter Stuyvesant, and accompanied him to the siege of Fort Christina. 1 He inherited, however, but little of the martial character of his ancestors. I have observed that he was a simple good-natured man; he was, moreover, a kind neighbor, and an obedient hennecked husband. Indeed, to the latter circumstance might be owing that meekness of spirit which gained him such universal popularity: for those men are most apt to be obsequious and conciliating abroad, who are under the discipline of shrews at home. Their tempers, doubtless, are rendered pliant and malleable in the fiery furnace of domestic tribulation; and a curtain lecture is worth all the sermons in the world for teaching the virtues of patience and long-suffering. A termagant wife may, therefore, in some respects be considered a tolerable blessing; and if so, Rip Van Winkle was thrice blessed.

*the last Dutch governor of New York

Certain it is, that he was a great favorite among all the good wives of the village, who, as usual with the amiable sex, took his part in all family squabbles; and never failed, whenever they talked those matters over in their evening gossipings, to lay all the blame on Dame Van Winkle. The children of the village, too. would shout with joy whenever he approached. He assisted at their sports, made their playthings, taught them to fly kites and shoot marbles, and told them long stories of ghosts, witches, and Indians. Whenever he went dodging about the village, he was surrounded by a troop of them, hanging on his skirts, clambering on his back, and playing a thousand tricks on him with impunity; and not a dog would bark at him throughout the neighborhood.

The great error in Rip's composition was an insuperable aversion to all kinds of profitable labor. It could not be from the want of assiduity or perseverance; for he would sit on a wet rock, with a rod as long and heavy as a Tartar's lance, and fish all day without a murmur even though he should not be encouraged by a single nibble. He would carry a fowlingpiece on his shoulder for hours together, trudging through woods and swamps, and up hill and down dale, to shoot a few squirrels or wild pigeons. He would never refuse to assist a neighbor, even in the roughest toil, and was a foremost man at all country frolics for husking Indian corn, or building stone-fences; the women of the village, too, used to employ him to run their errands, and to do such little odd jobs as their less obliging husbands would not do for them. In a word, Rip was ready to attend to anybody's business but his own; but as to doing any family duty, and keeping his farm in order, he found it impossible.

In fact, he declared it was of no use to work on his farm; it was the most pestilent little piece of ground in the whole country; everything about it went wrong, and would go wrong, in spite of him. His fences were continually falling to pieces; his cow would either go astray or get among the cabbages; weeds were sure to grow quicker in his fields than anywhere else; the rain always made a point of setting in just as he had outdoor work to do; so that though his patrimonial estate had dwindled away under his management, acre by acre, until there was little more left than a mere patch of Indian corn and potatoes, yet it was the worst-conditioned farm in the neighborhood.

His children, too, were as ragged and wild as if they belonged to nobody. His son Rip, an urchin begotten in his own likeness, promised to inherit the habits, with the old clothes of his father. He was generally seen trooping like a colt at his mother's heels, equipped in a pair of his father's cast-off galligaskins, 2 which he had much ado to hold up with one hand, as a fine lady does her train in bad weather.

Rip Van Winkle, however, was one of those happy mortals, of foolish, well-oiled dispositions, who take the world easy, eat white bread or brown, whichever can be got with least thought or trouble, and would rather starve on a penny than work for a pound. If left to himself, he would have whistled life away in perfect contentment; but his wife kept continually dinning in his ears about his idleness, his carelessness, and the ruin he was bringing on his family. Morning, noon, and night, her tongue was incessantly going, and everything he said or did was sure to produce a torrent of household eloquence. Rip had but one way of replying to all lectures of the kind, and that, by frequent use, had grown into a habit. shrugged his shoulders, shook his head, cast up his eyes, but said nothing. This, however, always provoked a fresh volley from his wife; so that he was fain to draw off his forces, and take to the outside of the house-the only side which, in truth, belongs to a henpecked husband.

Rip's sole domestic adherent was his dog Wolf, who was as much henpecked as his master; for Dame Van Winkle regarded them as companions in idleness, and even looked upon Wolf with an evil eye, as the cause of his master's going so often astray. True it is, in all points of spirit befitting an honorable dog, he was as courageous an animal as ever scoured the woods—but what courage can withstand the ever-during and all-besetting terrors of a woman's tongue? The moment Wolf entered the house his crest fell, his tail drooped to the ground, or curled between his legs, he sneaked about with a gallows air, casting many a sidelong glance at Dame Van Winkle, and at the least flourish of a broomstick or ladle, he would fly to the door with yelping precipitation.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a Swedish fort on the Delaware captured by the Dutch in 1655 after a bloodless siege

<sup>2</sup> large, loose knee-breeches

Times grew worse and worse with Rip Van Winkle as years of matrimony rolled on; a tart temper never mellows with age, and a sharp tongue is the only edged tool that grows keener with constant use. For a long while he used to console himself, when driven from home, by frequenting a kind of perpetual club of the sages, philosophers, and other idle personages of the village; which held its sessions on a bench before a small inn, designated by a rubicund portrait of His Majesty George the Third. Here they used to sit in the shade through a long lazy summer's day, talking listlessly over village gossip, or telling endless sleepy stories about nothing. But it would have been worth any statesman's money to have heard the profound discussions that sometimes took place, when by chance an old newspaper fell into their hands from some passing traveler. How solemnly they would listen to the contents, as drawled out by Derrick Van Bummel, the schoolmaster, a dapper learned little man, who was not to be daunted by the most gigantic word in the dictionary; and how sagely they would deliberate upon public events some months after they had taken place.

The opinions of this junto were completely controlled by Nicholas Vedder, a patriarch of the village, and landlord of the inn, at the door of which he took his seat from morning till night, just moving sufficiently to avoid the sun and keep in the shade of a large tree; so that the neighbors could tell the hour by his movements as accurately as by a sun-dial. It is true he was rarely heard to speak, but smoked his pipe incessantly. His adherents, however (for every great man has his adherents) perfectly understood him, and knew how to gather his opinions. When anything that was read or related displeased him, he was observed to smoke his pipe vehemently, and to send forth short, frequent, and angry puffs; but when pleased, he would inhale the smoke slowly and tranquilly, and emit it in light and placid clouds; and sometimes, taking the pipe from his mouth, and letting the fragrant vapor curl about his nose, would gravely nod his head in token of perfect approbation.

From even this stronghold the unlucky Rip was at length routed by his termagant wife, who would suddenly break in upon the tranquillity of the assemblage and call the members all to naught; nor was that august personage, Nicholas Vedder himself, sacred from the daring tongue of this terrible virago, who charged him outright with encouraging her husband in habits of idleness.

Poor Rip was at last reduced almost to despair; and his only alternative, to escape from the labor of the farm and clamor of his wife, was to take gun in hand and stroll away into the woods. Here he would sometimes seat himself at the foot of a tree, and share the contents of his wallet with Wolf, with whom he sympathized as a fellow-sufferer in persecution. "Poor Wolf," he would say, "thy mistress leads thee a dog's life of it; but never mind, my lad, whilst I live thou shalt never want a friend to stand by thee!" Wolf would wag his tail, look wistfully in his master's face, and if dogs can feel pity I verily believe he reciprocated the sentiment with all his heart.

In a long ramble of the kind on a fine autumnal day, Rip had unconsciously scrambled to one of the highest parts of the Kaatskill Mountains. He was after his favorite sport of squirrel shooting, and the still solitudes had echoed and reëchoed with the reports of his gun. Panting and fatigued, he threw himself. late in the afternoon, on a green knoll, covered with mountain herbage, that crowned the brow of a precipice. From an opening between the trees he could overlook all the lower country for many a mile of rich woodland. He saw at a distance the lordly Hudson, far, far below him, moving on its silent but majestic course, with the reflection of a purple cloud, or the sail of a lagging bark, here and there sleeping on its glassy bosom, and at last losing itself in the blue highlands.

On the other side he looked down into a deep mountain glen, wild, lonely, and shagged, the bottom filled with fragments from the impending cliffs, and scarcely lighted by the reflected rays of the setting sun. For some time Rip lay musing on this scene; evening was gradually advancing; the mountains began to throw their long blue shadows over the valleys; he saw that it would be dark long before he could reach the village, and he heaved a heavy sigh when he thought of encountering the terrors of Dame Van Winkle.

As he was about to descend, he heard a voice from a distance, hallooing, "Rip Van Winkle! Rip Van Winkle!" He looked round, but could see nothing but a crow winging its solitary flight across the mountain. He thought his fancy must have deceived him, and turned again to descend. when he heard the same cry ring through the still evening air; "Rip Van Winkle! Rip Van Winkle!"—at the same time Wolf bristled up his back, and giving a low growl, skulked to his master's side, looking fearfully down into the glen. Rip now felt a vague apprehension stealing over him; he looked anxiously in the same direction, and perceived a strange figure slowly toiling up the rocks, and bending under the weight of something he carried on his back. He was surprised to see any human being in this lonely and unfrequented place; but supposing it to be someone of the neighborhood in need of his assistance, he hastened down to yield it.

On nearer approach he was still more surprised at the singularity of the stranger's appearance. He was a short, square-built old fellow, with thick bushy hair, and a grizzled beard. His dress was of the antique Dutch fashion: a cloth jerkin 1 strapped round the waist, several pairs of breeches, the outer one of ample volume, decorated with rows of buttons down the sides, and bunches at the knees. He bore on his shoulder a stout keg, that seemed full of liquor, and made signs for Rip to approach and assist him with the load. Though rather shy and distrustful of this new acquaintance. Rip complied with his usual alacrity; and mutually relieving one another, they clambered up a narrow gully, apparently the dry bed of a mountain torrent. As they ascended, Rip every now and then heard long rolling peals, like distant thunder, that seemed to issue out of a deep ravine, or rather cleft, between lofty rocks, toward which their rugged path conducted. He paused for an instant, but supposing it to be the muttering of one of those transient thunder-showers which often take place in mountain heights, he proceeded. Passing through the ravine, they came to a hollow, like a small amphitheater, surrounded by perpendicular precipices, over the brinks of which impending trees shot their branches, so that you only caught glimpses of the azure sky and the bright evening cloud. During the whole time Rip and his companion had labored on in silence; for though the former marveled greatly what could be the object of carrying a keg of liquor up this wild mountain, yet there was something strange and incomprehensible about the unknown, that inspired awe and checked familiarity.

On entering the amphitheater, new objects of wonder presented themselves. On a level spot in the center was a company of oddlooking personages playing at ninepins. They were dressed in a quaint outlandish fashion; some wore short doublets. 2 others jerkins, with long knives in their belts, and most of them had enormous breeches of similar style with that of the guide's. Their visages, too, were peculiar: one had a large beard, broad face, and small piggish eyes: the face of another seemed to consist entirely of nose, and was surmounted by a white sugar-loaf hat, set off with a little red cock's tail. They all had beards, of various shapes and colors. There was one who seemed to be the commander. He was a stout old gentleman, with a weather-beaten countenance; he wore a laced doublet, broad belt and hanger, 3 high-crowned hat and feather, red stockings, and high-heeled shoes, with roses in them. The whole group reminded Rip of the figures in an old Flemish painting in the parlor of Dominie Van Shaick, the village parson, and which had been brought over from Holland at the time of the settlement.

What seemed particularly odd to Rip was, that though these folks were evidently amusing themselves, yet they maintained the gravest faces, the most mysterious silence, and were, withal, the most melancholy party of pleasure he had ever witnessed. Nothing interrupted the stillness of the scene but the noise of the balls, which, whenever they rolled, echoed along the mountains like rumbling peals of thunder.

As Rip and his companion approached them, they suddenly desisted from their play, and stared at him with such fixed, statue-like gaze, and such strange, uncouth, lack-luster countenances, that his heart turned within him, and his knees smote together. His companion now emptied the contents of the keg into large flagons, and made signs to him to wait upon the company. He obeyed with fear and trembling; they quaffed the liquor in profound silence, and then returned to their game.

By degrees Rip's awe and apprehension subsided. He even ventured, when no eye was fixed upon him, to taste the beverage, which he found had much of the flavor of excellent Hollands. 4 He was naturally a thirsty soul, and was soon tempted to repeat the draught. One taste provoked another; and he reiterated his visits to the flagon so often that at length his senses were overpowered, his eyes swam in his head, his head gradually declined, and he fell into a deep sleep.

 &lt;sup>2</sup> closely-fitting jackets
 <sup>4</sup> gin made in Holland
 <sup>3</sup> sword

On waking, he found himself on the green knoll whence he had first seen the old man of the glen. He rubbed his eyes—it was a bright, sunny morning. The birds were hopping and twittering among the bushes, and the eagle was wheeling aloft, and breasting the pure mountain breeze. "Surely," thought Rip, "I have not slept here all night." He recalled the occurrences before he fell asleep. The strange man with a keg of liquor—the mountain ravine—the wild retreat among the rocks—the woe-begone party at ninepins—the flagon—"Oh! that flagon! that wicked flagon!" thought Rip—"what excuse shall I make to Dame Van Winkle!"

He looked round for his gun, but in place of the clean, well-oiled fowling-piece, he found an old firelock lying by him, the barrel incrusted with rust, the lock falling off, and the stock worm-eaten. He now suspected that the grave roisters of the mountain had put a trick upon him, and, having dosed him with liquor, had robbed him of his gun. Wolf, too, had disappeared, but he might have strayed after a squirrel or partridge. He whistled after him, and shouted his name, but all in vain; the echoes repeated his whistle and shout, but no dog was to be seen.

He determined to revisit the scene of the last evening's gambol, and if he met with any of the party, to demand his dog and gun. As he rose to walk, he found himself stiff in the joints, and wanting in his usual activity. "These mountain beds do not agree with me," thought Rip, "and if this frolic should lay me up with a fit of the rheumatism, I shall have a blessed time with Dame Van Winkle." With some difficulty he got down into the glen: he found the gully up which he and his companion had ascended the preceding evening; but to his astonishment a mountain stream was now foaming down it, leaping from rock to rock, and filling the glen with babbling murmurs. He, however, made shift to scramble up its sides, working his toilsome way through thickets of birch, sassafras, and witch-hazel, and sometimes tripped up or entangled by the wild grapevines that twisted their coils or tendrils from tree to tree, and spread a kind of network in his path.

At length he reached to where the ravine had opened through the cliffs to the amphitheater: but no traces of such opening remained. The rocks presented a high, impenetrable wall, over which the torrent came tumbling in a sheet of feathery foam, and fell into a broad, deep basin, black from the shadows of the surrounding forest. Here, then, poor Rip was brought to a stand. He again called and whistled after his dog; he was only answered by the cawing of a flock of idle crows, sporting high in air about a dry tree that overhung a sunny precipice; and who, secure in their elevation, seemed to look down and scoff at the poor man's perplexities. What was to be done? the morning was passing away, and Rip felt famished for want of his breakfast. He grieved to give up his dog and gun; he dreaded to meet his wife; but it would not do to starve among the mountains. He shook his head, shouldered the rusty firelock, and, with a heart full of trouble and anxiety, turned his steps homeward.

As he approached the village he met a number of people, but none whom he knew, which somewhat surprised him, for he had thought himself acquainted with everyone in the country round. Their dress, too, was of a different fashion from that to which he was accustomed. They all stared at him with equal marks of surprise, and whenever they cast their eyes upon him, invariably stroked their chins. The constant recurrence of this gesture induced Rip, involuntarily, to do the same, when, to his astonishment, he found his beard had grown a foot long!

He had now entered the skirts of the village. A troop of strange children ran at his heels. hooting after him, and pointing at his gray The dogs, too, not one of which he recognized for an old acquaintance, barked at him as he passed. The very village was altered; it was larger and more populous. There were rows of houses which he had never seen before. and those which had been his familiar haunts had disappeared. Strange names were over the doors-strange faces at the windowseverything was strange. His mind now misgave him; he began to doubt whether both he and the world around him were not bewitched. Surely this was his native village, which he had left but the day before. There stood the Kaatskill Mountains—there ran the silver Hudson at a distance—there was every hill and dale precisely as it had always been—Rip was sorely perplexed-"That flagon last night," thought he, "has addled my poor head sadly!"

It was with some difficulty that he found the way to his own house, which he approached with silent awe, expecting every moment to hear the shrill voice of Dame Van Winkle. He found the house gone to decay—the roof fallen in, the windows shattered, and the doors off the hinges. A half-starved dog that looked like Wolf was skulking about it. Rip called him by name, but the cur snarled, showed his teeth, and passed on. This was an unkind cut indeed—"My very dog," sighed poor Rip, "has forgotten me!"

He entered the house, which, to tell the truth, Dame Van Winkle had always kept in neat order. It was empty, forlorn, and apparently abandoned. This desolateness overcame all his connubial fears—he called loudly for his wife and children—the lonely chambers rang for a moment with his voice, and then all again was silence.

He now hurried forth, and hastened to his old resort, the village inn-but it, too, was gone. A large, rickety wooden building stood in its place, with great gaping windows, some of them broken and mended with old hats and petticoats, and over the door was painted. "The Union Hotel, by Jonathan Doolittle." Instead of the great tree that used to shelter the quiet little Dutch inn of yore, there now was reared a tall naked pole, with something on the top that looked like a red night-cap, 1 and from it was fluttering a flag, on which was a singular assemblage of stars and stripes-all this was strange and incomprehensible. He recognized on the sign, however, the ruby face of King George, under which he had smoked so many a peaceful pipe; but even this was singularly metamorphosed. The red coat was changed for one of blue and buff, a sword was held in the hand instead of a scepter, the head was decorated with a cocked hat, and underneath was painted in large characters, GENERAL WASH-INGTON.

There was, as usual, a crowd of folk about the door, but none that Rip recollected. The very character of the people seemed changed. There was a busy, bustling, disputatious tone about it, instead of the accustomed phlegm and drowsy tranquillity. He looked in vain for the sage Nicholas Vedder, with his broad face, double chin, and fair long pipe, uttering clouds of tobacco smoke instead of idle speeches; or Van Bummel, the schoolmaster, doling forth the contents of an ancient newspaper. In place of these, a lean, bilious-looking fellow, with his pockets full of hand bills was haranguing vehemently about rights of citizens—elections—members of Congress—liberty—Bunker's Hill—heroes of seventy-six—and other words, which were a perfect Babylonish jargon to the bewildered Van Winkle.

The appearance of Rip, with his long grizzled beard, his rusty fowling-piece, his uncouth dress, and an army of women and children at his heels, soon attracted the attention of the tavern-politicians. They crowded round him, eveing him from head to foot with great curi-The orator bustled up to him, and, drawing him partly aside, inquired on which side he voted? Rip stared in vacant stupidity. Another short but busy little fellow pulled him by the arm, and, rising on tiptoe, inquired in his ear. 'Whether he was Federal or Democrat?' Rip was equally at a loss to comprehend the question; when a knowing, self-important old gentleman, in a sharp cocked hat, made his way through the crowd, putting them to the right and left with his elbows as he passed, and planting himself before Van Winkle, with one arm akimbo, the other resting on his cane, his keen eyes and sharp hat penetrating, as it were, into his very soul, demanded in an austere tone, 'what brought him to the election with a gun on his shoulder, and a mob at his heels, and whether he meant to breed a riot in the village?'-"Alas! gentlemen," cried Rip, somewhat dismayed, "I am a poor quiet man. a native of the place, and a loyal subject of the King, God bless him!"

Here a general shout burst from the bystanders—"A tory! a tory! a spy! a refugee! hustle him! away with him!" It was with great difficulty that the self-important man in the cocked hat restored order; and, having assumed a tenfold austerity of brow, demanded again of the unknown culprit what he came there for, and whom he was seeking? The poor man humbly assured him that he meant no harm, but merely came there in search of some of his neighbors, who used to keep about the tavern.

"Well—who are they?—name them."
Rip bethought himself a moment, and inquired, "Where's Nicholas Vedder?"

There was a silence for a little while, when an old man replied, in a thin, piping voice, "Nicholas Vedder! why, he is dead and gone these eighteen years! There was a wooden tombstone in the churchyard that used to tell all about him, but that's rotten and gone too."

"Where's Brom Dutcher?"

"Oh, he went off to the army in the beginning of the war; some say he was killed at the storming of Stony Point—others say he was drowned

the bonnet rouge, red cap, an emblem borrowed from the French revolutionists of the most extreme views in a squall at the foot of Antony's Nose. <sup>1</sup> I don't know—he never came back again."

"Where's Van Bummel, the schoolmaster?"

"He went off to the wars too, was a great militia general, and is now in Congress."

Rip's heart died away at hearing of these sad changes in his home and friends, and finding himself thus alone in the world. Every answer puzzled him too, by treating of such enormous lapses of time, and of matters which he could not understand: war—Congress—Stony Point; he had no courage to ask after any more friends, but cried out in despair, "Does nobody here know Rip Van Winkle?"

"Oh, Rip Van Winkle!" exclaimed two or three, "Oh, to be sure! that's Rip Van Winkle vonder, leaning against the tree."

Rip looked, and beheld a precise counterpart of himself, as he went up the mountain: apparently as lazy, and certainly as ragged. The poor fellow was now completely confounded. He doubted his own identity, and whether he was himself or another man. In the midst of his bewilderment, the man in the cocked hat demanded who he was, and what was his name?

"God knows," exclaimed he, at his wit's end; "I'm not myself—I'm somebody else—that's me yonder—no—that's somebody else got into my shoes—I was myself last night, but I fell asleep on the mountain, and they've changed my gun, and everything's changed, and I'm changed, and I can't tell what's my name, or who I am!"

The bystanders began now to look at each other, nod, wink significantly, and tap their fingers against their foreheads. There was a whisper, also, about securing the gun, and keeping the old fellow from doing mischief, at the very suggestion of which the self-important man in the cocked hat retired with some precipitation. At this critical moment a fresh, comely woman pressed through the throng to get a peep at the gray-bearded man. She had a chubby child in her arms, which, frightened at his looks, began to cry. "Hush, Rip," cried she, "hush, you little fool; the old man won't hurt you." The name of the child, the air of the mother, the tone of her voice, all awakened a train of recollections in his mind. "What is your name, my good woman?" asked he.

"Judith Gardenier."

"And your father's name?"

"Ah, poor man, Rip Van Winkle was his name, but it's twenty years since he went away from home with his gun, and never has been heard of since—his dog came home without him; but whether he shot himself, or was carried away by the Indians, nobody can tell. I was then but a little girl."

Rip had but one question more to ask; but he put it with a faltering voice:—

"Where's your mother?"

"Oh, she too had died but a short time since; she broke a blood-vessel in a fit of passion at a New England peddler."

There was a drop of comfort, at least, in this intelligence. The honest man could contain himself no longer. He caught his daughter and her child in his arms. "I am your father!" cried he—"Young Rip Van Winkle once—old Rip Van Winkle now!—Does nobody know poor Rip Van Winkle?"

All stood amazed, until an old woman, tottering out from among the crowd, put her hand to her brow, and peering under it in his face for a moment, exclaimed, "Sure enough! it is Rip Van Winkle—it is himself! Welcome home again, old neighbor—Why, where have you been these twenty long years?"

Rip's story was soon told, for the whole twenty years had been to him but as one night. The neighbors stared when they heard it; some were seen to wink at each other, and put their tongues in their cheeks; and the self-important man in the cocked hat, who, when the alarm was over, had returned to the field, screwed down the corners of his mouth, and shook his head—upon which there was a general shaking of the head throughout the assemblage.

It was determined, however, to take the opinion of old Peter Vanderdonk, who was seen slowly advancing up the road. He was a descendant of the historian of that name, 2 who wrote one of the earliest accounts of the province. Peter was the most ancient inhabitant of the village, and well versed in all the wonderful events and traditions of the neighborhood. He recollected Rip at once, and corroborated his story in the most satisfactory manner. He assured the company that it was a fact. handed down from his ancestor the historian, that the Kaatskill Mountains had always been haunted by strange beings. That it was affirmed that the great Hendrick Hudson, the first discoverer of the river and country, kept a kind of vigil there every twenty years, with his crew of the Half-moon; being permitted in this way to revisit the scenes of his enterprise, and keep a guardian eye upon the river and the great city called by his name. <sup>1</sup> That his father had seen them in their old Dutch dresses playing at ninepins in a hollow of the mountain; and that he himself had heard, one summer afternoon, the sound of their balls, like distant peals of thunder.

<sup>1</sup> a point of land on the Hudson, near West Point

&lt;sup>2</sup> Adrian Van der Donck, a prominent Dutch colonist who died in 1655, wrote a Description of New Netherland, a source of authentic information.

To make a long story short, the company broke up, and returned to the more important concerns of the election. Rip's daughter took him home to live with her; she had a snug well-furnished house, and a stout cheery farmer for a husband, whom Rip recollected for one of the urchins that used to climb upon his back. As to Rip's son and heir, who was the ditto of himself, seen leaning against the tree, he was employed to work on the farm; but evinced an hereditary disposition to attend to anything else but his business.

Rip now resumed his old walks and habits; he soon found many of his former cronies, though all rather the worse for the wear and tear of time; and preferred making friends among the rising generation, with whom he soon grew into great favor.

Having nothing to do at home, and being arrived at that happy age when a man can be idle with impunity, he took his place once more on the bench at the inn door, and was reverenced as one of the patriarchs of the village. and a chronicle of the old times "before the war." It was some time before he could get into the regular track of gossip, or could be made to comprehend the strange events that had taken place during his torpor. How that there had been a revolutionary war-that the country had thrown off the yoke of old England -and that, instead of being a subject of His Majesty George the Third, he was now a free citizen of the United States. Rip, in fact, was no politician; the changes of states and empires made but little impression on him: but there was one species of despotism under which he had long groaned, and that was—petticoat government. Happily that was at an end; he had got his neck out of the voke of matrimony. and could go in and out whenever he pleased, without dreading the tyranny of Dame Van Winkle. Whenever her name was mentioned, however, he shook his head, shrugged his shoulders, and cast up his eyes; which might pass either for an expression of resignation to his fate, or joy at his deliverance.

He used to tell his story to every stranger that arrived at Mr. Doolittle's hotel. He was observed, at first, to vary on some points every time he told it, which was, doubtless, owing to his having so recently awaked. It at last settled down precisely to the tale I have related, and not a man, woman, or child in the neighborhood but knew it by heart. Some always pretended to doubt the reality of it, and insisted Rip had been out of his head, and that this was one point on which he always remained flighty. The old Dutch inhabitants, however, almost universally gave it full credit. Even to this day they never hear a thunderstorm of a summer afternoon about the Kaatskill, but they say Hendrick Hudson and his crew are at their game of ninepins; and it is a common wish of all hennecked husbands in the neighborhood. when life hangs heavy on their hands, that they might have a quieting draught out of Rip Van Winkle's flagon.

<sup>1</sup> The city of Hudson, twenty-eight miles south of Albany, has now only about twelve thousand inhabitants, but may have been relatively much larger in Irving's time; or, Irving may be joking.

NOTE

The foregoing Tale, one would suspect, had been suggested to Mr. Knickerbocker by a little German superstition about the Emperor Frederick der Rothbart, <sup>2</sup> and the Kypphäuser Mountain; the subjoined note, however, which he had appended to the tale, shows that it is an absolute fact, narrated with his usual fidelity:

"The story of Rip Van Winkle may seem incredible to many, but nevertheless I give it my full belief, for I know the vicinity of our old Dutch settlements to have been very subject to marvelous events and appearances. Indeed, I have heard many stranger stories than this, in the villages along the Hudson; all of which were too well authenticated to admit of a doubt. I have even talked with Rip Van Winkle myself, who, when last I saw him, was a very venerable old man, and so perfectly rational and consistent on every other point, that I think no conscientious person could refuse to take this into the bargain; nay, I have seen a certificate on the subject taken before a country justice and signed with a cross, in the justice's own handwriting. The story, therefore, is beyond the possibility of doubt.

"D. K."

POSTSCRIPT

The following are traveling notes from a memorandum-book of Mr. Knickerbocker:

The Kaatsberg, or Catskill Mountains, have always been a region full of fable. The Indians considered them the abode of spirits, who influenced Frederick Barbarossa (red-beard), 1123-1100, emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, according to old legend sits asleep beside a marble table in the interior of the Kyffhäuser Mountain in Thuringia, Germany, surrounded by his knights and awaiting the day when he shall lead the Germans against their enemies. the weather, spreading sunshine or clouds over the landscape, and sending good or bad hunting sea-They were ruled by an old squaw spirit, said to be their mother. She dwelt on the highest peak of the Catskills, and had charge of the doors of day and night to open and shut them at the proper hour. She hung up the new moons in the skies, and cut up the old ones into stars. In times of drought, if properly propitiated, she would spin light summer clouds out of cobwebs and morning dew, and send them off from the crest of the mountain, flake after flake, like flakes of carded cotton, to float in the air; until, dissolved by the heat of the sun, they would fall in gentle showers, causing the grass to spring, the fruits to ripen, and the corn to grow an inch an hour. If displeased, however, she would brew up clouds black as ink, sitting in the midst of them like a bottle-bellied spider in the midst of its web; and when these clouds broke, woe betide the valleys!

In old times, say the Indian traditions, there was a kind of Manitou or Spirit, who kept about the wildest recesses of the Catskill Mountains, and took a mischievous pleasure in wreaking all kinds of evils and vexations upon the red men. Sometimes he would assume the form of a bear, a panther, or a deer, lead the bewildered hunter a weary chase through tangled forests and among ragged rocks; and then spring off with a loud ho! ho! leaving him aghast on the brink of a beetling precipice or raging torrent.

The favorite abode of this Manitou is still shown. It is a great rock or cliff on the loneliest part of the mountains, and, from the flowering vines which clamber about it, and the wild flowers which abound in its neighborhood, is known by the name of the Garden Rock. Near the foot of it is a small lake, the haunt of the solitary bittern, with water-snakes basking in the sun on the leaves of the pond-lilies which lie on the surface. This place was held in great awe by the Indians, insomuch that the boldest hunter would not pursue his game within its precincts. Once upon a time, however, a hunter, who had lost his way, penetrated to the Garden Rock, where he beheld a number of gourds placed in the crotches of trees. One of these he seized and made off with it, but in the hurry of his retreat he let it fall among the rocks when a great stream gushed forth, which washed him away and swept him down precipices, where he was dashed to pieces, and the stream made its way to the Hudson, and continues to flow to the present day; being the identical stream known by the name of the Kaaters-kill.

1818-19 1819

CHRISTMAS EVE

Saint Francis and Saint Benedight Blesse this house from wicked wight; From the night-mare and the goblin, That is hight good fellow Robin; Keep it from all evil spirits, Fairies, weezels, rats, and ferrets:
From curfew time
To the next prime.

CARTWRIGHT.

It was a brilliant moonlight night, but extremely cold: our chaise whirled rapidly over the frozen ground; the postboy smacked his whip incessantly, and a part of the time his horses were on a gallop. "He knows where he is going," said my companion, 1 laughing, "and is eager to arrive in time for some of the merriment and good cheer of the servants' hall. My father, you must know, is a bigoted devotee of the old school, and prides himself upon keeping up something of old English hospitality. He is a tolerable specimen of what you will rarely meet with nowadays in its purity, the old English country gentleman; for our men of fortune spend so much of their time in town, and fashion is carried so much into the country, that the strong rich peculiarities of ancient rural life are almost polished away. My father, however, from early years took honest Peacham 2 for his text-book, instead of Chesterfield; 3 he determined in his own mind that there was no condition more truly honorable and enviable than that of a country gentleman on his paternal lands, and therefore passes the whole of his time on his estate. He is a strenuous advocate for the revival of the old rural games and holiday observances, and is deeply read in the writers, ancient and modern, who have treated on the subject. Indeed his favorite range of reading is among the authors who flourished at least two centuries since; who, he insists, wrote and thought more like true Englishmen than any of their successors. He even regrets sometimes that he had not been born a few centuries earlier, when England was itself, and had its peculiar manners and customs. As he lives at some distance from the main road, in rather a lonely part of the country, without any rival gentry near him, he has that most enviable of all blessings to an Englishman, an opportunity of indulging the bent of his own humor without molestation. Being representative of the oldest family in the neighborhood, and a great part of the peasantry being his tenants, he is much looked up to, and, in general, is known simply by the appellation of author of The Complete Gentleman, 1622

Philip Stanhope, fourth Earl of Chesterfield, 16041773, the "mirror of politeness"

&lt;sup>1</sup> Irving by chance had met at an inn his former traveling acquaintance, Frank Bracebridge, who had invited him to spend the Christmas at Bracebridge Hall.

'The Squire'; a title which has been accorded to the head of the family since time immemorial. I think it best to give you these hints about my worthy old father, to prepare you for any eccentricities that might otherwise appear absurd."

We had passed for some time along the wall of a park, and at length the chaise stopped at the gate. It was in a heavy magnificent old style, of iron bars, fancifully wrought at top into flourishes and flowers. The huge square columns that supported the gate were surmounted by the family crest. Close adjoining was the porter's lodge, sheltered under dark fir trees, and almost buried in shrubbery.

The postboy rang a large porter's bell, which resounded through the still, frosty air, and was answered by the distant barking of dogs, with which the mansion-house seemed garrisoned. An old woman immediately appeared at the gate. As the moonlight fell strongly upon her, I had a full view of a little primitive dame, dressed very much in the antique taste, with a neat kerchief and stomacher, and her silver hair peeping from under a cap of snowy whiteness. She came courtseying forth, with many expressions of simple joy at seeing her young master. Her husband, it seemed, was up at the house keeping Christmas eve in the servants' hall; they could not do without him, as he was the best hand at a song and story in the household

My friend proposed that we should alight and walk through the park to the hall, which was at no great distance, while the chaise should follow on. Our road wound through a noble avenue of trees, among the naked branches of which the moon glittered, as she rolled through the deep vault of a cloudless sky. The lawn beyond was sheeted with a slight covering of snow, which here and there sparkled as the moonbeams caught a frosty crystal; and at a distance might be seen a thin transparent vapor, stealing up from the low grounds, and threatening gradually to shroud the landscape.

My companion looked around him with transport: "How often," said he, "have I scampered up this avenue, on returning home on school vacations! How often have I played under these trees when a boy! I feel a degree of filial reverence for them, as we look up to those who have cherished us in childhood. My father was always scrupulous in exacting our holidays, and having us around him on family festivals. He used to direct and superintend our games with the strictness that some parents do the studies of their children. He was very particular that we should play the old English games according to their original form; and consulted old books for precedent and authority for every 'merrie disport'; yet I assure you there never was pedantry so delightful. It was the policy of the good old gentleman to make his children feel that home was the happiest place in the world; and I value this delicious home-feeling as one of the choicest gifts a parent could bestow."

We were interrupted by the clamor of a troop of dogs of all sorts and sizes, "mongrel, puppy, whelp, and hound, and curs of low degree," I that, disturbed by the ring of the porter's bell and the rattling of the chaise, came bounding, open-mouthed, across the lawn.

The little dogs and all,
Tray, Blanch, and Sweetheart, see, they bark at me! 2

cried Bracebridge, laughing. At the sound of his voice, the bark was changed into a yelp of delight, and in a moment he was surrounded and almost overpowered by the caresses of the faithful animals

We had now come in full view of the old family mansion, partly thrown in deep shadow, and partly lit up by the cool moonshine. It was an irregular building, of some magnitude, and seemed to be of the architecture of different periods. One wing was evidently very ancient, with heavy stone-shafted bow windows jutting out and overrun with ivy, from among the foliage of which the small diamond-shaped panes of glass glittered with the moonbeams. The rest of the house was in the French taste of Charles the Second's time, having been repaired and altered, as my friend told me, by one of his ancestors, who returned with that monarch at the Restoration. The grounds about the house were laid out in the old formal manner of artificial flower-beds, clipped shrubberies, raised terraces, and heavy stone balustrades, ornamented with urns, a leaden statue or two, and a jet of water. The old gentleman, I was told, was extremely careful to preserve this obsolete finery in all its original state. He admired this fashion in gardening; it had an air of magnificence, was courtly and noble, and befitting good old family style. The boasted imitation of nature in modern gardening had sprung up with modern republican notions, but did not suit a monarchical government; it from "Elegy on a Mad Dog" in Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield Shakespeare, King Lear, III, vi, 60

smacked of the leveling system.—I could not help smiling at this introduction of politics into gardening, though I expressed some apprehension that I should find the old gentleman rather intolerant in his creed.—Frank assured me, however, that it was almost the only instance in which he had ever heard his father meddle with politics; and he believed that he got this notion from a member of Parliament who once passed a few weeks with him. The Squire was glad of any argument to defend his clipped yewtrees and formal terraces, which had been occasionally attacked by modern landscape gardeners.

As we approached the house, we heard the sound of music, and now and then a burst of laughter, from one end of the building. This, Bracebridge said, must proceed from the servants' hall, where a great deal of revelry was permitted, and even encouraged by the Squire, throughout the twelve days of Christmas, provided everything was done conformably to ancient usage. Here were kept up the old games of hoodman blind, shoe the wild mare, hot cockles, steal the white loaf, bob apples, and snap dragon: the Yule clog <sup>1</sup> and Christmas candle were regularly burnt, and the mistletoe, with its white berries, hung up, to the imminent peril of all the pretty housemaids.

So intent were the servants upon their sports that we had to ring repeatedly before we could make ourselves heard. On our arrival being announced, the Squire came out to receive us, accompanied by his two other sons: one a young officer in the army, home on leave of absence; the other an Oxonian, just from the university. The Squire was a fine, healthy-looking old gentleman, with silver hair curling lightly round an open florid countenance; in which the physiognomist, with the advantage, like myself, of a previous hint or two, might discover a singular mixture of whim and benevolence.

The family meeting was warm and affectionate: as the evening was far advanced, the Squire would not permit us to change our traveling dresses, but ushered us at once to the company, which was assembled in a large old-fashioned hall. It was composed of different branches of a numerous family connection, where there were the usual proportion of old uncles and aunts, comfortable married dames, superannuated spinsters, blooming country cousins, half-fledged striplings, and bright-eyed boarding-school hoydens. They were variously occupied: some at a round game of cards; others conversing around the hireplace; at one end of the hall was a group of the young folks, some nearly grown up, others of a more tender and budding age, fully engrossed by a merry game; and a profusion of wooden horses, penny trumpets, and tattered dolls, about the floor, showed traces of a troop of little fairy beings who, having frolicked through a happy day, had been carried off to slumber through a peaceful night.

While the mutual greetings were going on between young Bracebridge and his relatives. I had time to scan the apartment. I have called it a hall, for so it had certainly been in old times, and the Squire had evidently endeavored to restore it to something of its primitive state. Over the heavy projecting fireplace was suspended a picture of a warrior in armor, standing by a white horse, and on the opposite wall hung a helmet, buckler, and lance. At one end an enormous pair of antlers were inserted in the wall, the branches serving as hooks on which to suspend hats, whips, and spurs: and in the corners of the apartment were fowlingpieces, fishing-rods, and other sporting imple-The furniture was of the cumbrous ments. workmanship of former days, though some articles of modern convenience had been added. and the oaken floor had been carpeted; so that the whole presented an odd mixture of parlor and hall.

The grate had been removed from the wide overwhelming fireplace, to make way for a fire of wood, in the midst of which was an enormous log glowing and blazing, and sending forth a vast volume of light and heat: this I understood was the Yule clog, which the Squire was particular in having brought in and illumined on a Christmas eve, according to ancient custom.

It was really delightful to see the old Squire seated in his hereditary elbow-chair, by the hospitable fireside of his ancestors, and looking around him like the sun of a system, beaming warmth and gladness to every heart. Even the very dog that lay stretched at his feet, as he lazily shifted his position and yawned, would look fondly up in his master's face, wag his tail against the floor, and stretch himself again to sleep, confident of kindness and protection. There is an emanation from the heart in genuine hospitality which cannot be described, but is immediately felt, and puts the stranger at once at his ease. I had not been seated many minutes by the comfortable hearth of the worthy old cavalier, before I found myself as the log which must be kept burning all through Christmas night or ill-luck will come upon the house much at home as if I had been one of the family.

Supper was announced shortly after our arrival. It was served up in a spacious oaken chamber, the panels of which shone with wax, and around which were several family portraits decorated with holly and ivy. Besides the accustomed lights, two great wax tapers, called Christmas candles, wreathed with greens, were placed on a highly-polished beaufet among the family plate. The table was abundantly spread with substantial fare; but the Squire made his supper of frumenty, a dish made of wheat-cakes boiled in milk, with rich spices, being a standing dish in old times for Christmas eve.

I was happy to find my old friend, minced pie, in the retinue of the feast; and finding him to be perfectly orthodox, and that I need not be ashamed of my predilection, I greeted him with all the warmth wherewith we usually greet an old and very genteel acquaintance.

The mirth of the company was greatly promoted by the humors of an eccentric personage whom Mr. Bracebridge always addressed with the quaint appellation of Master Simon. He was a tight brisk little man, with the air of an arrant old bachelor. His nose was shaped like the bill of a parrot; his face slightly pitted with the smallpox, with a dry perpetual bloom on it, like a frost-bitten leaf in autumn. He had an eye of great quickness and vivacity, with a drollery and lurking waggery of expression that was irresistible. He was evidently the wit of the family, dealing very much in sly jokes and innuendoes with the ladies, and making infinite merriment by harping upon old themes; which, unfortunately, my ignorance of the family chronicles did not permit me to enjoy. It seemed to be his great delight during supper to keep a young girl next him in a continual agony of stifled laughter, in spite of her awe of the reproving looks of her mother, who sat opposite. Indeed, he was the idol of the younger part of the company, who laughed at everything he said or did, and at every turn of his countenance: I could not wonder at it, for he must have been a miracle of accomplishments in their eyes. He could imitate Punch and Judy; make an old woman of his hand, with the assistance of a burnt cork and pockethandkerchief; and cut an orange into such a ludicrous caricature, that the young folks were ready to die with laughing.

I was let briefly into his history by Frank Bracebridge. He was an old bachelor, of a small independent income, which, by careful management, was sufficient for all his wants.

He revolved through the family system like a vagrant comet in its orbit: sometimes visiting one branch, and sometimes another quite remote: as is often the case with gentlemen of extensive connections and small fortunes in England. He had a chirping buoyant disposition, always enjoying the present moment; and his frequent change of scene and company prevented his acquiring those rusty unaccommodating habits, with which old bachelors are so uncharitably charged. He was a complete family chronicle, being versed in the genealogy. history, and intermarriages of the whole house of Bracebridge, which made him a great favorite with the old folks: he was a beau of all the elder ladies and superannuated spinsters, among whom he was habitually considered rather a young fellow, and he was master of the revels among the children: so that there was not a more popular being in the sphere in which he moved than Mr. Simon Bracebridge. Of late years, he had resided almost entirely with the Squire, to whom he had become a factorum. and whom he particularly delighted by jumping with his humor in respect to old times, and by having a scrap of an old song to suit every occasion. We had presently a specimen of his last-mentioned talent: for no sooner was supper removed, and spiced wines and other beverages peculiar to the season introduced. than Master Simon was called on for a good old Christmas song. He bethought himself for a moment, and then, with a sparkle of the eve. and a voice that was by no means bad, excepting that it ran occasionally into a falsetto, like the notes of a split reed, he quavered forth a quaint old ditty.

Now Christmas is come,
Let us beat up the drum,
And call all our neighbors together,
And when they appear,
Let us make them such cheer,
As will keep out the wind and the weather, etc.

The supper had disposed everyone to gayety, and an old harper was summoned from the servants' hall, where he had been strumming all the evening, and to all appearance comforting himself with some of the Squire's homebrewed. He was a kind of hanger-on, I was told, of the establishment, and, though ostensibly a resident of the village, was oftener to be found in the Squire's kitchen than his own home, the old gentleman being fond of the sound of "harp in hall."

The dance, like most dances after supper, was a merry one; some of the older folks joined in it, and the Squire himself figured down several couple with a partner, with whom he affirmed he had danced at every Christmas for nearly half a century. Master Simon, who seemed to be a kind of connecting link between the old times and the new, and to be withal a little antiquated in the taste of his accomplishments, evidently piqued himself on his dancing, and was endeavoring to gain credit by the heel and toe, rigadoon, and other graces of the ancient school; but he had unluckily assorted himself with a little romping girl from boarding-school, who, by her wild vivacity, kept him continually on the stretch, and defeated all his sober attempts at elegance:—such are the ill-assorted matches to which antique gentlemen are unfortunately prone!

The young Oxonian, on the contrary, had led out one of his maiden aunts, on whom the rogue played a thousand little knaveries with impunity: he was full of practical jokes, and his delight was to tease his aunts and cousins; yet, like all madcap youngsters, he was a universal favorite among the women. The most interesting couple in the dance was the young officer and a ward of the Squire's, a beautiful blushing girl of seventeen. From several shy glances which I had noticed in the course of the evening. I suspected there was a little kindness growing up between them; and, indeed, the young soldier was just the hero to captivate a romantic girl. He was tall, slender, and handsome, and, like most young British officers of late years, had picked up various small accomplishments on the continent;—he could talk French and Italian-draw landscapes-sing very tolerably-dance divinely; but, above all, he had been wounded at Waterloo:--what girl of seventeen, well read in poetry and romance. could resist such a mirror of chivalry and perfection!

The moment the dance was over, he caught up a guitar and, lolling against the old marble fireplace, in an attitude which I am half inclined to suspect, was studied, began the little French air of the Troubadour. 1 The Squire, however, exclaimed against having anything on Christmas eve but good old English; upon which the young minstrel, casting up his eye for a moment, as if in an effort of memory, struck into another strain, and, with a charming air of gallantry, gave Herrick's 2 Night-piece, to Julia.

Her eyes the glow-worm lend thee; The shooting stars attend thee, And the elves also, Whose little eyes glow Like the sparks of fire, befriend thee.

No Will-o'-the-Wisp mislight thee: Nor snake nor slow-worm bite thee: But on, on thy way, Not making a stay, Since ghost there is none to affright thee.

Then let not the dark thee cumber; What though the moon does slumber, The stars of the night Will lend thee their light, Like tapers clear without number.

Then, Julia, let me woo thee, Thus, thus to come unto me: And when I shall meet Thy silvery feet, My soul I'll pour into thee.

The song might or might not have been intended in compliment to the fair Julia, for so I found his partner was called; she, however. was certainly unconscious of any such application, for she never looked at the singer, but kept her eyes cast upon the floor. Her face was suffused, it is true, with a beautiful blush. and there was a gentle heaving of the bosom. but all that was doubtless caused by the exercise of the dance; indeed, so great was her indifference, that she amused herself with plucking to pieces a choice bouquet of hot-house flowers, and by the time the song was concluded the nosegay lay in ruins on the floor.

The party now broke up for the night with the kind-hearted old custom of shaking hands. As I passed through the hall, on my way to my chamber, the dying embers of the Yule clog still sent forth a dusky glow, and had it not been the season when "no spirit dares stir abroad," I should have been half tempted to steal from my room at midnight, and peep whether the fairies might not be at their revels about the hearth.

My chamber was in the old part of the mansion, the ponderous furniture of which might have been fabricated in the days of the giants. The room was paneled with cornices of heavy carved work, in which flowers and grotesque faces were strangely intermingled; and a row of black-looking portraits stared mournfully at me from the walls. The bed was of rich, though faded damask, with a lofty tester, 3 and stood in a niche opposite a bow window. I had scarcely got into bed when a strain of music

The Troubadours were poets of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries who used the Langue d'Oc, the language of southern France.
 Robert Herrick, 1501-1674, an English poet

s canony

seemed to break forth in the air just below the window. I listened, and found it proceeded from a band, which I concluded to be the waits 1 from some neighboring village. They went round the house, playing under the windows. I drew aside the curtains to hear them more distinctly. The moonbeams fell through the upper part of the casement, partially lighting up the antiquated apartment. The sounds. as they receded, became more soft and aërial, and seemed to accord with the quiet and moonlight. I listened and listened.—they became more and more tender and remote, and, as they gradually died away, my head sunk upon the pillow, and I fell asleep.

1819

From THE ALHAMBRA 2 From PALACE OF THE ALHAMBRA

To the traveler imbued with a feeling for the historical and poetical, so inseparably intertwined in the annals of romantic Spain, the Alhambra is as much an object of devotion as is the Caaba 3 to all true Moslems. How many legends and traditions, true and fabulous,—how many songs and ballads, Arabian and Spanish, of love and war and chivalry, are associated with this Oriental pile! It was the royal abode of the Moorish kings, where, surrounded with the splendors and refinements of Asiatic luxury. they held dominion over what they vaunted as a terrestrial paradise, and made their last stand for empire in Spain. The royal palace forms but a part of a fortress, the walls of which, studded with towers, stretch irregularly round the whole crest of a hill, a spur of the Sierra Nevada or Snowy Mountains, and overlook the city; externally it is a rude congregation of towers and battlements, with no regularity of plan nor grace of architecture, and giving little promise of the grace and beauty which prevail within.

1 Christmas serenaders

Irving, while attaché of the American legation at Madrid, lived during some months of 1829 in the Alhambra, as The Alhambra narrates.

3 the Kaaba at Mecca, the most sacred Moslem shrine

In the time of the Moors the fortress was capable of containing within its outward precincts an army of forty thousand men, and served occasionally as a stronghold of the sovereigns against their rebellious subjects. After the kingdom has passed into the hands of the Christians, the Alhambra continued to be a royal demesne, and was occasionally inhabited by the Castilian monarchs. The emperor Charles V4 commenced a sumptuous palace within its walls, but was deterred from completing it by repeated shocks of earthquakes. The last royal residents were Philip V. and his beautiful queen. Elizabetta of Parma, early in the eighteenth century. Great preparations were made for their reception. The palace and gardens were placed in a state of repair, and a new suite of apartments erected, and decorated by artists brought from Italy. The soiourn of the sovereigns was transient, and after their departure the palace once more became desolate. Still the place was maintained with some military state. The governor held it immediately from the crown: its jurisdiction extended down into the suburbs of the city, and was independent of the captain-general of Granada. 5 A considerable garrison was kept up; the governor had his apartments in the front of the old Moorish palace, and never descended into Granada without some military parade. The fortress, in fact, was a little town of itself, having several streets of houses within its walls, together with a Franciscan convent and a parochial church.

The desertion of the court, however, was a fatal blow to the Alhambra. Its beautiful halls became desolate, and some of them fell to ruin: the gardens were destroyed, and the fountains ceased to play. By degrees the dwellings became filled with a loose and lawless population: contrabandistas, 6 who availed themselves of its independent jurisdiction to carry on a wide and daring course of smuggling, and thieves and rogues of all sorts, who made this their place of refuge whence they might depredate upon Granada and its vicinity. The strong arm of government at length interfered; the whole community was thoroughly sifted; none were suffered to remain but such as were of honest character, and had legitimate right to a

<sup>6</sup> smugglers

&lt;sup>2</sup> The Alhambra, a fortress begun by Moorish kings in the twelfth century on a hill overlooking Granada, was the last foothold of the Moors in Spain, and still stands as the visible emblem of the former Moslem empire in Europe. The Moors entered Coping in the sighth contagn. Spain in the eighth century, quickly overcame the Gothic kingdom of some three centuries' standing, and maintained a civilization that in many respects was the most enlightened in medieval Europe. Science, literature, and philosophy were encouraged. From the twelfth century the Moorish power declined until in the fifteenth century Granada, which had attained great influence and splendor, was the only remaining city of the Moors; and this, rent by internal feuds, at length fell to Ferdinand and Isabella in 1492.

<sup>4</sup> Charles V, 1500-1558, grandson of Ferdinand and Isabella, ruler of the Holy Roman Empire, Spain, The Netherlands, Mexico, and Peru, was the most powerful monarch of his time in Europe. In 1555 he gave up Spain and Netherlands to his son Philip; and in 1557 he abdicated the throne of the Empire in favor of his brother Ferdinand. His equestrian portrait by Titian is famous.

5 chief official of the province of Granada residence; the greater part of the houses were demolished and a mere hamlet left, with the parochial church and the Franciscan convent. During the recent troubles in Spain, when Granada was in the hands of the French. 1 the Alhambra was garrisoned by their troops, and the palace was occasionally inhabited by the French commander. With that enlightened taste which has ever distinguished the French nation in their conquests, this monument of Moorish elegance and grandeur was rescued from the absolute ruin and desolation that were The roofs were repaired, overwhelming it. the saloons and galleries protected from the weather, the gardens cultivated, the water courses restored, the fountains once more made to throw up their sparkling showers; and Spain may thank her invaders for having preserved to her the most beautiful and interesting of her historical monuments.

8 smugglers

On the departure of the French they blew up several towers of the outer wall, and left the fortifications scarcely tenable. Since that time the military importance of the post is at an end. The garrison is a handful of invalid soldiers, whose principal duty is to guard some of the outer towers, which serve occasionally as a prison of state; and the governor, abandoning the lofty hill of the Alhambra, resides in the center of Granada, for the more convenient dispatch of his official duties. I cannot conclude this brief notice of the state of the fortress without bearing testimony to the honorable exertions of its present commander, 2 Don Francisco de Serna, who is tasking all the limited resources at his command to put the palace in a state of repair, and by his judicious precautions has for some time arrested its too certain decay. Had his predecessors discharged the duties of their station with equal fidelity, the Alhambra might yet have remained in almost its pristine beauty; were government to second him with means equal to his zeal, this relic of it might still be preserved for many generations to adorn the land, and attract the curious and enlightened of every clime.

Our first object of course, on the morning after our arrival, was a visit to this timehonored edifice; it has been so often, however, and so minutely described by travelers, that I shall not undertake to give a comprehensive and elaborate account of it, but merely occasional sketches of parts, with the incidents and associations connected with them.

While waiting for admittance, our selfimposed cicerone. 3 Mateo Ximenes, informed us that the royal palace was intrusted to the care of a worthy old maiden dame called Doña Antonia-Molina, but who, according to Spanish custom, went by the more neighborly appellation of Tia Antonia (Aunt Antonia), who maintained the Moorish halls and gardens in order and showed them to strangers. While we were talking, the door was opened by a plump little black-eyed Andalusian damsel, whom Mateo addressed as Dolores, but who from her bright looks and cheerful disposition evidently merited a merrier name. 4 Mateo informed me in a whisper that she was the niece of Tia Antonia, and I found she was the good fairy who was to conduct us through the enchanted palace. Under her guidance we crossed the threshold. and were at once transported, as if by magic wand, into other times and an oriental realm, and were treading the scenes of Arabian story. Nothing could be in greater contrast than the unpromising exterior of the pile with the scene now before us. We found ourselves in a vast patio or court, one hundred and fifty feet in length, and upwards of eighty feet in breadth, paved with white marble, and decorated at each end with light Moorish peristyles, 5 one of which supported an elegant gallery of fretted architecture. Along the moldings of the cornices and on various parts of the walls were escutcheons and ciphers, and cufic 6 and Arabic characters in high relief, repeating the pious mottoes of the Moslem monarchs, the builders of the Alhambra, or extolling their grandeur and munificence. Along the center of the court extended an immense basin or tank (estangue), a hundred and twenty-four feet in length, twentyseven in breadth, and five in depth, receiving its water from two marble vases. Hence it is called the Court of the Alberca (from al Beerkah, the Arabic for a pond or tank). Great numbers of gold-fish were to be seen gleaming through the waters of the basin, and it was bordered by hedges of roses.

Passing from the court of the Alberca under a Moorish archway, we entered the renowned court of Lions. No part of the edifice gives a more complete idea of its original beauty than this, for none has suffered so little from the ravages of time. In the center stands the fountain famous in song and story. The alabaster basins still shed their diamond drops; the

<sup>1</sup> during the Napoleonic wars <sup>2</sup> in 1829

Mateo was born within the old palace and called himself a legitimate son of the Alhambra.
 Dolores means "sorrows." * rows of columns from Cufa or Kufa, an old city on the Euphrates noted for expert reproductions of the Koran twelve lions which support them, and give the court its name, still cast forth crystal streams as in the days of Boabdil. 1 The lions, however, are unworthy of their fame, being of miserable sculpture, the work probably of some Christian captive. The court is laid out in flower-beds, instead of its ancient and appropriate pavement of tiles or marble; the alteration, an instance of bad taste, was made by the French when in possession of Granada. Round the four sides of the court are light Arabian arcades of open filigree work, supported by slender pillars of white marble, which it is supposed were originally gilded. The architecture. like that in most parts of the interior of the palace. is characterized by elegance rather than grandeur, bespeaking a delicate and graceful taste, and a disposition to indolent enjoyment. When one looks upon the fairy traces of the peristyles, and the apparently fragile fretwork of the walls, it is difficult to believe that so much has survived the wear and tear of centuries, the shocks of earthquakes, the violence of war, and the quiet, though no less baneful, pilferings of the tasteful traveler: it is almost sufficient to excuse the popular tradition, that the whole is protected by a magic charm.

On one side of the court a rich portal opens into the Hall of the Abencerrages: 2 so called from the gallant cavaliers of that illustrious line who were here perfidiously massacred. There are some who doubt the whole story, but our humble cicerone Mateo pointed out the very wicket of the portal through which they were introduced one by one into the court of Lions. and the white marble fountain in the center of the hall beside which they were beheaded. He showed us also certain broad ruddy stains on the pavement, traces of their blood, which, according to popular belief, can never be effaced.

Immediately opposite the hall of the Abencerrages, a portal, richly adorned, leads into a hall of less tragical associations. It is light and lofty, exquisitely graceful in its architecture, paved with white marble, and bears the suggestive name of the Hall of the Two Sisters. Some destroy the romance of the name by attributing it to two enormous slabs of alabaster which lie side by side, and form a great part of the pavement: an opinion strongly supported by Mateo Ximenes. Others are disposed to give the name a more poetical significance, as the vague memorial of Moorish beauties who once graced this hall, which was evidently a part of the royal harem. This opinion I was happy to find entertained by our little brighteved guide. Dolores, who pointed to a balcony over an inner porch; which gallery, she had been told, belonged to the women's apartment. "You see, señor," said she, "it is all grated and latticed, like the gallery in a convent chapel where the nuns hear mass; for the Moorish kings," added she, indignantly, "shut up their wives just like nuns."

The latticed "jalousies," in fact, still remain, whence the dark-eved beauties of the harem might gaze unseen upon the zambras 3 and other dances and entertainments of the hall below.

On each side of this hall are recesses or alcoves for ottomans and couches, on which the voluptuous lords of the Alhambra indulged in that dreamy repose so dear to the Orientalists. A cupola or lantern admits a tempered light from above and a free circulation of air; while on one side is heard the refreshing sound of waters from the fountain of the lions, and on the other side the soft plash from the basin in the garden of Lindaraxa.

It is impossible to contemplate this scene. so perfectly Oriental, without feeling the early associations of Arabian romance, and almost expecting to see the white arm of some mysterious princess beckoning from the gallery, or some dark eye sparkling through the lattice. The abode of beauty is here as if it had been inhabited but yesterday; but where are the two sisters, where the Zoraydas and Lindaraxas! 4

An abundant supply of water, brought from the mountains by old Moorish aqueducts, circulates throughout the palace, supplying its baths and fish-pools, sparkling in jets within its halls or murmuring in channels along the marble pavements. When it has paid its tribute to the royal pile, and visited its gardens and parterres, it flows down the long avenue leading to the city, tinkling in rills, gushing in fountains, and maintaining a perpetual verdure in those groves that embower and beautify the whole hill of the Alhambra.

Those only who have so journed in the ardent climates of the South can appreciate the delights of an abode combining the breezy coolness of the mountain with the freshness and verdure of the valley. While the city below

Boabdil (called El Chico, the little) was the last Moorish sovereign of Granada.
 A Moorish tribal family of Granada at feud with the Zegrys; its warriors are supposed to have been massacred under King Abu Hassan toward the close of the Moorish dynasty.

&lt;sup>2</sup> feasts, merrymakings <sup>4</sup> Legendary beauties of the Moorish court; see The Mysterious Chambers, p. 205.

pants with the noontide heat, and the parched Vega <sup>1</sup> trembles to the eye, the delicate airs from the Sierra Nevada play through these lofty halls, bringing with them the sweetness of the surrounding gardens. Everything invites to that indolent repose, the bliss of southern climes; and while the half-shut eye looks out from shaded balconies upon the glittering land-scape, the ear is lulled by the rustling of groves and the murmur of running streams.

. . . . . . .

From THE HALL OF AMBASSADORS

In one of my visits to the old Moorish chamber where the good Tia Antonia cooks her dinner and receives her company, I observed a mysterious door in one corner, leading apparently into the ancient part of the edifice. My curiosity being aroused, I opened it, and found myself in a narrow, blind corridor, groping along which I came to the head of a dark winding staircase, leading down an angle of the tower of Comares. 2 Down this staircase I descended darkling, guiding myself by the wall, until I came to a small door at the bottom. throwing which open, I was suddenly dazzled by emerging into the brilliant antechamber of the Hall of Ambassadors; with the fountain of the court of the Alberca sparkling before me. The antechamber is separated from the court by an elegant gallery, supported by slender columns with spandrels 3 of open work in the Morisco style. At each end of the antechamber are alcoves, and its ceiling is richly stuccoed and painted. Passing through a magnificent portal, I found myself in the far-famed Hall of Ambassadors, the audience chamber of the Moslem monarchs. It is said to be thirty-seven feet square, and sixty feet high; occupies the whole interior of the Tower of Comares; and still bears the traces of past magnificence. The walls are beautifully stuccoed and decorated with Morisco fancifulness; the lofty ceiling was originally of the same favorite material, with the usual frostwork and pensile 4 ornaments or stalactites; which, with the embellishments of vivid coloring and gilding, must have been gorgeous in the extreme. Unfortunately it gave way during an earthquake, and brought down with it an immense arch which traversed the hall. It was replaced by the present vault or

<sup>1</sup> plain, lowland
<sup>2</sup> A heavy tower of the fortress; it contains the Hall of the Ambassadors,

4 hanging

dome of larch or cedar, with intersecting ribs, the whole curiously wrought and richly colored; still Oriental in its character, reminding one of "those ceilings of cedar and vermilion that we read of in the Prophets and the Arabian Nights."

From the great height of the vault above the windows, the upper part of the hall is almost lost in obscurity; yet there is a magnificence as well as solemnity in the gloom, as through it we have gleams of rich gilding and the brilliant tints of the Moorish pencil.

The royal throne was placed opposite the entrance in a recess, which still bears an inscription intimating that Yusef I5 (the monarch who completed the Alhambra) made this the throne of his empire. Everything in this noble hall seems to have been calculated to surround the throne with impressive dignity and splendor: there was none of the elegant voluptuousness which reigns in other parts of the palace. The tower is of massive strength, domineering over the whole edifice and overhanging the steep hillside. On three sides of the Hall of Ambassadors are windows cut through the immense thickness of the walls, and commanding extensive prospects. The balcony of the central window especially looks down upon the verdant valley of the Darro, with its walks, its groves. and gardens. To the left it enjoys a distant prospect of the Vega; while directly in front rises the rival height of the Albaycin, with its medley of streets, and terraces, and gardens, and once crowned by a fortress that vied in power with the Alhambra. "Ill fated the man who lost all this!" exclaimed Charles V., as he looked forth from his window upon the enchanting scenery it commands.

The balcony of the window where this royal exclamation was made, has of late become one of my favorite resorts. I have just been seated there, enjoying the close of a long brilliant day. The sun, as he sank behind the purple mountains of Alhama, sent a stream of effulgence up the valley of the Darro, that spread a melancholy pomp over the ruddy towers of the Alhambra; while the Vega, covered with a slight sultry vapor that caught the setting ray, seemed spread out in the distance like a golden sea. Not a breath of air disturbed the stillness of the hour, and though the faint sound of music and merriment now and then rose from the gardens of the Darro, it but rendered more impressive the monumental silence of the pile which overshadowed me. It was one of those hours and scenes in which memory asserts an almost magical power; and, like the evening sun beaming on these moldering towers, sends back her retrospective rays to light up the glories of the past.

<sup>3</sup> in a wall pierced by arches, as here, the flat spaces between the arches themselves; or the wall just outside the curve of an arch piercing it

&lt;sup>5</sup> Yusef succeeded to the throne in 1333.

THE MYSTERIOUS CHAMBERS

As I was rambling one day about the Moorish halls, my attention was, for the first time, attracted to a door in a remote gallery, communicating apparently with some part of the Alhambra which I had not yet explored. I attempted to open it, but it was locked. knocked, but no one answered, and the sound seemed to reverberate through empty chambers. Here then was a mystery. Here was the haunted wing of the castle. How was I to get at the dark secrets here shut up from the public eye? Should I come privately at night with lamp and sword, according to the prying custom of heroes of romance; or should I endeavor to draw the secret from Pépe the stuttering gardener; or the ingenuous Dolores, or the loquacious Mateo? Or should I go frankly and openly to Dame Antonia the chatelaine. and ask her about it? I chose the latter course, as being the simplest though the least romantic: and found, somewhat to my disappointment, that there was no mystery in the case. I was welcome to explore the apartment, and there was the kev.

Thus provided. I returned forthwith to the door. It opened, as I had surmised, to a range of vacant chambers; but they were quite different from the rest of the palace. The architecture, though rich and antiquated, was European. There was nothing Moorish about it. The first two rooms were lofty; the ceilings, broken in many places, were of cedar, deeply paneled and skilfully carved with fruits and flowers, intermingled with grotesque masks or faces.

The walls had evidently in ancient times been hung with damask; but now were naked, and scrawled over by that class of aspiring travelers who defile noble monuments with their worthless names. The windows, dismantled and open to wind and weather, looked out into a charming little secluded garden, where an alabaster fountain sparkled among roses and myrtles, and was surrounded by orange and citron trees, some of which flung their branches into the chambers. Beyond these rooms were two saloons, longer but less lofty, looking also into the garden. In the compartments of the paneled ceilings were baskets of fruit and garlands of flowers, painted by no mean hand, and in tolerable preservation. The walls also had been painted in fresco in the Italian style, but the paintings were nearly obliterated; the windows were in the same shattered state with those of the other chambers. This fanciful suite of rooms terminated in an open gallery with balustrades, running at right angles along another side of the garden. The whole apartment, so delicate and elegant in its decorations, so choice and sequestered in its situation along this retired little garden, and so different in architecture from the neighboring halls, awakened an interest in its history. I found on inquiry that it was an apartment fitted up by Italian artists in the early part of the last century, at the time when Philip V. and his second wife, the beautiful Elizabetta of Farnese, daughter of the Duke of Parma, were expected at the Alhambra. It was destined for the queen and the ladies of her train. One of the loftiest chambers had been her sleeping-room. A narrow staircase, now walled up, led up to a delightful belvidere, originally a mirador 1 of the Moorish sultanas. communicating with the harem; but which was fitted up as a boudoir for the fair Elizabetta, and still retains the name of el tocador de la reyna, or the queen's toilette.

One window of the royal sleeping-room commanded a prospect of the Generalife 2 and its embowered terraces; another looked out into the little secluded garden I have mentioned, which was decidedly Moorish in its character, and also had its history. It was in fact the garden of Lindaraxa, so often mentioned in descriptions of the Alhambra; but who this Lindaraxa was I had never heard explained. A little research gave me the few particulars known about her. She was a Moorish beauty who flourished in the court of Muhamed the Left-Handed, 3 and was the daughter of his loyal adherent, the alcayde of Malaga, who sheltered him in his city when driven from the throne. On regaining his crown, the alcayde was rewarded for his fidelity. His daughter had her apartment in the Alhambra, and was given by the king in marriage to Nasar, a young Cetimerien prince descended from Aben Hud the Just. Their espousals were doubtless celebrated in the royal palace, and their honeymoon may have passed among these very bowers.

Four centuries had elapsed since the fair Lindaraxa passed away, yet how much of the fragile beauty of the scenes she inhabited remained! The garden still bloomed in which Belvidere and mirador have the same meaning, a roofed but open chamber affording a view.

 a Moorish palace east of the Alhambra Muhamed Nasar El Hayzare, or left-handed, ascended the throne in 1423.

she delighted; the fountain still presented the crystal mirror in which her charms may once have been reflected; the alabaster, it is true, had lost its whiteness; the basin beneath, overrun with weeds, had become the lurking-place of the lizard, but there was something in the very decay that enhanced the interest of the scene, speaking as it did of that mutability, the irrevocable lot of man and all his works.

The desolation too of these chambers, once the abode of the proud and elegant Elizabetta, had a more touching charm for me than if I had beheld them in their pristine splendor, glittering with the pageantry of a court.

When I returned to my quarters, in the governor's apartment, everything seemed tame and commonplace after the poetic region I had left. The thought suggested itself: Why could I not change my quarters to these vacant chambers? that would indeed be living in the Alhambra, surrounded by its gardens and fountains, as in the time of the Moorish sovereigns. I proposed the change to Dame Antonia and her family, and it occasioned vast surprise. They could not conceive any rational inducement for the choice of an apartment so forlorn, remote, and solitary. Dolores exclaimed at its frightful loneliness: nothing but bats and owls flitting about,-and then a fox and wildcat kept in the vaults of the neighboring baths, and roamed about at night. The good Tia had more reasonable objections. The neighborhood was infested by vagrants; gipsies swarmed in the caverns of the adjacent hills; the palace was ruinous and easy to be entered in many places; the rumor of a stranger quartered alone in one of the rooms and ruined apartments, out of the hearing of the rest of the inhabitants, might tempt unwelcome visitors in the night, especially as foreigners were always supposed to be well stocked with money. I was not to be diverted from my humor, however, and my will was law with these good people. So, calling in the assistance of a carpenter, and the ever officious Mateo Ximenes, the doors and windows were soon placed in a state of tolerable security, and the sleeping-room of the stately Elizabetta prepared for my reception. Mateo kindly volunteered as a body-guard to sleep in my antechamber; but I did not think it worth while to put his valor to the proof.

With all the hardihood I had assumed and all the precautions I had taken, I must confess the first night passed in these quarters was inexpressibly dreary. I do not think it was so much the apprehension of dangers from without that affected me, as the character of the place itself, with all its strange associations: the deeds of violence committed there; the tragical ends of many of those who had once reigned there in splendor. As I passed beneath the fated halls of the tower of Comares on the way to my chamber, I called to mind a quotation, that used to thrill me in the days of boyhood:

Fate sits on these dark battlements and frowns; And, as the portal opens to receive me, A voice in sullen echoes through the courts Tells of a nameless deed!

The whole family escorted me to my chamber, and took leave of me as of one engaged on a perilous enterprise; and when I heard their retreating steps die away along the waste antechambers and echoing galleries, and turned the key of my door, I was reminded of those hobgoblin stories, where the hero is left to accomplish the adventure of an enchanted house.

Even the thoughts of the fair Elizabetta and the beauties of her court, who had once graced these chambers, now, by a perversion of fancy, added to the gloom. Here was the scene of their transient gayety and loveliness; here were the very traces of their elegance and enjoyment; but what and where were they? Dust and ashes! tenants of the tomb! phantoms of the memory! . . . .

In the course of a few evenings a thorough change took place in the scene and its associations. The moon, which when I took possession of my new apartments was invisible, gradually gained each evening upon the darkness of the night, and at length rolled in full splendor above the towers, pouring a flood of tempered light into every court and hall. The garden beneath my window, before wrapped in gloom, was gently lighted up, the orange and citron trees were tipped with silver; the fountain sparkled in the moonbeams, and even the blush of the rose was faintly visible.

I now felt the poetic merit of the Arabic inscription on the walls,—"How beauteous is this garden; where the flowers of the earth vie with the stars of heaven. What can compare with the vase of yon alabaster fountain filled with crystal water? nothing but the moon in her fulness, shining in the midst of an unclouded sky!"

On such heavenly nights I would sit for hours at my window inhaling the sweetness of the garden, and musing on the checkered fortunes of those whose history was dimly shadowed out in the elegant memorials around. Sometimes, when all was quiet, and the clock from the distant cathedral of Granada struck the midnight hour, I have sallied out on another tour and wandered over the whole building; but how different from my first tour! No longer dark and mysterious; no longer peopled with shadowy foes; no longer recalling scenes of violence and murder; all was open, spacious, beautiful; everything called up pleasing and romantic fancies: Lindaraxa once more walked in her garden; the gay chivalry of Moslem Granada once more glittered about the Court of Lions! Who can do justice to a moonlight night in such a climate and such a place? The temperature of a summer midnight in Andalusia is perfectly ethereal. We seem lifted up into a purer atmosphere; we feel a serenity of soul. a buoyancy of spirits, an elasticity of frame, which render mere existence happiness. But when moonlight is added to all this, the effect is like enchantment. Under its plastic sway the Alhambra seems to regain its pristine glories. Every rent and chasm of time; every moldering tint and weather-stain is gone; the marble resumes its original whiteness; the long colonnades brighten in the moonbeams; the halls are illuminated with a softened radiance. -we tread the enchanted palace of an Arabian tale!

&lt;sup>1</sup> This is the motto on the title-page of Mrs. Anne Radcliffe's Mysteries of Udolpho, an English romantic novel of 1794.

What a delight at such a time, to ascend to the little airy pavilion of the queen's toilet (el tocador de la reyna), which, like a birdcage, overhangs the valley of the Darro, and gaze from its light arcades upon the moonlight prospect! To the right, the swelling mountains of the Sierra Nevada, robbed of their ruggedness and softened into a fairy land, with their snowy summits gleaming like silver clouds against the deep blue sky. And then to lean over the parapet of the Tocador and gaze down upon Granada and the Albaycin 1 spread out like a map below; all buried in deep repose; the white palaces and convents sleeping in the moonshine, and beyond all these the vapory Vega fading away like a dreamland in the distance.

Sometimes the faint click of castanets rises from the Alameda, where some gay Andalusians are dancing away the summer night. Sometimes the dubious tones of a guitar and the notes of an amorous voice, tell perchance the whereabout of some moonstruck lover serenading his lady's window.

Such is a faint picture of the moonlight nights I have passed loitering about the courts and halls and balconies of this most suggestive pile; "feeding my fancy with sugared suppositions," and enjoying that mixture of reverie and sensation which steal away existence in a southern climate; so that it has been almost morning before I have retired to bed, and been lulled to sleep by the falling waters of the fountain of Lindaraxa.

LEGEND OF THE MOOR'S LEGACY 2

Just within the fortress of the Alhambra. in front of the royal palace, is a broad open esplanade, called the Place or Square of the Cisterns, (la Plaza de los Algibes) so called from being undermined by reservoirs of water. hidden from sight, and which have existed from the time of the Moors. At one corner of this esplanade is a Moorish well, cut through the living rock to a great depth, the water of which is cold as ice and clear as crystal. The wells made by the Moors are always in repute, for it is well known what pains they took to penetrate to the purest and sweetest springs and fountains. The one of which we now speak is famous throughout Granada, insomuch that water-carriers, some bearing great water-jars on their shoulders, others driving asses before them laden with earthen vessels, are ascending and descending the steep woody avenues of the Alhambra, from early dawn until a late hour of the night.

Fountains and wells, ever since the scriptural days, have been noted gossiping-places in hot climates; and at the well in question there is a kind of perpetual club kept up during the livelong day, by the invalids, old women, and other curious do-nothing folk of the fortress, who sit here on the stone benches, under an awning spread over the well to shelter the toll-gatherer from the sun, and dawdle over the gossip of the fortress, and question every water-carrier that arrives about the news of the city, and make long comments on everything they hear and see. Not an hour of the day but loitering housewives and idle maid-servants may be seen. lingering, with pitcher on head or in hand, to hear the last of the endless tattle of these worthies.

Among the water-carriers who once resorted to this well, there was a sturdy, strong-backed, bandy-legged little fellow, named Pedro Gil, but called Peregil for shortness. Being a water-carrier, he was a Gallego, or native of Gallicia, of course. Nature seems to have formed races of men, as she has of animals, for different kinds of drudgery. In France the shoeblacks are all Savovards, the porters of hotels all Swiss, and in the days of hoops and hair-powder in England, 1 no man could give the regular swing to a sedan-chair but a bogtrotting Irishman. So in Spain, the carriers of water and bearers of burdens are all sturdy little natives of Gallicia. No man says, "Get me a porter," but, "Call a Gallego."

&lt;sup>1</sup> a quarter of Granada north of the Alhambra just across the Darro

&lt;sup>2</sup> To this tale Irving has imparted much of the racy flavor of the medieval tale.

To return from this digression. Peregil the Gallego had begun business with merely a great earthen iar which he carried upon his shoulder; by degrees he rose in the world, and was enabled to purchase an assistant of a correspondent class of animals, being a stout shaggy-On each side of this his haired donkey. long-eared aide-de-camp, in a kind of pannier, were slung his water-jars, covered with figleaves to protect them from the sun. There was not a more industrious water-carrier in all Granada, nor one more merry withal. The streets rang with his cheerful voice as he trudged after his donkey, singing forth the usual summer note that resounds through the Spanish towns: "Ouien quiere agua—agua mas fria que la nieve?"--"who wants water-water colder than snow? Who wants water from the well of the Alhambra, cold as ice and clear as crystal?" When he served a customer with a sparkling glass, it was always with a pleasant word that caused a smile; and if, perchance, it was a comely dame or dimpling damsel, it was always with a sly leer and a compliment to her beauty that was irresistible. Thus Peregil the Gallego was noted throughout all Granada for being one of the civilest, pleasantest, and happiest of mortals. Yet it is not he who sings loudest and jokes most that has the lightest heart. Under all this air of merriment, honest Peregil had his cares and troubles. He had a large family of ragged children to support, who were hungry and clamorous as a nest of young swallows, and beset him with their outcries for food whenever he came home of an evening. He had a helpmate, too, who was anything but a help to him. She had been a village beauty before her marriage, noted for her skill at dancing the bolero 2 and rattling the castanets; and she still retained her early propensities, spending the hard earnings of honest Peregil in frippery, and laying the very donkey under requisition for junketing parties into the country on Sundays and saints' days, and those innumerable holidays which are rather more numerous in Spain than the days of the week. With all this she was a little of a slattern, something more of a lie-abed, and, above all, a gossip of the first water; neglecting house household, and everything else, to loiter slipshod in the houses of her gossip neighbors.

He, however, who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, accommodates the yoke of matrimony to the submissive neck. Peregil bore all the heavy dispensations of wife and children with as meek a spirit as his donkey bore the water-jars; and, however he might shake his ears in private, never ventured to question the household virtues of his slattern spouse.

He loved his children, too, even as an owl loves its owlets, seeing in them his own image multiplied and perpetuated; for they were a sturdy, long-backed, bandy-legged little brood. The great pleasure of honest Peregil was, whenever he could afford himself a scanty holiday, and had a handful of maravedis 3 to spare, to take the whole litter forth with him, some in his arms, some tugging at his skirts, and some trudging at his heels, and to treat them to a gambol among the orchards of the Vega, while his wife was dancing with her holiday friends in the Angosturas of the Darro. 4

It was a late hour one summer night, and most of the water-carriers had desisted from their toils. The day had been uncommonly sultry; the night was one of those delicious moonlights which tempt the inhabitants of southern climes to indemnify themselves for the heat and inaction of the day, by lingering in the open air, and enjoying its tempered sweetness until after midnight. Customers for water were therefore still abroad. Peregil, like a considerate, painstaking father, thought of his hungry children. "One more journey to the well," said he to himself, "to earn a Sunday's puchero 5 for the little ones." So saying, he trudged manfully up the steep avenue of the Alhambra, singing as he went, and now and then bestowing a hearty thwack with a cudgel on the flanks of his donkey, either by way of cadence to the song, or refreshment to the animal; for dry blows serve in lieu of provender in Spain for all beasts of burden.

When arrived at the well, he found it deserted by everyone except a solitary stranger in Moorish garb, seated on a stone bench in the moonlight. Peregil paused at first and

5 pot (of food)

the eighteenth century
 A Spanish dance representing the progress of love from shyness to passion; it is accompanied with the voice and castancts.

Spanish copper coins of less than one cent in value perhaps a local name for the part of Granada close to the river Darro before it was covered over as it now is within the city regarded him with surprise, not unmixed with awe, but the Moor feebly beckoned him to approach. "I am faint and ill," said he; "aid me to return to the city, and I will pay thee double what thou couldst gain by thy jars of water."

The honest heart of the little water-carrier was touched with compassion at the appeal of the stranger. "God forbid," said he, "that I should ask fee or reward for doing a common act of humanity." He accordingly helped the Moor on his donkey, and set off slowly for Granada, the poor Moslem being so weak that it was necessary to hold him on the animal to keep him from falling to the earth.

When they entered the city, the water-carrier demanded whither he should conduct him. "Alas!" said the Moor, faintly, "I have neither home nor habitation; I am a stranger in the land. Suffer me to lay my head this night beneath thy roof, and thou shalt be amply repaid."

Honest Peregil thus saw himself unexpectedly saddled with an infidel guest, but he was too humane to refuse a night's shelter to a fellowbeing in so forlorn a plight; so he conducted the Moor to his dwelling. The children, who had sallied forth open-mouthed as usual on hearing the tramp of the donkey, ran back with affright when they beheld the turbaned stranger, and hid themselves behind their mother. The latter stepped forth intrepidly, like a ruffling hen before her brood when a vagrant dog approaches.

"What infidel companion," cried she, "is this you have brought home at this late hour, to draw upon us the eyes of the inquisition?"

"Be quiet, wife," replied the Gallego, "here is a poor sick stranger, without friend or home; wouldst thou turn him forth to perish in the streets?"

The wife would still have remonstrated, for although she lived in a hovel, she was a furious stickler for the credit of her house; the little water-carrier, however, for once was stiff necked, and refused to bend beneath the yoke. He assisted the poor Moslem to alight, and spread a mat and a sheepskin for him on the ground, in the coolest part of the house; being the only kind of bed that his poverty afforded.

In a little while the Moor was seized with violent convulsions, which defied all the ministering skill of the simple water-carrier. The eye of the poor patient acknowledged his kindness. During an interval of his fits he called him to his side, and addressing him in a low voice, "My end," said he, "I fear is at hand.

If I die, I bequeath you this box as a reward for your charity:" so saying, he opened his albornoz, or cloak, and showed a small box of sandal-wood, strapped round his body. "God grant, my friend," replied the worthy little Gallego, "that you may live many years to enjoy your treasure, whatever it may be." The Moor shook his head; he laid his hand upon the box, and would have said something more concerning it, but his convulsions returned with increasing violence, and in a little while he expired.

The water-carrier's wife was now as one distracted. "This comes," said she, "of your foolish good-nature, always running into scrapes to oblige others. What will become of us when this corpse is found in our house? We shall be sent to prison as murderers; and if we escape with our lives, shall be ruined by notaries and alguazils." 1

Poor Peregil was in equal tribulation, and almost repented himself of having done a good deed. At length a thought struck him. "It is not yet day," said he; "I can convey the dead body out of the city, and bury it in the sands on the banks of the Xenil. No one saw the Moor enter our dwelling, and no one will know anything of his death."

So said, so done. The wife aided him; they rolled the body of the unfortunate Moslem in the mat on which he had expired, laid it across the ass, and Peregil set out with it for the banks of the river.

As ill luck would have it, there lived opposite to the water-carrier a barber named Pedrillo Pedrugo, one of the most prying, tattling, and mischief-making of his gossip tribe. He was a weasel-faced, spider-legged varlet, supple and insinuating; the famous barber of Seville<sup>2</sup> could not surpass him for his universal knowledge of the affairs of others, and he had no more power of retention than a sieve. It was said that he slept but with one eye at a time. and kept one ear uncovered, so that even in his sleep he might see and hear all that was going on. Certain it is, he was a sort of scandalous chronicle for the quidnuncs 3 of Granada. and had more customers than all the rest of his fraternity.

This meddlesome barber heard Peregil arrive at an unusual hour at night, and the exclamations of his wife and children. His head was instantly popped out of a little window which served him as a look-out, and he saw his neighbor assist a man in Moorish garb into his dwelling. This was so strange an occurrence, that Pedrillo Pedrugo slept not a wink that night. Every five minutes he was at his loophole watching the lights that gleamed through the chinks of his neighbor's door, and before daylight he beheld Peregil sally forth with his donkey unusually laden.

&lt;sup>1</sup> constables

&lt;sup>2</sup> Figare, in The Burber of Seville, a comic opera by Beaumarchais, written in 1772
<sup>3</sup> one always asking "What now?" a gossip

The inquisitive barber was in a fidget: he slipped on his clothes, and, stealing forth silently followed the water-carrier at a distance. until he saw him dig a hole in the sandy bank of the Xenil, and bury something that had the appearance of a dead body.

The barber hied him home, and fidgeted about his shop, setting everything upside down. until sunrise. He then took a basin under his arm, and sallied forth to the house of his daily customer the alcalde, 1

The alcalde was just risen. Pedrillo Pedrugo seated him in a chair, threw a napkin round his neck, put a basin of hot water under his chin. and began to mollify his beard with his fingers.

"Strange doings!" said Pedrugo, who played barber and newsmonger at the same time,-"strange doings! Robbery, and murder, and burial all in one night!"

"Hey!—how!—what is that you say?" cried the alcalde.

"I say," replied the barber rubbing a piece of soap over the nose and mouth of the dignitary, for a Spanish barber disdains to employ a brush. -"I say that Peregil the Gallego has robbed and murdered a Moorish Mussulman, and buried him, this blessed night. Maldita sea la noche;—Accursed be the night for the same!"

"But how do you know all this?" demanded the alcalde.

"Be patient, Señor, and you shall hear all about it," replied Pedrillo, taking him by the nose and sliding a razor over his cheek. He then recounted all that he had seen, going through both operations at the same time, shaving his beard, washing his chin, and wiping him dry with a dirty napkin, while he was robbing, murdering, and burying the Moslem.

Now it so happened that this alcalde was one of the most overbearing, and at the same time most griping and corrupt curmudgeons in all Granada. It could not be denied, however, that he set a high value upon justice, for he sold it at its weight in gold. He presumed the case in point to be one of murder and robbery; doubtless there must be a rich spoil; how was it to be secured into the legitimate hands of the law? for as to merely entrapping the delinquent—that would be feeding the gallows; but entrapping the booty—that would be enriching the judge, and such, according to his creed, was the great end of justice. So thinking, he summoned to his presence his trustiest alguazil-a gaunt, hungry-looking varlet, clad according to the custom of his order, in the ancient Spanish garb, a broad black beaver turned up at its sides; a quaint ruff; a small black coat dangling from his shoulders; rusty black under clothes that set off his spare wirv frame, while in his hands he bore a slender white wand, the dreaded insignia of his office. Such was the legal bloodhound of the ancient Spanish breed, that he put upon the traces of the unlucky water-carrier, and such was his speed and certainty, that he was upon the haunches of poor Peregil before he had returned to his dwelling, and brought both him and his donkey before the dispenser of justice.

The alcalde bent upon him one of the most terrific frowns. "Hark ye, culprit," roared he, in a voice that made the knees of the little Gallego smite together,—"hark ye, culprit! there is no need of denying thy guilt, everything is known to me. A gallows is the proper reward for the crime thou hast committed, but I am merciful, and readily listen to reason. The man that has been murdered in thy house was a Moor, an infidel, the enemy of our faith. It was doubtless in a fit of religious zeal that thou hast slain him. I will be indulgent, therefore; render up the property of which thou hast robbed him, and we will hush the matter up."

The poor water-carrier called upon all the saints to witness his innocence; alas! not one of them appeared; and if they had, the alcalde would have disbelieved the whole calendar. The water-carrier related the whole story of the dying Moor with the straightforward simplicity of truth, but it was all in vain. "Wilt thou persist in saying," demanded the judge, "that this Moslem had neither gold nor jewels, which were the object of thy cupidity?"

"As I hope to be saved, your worship," replied the water-carrier, "he had nothing but a small box of sandal-wood which he bequeathed to me in reward for my services."

"A box of sandal-wood! a box of sandalwood!" exclaimed the alcalde, his eyes sparkling at the idea of precious jewels. "And where is this box? where have you concealed it?"

"An' it please your grace," replied the watercarrier, "it is in one of the panniers of my mule, and heartily at the service of your worship.'

1 mayor-magistrate

He had hardly spoken the words, when the keen alguazil darted off, and reappeared in an instant with the mysterious box of sandal-wood. The alcalde opened it with an eager and trembling hand; all pressed forward to gaze upon the treasure it was expected to contain; when, to their disappointment, nothing appeared within, but a parchment scroll, covered with Arabic characters, and an end of a waxen taper.

When there is nothing to be gained by the conviction of a prisoner, justice, even in Spain, is apt to be impartial. The alcalde, having recovered from his disappointment, and found that there was really no booty in the case, now listened dispassionately to the explanation of the water-carrier, which was corroborated by the testimony of his wife. Being convinced, therefore, of his innocence, he discharged him from arrest; nay more, he permitted him to carry off the Moor's legacy, the box of sandal-wood and its contents, as the well-merited reward of his humanity; but he retained his donkey in payment of costs and charges.

Behold the unfortunate little Gallego reduced once more to the necessity of being his own water-carrier, and trudging up to the well of the Alhambra with a great earthen jar upon his shoulder.

As he toiled up the hill in the heat of a summer noon, his usual good-humor forsook him. "Dog of an alcalde!" would he cry, "to rob a poor man of the means of his subsistence, of the best friend he had in the world!" And then at the remembrance of the beloved companion of his labors, all the kindness of his nature would break forth. "Ah, donkey of my heart!" would he exclaim, resting his burden on a stone, and wiping the sweat from his brow, —"ah, donkey of my heart! I warrant me thou thinkest of thy old master! I warrant me thou missest the water-jars—poor beast."

To add to his afflictions, his wife received him, on his return home, with whimperings and repinings; she had clearly the vantage-ground of him, having warned him not to commit the egregious act of hospitality which had brought on him all these misfortunes; and, like a knowing woman, she took every occasion to throw her superior sagacity in his teeth. If her children lacked food, or needed a new garment, she could answer with a sneer, "Go to your father—he is heir to king Chico of the Alhambra: ask him to help you out of the Moor's strong box."

Was ever poor mortal so soundly punished for having done a good action? The unlucky Peregil was grieved in flesh and spirit, but still he bore meekly with the railings of his spouse. At length, one evening, when, after a hot day's toil, she taunted him in the usual manner, he lost all patience. He did not venture to retort upon her, but his eye rested on the box of sandal-wood, which lay on a shelf with lid half open, as if laughing in mockery at his vexation. Seizing it up, he dashed it with indignation to the floor. "Unlucky was the day that I ever set eyes on thee," he cried, "or sheltered thy master beneath my roof!"

As the box struck the floor, the lid flew wide open, and the parchment scroll rolled forth.

Peregil sat regarding the scroll for some time in moody silence. At length rallying his ideas, "Who knows," thought he, "but this writing may be of some importance, as the Moor seems to have guarded it with such care?" Picking it up therefore, he put it in his bosom, and the next morning, as he was crying water through the streets, he stopped at the shop of a Moor, a native of Tangiers, who sold trinkets and perfumery in the Zacatin, 1 and asked him to explain the contents.

The Moor read the scroll attentively, then stroked his beard and smiled. "This manuscript," said he, "is a form of incantation for the recovery of hidden treasure that is under the power of enchantment. It is said to have such virtue that the strongest bolts and bars, nay the adamantine rock itself, will yield before it!"

"Bah!" cried the little Gallego, "what is all that to me? I am no enchanter, and know nothing of buried treasure." So saying, he shouldered his water-jar, left the scroll in the hands of the Moor, and trudged forward on his daily rounds.

That evening, however, as he rested himself about twilight at the well of the Alhambra, he found a number of gossips assembled at the place, and their conversation, as is not unusual at that shadowy hour, turned upon old tales and traditions of a supernatural nature. Being all poor as rats, they dwelt with peculiar fondness upon the popular theme of enchanted riches left by the Moors in various parts of the Alhambra. Above all, they concurred in the belief that there were great treasures buried deep in the earth under the tower of the seven floors.

These stories made an unusual impression on the mind of the honest Peregil, and they sank deeper and deeper into his thoughts as he returned alone down the darkling avenues. "If, after all, there should be treasure hid beneath that tower; and if the scroll I left with the Moor should enable me to get at it!" In the sudden ecstasy of the thought he had wellnigh let fall his water-jar.

<sup>1</sup> a narrow market-street of Granada

That night he tumbled and tossed, and could scarcely get a wink of sleep for the thoughts that were bewildering his brain. Bright and early he repaired to the shop of the Moor, and told him all that was passing in his mind. "You can read Arabic," said he; "suppose we go together to the tower, and try the effect of the charm; if it fails, we are no worse off than before; but if it succeeds, we will share equally all the treasure we may discover."

"Hold," replied the Moslem; "this writing is not sufficient of itself; it must be read at midnight, by the light of a taper singularly compounded and prepared, the ingredients of which are not within my reach. Without such a taper the scroll is of no avail."

"Say no more!" cried the little Gallego: "I have such a taper at hand, and will bring it here in a moment." So saying, he hastened home, and soon returned with the end of yellow wax taper that he had found in the box of sandal-wood.

The Moor felt it and smelt of it. "Here are rare and costly perfumes," said he. "combined with this yellow wax. This is the kind of taper specified in the scroll. While this burns, the strongest walls and most secret caverns will remain open. Woe to him, however, who lingers within it until it be extinguished. He will remain enchanted with the treasure."

It was now agreed between them to try the charm that very night. At a late hour, therefore, when nothing was stirring but bats and owls, they ascended the woody hill of the Alhambra, and approached that awful tower, shrouded by trees and rendered formidable by so many traditionary tales. By the light of a lantern they groped their way through bushes. and over fallen stones, to the door of a vault beneath the tower. With fear and trembling they descended a flight of steps cut into the rock. It led to an empty chamber, damp and drear, from which another flight of steps led to a deeper vault. In this way they descended four several flights, leading into as many vaults, one below the other, but the floor of the fourth was solid; and though, according to tradition, there remained three vaults still below, it was said to be impossible to penetrate further, the residue being shut up by strong enchantment. The air of this vault was damp and chilly, and had an earthy smell, and the light scarce cast forth any rays. They paused here for a time. in breathless suspense, until they faintly heard the clock of the watch-tower strike midnight; upon this they lit the waxen taper, which diffused an odor of myrrh and frankincense and

The Moor began to read in a hurried voice. He had scarce finished when there was a noise as of subterraneous thunder. The earth shook and the floor, yawning open, disclosed a flight of steps. Trembling with awe, they descended, and by the light of the lantern found themselves in another vault covered with Arabic inscriptions. In the center stood a great chest, secured with seven bands of steel, at each end of which sat an enchanted Moor in armor, but motionless as a statue, being controlled by the power of the incantation. Before the chest were several jars filled with gold and silver and precious stones. In the largest of these they thrust their arms up to the elbow, and at every dip hauled forth handfuls of broad vellow pieces of Moorish gold, or bracelets and ornaments of the same precious metal, while occasionally a necklace of Oriental pearl would stick to their fingers. Still they trembled and breathed short while cramming their pockets with the spoils; and cast many a fearful glance at the two enchanted Moors, who sat grim and motionless, glaring upon them with unwinking eyes. At length, struck with a sudden panic at some fancied noise, they both rushed up the staircase. tumbled over one another into the upper apartment, overturned and extinguished the waxen taper, and the pavement again closed with a thundering sound.

Filled with dismay, they did not pause until they had groped their way out of the tower. and beheld the stars shining through the trees. Then seating themselves upon the grass, they divided the spoil, determining to content themselves for the present with this mere skimming of the jars, but to return on some future night and drain them to the bottom. To make sure of each other's good faith, also, they divided the talismans between them, one retaining the scroll. and the other the taper; this done, they set off with light hearts and well-lined pockets for Granada.

As they wended their way down the hill, the shrewd Moor whispered a word of counsel in the ear of the simple little water-carrier.

"Friend Peregil," said he, "all this affair must be kept a profound secret until we have Myrrh, frankincense, and storax are all gums or resins much used in the making of perfumes.

secured the treasure, and conveyed it out of harm's way. If a whisper of it gets to the ear of the alcalde, we are undone!"

"Certainly," replied the Gallego, "nothing can be more true.

"Friend Peregil," said the Moor, "you are a discreet man, and I make no doubt can keep a secret; but you have a wife."

"She shall not know a word of it." replied the little water-carrier sturdily.

"Enough," said the Moor, "I depend upon thy discretion and thy promise."

Never was promise more positive and sincere; but, alas! what man can keep a secret from his wife? Certainly not such a one as Peregil the water-carrier, who was one of the most loving and tractable of husbands. On his return home. he found his wife moping in a corner. "Mighty well," cried she as he entered, "you've come at last, after rambling about until this hour of the night. I wonder you have not brought home another Moor as a house-mate." Then bursting into tears, she began to wring her hands and smite her breast. "Unhappy woman that I am!" exclaimed she, "what will become of me? My house stripped and plundered by lawyers and alguazils; my husband a do-nogood, that no longer brings home bread to his family, but goes rambling about day and night, with infidel Moors! O my children! my children! what will become of us? We shall all have to beg in the streets!"

Honest Peregil was so moved by the distress of his spouse, that he could not help whimpering also. His heart was as full as his pockets. and not to be restrained. Thrusting his hand into the latter he hauled forth three or four broad gold pieces, and slipped them into her bosom. The poor woman stared with astonishment, and could not understand the meaning of this golden shower. Before she could recover her surprise, the little Gallego drew forth a chain of gold and dangled it before her, capering with exultation, his mouth distended from ear to ear.

"Holy Virgin protect us!" exclaimed the "What hast thou been doing Peregil? surely thou hast not been committing murder and robbery!"

The idea scarce entered the brain of the poor woman, than it became a certainty with her. She saw a prison and a gallows in the distance, and a little bandy-legged Gallego hanging pendent from it; and, overcome by the horrors conjured up by her imagination, fell into violent hysterics.

What could the poor man do? He had no other means of pacifying his wife, and dispelling the phantoms of her fancy, than by relating the whole story of his good fortune. This, however, he did not do until he had exacted from her the most solemn promise to keep it a profound secret from every living being.

To describe her joy would be impossible. She flung her arms round the neck of her husband. and almost strangled him with her caresses. "Now, wife," exclaimed the little man with honest exultation, "what say you now to the Moor's legacy? Henceforth never abuse me for helping a fellow-creature in distress."

The honest Gallego retired to his sheepskin mat, and slept as soundly as if on a bed of down. Not so his wife; she emptied the whole contents of his pockets upon the mat, and sat counting gold pieces of Arabic coin, trying on necklaces and earrings, and fancying the figure she should one day make when permitted to enjoy her riches.

On the following morning the honest Gallego took a broad golden coin, and repaired with it to a jeweler's shop in the Zacatin to offer it for sale, pretending to have found it among the ruins of the Alhambra. The jeweler saw that it had an Arabic inscription and was of the purest gold; he offered, however, but a third of its value, with which the water-carrier was perfectly content. Peregil now bought new clothes for his little flock, and all kinds of toys, together with ample provisions for a hearty meal, and returning to his dwelling, set all his children dancing around him, while he capered in the midst, the happiest of fathers.

The wife of the water-carrier kept her promise of secrecy with surprising strictness. For a whole day and a half she went about with a look of mystery and a heart swelling almost to bursting, yet she held her peace, though surrounded by her gossips. It is true, she could not help giving herself a few airs, apologized for her ragged dress, and talked of ordering a new basquina 1 all trimmed with gold lace and bugles, and a new lace mantilla. She threw out hints of her husband's intention of leaving off his trade of water-carrying, as it did not altogether agree with his health. In fact she thought they should all retire to the country for the summer, that the children might have the benefit of the mountain air, for there was no living in the city in this sultry season.

The neighbors stared at each other, and thought the poor woman had lost her wits; and 1 under petticoat her airs and graces and elegant pretentions were the theme of universal scoffing and merriment among her friends, the moment her back was turned.

If she restrained herself abroad, however, she indemnified herself at home, and putting a string of rich Oriental pearls round her neck, Moorish bracelets on her arms, and an aigrette of diamonds on her head, sailed backwards and forwards in her slattern rags about the room, now and then stopping to admire herself in a broken mirror. Nay, in the impulse of her simple vanity, she could not resist, on one occasion, showing herself at the window to enjoy the effect of her finery on the passers-by.

As the fates would have it, Pedrillo Pedrugo, the meddlesome barber, was at this moment sitting idly in his shop on the opposite side of the street, when his ever-watchful eye caught the sparkle of a diamond. In an instant he was at his loophole reconnoitering the slattern spouse of the water-carrier, decorated with the splendor of an eastern bride. No sooner had he taken an accurate inventory of her ornaments, than he posted off with all speed to the alcalde. In a little while the hungry alguazil was again on the scent, and before the day was over the unfortunate Peregil was once more dragged into the presence of the judge.

"How is this, villain!" cried the alcalde, in a furious voice. "You told me that the infidel who died in your house left nothing behind but an empty coffer, and now I hear of your wife flaunting in her rags decked out with pearls and diamonds. Wretch that thou art! prepare to render up the spoils of thy miserable victim, and to swing on the gallows that is already tired of waiting for thee."

The terrified water-carrier fell on his knees, and made a full relation of the marvelous manner in which he had gained his wealth. The alcalde, the alguazil, and the inquisitive barber listened with greedy ears to this Arabian tale of enchanted treasure. The alguazil was dispatched to bring the Moor who had assisted in the incantation. The Moslem entered half frightened out of his wits at finding himself in the hands of the harpies of the law. When he beheld the water-carrier standing with sheepish looks and downcast countenance, he comprehended the whole matter. "Miserable animal," said he, as he passed near him, "did I not warn thee against babbling to thy wife?"

The story of the Moor coincided exactly with that of his colleague; but the alcalde affected to be slow of belief, and threw out menaces of imprisonment and rigorous investigation. "Softly, good señor Alcalde," said the Mussulman, who by this time had recovered his usual shrewdness and self-possession. "Let us not mar fortune's favors in the scramble for them. Nobody knows anything of this matter but ourselves; let us keep the secret. There is wealth enough in the cave to enrich us all. Promise a fair division, and all shall be produced; refuse, and the cave shall remain forever closed."

The alcalde consulted apart with the alguazil. The latter was an old fox in his profession. "Promise anything," said he, "until you get possession of the treasure. You may then seize upon the whole, and if he and his accomplice dare to murmur, threaten them with the fagot and stake as infidels and sorcerers."

The alcalde relished the advise. Smoothing his brow and turning to the Moor, "This is a strange story," said he, "and may be true, but I must have ocular proof of it. This very night you must repeat the incantation in my presence. If there be really such treasure, we will share it amicably between us, and say nothing further of the matter; if ye have deceived me, expect no mercy at my hands. In the mean time you must remain in custody."

The Moor and the water-carrier cheerfully agreed to these conditions, satisfied that the event would prove the truth of their words

Towards midnight the alcalde sallied forth secretly, attended by the alguazil and the meddlesome barber, all strongly armed. They conducted the Moor and the water-carrier as prisoners, and were provided with the stout donkey of the latter to bear off the expected treasure. They arrived at the tower without being observed, and tying the donkey to a figtree, descended into the fourth vault of the tower.

The scroll was produced, the yellow waxen taper lighted, and the Moor read the form of incantation. The earth trembled as before, and the pavement opened with a thundering sound, disclosing the narrow flight of steps. The alcalde, the alguazil, and the barber were struck aghast, and could not summon courage to descend. The Moor and the water-carrier entered the lower vault, and found the two Moors seated as before, silent and motionless. They removed two of the great jars, filled with golden coin and precious stones. The water-carrier bore them up one by one upon his shoulders, but though a strong-backed little man, and accustomed to carry burdens, he staggered beneath their weight, and found, when slung on each side of his donkey, they were as much as the animal could bear.

"Let us be content for the present," said the Moor; "here is as much treasure as we can carry off without being perceived, and enough to make us all wealthy to our heart's desire."

"Is there more treasure remaining behind?"

demanded the alcalde.

"The greatest prize of all," said the Moor, "a huge coffer bound with bands of steel, and filled with pearls and precious stones."

"Let us have up the coffer by all means," cried the grasping alcalde.

"I will descend for no more," said the Moor, doggedly; "enough is enough for a reasonable man—more is superfluous."

"And I," said the water-carrier, "will bring up no further burden to break the back of my poor donkey."

Finding commands, threats, and entreaties equally vain, the alcalde turned to his two adherents. "Aid me," said he, "to bring up the coffer, and its contents shall be divided between us." So saying, he descended the steps, followed with trembling reluctance by the alguazil and the barber.

No sooner did the Moor behold them fairly earthed than he extinguished the yellow taper; the pavement closed with its usual crash, and the three worthies remained buried in its womb.

He then hastened up the different flights of steps, nor stopped until in the open air. The little water-carrier followed him as fast as his short legs would permit.

"What hast thou done?" cried Peregil, as soon as he could recover breath. "The alcalde and the other two are shut up in the vault."

"It is the will of Allah!" said the Moor, devoutly.

"And will you not release them?" demanded the Gallego.

"Allah forbid!" replied the Moor, smoothing his beard. "It is written in the book of fate that they shall remain enchanted until some future adventurer arrive to break the charm. The will of God be done!" so saying, he hurled the end of the waxen taper far among the gloomy thickets of the glen.

There was now no remedy; so the Moor and the water-carrier proceeded with the richly laden donkey toward the city, nor could honest Peregil refrain from hugging and kissing his long-eared fellow-laborer, thus restored to him from the clutches of the law; and, in fact, it is doubtful which gave the simple-hearted little man most joy at the moment, the gaining of the treasure, or the recovery of the donkey.

The two partners in good luck divided their spoil amicably and fairly, except that the Moor. who had a little taste for trinketry, made out to get into his heap the most of the pearls and precious stones and other baubles, but then he always gave the water-carrier in lieu magnificent jewels of massy gold, of five times the size, with which the latter was heartily content. They took care not to linger within reach of accidents, but made off to enjoy their wealth undisturbed in other countries. The Moor returned to Africa, to his native city of Tangiers. and the Gallego, with his wife, his children, and his donkey made the best of his way to Portugal. Here, under the admonition and tuition of his wife, he became a personage of some consequence, for she made the worthy little man array his long body and short legs in doublet and hose, with a feather in his hat and a sword by his side, and laving aside his familiar appellation of Peregil, assume the more sonorous title of Don Pedro Gil: his progeny grew up a thriving and merry-hearted, though short and bandylegged generation, while Señora Gil, befringed. belaced, and betasseled from her head to her heels, with glittering rings on every finger, became a model of slattern fashion and finery.

As to the alcalde and his adjuncts, they remained shut up under the great tower of the seven floors, and there they remain spellbound at the present day. Whenever there shall be a lack in Spain of gossiping barbers, sharking alguazils, and corrupt alcaldes, they may be sought after; but if they have to wait until such time for their deliverance, there is danger of their enchantment enduring until doomsday.

SPANISH ROMANCE

In the latter part of my sojourn in the Alhambra, I made frequent descents into the Tesuit's Library of the University; and relished more and more the old Spanish chronicles, which I found there bound in parchment. I delight in those quaint histories which treat of the times when the Moslems maintained a foothold in the Peninsula. With all their bigotry and occasional intolerance, they are full of noble acts and generous sentiments, and have a high, spicy, oriental flavor, not to be found in other records of the times, which were merely European. In fact, Spain, even at the present day, is a country apart; severed in history, habits, manners, and modes of thinking, from all the rest of Europe. It is a romantic country; but its romance has none of the sentimentality of modern European romance; it is chiefly derived from the brilliant regions of the East, and from the high-minded school of Saracenic chivalry.

The Arab invasion and conquest brought a higher civilization, and a nobler style of thinking, into Gothic Spain. The Arabs were a quick-witted, sagacious, proud-spirited, and poetical people, and were imbued with oriental science and literature. Wherever they established a seat of power, it became a rallyingplace for the learned and ingenious; and they softened and refined the people whom they conquered. By degrees, occupancy seemed to give them an hereditary right to their foothold in the land; they ceased to be looked upon as invaders, and were regarded as rival neighbors. The Peninsula, broken up into a variety of states, both Christian and Moslem, became, for centuries, a great campaigning-ground, where the art of war seemed to be the principal business of man, and was carried to the highest pitch of romantic chivalry. The original ground of hostility, a difference of faith, gradually lost its rancor. Neighboring states, of opposite creeds, were occasionally linked together in alliances, offensive and defensive; so that the cross and crescent were to be seen side by side. fighting against some common enemy. In times of peace, too, the noble youth of either faith resorted to the same cities, Christian or Moslem, to school themselves in military science. Even in the temporary truces of sanguinary wars, the warriors who had recently striven together in the deadly conflicts of the field, laid aside their animosity, met at tournaments, jousts, and other military festivities, and exchanged the courtesies of gentle and generous spirits. Thus the opposite races became frequently mingled together in peaceful intercourse, or if any rivalry took place, it was in those high courtesies and nobler acts, which bespeak the accomplished cavalier. Warriors of opposite creeds became ambitious of transcending each other in magnanimity as well as valor. Indeed, the chivalric virtues were refined upon to a degree sometimes fastidious and constrained, but at other times inexpressibly noble and affecting. The annals of the times teem with illustrious instances of high-wrought courtesy, romantic generosity, lofty disinterestedness, and punctilious honor, that warm the very soul to read them. These have furnished themes for national plays and poems, or have been celebrated in those all-pervading ballads, which are as the life-breath of the people, and thus have continued to exercise an influence on the national character, which centuries of vicissitude and decline have not been able to destroy; so that, with all their faults, and they are many. the Spaniards, even at the present day, are, on many points, the most high-minded and proudspirited people of Europe. It is true, the romance of feeling derived from the sources I have mentioned, has, like all other romance, its affectations and extremes. It renders the Spaniard at times pompous and grandiloquent: prone to carry the pundonor, or point of honor, beyond the bounds of sober sense and sound morality; disposed, in the midst of poverty, to affect the grande caballero, 1 and to look down with sovereign disdain upon "arts mechanical." and all the gainful pursuits of plebeian life: but this very inflation of spirit, while it fills his brain with vapors, lifts him above a thousand meannesses: and though it often keeps him in indigence, ever protects him from vulgarity.

In the present day, when popular literature is running into the low levels of life, and luxuriating on the vices and follies of mankind; and when the universal pursuit of gain is trampling down the early growth of poetic feeling, and wearing out the verdure of the soul, I question whether it would not be of service for the reader occasionally to turn to these records of prouder times and loftier modes of thinking; and to steep himself to the very lips in old Spanish romance.

1829-1832

1832

JAMES FENIMORE COOPER 1789-1851

The first American novelist to attract wide attention in the Old World was James Fenimore Cooper, born at Burlington, New Jersey, of English and Swedish Quaker ancestry. He was brought up on his father's vast wilderness estate at Otsego Lake, New York, educated in the local schools and in the home of an Episcopal clergyman at Albany, was three years at Yale, went to sca, secured a midshipman's commission, and served in the navy until 1811. He took up literature by chance in 1820 and soon achieved success. From 1826 until 1833 he lived abroad, and then settled at Cooperstown, New York, where he spent the remainder of his life, and died. A rather irritable disposition and tactless criticism of his fellow countrymen involved him in frequent local and public controversies. His works include some forty titles, chief among which are The Spy, 1821; The Pioneers, and The Pilot, 1823; The Last of the Mohicans, 1826; The Prairie, 1827; History of the Navy of the United States, 1839; The Pathfinder, 1840; The Deerslayer, 1841. Cooper has been translated into nearly all European languages.

reat gentleman

It was Cooper's privilege to write into American literature the prose epic of the white man's struggle with natives not yet emerged from a Stone Age civilization, and of the conquest of a continent. No such event had taken place before in modern history, and Cooper was its witness and recorder. He pictured that part of the conflict extending in time from the French and Indian War well into the nineteenth century, and in space from the Hudson to west of the Mississippi. The story is told in the life of one hero who figures under five different names in five books: Deerslayer, The Last of the Mohicans, The Pathfinder, The Pioneers, and The Prairie. Many parallels can be discovered between the work of Cooper and that of his contemporary and fellow romanticist, Scott. Where their fields overlapped in tales of the sea, Cooper was superior, for he wrote from a first-hand knowledge of the subject. In details Cooper is often inaccurate, the story not infrequently drags, the diction is often remote from life, and the characters sometimes pose. Nevertheless, Cooper was deeply original. He seized the opportunity of organizing into picturesque form the details of a large racial movement of which none of his contemporaries seem to have been aware. In more recent times, Harte, Mark Twain, Neihardt, and Garland have continued the story in the West.

continued the story in the West.

T. R. Lounsbury, J. F. Cooper, (AML) 1889;
W. B. S. Clymer (BB); Macy; Chubb; B. Mathews, "Fenimore Cooper," Atlan. 100:329-341;
W. C. Brownell, "Cooper," Scrib. M. 39:455-468;
"A Century of Fenimore Cooper," Nation 112: 255-56; S. F. Cooper, "A Glance Backward," Atlan. 59:199-206; "Chronicle and Comment," Bookm.

10:102-5.

THE PILOT 3 CHAPTER IV

Behold the threaden 1 sails. Borne with the invisible and creeping winds Draw the huge bottoms through the furrowed sea, Breasting the lofty surge.

SHAKESPEARE<sup>2</sup>

It has been already explained to the reader, that there were threatening symptoms in the appearance of the weather to create serious forebodings of evil in the breast of a seaman. When removed from the shadows of the cliffs, the night was not so dark but objects could be discerned at some little distance, and in the eastern horizon there was a streak of fearful light impending over the gloomy waters, in which the swelling outline formed by the rising waves was becoming each moment more distinct, and consequently, more alarming. Several dark clouds overhung the vessel, whose towering masts apparently propped the black vapor, while a few stars were seen twinkling with a sickly flame in the streak of clear sky that skirted the ocean. Still, light currents of air occasionally swept across the bay, bringing with them the fresh odor from the shore, but their flitting irregularity too surely foretold them to be the expiring breath of the land-breeze. The roaring then very generally thought to display. The Pirate was cited as a very marked instance of this universal knowledge, and it was wondered where a man of Scott's habits and associations could have become so familiar with the sea. The writer had frequently observed that there was much looseness in this universal knowledge, and that the secret of its success was to be traced to the power of cicating that vraisemblance, which is so remarkably exhibited in those world-renowned fictions, rather there to any very accurate information on the part then very generally thought to display. The Pirate exhibited in those world-renowned fictions, rather than to any very accurate information on the part of their author. It would have been hypercritical to object to The Pirate, that it was not strictly nautical, or true in its details; but, when the reverse was urged as a proof of what, considering the character of other portions of the work, would have been most extraordinary attainments it was a sext of proposition to dispute the ments, it was a sort of provocation to dispute the seamanship of The Pirate, a quality to which the book has certainly very little just pretension. The book has certainly very little just pretension. The result of this conversation was a sudden determination to produce a work which, if it had no mination to produce a work which, if it had no other merit, might present truer pictures of the ocean and ships than any that are to be found in The Pirate. To this unpremeditated decision, purely an impulse, is not only The Pilot due, but a tolerably numerous school of nautical romances that have succeeded it."

that have succeeded it."

The Pilot introduces, in the character of the pilot, John Paul Jones, famous in American naval battles of the Revolution. Jones, a native of the British sea coast, performed many daring feats in English and Irish harbors and waters as commander of American ships of war, and is perhaps mander of American ships of war, and is perhaps the only commander of a foreign military force to land and capture a fortified place on English soil from the time of William the Conqueror to the present. His daring was so great that a plan was really undertaken for his landing in England and capturing the persons of several English officials to be held in exchange for American officers in British prisons. The plan was not carried out, but Cooper uses it as the germ idea of the plot of The Pilot.

When the extract here given opens, Captain Munson, commander of a squadron consisting of Munson, commander of a squadron consisting of an unnamed frigate and the schooner Ariel, has worked his two ships into a narrow and dangerous hav on the Northumberland coast. Here the pilot, of the tide, the darkness, and the eastern gate, would have made the task of working the ships out to sea impossible to one lacking the pilot's perout to sea impossible to one latering the phot's perfect knowledge of the channel and the currents. The pilot is in disguise (his rank and dangerous mission being known only to Captain Munson), and is treated with some contempt by Griffith, first officer of the frigate.

In the following notes, no attempt will be made to explain the nautical terms further than for a hare understanding of the text.

of thread, fabric

2 Henry V. Act 111 (Prologue)

3 Cooper, in his preface to The Pilot, says: "The Pilot was published in 1823. This was not long after the appearance of The Pirate, a work which, it is hardly necessary to remind the reader, has a direct connection with the sea. In a conversation with a friend a man of polished taste and extended. with a friend, a man of polished taste and extensive reading, the authorship of the Scottish novels came under discussion. The claims of Sir Walter were a little distrusted, on account of the peculiar and minute information that the romances were of the surf, as it rolled on the margin of the bay, produced a dull, monotonous sound, that was only interrupted, at times, by a hollow bellowing, as a larger wave than usual broke violently against some cavity in the rock. Everything, in short, united to render the scene gloomy and portentous, without creating instant terror, for the ship rose easily on the long billows, without even straightening the heavy cable that held her to her anchor.

The higher officers were collected around the capstan, engaged in earnest discourse about their situation and prospects, while some of the oldest and most favored seamen would extend their short walk to the hallowed precincts of the quarter-deck, to catch with greedy ears the opinions that fell from their superiors. Numberless were the uneasy glances that were thrown from both officers and men at their commander and the Pilot, who still continued their secret communion in a distant part of the vessel. Once, an ungovernable curiosity. or the heedlessness of his years, led one of the youthful midshipmen near them, but a stern rebuke from his captain sent the boy, abashed and cowering, to hide his mortification among his fellows. This reprimand was received by the elder officers as an intimation that the consultation which they beheld was to be strictly inviolate; and, though it by no means suppressed the repeated expressions of their impatience, it effectually prevented an interruption to the communications which all, however, thought were unreasonably protracted for the occasion.

"This is no time to be talking over bearings and distances," observed the officer next in rank to Griffith; "but we should call the hands up, and try to kedge 1 her off while the sea will suffer a boat to live."

"'Twould be a tedious and bootless job to attempt warping a ship for miles against a head-beating sea," returned the first lieutenant; "but the land-breeze yet flutters aloft, and if our light sails would draw, with the aid of this ebb tide we might be able to shove her from the shore."

"Hail the tops, Griffith," said the other, "and ask if they feel the air above; 'twill be a hint at least to set the old man and that lubberly Pilot in motion."

Griffith laughed as he complied with the request, and when he received the customary reply to his call, he demanded in a loud voice,—

"Which way have you the wind, aloft?"

"We feel a light cat's-paw, now and then, from the land, sir," returned the sturdy captain of the top; "but our top-sail hangs in the clew-lines, sir, without winking."

Captain Munson and his companion suspended their discourse while this question and answer were exchanged, and then resumed their dialogue as earnestly as if it had received no interruption.

"If it did wink, the hint would be lost on our betters," said the officer of the marines, whose ignorance of seamanship added greatly to his perception of the danger, but who, from pure idleness, made more jokes than any other man in the ship. "That Pilot would not receive a delicate intimation through his ears, Mr. Griffith: suppose you try him by the nose."

"Faith, there was a flash of gunpowder between us in the barge," returned the first lieutenant, "and he does not seem a man to stomach such hints as you advise. Although he looks so meek and quiet, I doubt whether he has paid much attention to the book of Iob."

"Why should he?" exclaimed the chaplain, whose apprehensions at least equaled those of the marine, and with a much more disheartening effect; "I am sure it would have been a great waste of time: there are so many charts of the coast, and books on the navigation of these seas, for him to study, that I sincerely hope he has been much better employed." 2

A loud laugh was created at this speech among the listeners, and it apparently produced the effect that was so long anxiously desired, by putting an end to the mysterious conference between their captain and the pilot. As the former came forward towards his expecting crew, he said, in the composed, steady manner that formed the principal trait in his character.—

"Get the anchor, Mr. Griffith, and make sail on the ship; the hour has arrived when we must be moving."

The cheerful "Aye, aye, sir!" of the young lieutenant was hardly uttered, before the cries of half a dozen midshipmen were heard summoning the boatswain and his mates to their duty.

There was a general movement in the living masses that clustered around the mainmast, on the booms, and in the gangways, though their habits of discipline held the crew a moment longer in suspense. The silence was first broken by the sound of the boatswain's whistle, to move a ship against wind or current by means of light kedge anchors carried ahead in boats and dropped, the ship being worked up to these successively by cable and capstan followed by the hoarse cry of "All hands, up anchor, ahoy!" the former rising on the night air from its first low mellow notes to a piercing shrillness that gradually died away on the waters and the latter bellowing through every cranny of the ship, like the hollow murmurs of distant thunder.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Cooper is generally, as here, laborious and awkward in his attempts at humor.

The change produced by the customary summons was magical. Human beings sprang out from between the guns, rushed up the hatches. threw themselves with careless activity from the booms, and gathered from every quarter so rapidly, that in an instant, the deck of the frigate was alive with men. The profound silence that had hitherto been only interrupted by the low dialogue of the officers was now changed for the stern orders of the lieutenants. mingled with the shriller cries of the midshipmen, and the hoarse bawling of the boatswain's crew, rising above the tumult of preparation and general bustle.

The captain and the Pilot alone remained passive, in this scene of general exertion: for apprehension had even stimulated that class of officers which is called "idlers" to unusual activity, though frequently reminded by their more experienced messmates that, instead of aiding, they retarded the duty of the vessel. The bustle, however, gradually ceased, and in a few minutes, the same silence pervaded the ship as before.

"We are brought-to, 1 sir," said Griffith, who stood overlooking the scene, holding in one hand a short speaking-trumpet, and grasping with the other one of the shrouds of the ship, to steady himself in the position he had taken on a gun.

"Heave round, sir," was the calm reply. "Heave round!" repeated Griffith, aloud.

"Heave round!" echoed a dozen eager voices at once, and the lively strains of a fife struck up a brisk air, to enliven the labor. The capstan was instantly set in motion, and the measured tread of the seamen was heard, as they stamped the deck in the circle of their march. For a few minutes no other sounds were heard, if we except the voice of an officer, occasionally cheering the sailors, when it was announced that they "were short"; or, in other words, that the ship was nearly over her anchor.

"Heave and pawl," 2 cried Griffith; when the quivering notes of the whistle were again succeeded by a general stillness in the vessel.

"What is to be done now, sir?" continued the the slack of the cable taken up heave on the capstan and let what is gained be secured by means of the pawls working in the ratchet at its base lieutenant: "shall we trip 3 the anchor? There seems not a breath of air; and as the tide runs slack. I doubt whether the sea do not heave the ship ashore."

There was so much obvious truth in this conjecture, that all eyes turned from the light and animation afforded by the decks of the frigate, to look abroad on the waters, in a vain desire to pierce the darkness, as if to read the fate of their apparently devoted ship, from the aspect of nature.

"I leave all to the Pilot," said the captain, after he had stood a short time by the side of Griffith, anxiously studying the heavens and the ocean. "What say you, Mr. Gray?"

The man who was thus addressed by name was leaning over the bulwarks, with his eyes bent in the same direction as the others; but as he answered he turned his face towards the speaker, and the light from the deck fell full upon his quiet features, which exhibited a calmness bordering on the supernatural, considering his station and responsibility.

"There is much to fear from this heavy ground-swell," he said, in the same unmoved tones as before; "but there is certain destruction to us, if the gale that is brewing in the east finds us waiting its fury in this wild anchorage. All the hemp that ever was spun into cordage would not hold a ship an hour, chafing on these rocks, with a northeaster pouring its fury on her. If the powers of man can compass it, gentlemen, we must get an offing, and that speedily."

"You say no more, sir, than the youngest boy in the ship can see for himself," said Griffith; "ha! here comes the schooner!"

The dashing of the long sweeps in the water was now plainly audible, and the little Ariel 4 was seen through the gloom, moving heavily under their feeble impulse. As she passed slowly under the stern of the frigate, the cheerful voice of Barnstable was first heard, opening the communications between them.

"Here's a night for spectacles, Captain Munson!" he cried; "but I thought I heard your fife, sir. I trust in God, you do not mean to ride it out here till morning?"

"I like the berth as little as yourself, Mr. Barnstable," returned the veteran seaman, in his calm manner, in which anxiety was, however, beginning to grow evident. "We are short; but are afraid to let go our hold of the bottom, lest the sea cast us ashore. How make you out the wind?"

<sup>3</sup> lift from the bottom
<sup>4</sup> The schooner Ariel in command of Lieutenant Barnstable was so light that it could be moved by oars.

"Wind!" echoed the other: "there is not enough to blow a lady's curl aside. If you wait, sir, till the land-breeze fills your sails, vou will wait another moon. I believe I've got my egg-shell out of that nest of gray-caps; but how it has been done in the dark, a better man than myself must explain."

"Take your directions from the Pilot. Mr. Barnstable," returned his commanding officer, "and follow them strictly and to the letter."

A deathlike silence, in both vessels, succeeded this order: for all seemed to listen eagerly to catch the words that fell from the man on whom, even the boys now felt, depended their only hopes for safety. A short time was suffered to elapse, before his voice was heard. in the same low but distinct tones as before:-

"Your sweeps will soon be of no service to you," he said, "against the sea that begins to heave in: but your light sails will help them to get you out. So long as you can head eastand-by-north, you are doing well, and you can stand on till you open 1 the light from that northern headland, when you can heave to, and fire a gun; but if, as I dread, you are struck aback 2 before you open the light, you may trust to your lead on the larboard tack; but beware, with your head to the southward, for no lead will serve you there."

"I can walk over the same ground on one tack as on the other," said Barnstable, "and make both legs of a length." 3

"It will not do," returned the Pilot. "If you fall off a point to starboard from east-and-bynorth, in going large, 4 you will find both rocks and points of shoals to bring you up; and beware, as I tell you, of the starboard tack."

"And how shall I find my way? you will let me trust to neither time, lead, nor log."

"You must trust to a quick eye and a ready hand. The breakers only will show you the dangers, when you are not able to make out the bearings of the land. Tack in season, sir, and don't spare the lead when you head to port."

"Aye, aye," returned Barnstable, in a low, muttering voice. "This is a sort of blind navigation with a vengeance, and all for no purpose that I can see-see! damme, eyesight is of about as much use now as a man's nose would be in reading the Bible."

"Softly, softly, Mr. Barnstable." interrupted his commander.—for such was the anxious stillness in both vessels that even the rattling of the schooner's rigging was heard, as she rolled in the trough of the sea,—"the duty on which Congress has sent us must be performed, at the hazard of our lives."

"I don't mind my life, Captain Munson," said Barnstable, "but there is a great want of conscience in trusting a vessel in such a place as this. However, it is a time to do, and not to talk. But if there be such danger to an easy draught of water, what will become of the frigate? had I not better play jackal and try to feel the way for you?"

"I thank you," said the Pilot; "the offer is generous, but would avail us nothing. I have the advantage of knowing the ground well, and must trust to my memory, and God's good favor. Make sail, make sail, sir, and if you succeed, we will venture to break ground."

The order was promptly obeyed, and in a very short time the Ariel was covered with canvas. Though no air was perceptible on the decks of the frigate, the little schooner was so light, that she succeeded in stemming her way over the rising waves, aided a little by the tide; and in a few minutes her low hull was just discernible in the streak of light along the horizon, with the dark outline of her sails rising above the sea, until their fanciful summits were lost in the shadows of the clouds.

Griffith had listened to the foregoing dialogue like the rest of the junior officers, in profound silence; but when the Ariel began to grow indistinct to the eye, he jumped lightly from the gun to the deck, and cried,-

"She slips off, like a vessel from the stocks!

shall I trip the anchor, sir, and follow?"

"We have no choice," replied his captain. "You hear the question, Mr. Gray? shall we let go the bottom?"

"It must be done, Captain Munson; we may want more drift than the rest of this tide to get us to a place of safety," said the Pilot. "I would give five years from a life that I know will be short, if the ship lay one mile further seaward."

This remark was unheard by all, except the commander of the frigate, who again walked aside with the Pilot, where they resumed their The words of mysterious communications. assent were no sooner uttered, however, than Griffith gave forth from his trumpet the command to "Heave away!" Again the strains of the fife were followed by the tread of the men at the capstan. At the same time that the come in view of, past some obstruction, as a headland struck with a wind which blows upon the side of the sails opposite to that on which it blew at first, and tends to stop the ship make both courses of a ship, to starboard or port (larboard), as she tacks, of equal length not sailing so closely as possible toward the direction of the wind of the wind

anchor was heaving up, the sails were loosened from the yards, and opened to invite the breeze. In effecting this duty, orders were thundered through the trumpet of the first lieutenant, and executed with the rapidity of thought. Men were to be seen, like spots in the dim light from the heavens, lying on every yard, or hanging as in air, while strange cries were heard issuing from every part of the rigging, and each spar of the vessel. "Ready the fore-royal," cried a shrill voice, as if from the clouds; "Ready the fore-yard," uttered the hoarser tones of a seaman beneath him; "All ready aft, sir," cried a third, from another quarter; and in a few minutes the order was given to "Let fall."

The little light which fell from the sky was now excluded by the falling canvas, and a deeper gloom was cast athwart the decks of the ship, that served to render the brilliancy of the lanterns even vivid, while it gave to objects outboard a more appalling and dreary appearance than before.

Every individual, excepting the commander and his associate, was now earnestly engaged in getting the ship under way. The sounds of "We're away," were repeated by a burst from fifty voices, and the rapid evolutions of the capstan announced that nothing but the weight of the anchor was to be lifted. The hauling of cordage, the rattling of blocks, blended with the shrill calls of the boatswain and his mates, succeeded; and though to a landsman all would have appeared confusion and hurry, long practice and strict discipline enabled the crew to exhibit their ship under a cloud of canvas, from her deck to her trucks, in less time than we have consumed in relating it.

For a few minutes, the officers were not disappointed by the result; for though the heavy sails flapped lazily against the masts, the light duck on the loftier spars swelled outwardly, and the ship began sensibly to yield to their influence.

"She travels! she travels!" exclaimed Griffith, joyously; "ah, the hussy! she has as much antipathy to the land as any fish that swims: it blows a little gale aloft, yet!"

"We feel its dying breath," said the Pilot, in low, soothing tones, but in a manner so sudden as to startle Griffith, at whose elbow they were unexpectedly uttered. "Let us forget, young man, everything but the number of lives that depend, this night, on your exertions and my knowledge."

"If you be but half as able to exhibit the one, as I am willing to make the other, we shall do well." returned the lieutenant, in the same tone. "Remember, whatever may be your feelings, that we are on an enemy's coast, and love it not enough to wish to lay our bones there"

With this brief explanation they separated, the vessel requiring the constant and close attention of the officer to her movements.

The exultation produced in the crew by the progress of their ship through the water was of short duration; for the breeze that had seemed to await their motions, after forcing the vessel for a quarter of a mile, fluttered for a few minutes amid their light canvas, and then left them entirely. The quartermaster. whose duty it was to superintend the helm, soon announced that he was losing the command of the vessel, as she was no longer obedient to her rudder. This ungrateful intelligence was promptly communicated to his commander by Griffith, who suggested the propriety of again dropping an anchor.

"I refer you to Mr. Gray," returned the captain; "he is the pilot, sir, and with him rests the safety of the vessel."

"Pilots sometimes lose ships as well as save

"Pilots sometimes lose snips as well as save them," said Griffith: "know you the man well, Captain Munson, who holds all our lives in his keeping, and so coolly as if he cared but little for the venture?"

"Mr. Griffith, I do know him; he is, in my opinion, both competent and faithful. Thus much I tell you, to relieve your anxiety; more you must not ask; but is there not a shift of wind?"

"God forbid!" exclaimed his lieutenant; "if that northeaster catches us within the shoals, our case will be desperate indeed!"

The heavy rolling of the vessel caused an occasional expansion, and as sudden a reaction, in their sails, which left the oldest seaman in the ship in doubt which way the currents of air were passing, or whether there existed any that were not created by the flapping of their own canvas. The head of the ship, however, began to fall off from the sea, and notwithstanding the darkness, it soon became apparent that she was driving in, bodily, towards the shore.

During these few minutes of gloomy doubt, Griffith, by one of those sudden revulsions of the mind that connect the opposite extremes of feeling, lost his animated anxiety, and relapsed into the listless apathy that so often came over him, even in the most critical moments of trial and danger. He was standing with one elbow resting on his capstan, shading his eyes from the light of the battle-lantern that stood near him with one hand, when he felt a gentle pressure of the other that recalled his recollection. Looking affectionately, though still recklessly, at the boy who stood at his side, he said.—

"Dull music. Mr. Merry."

"So dull, sir, that I can't dance to it," returned the midshipman. "Nor do I believe there is a man in the ship who would not rather hear 'The Girl I left Behind me,' than those execrable sounds."

"What sounds, boy? The ship is as quiet as the Quaker meetings in the Jerseys, before your good old grandfather used to break the charm of silence with his sonorous voice."

"Ah! laugh at my peaceable blood, if thou wilt, Mr. Griffith," said the arch youngster; "but remember, there is a mixture of it in all sorts of veins. I wish I could hear one of the old gentleman's chants now, sir; I could always sleep to them like a gull in the surf. But he that sleeps tonight with that lullaby, will make a nap of it."

"Sounds! I hear no sounds, boy, but the flapping aloft; even that Pilot, who struts the quarter-deck like an admiral, has nothing to say."

":Is not that a sound to open a seaman's ear?"

"It is in truth a heavy roll of the surf, lad, but the night air carries it heavily to our ears. Know you not the sound of the surf yet, younker?"

"I know it too well, Mr. Griffith, and do not wish to know it better. How fast are we tumbling in towards that surf, sir?"

"I think we hold our own," said Griffith, rousing again; "though we had better anchor. Luff, fellow, luff; you are broadside to the sea!"

The man at the wheel repeated his former intelligence, adding a suggestion, that he thought the ship 'was gathering stern-way.'

"Haul up your courses, 1 Mr. Griffith," said Captain Munson, "and let us feel the wind."

The rattling of the blocks was soon heard, and the enormous sheets of canvas that hung from the lower yards were instantly suspended "in the brails." When this change was effected, all on board stood silent and breathless, as if expecting to learn their fate by the result. Several contradictory opinions were at length hazarded among the officers, when Griffith seized the candle from the lantern, and springing on one of the guns, held it on high, exposed to the action of the air. The little flame waved, with uncertain glimmering, for a moment, and then burned steadily, in a line with the masts. Griffith was about to lower his extended arm, when, feeling a slight sensation of coolness on his hand, he paused, and the light turned slowly towards the land, flared, flickered, and finally deserted the wick.

"Lose not a moment, Mr. Griffith," cried the Pilot aloud; "clew up and furl everything but your three topsails, and let them be double-reefed. Now is the time to fulfill your promise."

The young man paused one moment, in astonishment, as the clear, distinct tones of the stranger struck his ears so unexpectedly; but turning his eyes to seaward, he sprang on the deck, and proceeded to obey the order, as if life and death depended on his dispatch.

CHAPTER V

She rights! she rights, boys! wear 2 off shore. Song.

The extraordinary activity of Griffith, which communicated itself with promptitude to the crew, was produced by a sudden alteration in the weather. In place of the well defined streak along the horizon, that has been already described, an immense body of misty light appeared to be moving in, with rapidity, from the ocean, while a distinct but distant roaring announced the sure approach of the tempest that had so long troubled the waters. Even Griffith, while thundering his orders through the trumpet and urging the men by his cries to expedition, would pause, for instants, to cast anxious glances in the direction of the coming storm: and the faces of the sailors who lay on the vards were turned, instinctively, towards the same quarter of the heavens, while they knotted the reef-points, or passed the gaskets that were to confine the unruly canvas to the prescribed limits.

The Pilot alone, in that confused and busy throng, where voice rose above voice, and cry echoed cry in quick succession, appeared as if he held no interest in the important stake. With his eyes steadily fixed on the approaching mist, and his arms folded together in composure, he stood calmly waiting the result.

The ship had fallen off with her broadside to the sea, and was become unmanageable, and the sails were already brought into the folds necessary to her security, when the quick and heavy fluttering of canvas was thrown across the water with all the gloomy and chilling sensations that such sounds produce, where darkness and danger unite to appall the seaman.

Haul up the lower fore and main sails to the yards; the sails prevented the officers on deck from judging the direction of the very slight breeze.

&lt;sup>2</sup> when beating against the wind, to change the ship to the other course by steering away from the wind and turning the ship around

"The schooner has it!" cried Griffith. "Barnstable has held on, like himself, to the last moment. God send that the squall leave him cloth enough to keep him from the shore!"

"His sails are easily handled," the commander observed, "and she must be over the principal danger. We are falling off before it, Mr. Gray; shall we try a cast of the lead?"

The Pilot turned from his contemplative posture, and moved slowly across the deck before he returned any reply to this question, like a man who not only felt that everything depended on himself, but that he was equal to the emergency.

"'Tis unnecessary," he at length said; "'twould be certain destruction to be taken aback; and it is difficult to say, within several points, how the wind may strike us."

"'Tis difficult no longer," cried Griffith; "for here it comes, and in right earnest!"

The rushing sounds of the wind were now. indeed, heard at hand; and the words were hardly past the lips of the young lieutenant, before the vessel bowed down heavily to one side, and then, as she began to move through the water, rose again majestically to her upright position, as if saluting, like a courteous champion, the powerful antagonist with which she was about to contend. Not another minute elapsed before the ship was throwing the water aside, with a lively progress, and, obedient to her helm, was brought as near to the desired course as the direction of the wind would allow. The hurry and bustle on the yards gradually subsided, and the men slowly descended to the deck, all straining their eyes to pierce the gloom in which they were enveloped, and some shaking their heads, in melancholy doubt, afraid to express the apprehensions they really entertained. All on board anxiously waited for the fury of the gale; for there were none so ignorant or inexperienced in that gallant frigate, as not to know that as yet they only felt the infant efforts of the wind. Each moment, however, it increased in power, though so gradual was the alteration that the relieved mariners began to believe that all their gloomy forebodings were not to be realized. During this short interval of uncertainty, no other sounds were heard than the whistling of the breeze as it passed quickly through the mass of rigging that belonged to the vessel, and the dashing of the spray that began to fly from her bows like the foam of a cataract.

"It blows fresh," cried Griffith, who was the first to speak in that moment of doubt and anxiety; "but it is no more than a capful of wind after all. Give us elbow-room, and the right canvas, Mr. Pilot, and I'll handle the ship like a gentleman's yacht, in this breeze." "Will she stay, think ye, under this sail?"

said the low voice of the stranger.

"She will do all that man, in reason, can ask of wood and iron," returned the lieutenant; "but the vessel don't float the ocean that will tack under double-reefed topsails alone, against a heavy sea. Help her with the courses, 1 Pilot, and you shall see her come round like a dancing-master."

"Let us feel the strength of the gale first," returned the man who was called Mr. Gray, moving from the side of Griffith to the weather gangway of the vessel, where he stood in silence, looking ahead of the ship, with an air of singular coolness and abstraction.

All the lanterns had been extinguished on the deck of the frigate, when her anchor was secured, and as the first mist of the gale had passed over, it was succeeded by a faint light that was a good deal aided by the glittering foam of the waters, which now broke in white curls around the vessel in every direction. The land could be faintly discerned, rising like a heavy bank of black fog, above the margin of the waters, and was only distinguishable from the heavens by its deeper gloom and obscurity. The last rope was coiled and deposited in its proper place by the seamen, and for several minutes the stillness of death pervaded the crowded decks. It was evident to everyone that their ship was dashing at a prodigious rate through the waves and as she was approaching, with such velocity, the quarter of the bay where the shoals and dangers were known to be situated, nothing but the habits of the most exact discipline could suppress the uneasiness of the officers and men within their own bosoms. At length the voice of Captain Munson was heard, calling to the Pilot.

"Shall I send a hand into the chains, Mr.

Gray," he said, "and try our water?"

Although this question was asked aloud, and the interest it excited drew many of the officers and men around him in eager impatience for his answer, it was unheeded by the man to whom it was addressed. His head rested on his hand, as he leaned over the hammock-cloths <sup>2</sup> of the vessel, and his whole air was that of one whose thoughts wandered from the pressing necessity of their situation. Griffith was among those who had approached the Pilot; and after waiting a moment. from respect, to hear the answer to his commander's question, he presumed on

¹ lower fore and main sails ² tarpaulins covering the hammocks which were stowed, when not in use, in the bulwarks of the old men-of-war his own rank, and leaving the circle that stood at a little distance, stepped to the side of the mysterious guardian of their lives.

"Captain Munson desires to know whether you wish a cast of the lead," said the young officer, with a little impatience of manner. No immediate answer was made to this repetition of the question, and Griffith laid his hand unceremoniously on the shoulder of the other, with an intent to rouse him before he made another application for a reply, but the convulsive start of the Pilot held him silent in amazement.

"Fall back there," said the lieutenant, sternly, to the men who were closing around them in a compact circle; "away with you to your stations, and see all clear for stays." The dense mass of heads dissolved, at this order, like the water of one of the waves commingling with the ocean, and the lieutenant and his companion were left by themselves.

"This is not a time for musing, Mr. Gray," continued Griffith; "remember our compact, and look to your charge; is it not time to put the vessel in stays? Of what are you dreaming?"

The Pilot laid his hand on the extended arm of the lieutenant and grasped it with a convulsive pressure, as he answered,- "'Tis a dream of reality. You are young, Mr. Griffith, nor am I past the noon of life; but should you live fifty years longer, you never can see and experience what I have encountered in my little period of three-and-thirty years!"

A good deal astonished at this burst of feeling, so singular at such a moment, the young sailor was at a loss for a reply; but as his duty was uppermost in his thoughts he still dwelt on the theme that most interested him.

"I hope much of your experience has been on this coast, for the ship travels lively," he said, "and the daylight showed us so much to dread that we do not feel over valiant in the dark. How much longer shall we stand on, upon this tack?"

The Pilot turned slowly from the side of the vessel, and walked towards the commander of the frigate, as he replied, in a tone that seemed deeply agitated by his melancholy reflections.—

"You have your wish, then; much, very much of my early life was passed on this dreaded coast. What to you is all darkness and gloom, to me is light as if a noon-day sun shone upon it. But tack your ship, it, tack your ship; I would see how she works before we reach the point where she must behave well or we perish."

Griffith gazed after him in wonder, while the Pilot slowly paced the quarter-deck, and then. rousing from his trance, gave forth the cheering order that called each man to his station to perform the desired evolution. The confident assurances which the young officer had given to the pilot respecting the qualities of his vessel. and his own ability to manage her, were fully realized by the result. The helm was no sooner put a-lee, than the huge ship bore up gallantly against the wind, and, dashing directly through the waves, threw the foam high into the air as she looked boldly into the very eye of the wind: and then, yielding gracefully to its power. she fell off on the other tack, with her head pointed from those dangerous shoals that she had so recently approached with such terrifying velocity. The heavy yards swung round, as if they had been vanes to indicate the currents of air: and in a few moments the frigate again moved, with stately progress, through the water, leaving the rocks and shoals behind her on one side of the bay, but advancing towards those that offered equal danger on the other.

During this time the sea was becoming more agitated, and the violence of the wind was gradually increasing. The latter no longer whistled amid the cordage of the vessel, but it seemed to howl, surlily, as it passed the complicated machinery that the frigate obtruded on its path. An endless succession of white surges rose above the heavy billows, and the very air was glittering with the light that was disengaged from the ocean. The ship yielded, each moment, more and more before the storm, and in less than half an hour from the time that she had lifted her anchor, she was driven along with tremendous fury by the full power of a gale of wind. Still, the hardy and experienced mariners who directed her movements held her to the course that was necessary to their preservation, and still Griffith gave forth, when directed by their unknown Pilot, those orders that turned her in the narrow channel where alone safety was to be found.

So far, the performance of his duty appeared easy to the stranger, and he gave the required directions in those still, calm tones, that formed so remarkable a contrast to the responsibility of his situation. But when the land was becoming dim, in distance as well as darkness, and the agitated sea alone was to be discovered as it swept by them in foam, he broke in upon the monotonous roaring of the tempest with the sounds of his voice, seeming to shake off his apathy and rouse himself to the occasion.

"Now is the time to watch her closely, Mr. Griffith," he cried; "here we get the true tide and the real danger. Place the best quartermaster of your ship in those chains, and let an officer stand by him, and see that he gives us the right water."

<sup>1</sup> ready for executing the maneuver of tacking

"I will take that office on myself," said the captain, "pass a light into the weather main-chains.'

"Stand by your braces!" a exclaimed the Pilot, with startling quickness, "Heave away that lead!"

These preparations taught the crew to expect the crisis, and every officer and man stood in fearful silence, at his assigned station, awaiting the issue of the trial. Even the quartermaster at the con 2 gave out his orders to the men at the wheel, in deeper and hoarser tones than usual, as if anxious not to disturb the quiet and order of the vessel.

While this deep expectation pervaded the frigate, the piercing cry of the leadsman, as he called "By the mark seven," rose above the tempest, crossed over the decks, and appeared to pass away to leeward, borne on the blast like the warnings of some water spirit.

"'Tis well," returned the Pilot calmly; "try it again."

The short pause was succeeded by another cry, "And a half-five!"

"She shoals! she shoals!" exclaimed Griffith:

"keep her a good full." 3

"Aye! you must hold the vessel in command, now," said the Pilot, with those cool tones that are most appalling in critical moments, because they seem to denote most preparation and care.

The third call, "By the deep four!" was followed by a prompt direction from the stranger to tack.

Griffith seemed to emulate the coolness of the Pilot, in issuing the necessary orders to execute this maneuver.

The vessel rose slowly from the inclined position into which she had been forced by the tempest, and the sails were shaking violently, as if to release themselves from their confinement, while the ship stemmed the billows, when the well-known voice of the sailingmaster was heard shouting from the forecastle,—

"Breakers! breakers, dead ahead!"

This appalling sound seemed yet to be lingering about the ship, when a second voice cried,---

"Breakers on our lee-bow!"

"We are in the bight of the shoals, Mr. Gray," cried the commander. "She loses her way: perhaps an anchor might hold her."

"Clear away that best bower!" 4 shouted

Griffith through his trumpet.

"Hold on!" cried the Pilot, in a voice that reached the very hearts of all who heard him: "hold on everything."

The young man turned fiercely to the daring stranger who thus defied the discipline of his vessel, and at once demanded,-

"Who is it that dares to countermand my orders? is it not enough that you run the ship into danger, but you must interfere to keep her there? If another word"-

"Peace, Mr. Griffith," interrupted the captain. bending from the rigging, his gray locks blowing about in the wind, and adding a look of wildness to the haggard care that he exhibited by the light of the lantern; "yield the trumpet to Mr. Gray; he alone can save us."

Griffith threw his speaking-trumpet on the deck, and as he walked proudly away, muttered in bitterness of feeling.

"Then all is lost, indeed! and among the rest. the foolish hopes with which I visited this coast."

There was, however, no time for reply; the ship had been rapidly running into the wind, and as the efforts of the crew were paralyzed by the contradictory orders they had heard, she gradually lost her way, and in a few seconds all her sails were taken aback.

Before the crew understood their situation. the Pilot had applied the trumpet to his mouth, and in a voice that rose above the tempest, he thundered forth his orders. Each command was given distinctly, and with a precision that showed him to be master of his profession. The helm was kept fast, the head yards swung up heavily against the wind, and the vessel was soon whirling round on her heel, with a retrograde movement.

Griffith was too much of a seaman not to perceive that the Pilot had seized, with a perception almost intuitive, the only method that promised to extricate the vessel from her situation. He was young, impetuous, and proudbut he was also generous. Forgetting his resentment and his mortification, he rushed forward among the men, and, by his presence and example, added certainty to the experiment. The ship fell off slowly before the gale, and bowed her yards nearly to the water, as she felt the blast pouring its fury on her broadside, while the surly waves beat violently against her stern, as if in reproach at departing from her usual manner of moving.

ropes from the yards to the deck, holding the yards in a given direction

&lt;sup>2</sup> any station taken by the officer giving orders to the men at the wheel <sup>3</sup> keep all sails full by sailing not too close to the wind

<sup>4</sup> largest anchor

The voice of the Pilot, however, was still heard, steady and calm, and yet so clear and high as to reach every ear; and the obedient seamen whirled the vards at his bidding, in despite of the tempest, as if they handled the toys of their childhood. When the ship had fallen off dead before the wind, her head-sails were shaken, her after-yards trimmed, and her helm shifted, before she had time to run upon the danger that had threatened, as well to leeward as to windward. The beautiful fabric. obedient to her government, threw her bows up gracefully towards the wind again; and, as her sails were trimmed, moved out from amongst the dangerous shoals in which she had been embayed, as steadily and swiftly as she had approached them.

A moment of breathless astonishment succeeded the accomplishment of this nice maneuver, but there was no time for the usual expressions of surprise. The stranger still held the trumpet, and continued to lift his voice amid the howlings of the blast, whenever prudence or skill required any change in the management of the ship. For an hour longer there was a fearful struggle for their preservation, the channel becoming at each step more complicated, and the shoals thickening around the mariners on every side. The lead was cast rapidly, and the quick eye of the Pilot seemed to pierce the darkness with a keenness of vision that exceeded human power. It was apparent to all in the vessel that they were under the guidance of one who understood the navigation thoroughly, and their exertions kept pace with their reviving confidence. Again and again the frigate appeared to be rushing blindly on shoals where the sea was covered with foam, and where destruction would have been as sudden as it was certain, when the clear voice of the stranger was heard warning them of the danger and inciting them to their duty. The vessel was implicitly yielded to his government; and during those anxious moments when she was dashing the waters aside, throwing the spray over her enormous yards, each ear would listen eagerly for those sounds that had obtained a command over the crew, that can only be acquired, under such circumstances, by great steadiness and consummate skill. The ship was recovering from the inaction of changing her course, in one of those critical tacks that she had made so often, when the Pilot, for the first time, addressed the commander of the frigate, who still continued to superintend the all-important duty of the leadsman."

"Now is the pinch," he said, "and if the ship behaves well, we are safe; but if otherwise, all we have yet done will be useless."

The veteran seaman whom he addressed, left the chains at this portentous notice, and calling to his first lieutenant, required of the stranger an explanation of his warning.

"See you you light on the southern headland?" returned the Pilot; "you may know it from the star near it, by its sinking, at times, in the ocean. Now observe the hummock a little north of it, looking like a shadow in the horizon; 'tis a hill far inland. If we keep that light open from the hill, we shall do well; but if not, we surely go to pieces."

"Let us tack again!" exclaimed the lieutenant. The Pilot shook his head as he replied.—

"There is no more tacking or box-hauling 1 to be done tonight. We have barely room to pass out of the shoals on this course; and if we can weather the 'Devil's Grip,' we clear their outermost point; but if not, as I said before, there is but an alternative."

"If we had beaten out the way we entered," exclaimed Griffith, "we should have done well."

"Say, also, if the tide would have let us do so," returned the Pilot, calmly. "Gentlemen, we must be prompt; we have but a mile to go, and the ship appears to fly. That topsail is not enough to keep her up to the wind; we want both jib and mainsail."

"'Tis a perilous thing to loosen canvas in such a tempest!" observed the doubtful captain.

"It must be done," returned the collected stranger; "we perish without it; see! the light already touches the edge of the hummock; the sea casts us to leeward!"

"It shall be done!" cried Griffith, seizing the trumpet from the hand of the Pilot.

The orders of the lieutenant were executed almost as soon as issued; and, everything being ready, the enormous folds of the mainsail were trusted loose to the blast. There was an instant when the result was doubtful; the tremendous threshing of the heavy sail seemed to bid defiance to all restraint, shaking the ship to her center; but art and strength prevailed, and gradually the canvas was distended, and bellying as it filled, was drawn down to its usual place by the power of a hundred men. The vessel yielded to this immense addition of force, and bowed before it like a reed bending to a breeze. But the success of the measure was announced by a joyful cry from the stranger, that seemed to burst from his inmost soul.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a method of coming upon the other tack by steering the ship into the wind and then backing away from the wind in turning

"She feels it! she springs her luff! 1 observe." he said, "the light opens from the hummock already: if she will only bear her canvas, we shall go clear!"

A report, like that of a cannon, interrupted his exclamation, and something resembling a white cloud was seen drifting before the wind from the head of the ship, till it was driven into the gloom far to leeward.

"'Tis the jib, blown from the bolt-ropes," said the commander of the frigate. no time to spread light duck-but the mainsail may stand it vet."

"The sail would laugh at a tornado," returned the lieutenant; "but the mast springs like a piece of steel."

"Silence all!" cried the Pilot. "Now, gentlemen, we shall soon know our fate. Let her luff -luff you can!" 2

This warning effectually closed all discourse. and the hardy mariners, knowing that they had already done all in the power of man to insure their safety, stood in breathless anxiety awaiting the result. At a short distance ahead of them the whole ocean was white with foam. and the waves instead of rolling on in regular succession, appeared to be tossing about in mad gambols. A single streak of dark billows, not half a cable's length in width, could be discerned running into this chaos of water; but it was soon lost to the eve amid the confusion of the disturbed element. Along this narrow path the vessel moved more heavily than before, being brought so near the wind as to keep her sails touching. The Pilot silently proceeded to the wheel, and, with his own hands, he undertook the steerage of the ship. No noise proceeded from the frigate to interrupt the horrid tumult of the ocean; and she entered the channel among the breakers, with the silence of a desperate calmness. Twenty times, as the foam rolled away to leeward, the crew were on the eve of uttering their joy, as they supposed the vessel past the danger; but breaker after breaker would still heave up before them, following each other into the general mass, to check their exultation. Occasionally, the fluttering of the sails would be heard; and when the looks of the startled seamen were turned to the wheel, they beheld the stranger grasping its spokes, with his quick eye glancing from the water to the canvas. At length the ship reached a point where she appeared to be rushing directly into the jaws of destruction, when suddenly her course was changed, and her head receded rapidly from the wind. At the same instant the voice of the Pilot was heard shout-

"Square away the yards!—in mainsail!"

A general burst from the crew echoed, "Square away the yards!" and, quick as thought, the frigate was seen gliding along the channel before the wind. The eve had hardly time to dwell on the foam, which seemed like clouds driving in the heavens, and directly the gallant vessel issued from her perils, and rose and fell on the heavy waves of the sea.

The seamen were yet drawing long breaths, and gazing about them like men recovered from a trance, when Griffith approached the man who had so successfully conducted them through their perils. The lieutenant grasped the hand of the other, as he said.—

"You have this night proved yourself a faithful pilot and such a seaman as the world cannot equal."

The pressure of the hand was warmly returned by the unknown mariner, who replied,—

"I am no stranger to the seas, and I may yet find my grave in them. But you, too, have deceived me; you have acted nobly, young man, and Congress-"

"What of Congress?" asked Griffith, observing him to pause.

"Why, Congress is fortunate if it has many such ships as this," said the stranger, coldly, walking away towards the commander.

Griffith gazed after him a moment in surprise; but, as his duty required his attention, other thoughts soon engaged his mind.

The vessel was pronounced to be in safety. The gale was heavy and increasing, but there was a clear sea before them; and, as she slowly stretched out into the bosom of the ocean, preparations were made for her security during its continuance. Before midnight, everything was in order.

A gun from the Ariel soon announced the safety of the schooner also, which had gone out by another and an easier channel that the frigate had not dared to attempt; when the commander directed the usual watch to be set, and the remainder of the crew to seek their necessary repose.

The captain withdrew with the mysterious pilot to his own cabin. Griffith gave his last order; and renewing his charge to the officer instructed with the care of the vessel, he wished him a pleasant watch, and sought the refreshment of his own cot. For an hour the young lieutenant lav musing on the events of the day. The remark of Barnstable would occur to him, in connection with the singular comment of the boy; and then his thoughts would recur to the Pilot, who, taken from the hostile shores of Britain, and with her accent on his tongue, had served them so faithfully and so well. He remembered the anxiety of Captain Munson to procure this stranger, at the very hazard from which they had just been relieved, and puzzled himself with conjecturing why a pilot was to be sought at such a risk. His more private feelings would then resume their sway, and the recollection of America, his mistress, his home, mingled with the confused images of the drowsy vouth. The dashing of the billows against the side of the ship, the creaking of guns and bulkheads, with the roaring of the tempest, however, became gradually less and less distinct, until nature yielded to necessity, and the young man forgot even the romantic images of his love, in the deep sleep of a seaman.

&lt;sup>1</sup> sails closer to the wind <sup>2</sup> come nearer the wind, as close as you can

1823

From THE DEERSLAYER <sup>1</sup> CHAPTER XXVII

Thou hast been busy, Death, this day, and yet But half thy work is done! The gates of hell Are thronged, yet twice ten thousand spirits more, Who, from their warm and healthful tenements, Fear no divorce, must, ere the sun go down, Enter the world of woe!

SOUTHEY

One experienced in the signs of the heavens would have seen that the sun wanted but two or three minutes of the zenith, when Deerslayer landed on the point where the Hurons were now encamped, nearly abreast of the castle. This spot was similar to the one already described, with the exception that the surface of the land was less broken and less crowded with trees.

The Decrslayer is placed before The Prairie because, though last in date of composition, it is first in epic order of the Leatherstocking Tales. These tales vary in scene and in characters, but they work out a unified theme, the contact of the red man with the white, at the shifting border of American settlement, from the Mohawk to the Platte. One character, Natty Bumppo, or Leatherstocking, or Deerslayer, as he is variously called, runs through all the tales. He has been brought up among the Delaware Indians, and has, at the beginning of the present tale, come to Otsego Lake in the central part of the present state of New York. The time is the beginning of the French and Indian War and the region is a wilderness. Here he is to meet a young Delaware chief, Chingachgook, or The Serpent, of the renowned Uncas family, whose betrothed, Hist, or Wahta-Wah, has been, through the connivance of the traiter B iarthorn, stolen away and adopted by the Hurons, a tribe of the Iroquois or Mingo Confederacy. The only settlers at the lake are the old trapper, Hutter, and his two daughters,

Owing to these two circumstances, it was all the better suited to the purpose for which it had been selected, the space beneath the branches bearing some resemblance to a densely-wooded lawn. Favored by its position and its spring, it had been much resorted to by savages and hunters, and the natural grasses has succeeded their fires, leaving an appearance of sward in places, a very unusual accompaniment of the virgin forest. Nor was the margin of water fringed with bushes as on so much of its shore, but the eye penetrated the woods immediately on reaching the strand, commanding nearly the whole area of the projection.

If it was a point of honor with the Indian warrior to redeem his word, when pledged to return and meet his death at a given hour, so was it a point of characteristic pride to show no womanish impatience but to reappear as nearly as possible at the appointed moment. It was well not to exceed the grace accorded by the generosity of the enemy, but it was better to meet it to a minute. Something of this dramatic effect mingles with most of the graver usages of the American aborigines, and no doubt —like the prevalence of a similar feeling among people more sophisticated and refined-may be referred to a principle of nature. We all love the wonderful, and when it comes attended by chivalrous self-devotion and a rigid regard to honor, it presents itself to our admiration in a shape doubly attractive. As respects Deerslaver, though he took a pride in showing his the beautiful Judith and the seeble-minded Hester. This family, for protection from the Indians, lives in the "castle," a lake-dwelling on piles, or sometimes in the "ark," a rude house-boat. Just as Deerslayer arrives at the lake in the company of Hurons attempts to surprise the lake-dwellers. Hutter and Hurry, against the protest of Deerslayer, risk a night attack on these Indians for the sake of the scalp-bounty. They are themselves captured, but Deerslayer manages to negotiate their release in exchange for four curiously carved vory chess-men in the form of elephants, that he finds, together with rich articles of dress, in a mysterious chest of Hutter's. A day or two later the Hurons attack the "castle" and kill and scalp Hutter. Deerslayer and Chingachgook, finding that Hist is captive in the same camp of Hurons, steal upon the camp at night, and snatch Hist away; but Deerslayer is himself made captive. The fo'lowing day the Hurons release him on twenty-four hours' furlough: if Hist is returned to the Hurons and Judith and Hester will also go with the Hurons, Deerslayer is to be free. These conditions none will accept, much less will Deerslayer advise them; and he himself, true to his word, returns to the Huron camp at the edge of the lake to undergo, as he has every reason to expect, death by torture as a captive enemy. The selection above begins as he sets foot among the savages. These have just begun to suspect that their presence may be known at the frontier posts, and are in some haste to set out on their return to Canada.

white blood, by often deviating from the usages of the red men, he frequently dropped into their customs, and oftener into their feelings. unconsciously to himself, in consequence of having no other arbiters to appeal to than their judgments and tastes. On the present occasion. he would have abstained from betraying a feverish haste by a too speedy return, since it would have contained a tacit admission that the time asked for was more than had been wanted; but. on the other hand, had the idea occurred to him, he would have quickened his movements a little. in order to avoid the dramatic appearance of returning at the precise instant set as the utmost limit of his absence. Still, accident had interfered to defeat the last intention, for when the young man put his foot on the point, and advanced with a steady tread toward the group of chiefs that was seated in grave array on a fallen tree, the oldest of their number cast his eve upward at an opening in the trees, and pointed out to his companions the startling fact that the sun was just entering a space that was known to mark the zenith. A common but low exclamation of surprise and admiration escaped every mouth, and the grim warriors looked at each other; some with envy and disappointment, some with astonishment at the precise accuracy of their victim, and others with a more generous and liberal feeling. The American Indian always deemed his moral victories the noblest, prizing the groans and yielding of his victim under torture more than the trophy of his scalp; and the trophy itself more than his life. To slay, and not to bring off the proof of victory, indeed, was scarcely deemed honorable; even these rude and fierce tenants of the forest, like their more nurtured brethren of the court and the camp, having set up for themselves imaginary and arbitrary points of honor, to supplant the conclusions of the right and the decisions of reason.

The Hurons had been divided in their opinions concerning the probability of their captive's return. Most among them, indeed, had not expected it possible for a paleface to come back voluntarily, and meet the known penalties of an Indian torture; but a few of the seniors expected better things from one who had already shown himself so singularly cool, brave, and upright. The party had come to its decision, however, less in the expectation of finding the pledge redeemed, than in the hope of disgracing the Delawares by casting into their teeth the delinquency of one bred in their villages. They would have greatly preferred that Chingachgook should be their prisoner, and prove the traitor; but the paleface scion of the hated stock was no bad substitute for their purposes, failing in their designs against the ancient stem. With a view to render the triumph as signal as possible, in the event of the hour's passing without the reappearance of the hunter, all the warriors and scouts of the party had been called in: and the whole band, men. women and children, was now assembled at this single point, to be a witness of the expected scene. As the castle was in plain view, and by no means distant, it was easily watched by daylight; and it being thought that its inmates were now limited to Hurry, the Delaware, and the two girls, no apprehensions were felt of their being able to escape unseen. A large raft, having a breastwork of logs, had been prepared, and was in actual readiness to be used against either ark or castle, as occasion might require. as soon as the fate of Deerslayer was determined; the seniors of the party having come to the opinion that it was getting to be hazardous to delay their departure for Canada beyond the coming night. In short, the band waited merely to dispose of this single affair, ere it brought matters to a crisis, and prepared to commence its retreat towards the distant waters of Ontario.

It was an imposing scene into which Deerslaver now found himself advancing. All the older warriors were seated on the trunk of the fallen tree, waiting his approach with grave decorum. On the right stood the young men, armed, while the left was occupied by the women and children. In the center was an open space of considerable extent, always canopied by leaves, but from which the underbrush, dead wood, and other obstacles had been carefully removed. The more open area had probably been much used by former parties, for this was the place where the appearance of a sward was the most decided. The arches of the woods, even at high noon, cast their somber shadows on the spot, which the brilliant rays of the sun that struggled through the leaves contributed to mellow, and, if such an expression can be used, to illuminate. It was probably from a similar scene that the mind of man first got its idea of the effects of Gothic tracery and churchly hues; 1 this temple of nature producing some such effect, so far as light and shadows were concerned, as the well-known offspring of human invention.

As was not unusual among the tribes and wandering bands of the aborigines, two chiefs shared, in nearly equal degrees, the principal and primitive authority that was wielded over these children of the forest. There were several who might claim the distinction of being chief men but the two in question were so much superior to all the rest in influence, that when they agreed, no one disputed their mandates: and when they were divided, the band hesitated. like men who had lost their governing principle of action. It was also in conformity with practice—perhaps we might add, in conformity with nature—that one of the chiefs was indebted to his mind for his influence, whereas the other owed his distinction altogether to qualities that were physical. One was a senior well known for eloquence in debate, wisdom in council, and prudence in measures: while his great competitor, if not his rival, was a brave,—distinguished in war, notorious for ferocity, and remarkable, in the way of intellect, for nothing but the cunning and expedients of the warpath. The first was Rivenoak, who has already been introduced to the reader, while the last was called Le Panthère, in the language of the Canadas; or the Panther, to resort to the vernacular of the English colonies. The appellation of the fighting chief was supposed to indicate the qualities of the warrior, agreeably to a practice of the red man's nomenclature; ferocity, cunning, and treachery being, perhaps, the distinctive features of his character. The title had been received from the French, and was prized so much the more from that circumstance, the Indian submitting profoundly to the greater intelligence of his paleface allies in most things of this nature. How well the sobriquet was merited will be seen in the sequel.

More recent investigation renders untenable this theory of the origin of Gothic architecture.

Rivenoak and the Panther sat side by side, awaiting the approach of their prisoner, as Deerslayer put his moccasined foot on the strand; nor did either move or utter a syllable until the young man had advanced into the center of the area, and proclaimed his presence with his voice. This was done firmly, though in the simple manner that marked the character of the individual.

"Here I am, Mingos," he said, in the dialect of the Delawares, a language that most present understood; "here I am, and there is the sun. One is not more true to the laws of natur' than the other has proved true to his word. I am your prisoner; do with me what you please. My business with man and 'arth is settled; nothing remains now but to meet the white man's God; accordin' to a white man's duties and gifts."

A murmur of approbation escaped even the women at this address, and, for an instant, there was a strong and pretty general desire to adopt into the tribe one who owned so brave a Still there were dissenters from this wish, among the principal of whom might be classed the Panther, and his sister. Le Sumach. so called from the number of her children, who was the widow of Le Loup Cervier. 1 now known to have fallen by the hand of the captive. Native ferocity held one in subjection, while the corroding passion of revenge prevented the other from admittting any gentler feeling at the moment. Not so with Rivenoak. chief arose, stretched his arm before him, in a gesture of courtesy, and paid his compliments with an ease and dignity that a prince might have envied. As, in that band, his wisdom and eloquence were confessedly without rivals, he knew that on himself would properly fall the duty of first replying to the speech of the paleface.

"Paleface, you are honest," said the Huron orator. "My people are happy in having captured a man, and not a skulking fox. We now know you; we shall treat you like a brave. If you have slain one of our warriors, and helped to kill others, you have a life of your own ready to give away in return. Some of my young men thought that the blood of a paleface was too thin: that it would refuse to run under the Huron knife. You will show them it is not so: your heart is stout as well as your body. It is a pleasure to make such a prisoner; should my warriors say that the death of Le Loup Cervier ought not to be forgotten, and that he cannot travel towards the land of spirits alone, that his enemy must be sent to overtake him, they will remember that he fell by the hand of a brave, and send you after him with such signs of our friendship as shall not make him ashamed to keep your company. I have spoken: you know what I have said."

"True enough, Mingo, all true as the gospel," returned the simple-minded hunter; "you have spoken, and I do know, not only what you have said, but, what is still more important, what you mean. I dare say your warrior, the Lynx, was a stout-hearted brave, and worthy of your fri'ndship and respect, but I do not feel unworthy to keep his company, without any passport from your hands. Nevertheless, here I am, ready to receive judgment from your council, if, indeed, the matter was not detarmined among you afore I got back."

"My old men would not sit in council over a paleface until they saw him among them," Deerslayer had killed The Lyux or Le Loup Cervier, in a skirmish a few days before.

answered Rivenoak, looking around him a little ironically; "they said it would be like sitting in council over the winds; they go where they will, and come back as they see fit, and not otherwise. There was one voice that spoke in your favor, Deerslayer, but it was alone, like the song of the wren whose mate has been struck by the hawk."

"I thank that voice, whosever it may have been, Mingo, and will say it was as true a voice as the rest were lying voices. A furlough is as binding on a paleface, if he be honest, as it is on a redskin; and was it not so, I would never bring disgrace on the Delawares, among whom I may be said to have received my edication. But words are useless, and lead to braggin' feelin's; here I am; act your will on me."

Rivenoak made a sign of acquiescence, and then a short conference was privately held among the chiefs. As soon as the latter ended. three or four young men fell back from among the armed group, and disappeared. Then it was signified to the prisoner that he was at liberty to go at large on the point, until a council was held concerning his fate. was more of seeming than of real confidence, however, in this apparent liberality, inasmuch as the young men mentioned already formed a line of sentinels across the breadth of the point, inland, and escape from any other part was out of the question. Even the canoe was removed beyond this line of sentinels, to a spot where it was considered safe from any sudden attempt. These precautions did not proceed from a failure of confidence, but from the circumstance that the prisoner had now complied with all the required conditions of his parole, and it would have been considered a commendable and honorable exploit to escape from his foes. So nice, indeed, were the distinctions drawn by the savages, in cases of this nature, that they often gave their victims a chance to evade the torture, deeming it as creditable to the captors to overtake, or to outwit a fugitive, when his exertions were supposed to be quickened by the extreme jeopardy of his situation, as it was for him to get clear from so much extraordinary vigilance.

Nor was Deerslayer unconscious of, or forgetful of, his rights and his opportunities. Could he now have seen any probable opening for an escape, the attempt would not have been delayed a minute. But the case seemed desperate. He was aware of the line of sentinels, and felt the difficulty of breaking through it unharmed. The lake offered no advantages, as the canoe would have given his foes the greatest facilities for overtaking him: else would he have found it no difficult task to swim as far as the castle. As he walked about the point, he even examined the spot to ascertain if it offered no place of concealment; but its openness, its size, and the hundred watchful glances that were turned towards him, even while those who made them affected not to see him, prevented any such expedient from succeeding. The dread and disgrace of failure had no influence on Deerslayer, who deemed it ever a point of honor to reason and feel like a white man, rather than as an Indian, and who felt it a sort of duty to do all he could that did not involve a dereliction from principle, in order to save his life. Still he hesitated about making the effort, for he also felt that he ought to see the chance of success before he committed himself.

In the mean time the business of the camp appeared to proceed in its regular train. The chiefs consulted apart, admitting no one but the Sumach to their councils; for she, the widow of the fallen warrior, had an exclusive right to be heard on such an occasion. The young men strolled about in indolent listlessness, awaiting the result with Indian impatience, while the females prepared the feast that was to celebrate the termination of the affair, whether it proved fortunate or otherwise for our hero. No one betrayed feeling; and an indifferent observer, beyond the extreme watchfulness of the sentinels, would have detected no extraordinary movement or sensation to denote the real state of things. Two or three old women put their heads together, and it appeared unfavorably to the prospect of Deerslayer, by their scowling looks and angry gestures; but a group of Indian girls were evidently animated by a different impulse, as was apparent by stolen glances that expressed pity and regret. In this condition of the camp, an hour soon glided away.

Suspense is, perhaps, the feeling of all others, that is most difficult to be supported. When Deerslayer landed, he fully expected in the course of a few minutes to undergo the tortures of an Indian revenge, and he was prepared to meet his fate manfully; but the delay proved far more trying than the nearer approach of suffering, and the intended victim began seriously to meditate some desperate effort at escape, as it might be from sheer anxiety to terminate the scene, when he was suddenly summoned to appear, once more, in front of his judges, who had already arranged the band in its former order, in readiness to receive him.

"Killer of the Deer," commenced Rivenoak, as soon as his captive stood before him. "my aged men have listened to wise words; they are ready to speak. You are a man whose fathers came from beyond the rising sun; we are children of the setting sun; we turn our faces towards the Great Sweet Lakes when we look towards our villages. It may be a wise country and full of riches towards the morning, but it is very pleasant towards the evening. We love most to look in that direction. When we gaze at the east we feel afraid, canoe after canoe bringing more and more of your people in the track of the sun, as if their land was so full as to run over. The red men are few already: they have need of help. One of our best lodges has lately been emptied by the death of its master: it will be a long time before his son can grow big enough to sit in his place. There is his widow! she will want venison to feed her and her children, for her sons are yet like the young of the robin before they quit the nest. By your hand has this great calamity befallen her. She has two duties: one to Le Loup Cervier, and one to his children. Scalp for scalp, life for life, blood for blood, is one law; to feed her young another. We know you, Killer of the Deer. You are honest; when you say a thing it is so. You have but one tongue. and that is not forked like a snake's. Your head is never hid in the grass; all can see it. What you say that will you do. You are just. When you have done wrong, it is your wish to do right again as soon as you can. Here is the Sumach; she is alone in her wigwam, with children crying around her for food; yonder is a rifle, it is loaded and ready to be fired. Take the gun; go forth and shoot a deer; bring the venison and lav it before the widow of Le Loup Cervier; feed her children; call yourself her husband. After which your heart will no longer be Delaware, but Huron; Le Sumach's ears will not hear the cries of her children; my people will count the proper number of warriors.

"I feared this, Rivenoak," answered Deerslayer, when the other had ceased speaking; "yes, I did dread that it would come to this. Hows'ever, the truth is soon told, and that will put an end to all expectations on this head. Mingo, I'm white, and Christian-born; 'twould ill become me to take a wife, under redskin forms, from among heathen. That which I wouldn't do in peaceable times, and under a bright sun, still less would I do behind clouds, in order to save my life. I may never marry; most likely Providence, in putting me up here in the woods, has intended I should live single, and without a lodge of my own; but should such a thing come to pass, none but a woman of my own color and gifts shall darken the door of my wigwam. As for feeding the young of your dead warrior, I would do that cheerfully, could it be done without discredit: but it cannot, seeing that I can never live in a Huron village. Your own young men must find the Sumach in venison, and the next time she marries, let her take a husband whose legs are not long enough to overrun territory that don't belong to him. We fou't a fair battle, and he fell.—in this there is nothin' but what a brave expects, and should be ready to meet. As for getting a Mingo heart, as well might you expect to see gray hairs on a boy, or the blackberry growing on the pine. No, no, Huron; my gifts are white so far as wives are consarned; it is Delaware in all things touchin' Injins."

These words were scarcely out of the mouth of Deerslayer before a common murmur betrayed the dissatisfaction with which they had been heard. The aged women, in particular, were loud in their expressions of disgust; and the gentle Sumach herself, a woman quite old enough to be our hero's mother, was not the least pacific in her denunciations. But all the other manifestations of disappointment and discontent were thrown into the background by the fierce resentment of the Panther. grim chief had thought it a degradation to permit his sister to become the wife of a paleface of the Yengeese, 1 at all, and had only given a reluctant consent to the arrangement-one by no means unusual among the Indians, however -at the earnest solicitations of the bereaved widow; and it goaded him to the quick to find his condescension slighted, the honor he with so much regret had been persuaded to accord, contemned. The animal from which he got his name does not glare on his intended prey with more frightful ferocity than his eyes gleamed on the captive; nor was his arm backward in seconding the fierce resentment that almost consumed his breast.

"Dog of the palefaces!" he exclaimed, in Iroquois, "go yell among the curs of your own evil hunting-grounds!"

The denunciation was accompanied by an appropriate action. Even while speaking, his arm was lifted and the tomahawk hurled. Luckily the loud tones of the speaker had drawn the eye of Deerslayer towards him, else would that moment have probably closed his career. So great was the dexterity with which this dangerous weapon was thrown, and so deadly the intent, that it would have riven the skull of the prisoner had he not stretched forth an arm and caught the handle in one of its turns. with a readiness quite as remarkable as the skill with The prowhich the missile had been hurled. jectile force was so great, notwithstanding, that when Deerslaver's arm was arrested, his hand was raised above and behind his own head, and in the very attitude necessary to return the attack. It is not certain whether the circumstance of finding himself unexpectedly in this menacing posture and armed, tempted the young man to retaliate, or whether sudden resentment overcame his forbearance and prudence. His eve kindled, however, and a small red spot appeared on each cheek, while he cast all his energy into the effort of his arm, and threw back the weapon at his assailant. The unexpectedness of this blow contributed to its success—the Panther neither raising an arm nor bending his head to avoid it. The keen little axe struck the victim in a perpendicular line with the nose, directly between the eyes, literally braining him on the spot. Sallying forward, as the serpent darts at its enemy even while receiving its own death-wound, this man of powerful frame fell his length into the open area formed by the circle, quivering in death. A common rush to his relief left the captive for a single instant, quite without the crowd; and, willing to make one desperate effort for his life, he bounded off with the activity of a deer. There was but a breathless instant, when the whole band, old and young, women and children, abandoning the lifeless body of the Panther where it lay, raised the yell of alarm, and followed in pursuit.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Yankees, English

Sudden as had been the event which induced Deerslayer to make this desperate trial of speed, his mind was not wholly unprepared for the fearful emergency. In the course of the past hour, he had pondered well on the chances of such an experiment, and had shrewdly calculated all the details of success and failure. At the first leap, therefore, his body was completely under the direction of an intelligence that turned all its efforts to the best account. and prevented everything like hesitation or indecision at the important instant of the start. To this alone was he indebted for the first great advantage, that of getting through the line of sentinels unharmed. The manner in which this was done, though sufficiently simple, merits a description.

Although the shores of the point were not fringed with bushes, as was the case with most of the others on the lake, it was owing altogether to the circumstance that the spot had been so much used by hunters and fishermen. This fringe commenced on what might be termed the mainland, and was as dense as usual, extending in long lines both north and south. In the latter direction, then. Deerslaver held his way; and, as the sentinels were a little without the commencement of this thicket before the alarm was clearly communicated to them, the fugitive had gained its cover. To run among the bushes, however, was out of the question, and Deerslaver held his way for some forty or fifty yards in the water, which was barely kneedeep, offering as great an obstacle to the speed of his pursuers as it did to his own. As soon as a favorable spot presented, he darted through the line of bushes, and issued into the open woods.

Several rifles were discharged at Deerslayer while in the water, and more followed as he came out into the comparative exposure of the clear forest. But the direction of his line of flight, which partially crossed that of the fire, the haste with which the weapons had been aimed, and the general confusion that prevailed in the camp, prevented any harm from being Bullets whistled past him, and many cut twigs from the branches at his side, but not one touched even his dress. The delay caused by these fruitless attempts was of great service to the fugitive, who had gained more than a hundred yards on even the leading men of the Hurons, ere something like concert and order had entered into the chase. To think of following with rifle in hand was out of the question; and, after emptying their pieces in vague hope of wounding their captive, the best runners of the Indians threw them aside, calling out to the women and boys to recover and load them again as soon as possible.

Deerslayer knew too well the desperate nature of the struggle in which he was engaged to lose one of the precious moments. He also knew that his only hope was to run in a straight line, for as soon as he began to turn or double the greater number of his pursuers would put escape out of the question. He held his way, therefore, in a diagonal direction, up the acclivity, which was neither very high nor very steep, in this part of the mountain, but which was sufficiently toilsome for one contending for life, to render it painfully oppressive. There. however, he slackened his speed to recover breath, proceeding even at a quick walk, or slow trot, along the more difficult parts of the way The Hurons were whooping and leaping behind him; but this he disregarded, well knowing they must overcome the difficulties he had surmounted ere they could reach the elevation to which he had attained. The summit of the first hill was now quite near him, and he saw. by the formation of the land, that a deep glen intervened before the base of a second hill Walking deliberately to could be reached. the summit, he glanced eagerly about him in every direction, in quest of a cover. None offered in the ground; but a fallen tree lay near him, and desperate circumstances required desperate remedies. This tree lav in a line parallel to the glen at the brow of the hill; to leap on it, and then to force his person as close as possible under its lower side, took but a moment. Previously to disappearing from his pursuers, however, Deerslayer stood on the height and gave a cry of triumph, as if exulting at the sight of the descent that lay before him. In the next instant he was stretched beneath the tree.

No sooner was this expedient adopted, than the young man ascertained how desperate had been his own efforts, by the violence of the pulsation in his frame. He could hear his heart beat, and his breathing was like the action of a bellows in quick motion. Breath was gained, however, and the heart soon ceased to throb as if about to break through its confinement. The footsteps of those who toiled up the opposite side of the acclivity were now audible, and presently voices and treads announced the arrival of the pursuers. The foremost shouted as they reached the height; then, fearful that their enemy would escape under favor of the descent, each leaped upon the fallen tree, and plunged into the ravine, trusting to get a sight of the pursued, ere he reached the bottom. In this manner Huron followed Huron, until Natty began to hope the whole had passed. Others succeeded, however, until quite forty had leaped over the tree; and then he counted them, as the surest mode of ascertaining how many could be behind. Presently all were in the bottom of the glen, quite a hundred feet below him, and some had even ascended part of the opposite hill, when it became evident an inquiry was making as to the direction he had taken. This was the critical moment; and one of nerves less steady, or of a training that had been neglected, would have seized it to rise and fly. Not so with Deerslayer. He still lay quiet, watching with jealous vigilance every movement below, and fast regaining his breath.

The Hurons now resembled a pack of hounds at fault. Little was said, but each man ran about, examining the dead leaves, as the hound hunts for the lost scent. The great number of moccasins that had passed made the examination difficult, though the in-toe of an Indian was easily to be distinguished from the freer and wider step of a white man. Believing that no more pursuers remained behind, and hoping to steal away unseen, Deerslayer suddenly threw himself over the tree, and fell on the upper side. This achievement appeared to be effected successfully, and hope beat high in the bosom of the fugitive. Rising to his hands and feet, after a moment lost in listening to the sounds in the glen, in order to ascertain if he had been seen, the young man next scrambled to the top of the hill, a distance of only ten yards, in the expectation of getting its brow between him and his pursuers, and himself so far under cover. Even this was effected, and he rose to his feet, walking swiftly but steadily along the summit, in a direction opposite to that in which he had first fled. The nature of the calls in the glen, however, soon made him uneasy, and he sprang upon the summit again, in order to reconnoiter. No sooner did he reach the height, than he was seen, and the chase renewed. As it was better footing on the level ground, Deerslayer now avoided the side-hill, holding his flight along the ridge; while the Hurons, judging from the general formation of the land, saw that the ridge would soon melt into the hollow, and kept to the latter, as the easiest mode of heading the fugitive. A few at the same time turned south, with a view to prevent his escaping in that direction; while some crossed his trail towards the water, in order to prevent his retreat by the lake, running southerly.

The situation of Deerslaver was now more critical than it ever had been. He was virtually surrounded on three sides, having the lake on the fourth. But he had pondered well on all the chances, and took his measures with coolness. even while at the top of his speed. As is generally the case with the vigorous border-men, he could outrun any single Indian among his pursuers, who were principally formidable to him on account of their numbers, and the advantages they possessed in position; and he would not have hesitated to break off, in a straight line, at any spot, could he have got the whole band again fairly behind him. But no such chance did, or indeed could, now offer; and when he found that he was descending towards the glen, by the melting away of the ridge, he turned short, at right angles to his previous course, and went down the declivity with tremendous velocity, holding his way towards the shore. Some of his pursuers came panting up the hill, in direct chase, while most still kept on, in the ravine, intending to head him at its termination.

Deerslayer had now a different though a desperate project in view. Abandoning all thoughts of escape by the woods, he made the best of his way towards the canoe. He knew where it lay; could it be reached, he had only to run the gauntlet of a few rifles, and success would be certain. None of the warriors had kept their weapons, which would have retarded their speed, and the risk would come either from the uncertain hands of the women, or from those of some well-grown boy: though most of the latter were already out in hot pursuit. Everything seemed propitious to the execution of this plan, and the course being a continued descent, the young man went over the ground at a rate that promised a speedy termination to his toil.

As Deerslayer approached the point, several women and children were passed, but, though the former endeavored to cast dried branches between his legs, the terror inspired by his bold retaliation on the redoubted Panther was so great that none dared come near enough seriously to molest him. He went by all triumphantly, and reached the fringe of bushes. Plunging through these, our hero found himself once more in the lake and within fifty feet of Here he ceased to run, for he the canoe. well understood that his breath was now allimportant to him. He even stooped, as he advanced, and cooled his parched mouth by scooping up water in his hand to drink. Still the moments pressed, and he soon stood at the side of the canoe. The first glance told him that the paddles had been removed! This was a sore disappointment after all his efforts, and, for a single moment, he thought of turning and of facing his foes by walking with dignity into the center of the camp again. But an infernal yell, such as the American savage alone can raise, proclaimed the quick approach of the nearest of his pursuers, and the instinct of life triumphed. Preparing himself duly, and giving a right direction to its bows, he ran off into the water bearing the canoe before him, threw all his strength and skill into a last effort, and cast himself forward so as to fall into the bottom of the light craft, without materially impeding its way. Here he remained on his back, both to regain his breath and to cover his person from the deadly rifle. The lightness, which was such an advantage in paddling the canoe, now operated unfavorably. The material was so like a feather that the boat had no momentum; else would the impulse in that smooth and placid sheet have impelled it to a distance from the shore, that would have rendered paddling with the hands safe. Could such a point once be reached. Deerslaver thought he might get far enough out to attract the attention of Chingachgook and Judith, who would not fail to come to his relief with other canoes,—a circumstance that promised everything. As the young man lay in the bottom of the canoe he watched its movements by studying the tops of the trees on the mountain-side, and judged of his distance by the time and the motion. Voices on the shore were now numerous, and he heard something said about manning the raft. which fortunately for the fugitive lay at a considerable distance on the other side of the point.

Perhaps the situation of Deerslaver had not been more critical that day than it was at this moment. It certainly had not been one half as tantalizing. He lay perfectly quiet for two or three minutes, trusting to the single sense of hearing, confident that the noise on the lake would reach his ears, did any one venture to approach by swimming. Once or twice he fancied that the element was stirred by the cautious movement of an arm, and then he perceived it was the wash of the water on the pebbles of the strand: for, in mimicry of the ocean, it is seldom that those little lakes are so totally tranquil as not to possess a slight heaving and setting on their shores. Suddenly all the voices ceased, and a death-like stillness pervaded the spot, a quietness as profound as if all lav in the repose of inanimate life. By this time the canoe had drifted so far as to render nothing visible to Deerslayer, as he lay on his back, except the blue void of space, and a few of those brighter rays that proceed from the effulgence of the sun, marking his proximity. It was not possible to endure this uncertainty long. The young man well knew that the profound stillness foreboded evil, the savages never being so silent as when about to strike a blowresembling the stealthy foot of the panther ere he takes his leap. He took out a knife, and was about to cut a hole through the bark in order to get a view of the shore, when he paused from a dread of being seen in the operation, which would direct the enemy where to aim their bullets. At this instant a rifle was fired, and the ball pierced both sides of the canoe, within eighteen inches of the spot where his head lay. This was close work, but our hero had too lately gone through that which was closer, to be appalled. He lay still half a minute longer, and then he saw the summit of an oak coming slowly within his narrow horizon.

Unable to account for this change. Deerslaver could restrain his impatience no longer. Hitching his body along with the utmost caution, he got his eye at the bullet-hole and fortunately commanded a very tolerable view of the point. The canoe, by one of those imperceptible impulses that so often decide the fate of men, as well as the course of things, had inclined southerly, and was slowly drifting down the lake. It was lucky that Deerslaver had given it a shove sufficiently vigorous to send it past the end of the point ere it took this inclination, or it must have gone ashore again. As it was, it drifted so near it as to bring the tops of two or three trees within the range of the young man's view, as has been mentioned, and, indeed, to come in quite as close proximity with the extremity of the point as was at all safe. The distance could not much have exceeded a hundred feet, though fortunately a light current of air from the southwest began to set it slowly off shore.

Deerslayer now felt the urgent necessity of resorting to some expedient to get farther from his foes, and if possible, to apprise his friends of his situation. The distance rendered the last difficult, while the proximity to the point rendered the first indispensable. As was usual in such craft, a large, round, smooth stone was in each end of the canoe, for the double purpose of seats and ballast: one of these was within reach of his feet. The stone he contrived to get so far between his legs as to reach it with his hands, and then he managed to roll it to the side of its fellow in the bows, where the two served to keep the trim of the light boat, while he worked his own body as far aft as possible. Before quitting the shore, and as soon as he perceived that the paddles were gone, Deerslayer had thrown a bit of dead branch into the canoe, and this was within reach of his arm. Removing the cap he wore, he put it on the end of this stick, and just let it appear over the edge of the canoe, as far as possible from his own person. This ruse was scarcely adopted before the young man had a proof how much he had underrated the intelligence of his enemies. In contempt of an artifice so shallow and commonplace, a bullet was fired directly through another part of the canoe, which actually grazed his skin. He dropped the cap and instantly raised it immediately over his head, as a safeguard. It would seem that this second artifice was unseen,-or what was more probable, the Hurons, feeling certain of recovering their captive, wished to take him alive.

Deerslayer lay passive a few minutes longer, his eye at the bullet-hole, however, and much did he rejoice at seeing that he was drifting gradually farther and farther from the shore. When he looked upwards the treetops had disappeared, but he soon found that the canoe was slowly turning, so as to prevent his getting a view of anything at his peep-hole but of the two extremities of the lake. He now bethought him of the stick, which was crooked, and offered some facilities for rowing without the necessity of rising. The experiment succeeded. on trial, better even that he had hoped, though his great embarrassment was to keep the canoe. straight. That his present maneuver was seen soon became apparent by the clamor on the shore, and a bullet entering the stern of the canoe, traversed its length, whistling between the arms of our hero, passed out at the head. This satisfied the fugitive that he was getting away with tolerable speed, and induced him to increase his efforts. He was making a stronger push than common, when another messenger from the point broke the stick out-board, and at once deprived him of his oar. As the sound of voices seemed to grow more and more distant, however, Deerslayer determined to leave all to the drift, until he believed himself beyond the reach of bullets. This was nervous work. but it was the wisest of all the expedients that offered; and the young man was encouraged to persevere in it by the circumstance that he felt his face fanned by the air, a proof that there was a little more wind.

CHAPTER XXVIII

Nor widows' tears, nor tender orphans' cries
Can stop th' invaders' force;
Nor swelling seas, nor threatening skies,
Prevent the pirate's course:
Their lives to selfish ends decreed,
Through blood and rapine they proceed;
No anxious thoughts of ill-repute
Suspend the impetuous and unjust pursuit;
But power and wealth obtained, guilty and great,
Their fellow-creatures' fears they raise, or urge their hate.

Concreve

By this time Deerslayer had been twenty minutes in the canoe, and he began to grow a little impatient for some signs of relief from his friends. The position of the boat still prevented his seeing in any direction, unless it were up or down the lake; and, though he knew that his line of sight must pass within a hundred yards of the castle, it, in fact, passed that distance to the westward of the buildings. The profound stillness troubled him also, for he knew not whether to ascribe it to the increasing space between him and the Indians, or to some new artifice. At length, wearied with fruitless watchfulness, the young man turned himself on his back, closed his eyes, and awaited the result in determined acquiescence. If the savages could so completely control their thirst for revenge, he was resolved to be as calm as themselves, and to trust his fate to the interposition of the currents and air

Some additional ten minutes may have passed in this quiescent manner, on both sides, when Deerslaver thought he heard a slight noise, like a low rubbing against the bottom of his canoe. He opened his eyes of course, in expectation of seeing the face or arm of an Indian rising from the water, and found that a canopy of leaves was impending directly over his head. Starting to his feet, the first object that met his eye was Rivenoak, who had so far aided the slow progress of the boat as to draw it on the point, the grating on the strand being the sound that had first given our hero the alarm. The change in the drift of the canoe had been altogether owing to the baffling nature of the light currents of air, aided by some eddies in the water.

"Come," said the Huron, with a quiet gesture of authority to order his prisoner to land; "my young friend has sailed about till he is tired; he will forget how to run again, unless he uses his legs." 1

CHAPTER XXX

So deem'st thou—so each mortal deems
Of that which is from that which seems;
But other harvest here
Than that which peasant's scythe demands,
Was gathered in by sterner hands,
With bayonet, blade and spear.

SCOTT

It exceeded Deerslayer's power to ascertain what had produced the sudden pause in the movements of his enemies, until the fact was revealed in the due course of events. He perceived that much agitation prevailed among the women in particular, while the warriors rested on their arms, in a sort of dignified expectation. It was plain no alarm was excited, though it was not equally apparent that a friendly occurrence produced the delay. Rivenoak was evidently apprised of all, and by a gesture of his arm he appeared to direct the circle to remain unbroken, and for each person to await the issue in the situation he or she then occupied. It required but a minute or two to bring an explanation of this singular and mysterious pause, which was soon terminated by the appearance of Judith, on the exterior of the line of bodies, and her ready admission within its circle.

If Deerslaver was startled by this unexpected arrival, well knowing that the quick-witted girl could claim none of that exemption from the penalties of captivity that was so cheerfully accorded to her feeble-minded sister, he was equally astonished at the guise in which she came. All her ordinary forest attire, neat and becoming as this usually was, had been laid aside for the brocade that has been already mentioned, and which had once before wrought so great and magical an effect in her appearance. Nor was this all. Accustomed to see the ladies of the garrison in the formal gala attire of the day, and familiar with the more critical niceties of these matters, the girl had managed to complete her dress in a way to leave nothing strikingly defective in its details, or even to betray an incongruity that would have been detected by one practiced in the mysteries of the toilet. Head, feet, arms, hands, bust, and drapery, were all in harmony, as female attire was then deemed attractive and harmonious: and the end she aimed at. that of imposing on the uninstructed senses of the savages, by causing them to believe their guest was a woman of rank and importance, might well have succeeded with those whose habits had taught them to discriminate between persons. Judith, in addition to her rare native beauty, had a singular grace of person, and her mother had imparted enough of her own deportment to prevent any striking or offensive vulgarity of manner; so that, sooth to say, the gorgeous dress might have been worse bestowed in nearly every particular. Had it been displayed in a capital, a thousand might have worn it before one could have been found to do more credit to its gay colors, glossy satins, and rich laces than the beautiful creature whose person it now aided to adorn.

The effect of such an apparition had not been miscalculated. The instant Judith found herself within the circle, she was in a degree compensated for the fearful personal risk she ran, by the unequivocal sensation of surprise and admiration produced by her appearance. The grim old warriors uttered their favorite exclamation, "Hugh!" The younger men were still more sensibly overcome, and even the women were not backward in letting open manifestations of pleasure escape them. It was seldom that these untutored children of the forest had ever seen any white female above the commonest sort, and as to dress, never before had so much splendor shone before their eyes. The gayest uniforms of both French and English seemed dull compared with the luster of the brocade; and while the rare personal beauty of the wearer added to the effect produced by its hues, the attire did not fail to adorn that beauty in a way which surpassed even the hopes of its wearer. Deerslayer himself was astounded, and this quite as much by the brilliant picture the girl presented as at the indifference to consequences with which she had braved the danger of the step she had taken. Under such circumstances, all waited for the visitor to explain her object, which to most of the spectators seemed as inexplicable as her appearance.

&lt;sup>1</sup> In what is here omitted the Indians begin torturing Deerslayer, and Hetty comes to the Indian camp in a vain attempt to rescue him.

2"Which of these warriors is the principal chief?" demanded Judith of Deerslayer, as soon as she found it was expected that she should open the communication; "my errand is too important to be delivered to any of inferior rank. First explain to the Hurons what I say: then give an answer to the question I have put."

Deerslayer quietly complied, his auditors greedily listening to the interpretation of the first words that fell from so extraordinary a vision. The demand seemed perfectly in character for one who had every appearance of an exalted rank herself. Rivenoak gave an appropriate reply, by presenting himself before his fair visitor in a way to leave no doubt that he was entitled to all the consideration he claimed.

"I can believe this, Huron," resumed Judith, enacting her assumed part with a steadiness and dignity that did credit to her powers of imitation, for she strove to impart to her manner the condescending courtesy she had once observed in the wife of a general officer, at a similar, though a more amicable, scene—"I can believe you to be the principal person of this party; I see in your countenance the marks of thought and reflection. To you, then, I must make my communication."

"Let the Flower of the Woods speak," returned the old chief, courteously, as soon as her address had been translated, so that all might understand it. "If her words are as pleasant as her looks, they will never quit my ears; I shall hear them long after the winter in Canada has killed the flowers, and frozen all the speeches of summer."

This admiration was grateful to one constituted like Judith, and contributed to aid her self-possession quite as much as it fed her vanity. Smiling involuntarily, or in spite of her wish to seem reserved, she proceeded in her plot

"Now, Huron," she continued, "listen to my words. Your eyes tell you that I am no common woman. I will not say I am queen of this country; she is afar off, in a distant land; but under our gracious monarchs there are many degrees of rank; one of these I fill. What that rank is precisely it is unnecessary for me to say, since you would not understand it. For that information you must trust your eyes. You see what I am; you must feel that in listening to my words you listen to one who can be your friend or your enemy, as you treat her."

This was well uttered, with a due attention to manner and a steadiness of tone that was really surprising, considering all the circumstances of the case. It was well though simply rendered into the Indian dialect, too, and it was received with a respect and gravity that augured favorably for the girl's success. But Indian thought is not easily traced to its sources. Judith waited with anxiety to hear the answer, filled with hope even while she doubted. Rivenoak was a ready speaker, and he answered as promptly as comported with the notions of Indian decorum: that peculiar people seeming to think a short delay respectful, inasmuch as it manifests that the words already heard have been duly weighed.

"My daughter is handsomer than the wild roses of Ontario; her voice is pleasant to the ear as the song of the wren," answered the cautious and wily chief, who of all the band stood alone in not being fully imposed on by the magnificent and unusual appearance of Tudith, but who distrusted even while he wondered; "the hummingbird is not much larger than the bee; yet its feathers are as gay as the tail of the peacock. The Great Spirit sometimes puts very bright clothes on very little animals. Still, he covers the moose with coarse hair. These things are beyond the understanding of poor Indians, who can only comprehend what they see and hear. No doubt my daughter has a very large wigwam somewhere about the lake; the Hurons have not found it on account of their ignorance!"

"I have told you, chief, that it would be useless to state my rank and residence, inasmuch as you would not comprehend them. You must trust to your eyes for this knowledge; what red man is there that cannot see? This blanket that I wear is not the blanket of a common squaw; these ornaments are such as the wives and daughters of chiefs only appear in. Now listen and hear why I have come alone among your people, and hearken to the errand that has brought me here. The Yengeese have young men as well as the Hurons; and plenty of them, too: this you well know"

"The Yengeese are as plenty as the leaves on the trees! This every Huron knows and feels."

"I understand you, chief. Had I brought a party with me it might have caused trouble. My young men and your young men would have looked angrily at each other, especially had my young men seen that paleface bound for the tortures. He is a great hunter, and is much loved by all the garrisons, far and near. There would have been blows about him, and the trail of the Iroquois back to the Canadas would have been marked with blood."

"There is so much blood on it now," returned the chief, gloomily, "that it blinds our eyes. My young men see that it is all Huron."

"No doubt: and more Huron blood would be spilt, had I came surrounded with palefaces. I have heard of Rivenoak, and have thought it would be better to send him back in peace to his village, that he might leave his women and children behind him. If he then wished to come for our scalps, we would meet him. He loves animals made of ivory and little rifles. See; I have brought some with me to show him. I am his friend. When he has packed up these things among his goods, he will start for his village, before any of my young men can overtake him; and then he will show his people in Canada what riches they can come to seek, now that our great fathers, across the salt lake. have sent each other the war-hatchet. I will lead back with me this great hunter, of whom I have need to keep my house in venison."

Judith, who was sufficiently familiar with Indian phraseology, endeavored to express her ideas in the sententious manner common to those people; and she succeeded even beyond her own expectations. Deerslayer did her full justice in the translation, and this so much the more readily since the girl carefully abstained from uttering any direct untruth; a homage she paid to the young man's known aversion to falsehood, which he deemed a meanness altogether unworthy of a white man's gifts. The offering of the two remaining elephants, and of the pistols already mentioned, one of which was all the worse for the recent accident, produced a lively sensation among the Hurons generally, though Rivenoak received it coldly, notwithstanding the delight with which he had first discovered the probable existence of a creature with two tails. In a word, this cool and sagacious savage was not so easily imposed on as his followers; and with a sentiment of honor that half the civilized world would have deemed supererogatory, he declined the acceptance of a bribe that he felt no disposition to earn by a compliance with the donor's wishes.

"Let my daughter keep her two-tailed hog to eat when venison is scarce," he dryly answered; "and the little gun which has two muzzles. The Hurons will kill deer when they are hungry; and they have long rifles to fight with. This hunter cannot quit my young men now; they wish to know if he is as stout-hearted as he boasts himself to be."

"That I deny, Huron," interrupted Deerslayer, with warmth; "yes, that I downright deny as agin truth and reason. No man has heard me boast and no man shall, though ye flay me alive, and then roast the quivering flesh with your own infarnal devices and cruelties! I may be humble, and misfortunate, and your prisoner; but I'm no boaster, by my very gifts."

"My young paleface boasts he is no boaster," returned the crafty chief; "he must be right. I hear a strange bird singing. It has very rich feathers. No Huron ever before saw such feathers. They will be ashamed to go back to their village and tell their people that they let their prisoner go on account of the song of this strange bird, and not be able to give the name of the bird. They do not know how to say whether it is a wren or a cat-bird. This would be a great disgrace; my young men would not be allowed to travel in the woods without taking their mothers with them to tell them the names of the birds."

"You can ask my name of your prisoner," returned the girl. "It is Judith; and there is a great deal of the history of Judith in the palefaces' best book, the Bible. If I am a bird of fine feathers, I have also my name."

"No," answered the wily Huron, betraying the artifice he had so long practised by speaking in English with tolerable accuracy; "I not ask prisoner. He tired; he want rest. I ask my daughter with feeble mind. She speak truth. Come here, daughter; you answer. Your name Hetty?"

"Yes, that's what they call me," returned the girl; "though it's written Esther in the Bible."

"He write him in Bible, too? All write in Bible. No matter—what her name?"

"That's Judith, and it's so written in the Bible, though father sometimes called her Jude. That's my sister Judith, Thomas Hutter's daughter-Thomas Hutter, whom you called the Muskrat 1; though he was no muskrat, but a man, like vourself—he lived in a house on the water, and that was enough for you."

A smile of triumph gleamed on the hardwrinkled countenance of the chief when he found how completely his appeal to the truthloving Hetty had succeeded. As for Judith herself, the moment her sister was questioned, she saw that all was lost; for no sign, or even entreaty, could have induced the right-feeling girl to utter a falsehood. To attempt to impose a daughter of the Muskrat on the savages as a princess or a great lady she knew would be idle; and she saw her bold and ingenious expedient for liberating the captive fail through one of the simplest and most natural causes that could be imagined. She turned her eye on Deerslayer, therefore, as if imploring him to interfere to save them both.

"It will not do, Judith," said the young man, in answer to this appeal, which he understood. though he saw its uselessness; "it will not do. 'Twas a bold idee, and fit for a general's lady; but yonder Mingo"-Rivenoak had withdrawn to a little distance, and was out of ear-shot-"but yonder Mingo is an uncommon man, and not to be deceived by any unnat'ral sarcumventions. Things must come afore him in their right order to draw a cloud afore his eyes! 'Twas too much to attempt making him fancy that a queen or a great lady lived in these mountains; and no doubt he thinks the fine clothes you wear are some of the plunder of your own father—or, at least, of him who once passed for your father; as quite likely it was, if all they say is true!"

"At all events, Deerslayer, my presence here will save you for a time. They will hardly attempt torturing you before my face!"

"Why not, Judith? Do you think they will treat a woman of the palefaces more tenderly than they treat their own? It's true that your sex will most likely save you from the torments, but it will not save your liberty, and may not save your scalp. I wish you hadn't come, my good Judith; it can do no good to me, while it may do great harm to yourself."

"I can share your fate," the girl answered with generous enthusiasm. "They shall not injure you while I stand by, if in my power to prevent it; besides-"

"Besides what, Judith? What means have you to stop Injin cruelties, or to avart Injin deviltries?'

"None, perhaps, Deerslayer," answered the girl, with firmness; "but I can suffer with my friends—die with them if necessary."

"Ah! Judith-suffer you may; but die you will not until the Lord's time shall come. It's little likely that one of your sex and beauty will meet with a harder fate than to become the wife of a chief, if indeed your white inclinations can stoop to match with an Injin. 'Twould have been better had you stayed in the ark or the castle: but what has been done is done. You was about to say something, when you stopped at 'besides'?"

"It might not be safe to mention it here, Deerslayer," the girl hurriedly answered, moving past him carelessly, that she might speak in a low tone: "half an hour is all in all to us. None of your friends are idle."

The hunter replied merely by a grateful look. Then he turned toward his enemies, as if ready again to face the torments. A short consultation had passed among the elders of the band. and by this time they also were prepared with their decision. The merciful purpose of Rivenoak had been much weakened by the artifice of Judith, which, failing of its real object. was likely to produce results the very opposite of those she had anticipated. This was natural: the feeling being aided by the resentment of an Indian, who found how near he had been to becoming the dupe of an inexperienced girl. By this time Judith's real character was fully understood—the wide-spread reputation of her beauty contributed to the exposure. As for the unusual attire, it was confounded with the profound mystery of the animals with two tails. and, for the moment, lost its influence.

When Rivenoak, therefore, faced the captive again, it was with an altered countenance. He had abandoned the wish of saving him, and was no longer disposed to retard the more serious part of the torture. This change of sentiment was, in effect, communicated to the young men. who were already eagerly engaged in making their preparations for the contemplated scene. Fragments of dried wood were rapidly collected near the sapling, the splinters which it was intended to thrust into the flesh of the victim previously to lighting were all collected, and the thongs were already produced that were again to bind him to the tree. All this was done in profound silence, Judith watching every movement with breathless expectation, while Deerslaver himself stood seemingly as unmoved as one of the pines of the hills. When the warriors advanced to bind him, however, the young man glanced at Judith, as if to inquire the name of the Indians for Hutter

whether resistance or submission were most advisable. By a significant gesture she counseled the last; and in a minute, he was once more fastened to the tree, a helpless object of any insult or wrong that might be offered. So eagerly did every one now act, that nothing was said. The fire was immediately lighted in the pile, and the end of all was anxiously expected.

It was not the intention of the Hurons absolutely to destroy the life of their victim by means of fire. They designed merely to put his physical fortitude to the severest proofs it could endure, short of that extremity. In the end, they fully intended to carry his scalp with them into their village, but it was their wish first to break down his resolution, and to reduce him to the level of a complaining sufferer. With this view, the pile of brush and branches had been placed at a proper distance. or one at which it was thought the heat would soon become intolerable, though it might not be immediately dangerous. As often happened, however, on these occasions, this distance had been miscalculated, and the flames began to wave their forked tongues in a proximity to the face of the victim that would have proved fatal, in another instant, had not Hetty rushed through the crowd, armed with a stick, and scattered the blazing pile in a dozen directions. More than one hand was raised to strike the presumptuous intruder to the earth; but the chiefs prevented the blows by reminding their irritated followers of the state of her mind. Hetty, herself, was insensible to the risk she ran; but, as soon as she had performed this bold act, she stood looking about her in frowning resentment, as if to rebuke the crowd of attentive savages for their cruelty.

"God bless you, dearest sister, for that brave and ready act!" murmured Judith, herself unnerved so much as to be incapable of exertion; "Heaven itself has sent you on its holy errand."

"'Twas well meant, Judith," rejoined the victim; "'twas excellently meant, and 'twas timely, though it may prove ontimely in the ind! What is to come to pass must come to pass soon, or 'twill quickly be too late. Had I drawn in one mouthful of that flame in breathing, the power of man couldn't save my life; and you see that this time they've so bound my forehead as not to leave my head the smallest chance. 'Twas well meant; but it might have been more marciful to let the flames act their part."

"Cruel, heartless Hurons!" exclaimed the still indignant Hetty; "would you burn a man and a Christian as you would burn a log of wood! Do you never read your Bibles? or do you think God will forget such things?"

A gesture from Rivenoak caused the scattered brands to be collected; fresh wood was brought, even the women and children busying themselves eagerly in the gathering of dried sticks. The flame was just kindling a second time, when an Indian female pushed through the circle, advanced to the heap, and with her foot dashed aside the lighted twigs in time to prevent the conflagration. A vell followed this second disappointment: but when the offender turned towards the circle, and presented the countenance of Hist, it was succeeded by a common exclamation of pleasure and surprise. For a minute, all thought of pursuing the business in hand was forgotten, and young and old crowded around the girl, in haste to demand an explanation of her sudden and unlooked-for return. It was at this critical instant that Hist spoke to Judith in a low voice, placed some small object, unseen, in her hand, and then turned to meet the salutations of the Huron girls, with whom she was personally a great favorite. Judith recovered her self-possession and acted promptly. The small, keen-edged knife, that Hist had given to the other, was passed by the latter into the hands of Hetty. as the safest and least-suspected medium of transferring it to Deerslayer. But the feeble intellect of the last defeated the well-grounded hopes of all three. Instead of first cutting loose the hands of the victim, and then concealing the knife in his clothes, in readiness for action at the most available instant, she went. to work herself, with earnestness and simplicity, to cut the thongs that bound his head, that he might not again be in danger of inhaling flames. Of course this deliberate procedure was seen, and the hands of Hetty were arrested ere she had more than liberated the upper portion of the captive's body, not including his arms, below the elbows. This discovery at once pointed distrust towards Hist; and, to Judith's surprise, when questioned on the subject, that spirited girl was not disposed to deny her agency in what had passed.

"Why should I not help the Deerslayer?" the girl demanded, in the tones of a firm-minded woman. "He is the brother of a Delaware chief; my heart is all Delaware. Come forth, miserable Briarthorn, and wash the Iroquois paint from your face,—stand before the Hurons, the crow that you are; you would eat the carrion of your own dead rather than starve. Put him face to face with Deerslayer, chiefs and warriors; I will show you how great a knave you have been keeping in your tribe."

This hold language, uttered in their own dialect, and with a manner full of confidence, produced a deep sensation among the Hurons. Treachery is always liable to distrust; and though the recreant Briarthorn had endeavored to serve the enemy well, his exertions and assiduities had gained for him little more than toleration. His wish to obtain Hist for a wife had first induced him to betray her and his own people; but serious rivals to his first proiect had risen up among his new friends, weakening still more their sympathies with treason. In a word, Briarthorn had been barely permitted to remain in the Huron encampment, where he was as closely and as jealously watched as Hist herself; seldom appearing before the chiefs, and sedulously keeping out of view of Deerslaver, who, until this moment, was ignorant even of his presence. Thus summoned, however, it was impossible to remain in the background. "Wash the Iroquois paint from his face" he did not: for when he stood in the center of the circle, he was so disguised in these new colors, that at first the hunter did not recognize him. He assumed an air of defiance, notwithstanding, and haughtily demanded what any could say against "Briarthorn."

"Ask yourself that," continued Hist, with spirit, though her manner grew less concentrated, and there was a slight air of abstraction that became observable to Deerslayer and Judith, if to no others. "Ask that of your own heart, sneaking woodchuck of the Delawares; come not here with the face of an innocent man. Go look in the spring; see the colors of your enemies on your lying skin,—and then come back and boast how you ran from your tribe, and took the blanket of the French for your covering. Paint yourself as bright as a humming-bird, you will still be as black as the crow."

Hist had been so uniformly gentle while living with the Hurons, that they now listened to her language with surprise. As for the delinquent, his blood boiled in his veins; and it was well for the pretty speaker that it was not in his power to execute the revenge he burned to inflict on her, in spite of his pretended love.

"Who wishes Briarthorn?" he sternly asked. "If this paleface is tired of life; if afraid of Indian torments, speak, Rivenoak; I will send him after the warriors we have lost."

"No, chief,—no, Rivenoak," eagerly interrupted Hist. "The Deerslayer fears nothing; least of all a crow! Unbind him—cut his withes—place him face to face with this cawing bird; then let us see which is tired of life,"

Hist made a forward movement, as if to take a knife from a young man, and perform the office she had mentioned in person; but an aged warrior interposed, at a sign from Rivenoak. This chief watched all the girl did with distrust: for, even while speaking in her most boastful language and in the steadiest manner, there was an air of uncertainty and expectation about her that could not escape so close an observer. She acted well: but two or three of the old men were equally satisfied that it was merely acting. Her proposal to release Deerslaver, therefore. was rejected; and the disappointed Hist found herself driven back from the sapling at the very moment she fancied herself about to be successful. At the same time the circle, which had got to be crowded and confused, was enlarged, and brought once more into order. Rivenoak now announced the intention of the old men again to proceed; the delay having been continued long enough, and leading to no result.

"Stop, Huron; stay, chiefs!" exclaimed Judith, scarcely knowing what she said, or why she interposed, unless to obtain time; "for God's sake, a single minute longer—"

The words were cut short by another and still more extraordinary interruption. A young Indian came bounding through the Huron ranks, leaping into the very center of the circle, in a way to denote the utmost confidence, or a temerity bordering on foolhardiness. Five or six sentinels were still watching the lake at different and distant points; and it was the first impression of Rivenoak that one of these had come in with tidings of import. Still, the movements of the stranger were so rapid, and his war-dress, which scarcely left him more drapery than an antique statue, had so little distinguishing about it, that, at the first moment, it was impossible to ascertain whether he were friend or foe. Three leaps carried this warrior to the side of Deerslayer, whose withes were cut in the twinkling of an eye with a quickness and precision that left the prisoner perfect master of his limbs. Not till this was effected did the stranger bestow a glance on any other object; then he turned and showed the astonished Hurons the noble brow, fine person, and eagle eye of a young warrior, in the paint and panoply of a Delaware. He held a rifle in each hand, the butts of both resting on the earth, while from one dangled its proper pouch and horn. This was Killdeer, which even as he looked boldly and in defiance on the crowd around him, he suffered to fall back into the hands of its proper owner. The presence of two armed men, though it was in their midst, startled the Hurons. Their rifles were scattered about against the different trees, and their only weapons were their knives and tomahawks. Still, they had too much self-possession to betray fear. It was little likely that so small a force would assail so strong a band; and each man expected some extraordinary proposition to succeed so decisive a step. The stranger did not seem disposed to disappoint them; he prepared to speak.

"Hurons," he said, "this earth is very big. The great lakes are big, too; there is room beyond them for the Iroquois, there is room for the Delawares on this side. I am Chingachgook, the son of Uncas, the kinsman of Tamenund. This is my betrothed; that paleface is my friend. My heart was heavy when I missed him. All the Delaware girls are waiting for Wah; they wonder that she stays away so long. Come, let us say farewell, and go on our path."

"Hurons, this is your mortal enemy, the Great Serpent of them you hate!" cried Briarthorn. "If he escape, blood will be in your moccasin-prints from this spot to the Canadas. I am all Huron."

As the last words were uttered, the traitor cast his knife at the naked breast of the Delaware. A quick movement of the arm on the part of Hist, who stood near, turned aside the blow, the dangerous weapon burying its point in a pine. At the next instant a similar weapon glanced from the hand of the Serpent, and quivered in the recreant's heart. A minute had scarcely elapsed from the moment in which Chingachgook bounded into the circle, and that in which Briarthorn fell, like a dog, dead in his tracks. The rapidity of events prevented the Hurons from acting; but this catastrophe permitted no further delay. A common exclamation followed, and the whole party was in motion. At this instant a sound unusual to the woods was heard, and every Huron, male and female, paused to listen, with ears erect, and faces filled with expectation. The sound was regular and heavy, as if the earth were struck with beetles. Objects became visible among the trees of the background, and a body of troops was seen advancing with measured tread. They came upon the charge, the scarlet of the king's livery shining among the bright green foliage of the forest.

The scene that followed is not easily described. It was one in which wild confusion, despair, and frenzied efforts were so blended as to destroy the unity and distinctness of the action. A general vell burst from the enclosed Hurons: it was succeeded by the hearty cheers of England. Still not a musket or rifle was fired, though that steady, measured tramp continued, and the bayonet was seen gleaming in advance of a line that counted nearly sixty The Hurons were taken at a fearful disadvantage. On three sides was the water. while their formidable and trained foes cut them off from flight on the fourth. Each warrior rushed for his arms, and then all on the point, man, woman, and child, eagerly sought the covers. In this scene of confusion and dismay, however, nothing could surpass the discretion and coolness of Deerslaver. His first care was to place Judith and Hist behind trees, and he looked for Hetty; but she had been hurried away in the crowd of Huron women. This effected, he threw himself on a flank of the retiring Hurons, who were inclining off towards the southern margin of the point, in the hope of escaping through the water. Deerslayer watched his opportunity, and finding two of his recent tormenters in a range, his rifle first broke the silence of the terrific scene. The bullet brought down both at one discharge. This drew a general fire from the Hurons, and the rifle and war cry of the Serpent were heard in the clamor. Still the trained men returned no answering volley, the whoop and piece of Hurry alone being heard on their side, if we except the short, prompt word of authority, and that heavy, measured, and menacing tread. Presently, however, the shrieks, groans, and denunciations that usually accompany the use of the bayonet followed. That terrible and deadly weapon was glutted in vengeance. The scene that succeeded was one of those of which so many have occurred in our own times in which neither age nor sex forms an exemption to the lot of a savage warfare. . . .

1841

From THE PRAIRIE <sup>1</sup> CHAPTER XXXIV

The trapper was placed on a rude seat, which had been made, with studied care, to support his frame in an upright and easy attitude. The <sup>1</sup> In The Prairie we find Natty Bumppo, driven from the borders of the eastern states by the tide of civilization, spending his last days as a trapper west of the Mississippi among the Pawnees. Suddenly the old man's physical strength fails him, and his Indian friends, who have held him in first glance of the eve told his former friends that the old man was at length called upon to pay the last tribute of nature. His eye was glazed, and apparently as devoid of sight as of expression. His features were a little more sunken and strongly marked than formerly; but there all change, so far as exterior was concerned, might be said to have ceased. His approaching end was not to be ascribed to any positive disease, but had been a gradual and mild decay of the physical powers. Life, it is true still lingered in his system; but it was as if at times entirely ready to depart, and then it would appear to reanimate the sinking form. reluctant to give up the possession of a tenement that had never been corrupted by vice or undermined by disease. It would have been no violent fancy to have imagined that the spirit fluttered about the placid lips of the old woodsman, reluctant to depart from a shell that had so long given it an honest and honorable shelter.

His body was placed so as to let the light of the setting sun fall full upon the solemn features. His head was bare, the long, thin, locks of gray fluttering lightly in the evening breeze. His rifle lay upon his knee, and the other accouterments of the chase were placed at his side, within reach of his hand. Between his feet lay the figure of a hound, with its head crouching to the earth, as if it slumbered; and so perfectly easy and natural was its position that a second glance was necessary to tell Middleton he saw only the skin of Hector, stuffed, by Indian tenderness and ingenuity, in a manner to represent the living animal. His own dog was playing at a distance with the child of Tachechana and Mahtoree. The mother herself stood at hand, holding in her arms a second offspring, that might boast of a parentage no less honorable than that which belonged great veneration because of his wise counsel and his perfect integrity, perceiving that his spirit is about to pass, gather solemnly at his side. Just this hour Middleton, an officer of the United States army, whom the old man had greatly befriended and who is a descendant of one of the early patrons of the hunter, comes to the Pawnee village to visit his aged friend. The scene described is what opens before him as he enters the Indian camp. Of the Indian characters, Le Balafré is an aged chief; Hard-Heart, the friend and filial support of the old trapper, is war-chief of the tribe; and Tachechana, the former wife of Mahtoree, a Sioux chief whom Hard-Heart had killed in combat, is now the wife of Hard-Heart.

in combat, is now the wife of Hard-Heart.

In this scene Cooper puts the final touches upon a character wholly his own creation, one full of impossibilities when viewed realistically, yet painted with such brilliance, and such a sense for basal truth, as to stand after many literary generations as the type of the virtues of the class Natty Bumppo represents.

to the son of Hard-Heart. Le Balafré was seated nigh the dying trapper, with every mark about his person that the hour of his own departure was not far distant. The rest of those immediately in the center were aged men, who had apparently drawn near in order to observe the manner in which a just and fearless warrior would depart on the greatest of his journeys.

The old man was reaping the rewards of a life remarkable for temperance and activity. in a tranquil and placid death. His vigor in a manner endured to the very last. Decay, when it did occur, was rapid, but free from pain. He had hunted with the tribe in the spring, and even throughout most of the summer, when his limbs suddenly refused to perform their customary offices. A sympathizing weakness took possession of all his faculties: and the Pawnees believed that they were going to lose, in this unexpected manner, a sage and counselor whom they had begun both to love and respect. But, as we have already said, the immortal occupant seemed unwilling to desert its tenement. The lamp of life flickered, without becoming extinguished. On the morning of the day on which Middleton arrived, there was a general reviving of the powers of the whole man. His tongue was again heard in wholesome maxims, and his eye from time to time recognized the persons of his friends. It merely proved to be a brief and final intercourse with the world on the part of one who had already been considered, as to mental communion, to have taken his leave of it forever.

When he had placed his guests in front of the dying man, Hard-Heart, after a pause that proceeded as much from sorrow as decorum, leaned a little forward, and demanded:

"Does my father hear the words of his son?"
"Speak," returned the trapper, in tones that issued from his chest, but which were rendered awfully distinct by the stillness that reigned in the place. "I am about to depart from the village of the Loups, and shortly shall be beyond the reach of your voice."

"Let the wise chief have no cares for his journey," continued Hard-Heart, with an earnest solicitude that led him to forget, for the moment, that others were waiting to address his adopted parent; "a hundred Loups shall clear his path from briers."

"Pawnee, I die, as I have lived, a Christian man!" resumed the trapper, with a force of voice that had the same startling effect on his hearers as is produced by the trumpet, when its blast rises suddenly and freely on the air after its obstructed sounds have been heard struggling in the distance; "as I came into life so will I leave it. Horses and arms are not needed to stand in the presence of the Great Spirit of my people. He knows my color, and according to my gifts will he judge my deeds."

"My father will tell my young men how many Mingos 1 he has struck, and what acts of valor and justice he has done, that they may know how to imitate him."

"A boastful tongue is not heard in the heaven of a white man!" solemnly returned the old man. "What I have done, He has seen. His eyes are always open. That which has been well done will He remember; wherein I have been wrong will He not forget to chastise, though He will do the same in mercy. No, my son; a paleface may not sing his own praises, and hope to have them acceptable before his God!"

A little disappointed, the young partisan stepped modestly back, making way for the recent comers to approach. Middleton took one of the meager hands of the trapper, and struggling to command his voice, he succeeded in announcing his presence.

The old man listened like one whose thoughts were dwelling on a very different subject; but when the other had succeeded in making him understand that he was present, an expression of joyful recognition passed over his faded features.

"I hope you have not so soon forgotten those whom you so materially served!" Middleton concluded. "It would pain me to think my hold on your memory was so light."

"Little that I have ever seen is forgotten," returned the trapper. "I am at the close of many weary days, but there is not one among them all that I could wish to overlook. I remember you, with the whole of your company; aye, and your gran'ther that went before you. I am glad that you have come back upon these plains, for I had need of one who speaks the English, since little faith can be put in the traders 2 of these regions. Will you do a favor to an old and dying man?"

"Name it," said Middleton; "it shall be done."

"It is a far journey to send such trifles," resumed the old man, who spoke at short intervals, as strength and breath permitted; "a far and weary journey is the same; but kindnesses and friendships are things not to be forgotten.

There is a settlement among the Otsego hills"—3

"I know the place," interrupted Middleton, observing that he spoke with increasing difficulty; "proceed to tell me what you would have done."

"Take this rifle, and pouch, and horn, and send them to the person whose name is graven on the plates of the stock,—a trader cut the letters with his knife—for it is long that I have intended to send him such a token of my love!"

"It shall be so. Is there more that you could wish?"

"Little else have I to bestow. My traps I give to my Indian son; for honestly and kindly has he kept his faith. Let him stand before me."

Middleton explained to the chief what the trapper had said, and relinquished his own place to the other.

"Pawnee." continued the old man, always changing his language to suit the person he addressed, and not infrequently according to the ideas he expressed, "it is a custom of my people for the father to leave his blessing with the son before he shuts his eyes forever. This blessing I give to you; take it; for the prayers of a Christian man will never make the path of a just warrior to the blessed prairies either longer or more tangled. May the God of a white man look on your deeds with friendly eyes, and may you never commit an act that shall cause him to darken his face. I know not whether we shall ever meet again. There are many traditions concerning the place of Good Spirits. It is not for one like me, old and experienced though I am, to set up my opinion against a nation's. You believe in the blessed prairies. and I have faith in the sayings of my fathers. If both are true, our parting will be final; but if it should prove that the same meaning is hid under different words, we shall yet stand together, Pawnee, before the face of your Wahcondah. 5 who will then be no other than my There is much to be said in favor of God. both religions, for each seems suited to its own people, and no doubt it was so intended. I fear I have not altogether followed the gifts of my color, inasmuch as I find it a little painful to give up forever the use of the rifle and the comforts of the chase. But then the fault has been my own, seeing that it could not have been His. Aye, Hector," he continued, leaning

&lt;sup>1</sup> Iroquois; see note introducing the selection from The Deerslayer, p. 228.

The traders of the West were mostly French Canadians.

<sup>3</sup> The next few lines refer to the old man's youth among the forests of central New York and to the persons who had befriended him there.

<sup>4</sup> Hard-Heart, his son by adoption 5 The Great Spirit forward a little, and feeling for the ears of the hound, "our parting has come at last, dog, and it will be a long hunt. You have been an honest, and a bold, and a faithful hound. Pawnee, you cannot slay the pup on my grave, for where a Christian dog falls there he lies forever; but you can be kind to him after I am gone, for the love you bear his master."

"The words of my father are in my ears," returned the young partisan, making a grave and respectful gesture of assent.

"Do you hear what the chief has promised, dog?" demanded the trapper, making an effort to attract the notice of the insensible effigy of his hound. Receiving no answering look, nor hearing any friendly whine, the old man felt for the mouth, and endeavored to force his hand between the cold lips. The truth then flashed upon him, although he was far from perceiving the whole extent of the deception. Falling back in his seat, he hung his head, like one who felt a severe and unexpected shock. Profiting by this momentary forgetfulness, two young Indians removed the skin with the same delicacy of feeling that had induced them to attempt the pious fraud.

"The dog is dead!" muttered the trapper, after a pause of many minutes; "a hound has his time as well as a man; and well has he filled his days! Captain," he added, making an effort to wave his hand for Middleton, "I am glad you have come; for though kind, and well-meaning according to the gifts of their color, these Indians are not the men to lay the head of a white man in his grave. I have been thinking, too, of this dog at my feet; it will not do to set forth the opinion that a Christian can expect to meet his hound again; still there can be little harm in placing what is left of so faithful a servant nigh the bones of his master."

"It shall be as you desire."

"I'm glad you think with me in this matter. In order, then, to save labor, lay the pup at my feet; or for that matter, put him side by side. A hunter need never be ashamed to be found in company with his dog!"

"I charge myself with your wish."

The old man made a long and apparently a musing pause. At times he raised his eyes wistfully, as if he would again address Middleton, but some innate feeling appeared always to suppress his words. The other, who observed his hesitation, inquired in a way most likely to encourage him to proceed, whether there was aught else that he could wish to have done.

"I am without kith or kin in the wide world!" the trapper answered; "when I am gone there will be an end of my race. We have never been chiefs; but honest, and useful in our way, I hope it cannot be denied we have always proved ourselves. My father lies buried near the sea, and the bones of his son will whiten on the prairies"—

"Name the spot, and your remains shall be placed by the side of your father," interrupted Middleton.

"Not so, not so, captain. Let me sleep where I have lived,—beyond the din of the settlements! Still I see no need why the grave of an honest man should be hid, like a redskin in his ambushment. I paid a man in the settlements to make and put a graven stone at the head of my father's resting-place. It was of the value of twelve beaver-skins, and cunningly and curiously was it carved! Then it told to all comers that the body of such a Christian lay beneath; and it spoke of his manner of life. of his years, and of his honesty. When we had done with the Frenchers in the old war 1 I made a journey to the spot, in order to see that all was rightly performed, and glad I am to say, the workman had not forgotten his faith."

"And such a stone you would have at your grave?"

"I! no, no; I have no son but Hard-Heart, and it is little that an Indian knows of white fashions and usages. Besides, I am his debtor already, seeing it is so little I have done since I have lived in his tribe. The rifle might bring the value of such a thing—but then I know it will give the boy pleasure to hang the piece in his hall, for many is the deer and the bird that he has seen it destroy. No, no, the gun must be sent to him whose name is graven on the lock!"

"But there is one who would gladly prove his affection in the way you wish,—he who owes you not only his own deliverance from so many dangers, but who inherits a heavy debt of gratitude from his ancestors. The stone shall be put at the head of your grave."

The old man extended his emaciated hand, and gave the other a squeeze of thanks.

"I thought you might be willing to do it, but I was backward in asking the favor," he said, "seeing that you are not of my kin. Put no boastful words on the same, but just the name, the age, and the time of death, with something from the Holy Book; no more, no more. My name will then not be altogether lost on 'arth; I need no more."

<sup>1</sup> the French and Indian War

Middleton intimated his assent, and then followed a pause that was only broken by distant and broken sentences from the dying man. He appeared now to have closed his accounts with the world, and to await merely for the final summons to quit it. Middleton and Hard-Heart placed themselves on the opposite sides of his seat, and watched with melancholy solicitude the variations of his countenance. For two hours there was no very sensible alteration. The expression of his faded and time-worn features was that of a calm and dignified repose. From time to time he spoke, uttering some brief sentence in the way of advice, or asking some simple questions concerning those in whose fortunes he still took a friendly interest. During the whole of that solemn and anxious period each individual of the tribe kept his place, in the most self-restrained patience. When the old man spoke, all bent their heads to listen; and when his words were uttered, they seemed to ponder on their wisdom and usefulness.

As the flame drew nigher to the socket his voice was hushed, and there were moments when his attendants doubted whether he still belonged to the living. Middleton, who watched each wavering expression of his weather-beaten visage with the interest of a keen observer of human nature, softened by the tenderness of personal regard, fancied he could read the workings of the old man's soul in the strong lineaments of his countenance. Perhaps what the enlightened soldier took for the delusion of mistaken opinion did actually occur-for who has returned from that unknown world to explain by what forms, and in what manner, he was introduced into its awful precincts? Without pretending to explain what must ever be a mystery to the quick, we shall simply relate facts as they occurred.

The trapper had remained nearly motionless for an hour. His eyes alone had occasionally opened and shut. When opened, his gaze seemed fastened on the clouds which hung around the western horizon, reflecting the bright colors, and giving form and loveliness to the glorious tints of an American sunset. The hour—the calm beauty of the season—the occasion, all conspired to fill the spectators with solemn awe. Suddenly, while musing on the remarkable position in which he was placed, Middleton felt the hand which he held grasp his own with incredible power, and the old man, supported on either side by his friends, rose upright to his feet. For a moment he looked about him, as if to invite all in presence to listen (the lingering remnant of human frailty), and then, with a fine military elevation of the head, and with a voice that might be heard in every part of that numerous assembly, he pronounced the word—

"Here!" 1

A movement so entirely unexpected, and the air of grandeur and humility which were so remarkably united in the mien of the trapper. together with the clear and uncommon force of his utterance, produced a short period of confusion in the faculties of all present. When Middleton and Hard-Heart, each of whom had involuntarily extended a hand to support the form of the old man, turned to him again, they found that the subject of their interest was removed forever beyond the necessity of their care. They mournfully placed the body in its seat, and Le Balafré arose to announce the termination of the scene to the tribe. The voice of the old Indian seemed a sort of echo from that invisible world to which the meek spirit of the trapper had just departed.

"A valiant, a just, and a wise warrior has gone on the path which will lead him to the blessed grounds of his people!" he said. "When the voice of the Wahcondah called him, he was ready to answer. Go, my children; remember the just chief of the palefaces, and clear your own tracks from briers!"

The grave was made beneath the shade of some noble oaks. It has been carefully watched to the present hour by the Pawnees of the Loup, 2 and is often shown to the traveler and the trader as a spot where a just white man sleeps. In due time the stone was placed at its head, with the simple inscription which the trapper had himself requested. The only liberty taken by Middleton was to add, "May no wanton hand ever disturb his remains!"

1827

It is worthy of note that this passage was written some thirty years before Thackeray conceived a somewhat similar final scene in the life of the beloved Colonel Newcome, the aged pensioner at the school he had attended as a boy: "At the usual evening hour, the chapel bell began to toll, and Thomas Newcome's hands outside the bed feebly beat time. And just as the last bell struck, a peculiar sweet smile shone over his face, and he lifted up his head a little, and quickly said, 'Adsum!' and fell back. It was the word we used at school, when our names were called; and lo, he whose heart was as that of a little child, had answered to his name, and stood in the presence of The Master." The Newcomes, vol. ii.
2 the Pawnee Indians living on the Loup River in Nebraska

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT 1794-1878

The eldest of the "six great American poets," as the phrase once went (Bryant, Emerson, Longfellow, Whittier, Holmes, Lowell), was born at Cummington. Massachusetts, the son of a poor but able country doctor. He was sent after meager preparation to Williams College, where he remained seven months; then, giving up hope of a college training, he studied law. After a few years' practice, during which his poetry was beginning to attract attention. he entered journalism in New York City, and from 1828 was editor-in-chief of the Evening Post. He traveled extensively abroad and was active till his death by sunstroke. Aside from frequent volumes of poems from 1821 to 1863, he wrote Letters of a Traveller, 1852; Letters from Spain, 1859; Letters from the East, 1869. His translation of the Iliad appeared in 1870, and that of the Odyssey in 1871-1872.

American literature was fortunate in the fact that at the outset of its first really productive period it had, in Bryant and Irving, writers of taste who knew the value of form in poetry and prose respectively. Bryant's work is enveloped in a "cold, thin atmosphere," lacks passion and spontaneity, and personal charm; yet has high value because of its elemental dignity, its correctness, its sobriety, and the fact that it transmuted into art some spiritual forces strong in America a hundred years ago. Bryant's culture was essentially classic, and his art is based upon the classical tradition of the eighteenth century; this shows itself much as it does in Gray. But Bryant is also sensitive to nature and shows a joy in natural objects akin to that of Wordsworth.

Biography and criticism: J. Bigelow, William C. Bryant (AML), 1890; W. A. Bradley, W. C. Bryant (EML), 1905; C. H. Kirkland (LJ); Stedman (Poets); Chubb; W. L. Phelps, No. Am. 201: 224-7; J. L. Hervey, Dial 59:361-3.

THANATOPSIS 1

To him who in the love of Nature holds Communion with her visible forms, she speaks A various language; for his gayer hours She has a voice of gladness, and a smile

The word thanatopsis is made up of two Greek words.
\[
\text{\text{\text{\text{\text{$\tex{$\text{$\text{$\text{$\text{$\text{$\text{$\text{$\text{$\text{$

And eloquence of beauty, and she glides
Into his darker musings, with a mild
And healing sympathy, that steals away Their sharpness, ere he is aware. When thoughts

Of the last bitter hour come like a blight
Over thy spirit, and sad images
Of the stern agony, and shroud, and pall,
And breathless darkness, and the narrow house.
Make thee to shudder and grow sick at heart;—
Go forth, under the open sky, and list
To Nature's teachings, while from all around—
Earth and her waters, and the depths of air—
Comes a still voice—

Yet a few days, and thee The all-beholding sun shall see no more In all his course; nor yet in the cold ground, Where thy pale form was laid with many tears, Nor in the embrace of ocean, shall exist 21 Thy image. Earth, that nourished thee, shall claim

Thy growth, to be resolved to earth again,
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix forever with the elements.
To be a brother to the insensible rock
And to the sluggish clod, which the rude swain Turns with his share, and treads upon. The oak Shall send his roots abroad, and pierce thy mold.

Yet not to thine eternal resting-place
Shalt thou retire alone, nor couldst thou wish Couch more magnificent. Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings.
The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good,
Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past,
All in one mighty sepulcher. The hills
Rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun,—the vales
Stretching in pensive quietness between;
The venerable woods—rivers that move
In majesty, and the complaining brooks
That make the meadows green; and, poured round all.

Old Ocean's gray and melancholy waste,—<sup>2</sup> Are but the solemn decorations all Of the great tomb of man. The golden sun, The planets, all the infinite host of heaven, Are shining on the sad abodes of death Through the still lapse of ages. All that tread The globe are but a handful to the tribes <sup>3</sup> Bryant is particularly notable in such phrasings as these, which would be remarkable in the work of even a much greater poet. It is in such felicities that his greatest merit lies, for though the literary vistas opened by his work are meager, his eye for nature is correct and inspires him often to the faultless stroke.

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT

That slumber in its bosom.—Take the wings 50 Of morning, pierce the Barcan 1 wilderness Or lose thyself in the continuous woods Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound. Save his own dashings—yet the dead are there: And millions in those solitudes, since first The flight of years began, have laid them down In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone. So shalt thou rest, and what if thou withdraw In silence from the living, and no friend Take note of thy departure? All that breathe Will share thy destiny. The gay will laugh When thou art gone, the solemn brood of care Plod on, and each one as before will chase His favorite phantom; yet all these shall leave Their mirth and their employments, and shall

And make their bed with thee. As the long train

Of ages glides away, the sons of men, The youth in life's green spring, and he who

In the full strength of years, matron and maid, The speechless babe, and the gray-headed Shall one by one be gathered to thy side, By those, who in their turn shall follow them.

So live, that when thy summons comes to join The innumerable caravan, which moves To that mysterious realm, where each shall take His chamber in the silent halls of death. Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night, Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed

By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave. Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch 80 About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams. 1817

1811

TO A WATERFOWL 2

Whither, midst falling dew, While glow the heavens with the last steps of day.

Far, through their rosy depths, dost thou pursue Thy solitary way?

Vainly the fowler's eve Might mark thy distant flight to do thee wrong, As, darkly seen against the crimson sky, Thy figure floats along.

<sup>1</sup> The Barcan desert is northwest of Egypt.
<sup>2</sup> Bryant wrote the poem at a time of peculiar anxiety when away from home, seeking a place where he might find work in his profession. The picture is what he saw as he walked over the Massachusetts hills at sunset.

Seek'st thou the plashy brink 10 Of weedy lake, or marge of river wide, Or where the rocking billows rise and sink On the chafed ocean-side?

There is a Power whose care Teaches thy way along that pathless coast— The desert and illimitable air-Lone wandering, but not lost.

All day thy wings have fanned. At that far height, the cold, thin atmosphere, Yet stoop not, weary, to the welcome land, Though the dark night is near.

And soon that toil shall end: Soon shalt thou find a summer home, and rest. And scream among thy fellows: reeds shall hend

Soon, o'er thy sheltered nest.

Thou'rt gone, the abyss of heaven Hath swallowed up thy form; yet, on my heart Deeply hath sunk the lesson thou has given, And shall not soon depart.

He who, from zone to zone. Guides through the boundless sky thy certain flight.

In the long way that I must tread alone Will lead my steps aright. 1815

1818

GREEN RIVER

When breezes are soft and skies are fair. I steal an hour from study and care. And hie me away to the woodland scene. Where wanders the stream with waters of green, As if the bright fringe of herbs on its brink Had given their stain to the wave they drink; And they, whose meadows it murmurs through, Have named the stream from its own fair hue.

Yet pure its waters—its shallows are bright With colored pebbles and sparkles of light, And clear the depths where its eddies play, And dimples deepen and whirl away, And the plane-tree's speckled arms o'ershoot The swifter current that mines its root, Through whose shifting leaves, as you walk the hill,

The quivering glimmer of sun and rill With a sudden flash on the eye is thrown. Like the ray that streams from the diamond-

Oh, loveliest there the spring days come, With blossoms, and birds, and wild-bees' hum; The flowers of summer are fairest there.

And freshest the breath of the summer air; And sweetest the golden autumn day In silence and sunshine glides away.

Yet, fair as thou art, thou shunnest to glide, Beautiful stream! by the village side; But windest away from haunts of men. To quiet valley and shaded glen; And forest, and meadow, and slope of hill, 30 Around thee, are lonely, lovely, and still, Lonely-save when by thy rippling tides, From thicket to thicket the angler glides; Or the simpler 1 comes, with basket and book, For herbs of power on thy banks to look; Or haply, some idle dreamer, like me, To wander, and muse, and gaze on thee, Still—save the chirp of birds that feed On the river cherry and seedy reed, And thy own wild music gushing out 40 With mellow murmur and fairy shout, From dawn to the blush of another day, Like a traveler singing along his way.

That fairy music I never hear,
Nor gaze on those waters so green and clear,
And mark them winding away from sight.
Darkened with shade or flashing with light.
While o'er them the vine to its thicket clings,
And the zephyr stoops to freshen his wings,
But I wish that fate had left me free
To wander these quiet haunts with thee.
Till the eating cares of earth should depart,
And the peace of the scene pass into my heart;
And I envy thy stream, as it glides along Through its beautiful banks in a trance of song.

Though forced to drudge for the dregs of men,
And scrawl strange words with the barbarous pen,
And mingle among the jostling crowd,
Where the sons of strife are subtle and loud—
I often come to this quiet place,
To breathe the airs that ruffle thy face,
And gaze upon thee in silent dream,
For in thy lonely and lovely stream
An image of that calm life appears

SUMMER WIND 2

1821

It is a sultry day; the sun has drunk The dew that lay upon the morning grass; There is no rustling in the lofty elm

That won my heart in my greener years.

1819

one who collects simples, herbs
 It may be noted that wind is the element most influential in Bryant's poetic moods.

That canopies my dwelling, and its shade Scarce cools me. All is silent, save the faint And interrupted murmur of the bee. Settling on the sick flowers, and then again Instantly on the wing. The plants around Feel the too potent fervors: the tall maize Rolls up its long green leaves: the clover droops Its tender foliage, and declines its blooms. But far in the fierce sunshine tower the hills, With all their growth of woods, silent and stern, As if the scorching heat and dazzling light Were but an element they loved. Bright clouds. Motionless pillars of the brazen heaven-Their bases on the mountains—their white tops Shining in the far ether—fire the air With a reflected radiance, and make turn The gazer's eye away. For me, I lie Languidly in the shade, where the thick turf, Yet virgin from the kisses of the sun, Retains some freshness, and I woo the wind That still delays his coming. Why so slow, Gentle and voluble spirit of the air? Oh, come and breathe upon the fainting earth Coolness and life. Is it that in his caves He hears me? See, on yonder woody ridge, The pine is bending his proud top, and now Among the nearer groves, chestnut and oak Are tossing their green boughs about. comes:

Lo, where the grassy meadow runs in waves! The deep distressful silence of the scene Breaks up with mingling of unnumbered sounds And universal motion. He is come, Shaking a shower of blossoms from the shrubs, And bearing on their fragrance; and he brings Music of birds, and rustling of young boughs, And sound of swaying branches, and the voice Of distant waterfalls. All the green herbs Are stirring in his breath; a thousand flowers, By the road-side and the borders of the brook, Nod gavly to each other; glossy leaves Are twinkling in the sun, as if the dew Were on them yet, and silver waters break Into small waves and sparkle as he comes. 1824 1824

THE DEATH OF THE FLOWERS

The melancholy days are come, the saddest of the year.

Of wailing winds, and naked woods, and meadows brown and sere.

Heaped in the hollows of the grove, the autumn leaves lie dead;

They rustle to the eddying gust, and to the rabbit's tread;

The robin and the wren are flown, and from the shrubs the jay,

And from the wood-top calls the crow through all the gloomy day.

Where are the flowers, the fair young flowers, that lately sprang and stood

In brighter light and softer airs, a beauteous sisterhood?

Alas! they all are in their graves, the gentle race of flowers

Are lying in their lowly beds, with the fair and good of ours.

The rain is falling where they lie, but the cold November rain

Calls not from out the gloomy earth the lovely ones again. 1

The wind-flower and the violet, they perished long ago.

And the brier-rose and the orchis died amid the summer glow;

But on the hill the golden-rod, and the aster in the wood.

And the vellow sun-flower by the brook, in autumn beauty stood.

Till fell the frost from the clear cold heaven. as falls the plague on men,

And the brightness of their smile was gone. from upland, glade, and glen.

And now, when comes the calm mild day, as still such days will come,

To call the squirrel and the bee from out their winter home:

When the sound of dropping nuts is heard, though all the trees are still.

And twinkle in the smoky light the waters of the rill.

The south wind searches for the flowers whose fragrance late he bore.

And sighs to find them in the wood and by the stream no more.

And then I think of one who in her youthful beauty died,

The fair meek blossom that grew up and faded by my side.

In the cold moist earth we laid her, when the forest cast the leaf.

And we wept that one so lovely should have a life so brief:

Yet not unmeet it was that one, like that young friend of ours,

So gentle and so beautiful, should perish with the flowers.

1825

<sup>1</sup> Bryant's work contains a good deal of eighteenth century poetic diction, the realism in his pictures ridding them of artificiality. "The Death of the Flowers' may well be compared with Tennyson's "Song," "A spirit haunts the year's last hours."

"O FAIREST OF THE RURAL MATDS" 2

O. fairest of the rural maids! Thy birth was in the forest shades: Green boughs, and glimpses of the sky, Were all that met thine infant eve.

Thy sports, thy wanderings, when a child, Were ever in the sylvan wild; And all the beauty of the place Is in thy heart and on thy face.

The twilight of the trees and rocks Is in the light shade of thy locks: Thy step is as the wind, that weaves Its playful way among the leaves.

Thy eyes are springs, in whose serene And silent waters heaven is seen: Their lashes are the herbs that look On their young figures in the brook.

The forest depths, by foot unpressed. Are not more sinless than thy breast; The holy peace, that fills the air Of those calm solitudes, is there.

20

10

1832

A FOREST HYMN

The groves were God's first temples. Ere man learned

To hew the shaft, and lay the architrave, And spread the roof above them—ere he framed The lofty vault, to gather and roll back The sound of anthems: in the darkling wood. Amid the cool and silence, he knelt down, And offered to the Mightiest solemn thanks And supplication. For his simple heart Might not resist the sacred influences Which, from the stilly twilight of the place, And from the gray old trunks that high in heaven

Mingled their mossy boughs, and from the sound

Of the invisible breath that swayed at once All their green tops, stole over him, and bowed His spirit with the thought of boundless power And inaccessible majesty. Ah, why Should we, in the world's riper years, neglect God's ancient sanctuaries, and adore Only among the crowd, and under roofs That our frail hands have raised? Let me, at least,

Here, in the shadow of this aged wood, Offer one hymn—thrice happy, if it find Acceptance in His ear.

<sup>2</sup> These verses Bryant addressed to his wife. Comparison with "She was a phantom of delight," written by Wordsworth to his own wife, is illuminating.

Father, thy hand Hath reared these venerable columns, thou Didst weave this verdant roof. Thou didst look down Upon the naked earth, and, forthwith, rose All these fair ranks of trees. They, in thy sun, Budded, and shook their green leaves in thy breeze.

And shot toward heaven. The century-living

Whose birth was in their tops, grew old and

Among their branches, till, at last, they stood, As now they stand, massy, and tall, and dark, Fit shrine for humble worshiper to hold Communion with his Maker. These dim vaults, These winding aisles, of human pomp or pride Report not. No fantastic carvings show The boast of our vain race to change the form Of thy fair works. But thou art here—thou fill'st

The solitude. Thou art in the soft winds
That run along the summit of these trees
In music; thou art in the cooler breath
That from the inmost darkness of the place Comes, scarcely felt; the barky trunks, the ground,

The fresh moist ground, are all instinct with

Here is continual worship;—Nature, here, In the tranquillity that thou dost love, Enjoys thy presence. Noiselessly, around, From perch to perch, the solitary bird Passes; and you clear spring, that, midst its herbs,

Wells softly forth and wandering steeps the

Wells softly forth and wandering steeps the

Of half the mighty forest, tells no tale
Of all the good it does. Thou hast not left
Thyself without a witness, in these shades,
Of thy perfections. Grandeur, strength, and grace

My heart is awed within me when I think 70 Of the great miracle that still goes on. In silence, round me—the perpetual work Of thy creation, finished, yet renewed Forever. Written on thy works I read The lesson of thy own eternity. Lo! all grow old and die-but see again, How on the faltering footsteps of decay Youth presses—ever gay and beautiful youth In all its beautiful forms. These lofty trees Wave not less proudly that their ancestors Molder beneath them. 1 Oh, there is not lost One of earth's charms: upon her bosom yet, After the flight of untold centuries. The freshness of her far beginning lies And yet shall lie. Life mocks the idle hate Of his arch enemy Death—vea, seats himself Upon the tyrant's throne—the sepulcher, And of the triumphs of his ghastly foe Makes his own nourishment. For he came forth From thine own bosom, and shall have no end.

There have been holy men who hid themselves

Deep in the woody wilderness, and gave Their lives to thought and prayer, till they outlived

The generation born with them, nor seemed Less aged than the hoary trees and rocks Around them;—and there have been holy men Who deemed it were not well to pass life thus. But let me often to these solitudes Retire, and in thy presence reassure My feeble virtue. Here its enemies,

The passions, at thy plainer footsteps shrink And tremble and are still. Oh, God! when thou Dost scare the world with tempests, set on fire The heavens with falling thunderbolts, or fill, With all the waters of the firmament, The swift dark whirlwind that uproots the woods

And drowns the villages; when, at thy call, Uprises the great deep and throws himself Upon the continent, and overwhelms Its cities—who forgets not, at the sight 109 Of these tremendous tokens of thy power, His pride, and lays his strifes and follies by? Oh, from these sterner aspects of thy face Spare me and mine, nor let us need the wrath Of the mad unchained elements to teach

Bryant's method of treating this idea is pointedly in contrast with that of Omar Khayyam, Rubaiyat, xx:

&quot;And this delightful herb of tender Green Fledges the River's Lip on which we lean—Ah, lean upon it lightly! for who knows From what once lovely lip it springs unseen!"

30

40

5.01

Who rules them. Be it ours to meditate. In these calm shades, thy milder majesty. And to the beautiful order of thy works Learn to conform the order of our lives. 1825

IUNE

I gazed upon the glorious sky And the green mountains round. And thought that when I came to lie At rest within the ground. 'T were pleasant, that in flowery June, When brooks send up a cheerful tune. And groves a joyous sound. The sexton's hand, my grave to make. The rich, green mountain-turf should break. 1

A cell within the frozen mold. A coffin borne through sleet. And icy clods above it rolled. While fierce the tempests beat— Away!—I will not think of these— Blue be the sky and soft the breeze. Earth green beneath the feet. And be the damp mold gently pressed Into my narrow place of rest.

There through the long, long summer hours, The golden light should lie. And thick young herbs and groups of flowers Stand in their beauty by. The oriole should build and tell His love-tale close beside my cell: The idle butterfly Should rest him there, and there be heard The housewife bee and humming-bird.

And what if cheerful shouts at noon Come, from the village sent, Or songs of maids, beneath the moon With fairy laughter blent? And what if, in the evening light, Betrothed lovers walk in sight Of my low monument? I would the lovely scene around Might know no sadder sight nor sound.

I know that I no more should see The season's glorious show, Nor would its brightness shine for me. Nor its wild music flow; But if, around my place of sleep, The friends I love should come to weep, They might not haste to go.

1 Bryant died June 12th, 1878.

Soft airs, and song, and light, and bloom Should keep them lingering by my tomb.

These to their softened hearts should bear The thought of what has been, And speak of one who cannot share The gladness of the scene: Whose part, in all the pomp that fills The circuit of the summer hills. Is that his grave is green; And deeply would their hearts rejoice To hear again his living voice. 1825 1826

THE PAST

Thou unrelenting Past! 2 Strong are the barriers round thy dark domain. And fetters, sure and fast, Hold all that enter thy unbreathing reign.

Far in thy realm withdrawn Old empires sit in sullenness and gloom. And glorious ages gone Lie deep within the shadow of thy womb.

Childhood, with all its mirth. Youth, Manhood, Age that draws us to the ground. And last, Man's Life on earth. Glide to thy dim dominions, and are bound.

Thou hast my better years; Thou hast my earlier friends, the good, the kind. Yielded to thee with tears; The venerable form, the exalted mind.

My spirit yearns to bring The lost ones back—yearns with desire intense, And struggles hard to wring Thy bolts apart, and pluck thy captives thence.

In vain; thy gates deny All passage save to those who hence depart; Nor to the streaming eye Thou giv'st them back-nor to the broken heart.

In thy abysses hide Beauty and excellence unknown; to thee

<sup>2</sup> The theme of this poem is the same as that of the Rubàiyàt of Omar Khayyàm, lxxi, "The Moving Finger writes; and having writ. Moves on: nor all thy Piety nor Wit Shall lure it back to cancel half a Line, Nor all thy Tears wash out a Word of it."

Earth's wonder and her pride Are gathered, as the waters to the sea;

Labors of good to man,
Unpublished charity, unbroken faith,
Love, that midst grief began,
And grew with years, and faltered not in death.

Full many a mighty name Lurks in thy depths, unuttered, unrevered; With thee are silent fame, Forgotten arts, and wisdom disappeared.

Thine for a space are they—
Yet shalt thou yield thy treasures up at last:
Thy gates shall yet give way,
Thy bolts shall fall, inexorable Past!

All that of good and fair
Has gone into thy womb from earliest time,
Shall then come forth to wear
The glory and the beauty of its prime.

They have not perished—no!
Kind words, remembered voices once so sweet,
Smiles, radiant, long ago,
And features, the great soul's apparent seat.

All shall come back; each tie
Of pure affection shall be knit again;
Alone shall Evil die,
And Sorrow dwell a prisoner in thy reign.

And then shall I behold
Him, by whose kind paternal side I sprung,
And her, who, still and cold,
Fills the next grave—the beautiful and young.
1828
1829

THE EVENING WIND

Spirit that breathest through my lattice, thou
That cool'st the twilight of the sultry day,
Gratefully flows thy freshness round my brow;
Thou hast been out upon the deep at play,
Riding all day the wild blue waves till now, Roughening their crests, and scattering high their spray,
And swelling the white sail. I welcome thee

To the scorched land, thou wanderer of the sea!

Nor I alone; a thousand bosoms round
Inhale thee in the fulness of delight;
And languid forms rise up, and pulses bound
Livelier, at coming of the wind of night;
And, languishing to hear thy grateful sound,
Lies the vast inland stretched beyond the sight.

Go forth into the gathering shade; go forth, God's blessing breathed upon the fainting earth!

Go, rock the little wood-bird in his nest, Curl the still waters, bright with stars, and

The wide old wood from his majestic rest,
Summoning from the innumerable boughs
The strange, deep harmonies that haunt his

Pleasant shall be thy way where meekly bows The shutting flower, and darkling waters pass, And where the o'ershadowing branches sweep the grass.

The faint old man shall lean his silver head
To feel thee; thou shalt kiss the child asleep,
And dry the moistened curls that overspread
His temples, while his breathing grows more deep:

And they who stand about the sick man's bed Shall joy to listen to thy distant sweep.

And softly part his curtains to allow
Thy visit, grateful to his burning brow.

Go—but the circle of eternal change,
Which is the life of Nature, shall restore,
With sounds and scents from all thy mighty range.

Thee to thy birthplace of the deep once more; Sweet odors in the sea-air, sweet and strange, Shall tell the homesick mariner of the shore; And, listening to thy murmur, he shall deem <sup>39</sup> He hears the rustling leaf and running stream. 1829

TO THE FRINGED GENTIAN

Thou blossom bright with autumn dew, And colored with the heaven's own blue, That openest when the quiet light Succeeds the keen and frosty night,

Thou comest not when violets lean O'er wandering brooks and springs unseen, Or columbines, in purple dressed, Nod o'er the ground-bird's hidden nest.

Thou waitest late and com'st alone, When woods are bare and birds are flown, And frosts and shortening days portend The aged year is near his end.

10

Then doth thy sweet and quiet eye Look through its fringes to the sky, Blue—blue—as if that sky let fall A flower from its cerulean wall.

20

30

1831

1831

I would that thus, when I shall see The hour of death draw near to me, Hope, blossoming within my heart, May look to heaven as I depart.

SONG OF MARION'S MEN 1

Our band is few but true and tried,
Our leader frank and bold;
The British soldier trembles
When Marion's name is told.
Our fortress is the good greenwood,
Our tent the cypress-tree;
We know the forest round us,
As seamen know the sea.
We know its walls of thorny vines
Its glades of reedy grass,
Its safe and silent islands
Within the dark morass.

Woe to the English soldiery
That little dread us near!
On them shall light at midnight
A strange and sudden fear:
When, waking to their tents on fire,
They grasp their arms in vain,
And they who stand to face us
Are beat to earth again;
And they who fly in terror deem
A mighty host behind,
And hear the tramp of thousands
Upon the hollow wind.

Then sweet the hour that brings release
From danger and from toil:
We talk the battle over,
And share the battle's spoil.
The woodland rings with laugh and shout,
As if a hunt were up,
And woodland flowers are gathered
To crown the soldier's cup.
With merry songs we mock the wind
That in the pine-top grieves,
And slumber long and sweetly
On beds of oaken leaves.

Well knows the fair and friendly moon
The band that Marion leads—
The glitter of their rifles,
The scampering of their steeds.

'Tis life to guide the fiery barb
Across the moonlight plain;

General Francis Marion, 1732-95, was the brilliant commander of a force of irregular cavalry that did much to annoy large bodies of British troops and prevent them from concerted movements against the colonists.

'Tis life to feel the night-wind
That lifts the tossing mane

A moment in the British camp—
A moment—and away

Back to the pathless forest,
Before the peep of day.

Grave men there are by broad Santee,
Grave men with hoary hairs;
Their hearts are all with Marion,
For Marion are their prayers.
And lovely ladies greet our band
With kindliest welcoming,
With smiles like those of summer,
And tears like those of spring.
For them we wear these trusty arms,
And lay them down no more
Till we have driven the Briton,
Forever, from our shore.

THE PRAIRIES<sup>2</sup>

These are the gardens of the Desert, these
The unshorn fields, boundless and beautiful,
For which the speech of England has no name—
The Prairies. I behold them for the first,
And my heart swells while the dilated sight Takes in the encircling vastness. Lo! they stretch

Among the palms of Mexico and vines
Of Texas, and have crisped the limpid brooks
That from the fountains of Sonora glide
Into the calm Pacific—have ye fanned
A nobler or a lovelier scene than this?
Man hath no part in all this glorious work:
The hand that built the firmament hath heaved
And smoothed these verdant swells, and sown their slopes

With herbage, planted them with island groves, And hedged them round with forests. Fitting Written when Bryant visited the prairies of Illinois in 1832; the word prairie is the French prairie, meadow. For this magnificent temple of the sky-With flowers whose glory and whose multitude Rival the constellations! The great heavens Seem to stoop down upon the scene in love .-A nearer vault, and of a tenderer blue, Than that which bends above our eastern hills.

As o'er the verdant waste I guide my steed. Among the high rank grass that sweeps his sides

The hollow beating of his footsteps seems A sacrilegious sound. I think of those Upon whose rest he tramples. Are they here-The dead of other days?—and did the dust Of these fair solitudes once stir with life And burn with passion? Let the mighty mounds

That overlook the rivers, or that rise In the dim forest crowded with old oaks, Answer. A race that long has passed away Built them;—a disciplined and populous race 1 Heaped, with long toil, the earth, while yet the Greek

Was hewing the Pentelicus to forms Of symmetry, and rearing on its rock The glittering Parthenon. 2 These ample fields Nourished their harvests, here their herds were

When haply by their stalls the bison lowed. And bowed his maned shoulder to the yoke. All day this desert murmured with their toils, Till twilight blushed, and lovers walked, and wooed

In a forgotten language, and old tunes, From instruments of unremembered form. Gave the soft winds a voice. The red man

The roaming hunter tribes, warlike and fierce, And the mound-builders vanished from the earth

The solitude of centuries untold

Has settled where they dwelt. The prairiewolf

Hunts in their meadows, and his fresh-dug den Yawns by my path. The gopher mines the

Where stood their swarming cities. All is gone; All—save the piles of earth that hold their

The platforms where they worshiped unknown gods.

The barriers which they builded from the soil

1 The mound builders, to whom Bryant here refers, are Ine mound builders, to whom Bryant here refers, are now generally supposed by archaeologists to have been of the same general race as the Indians of more modern times.
 The Parthenon, situated on the acropolis of Athens, the highest point of the city, was built from marble quarried at Mount Pentelicus.

To keep the foe at bay-till o'er the walls The wild beleaguerers broke, and, one by one, The strongholds of the plain were forced and heaped

With corpses. The brown vultures of the wood Flocked to those vast uncovered sepulchers. And sat, unscared and silent, at their feast. Haply some solitary fugitive. Lurking in marsh and forest, till the sense Of desolation and of fear became Bitterer than death, yielded himself to die.

Man's better nature triumphed then. words Welcomed and soothed him; the rude conquer-

Seated the captive with their chiefs; he chose A bride among their maidens, and at length Seemed to forget-yet ne'er forgot-the wife Of his first love, and her sweet little ones, Butchered amid their shrieks, with all his race.

Thus change the forms of being. Thus arise Races of living things, glorious in strength, And perish, as the quickening breath of God Fills them, or is withdrawn. The red man,

Has left the blooming wilds he ranged so long, And, nearer to the Rocky Mountains, sought 91 A wider hunting-ground. The beaver builds No longer by these streams, but far away, On waters whose blue surface ne'er gave back The white man's face - among Missouri's springs.

And pools whose issues swell the Oregon-He rears his little Venice. In these plains The bison feeds no more. Twice twenty leagues Beyond remotest smoke of hunter's camp, Roams the majestic brute, in herds that shake The earth with thundering steps—yet here I

His ancient footprints stamped beside the pool.

Still this great solitude is quick with life. Myriads of insects, gaudy as the flowers They flutter over, gentle quadrupeds, And birds, that scarce have learned the fear of

Are here, and sliding reptiles of the ground, Startlingly beautiful. The graceful deer Bounds to the wood at my approach. The bee, A more adventurous colonist than man. With whom he came across the eastern deep, Fills the savannas with his murmurings, And hides his sweets, as in the golden age, Within the hollow oak. I listen long To his domestic hum, and think I hear The sound of that advancing multitude

Which soon shall fill these deserts. From the ground

Comes up the laugh of children, the soft voice Of maidens, and the sweet and solemn hymn Of Sabbath worshipers; the low of herds 120 Blends with the rustling of the heavy grain Over the dark-brown furrows. All at once A fresher wind sweeps by, and breaks my dream,

And I am in the wilderness alone.

1832

1833

10 20 30

THE BATTLE-FIELD

Once this soft turf, this rivulet's sands, Were trampled by a hurrying crowd, And fiery hearts and armed hands Encountered in the battle-cloud

Ah! never shall the land forget
How gushed the life-blood of her brave;
Gushed, warm with hope and valor yet,
Upon the soil they fought to save.

Now all is calm, and fresh, and still;
Alone the chirp of flitting bird,
And talk of children on the hill,
And bell of wandering kine, are heard.

No solemn host goes trailing by
The black-mouthed gun and staggering wain;
Men start not at the battle-cry,
Oh, be it never heard again!

Soon rested those who fought; but thou Who minglest in the harder strife For truths which men receive not now, Thy warfare only ends with life.

A friendless warfare! lingering long
Through weary day and weary year,
A wild and many-weaponed throng
Hang on thy front, and flank, and rear.

Yet nerve thy spirit to the proof,
And blench not at thy chosen lot.
The timid good may stand aloof,
The sage may frown—yet faint thou not.

Nor heed the shaft too surely cast, The foul and hissing bolt of scorn; For with thy side shall dwell, at last. The victory of endurance born.

Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again; Th' eternal years of God are hers; But Error, wounded, writhes in pain, And dies among his worshipers. <sup>1</sup> probably Bryant's best known stanza Yea, though thou lie upon the dust,
When those who helped thee flee in fear,
Die full of hope and manly trust,
Like those who fell in battle here.

Another hand thy sword shall wield, Another hand the standard wave, Till from the trumpet's mouth is pealed The blast of triumph o'er thy grave.

1837

ROBERT OF LINCOLN

Merrily swinging on brier and weed,
Near to the nest of his little dame,
Over the mountain-side or mead
Robert of Lincoln is telling his name:
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Snug and safe is that nest of ours,
Hidden among the summer flowers.
Chee. chee. chee.

Robert of Lincoln is gayly drest,
Wearing a bright black wedding-coat;
White are his shoulders and white his crest.
Hear him call his merry note:
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Look what a nice new coat is mine,
Sure there was never a bird so fine.
Chee. chee.

Robert of Lincoln's Quaker wife,
Pretty and quiet, with plain brown wings,
Passing at home a patient life,
Broods in the grass while her husband sings:
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Brood, kind creature; you need not fear
Thieves and robbers while I am here.
Chee, chee, chee.

Modest and shy as a nun is she;
One weak chirp is her only note.
Braggart and prince of braggarts is he,
Pouring boasts from his little throat:
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Never was I afraid of man;
Catch me, cowardly knaves, if you can!
Chee, chee, chee.

Six white eggs on a bed of hay, Flecked with purple, a pretty sight! There as the mother sits all day, Robert is singing with all his might:

40

30

60

70

1855

Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link, Spink, spank, spink; Nice good wite, that never goes out, Keeping house while I frolic about. Chee, chee, chee.

Soon as the little ones chip the shell Six wide mouths are open for food; Robert of Lincoln bestirs him well, Gathering seeds for the hungry brood. Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link, Spink, spank, spink; This new life is likely to be Hard for a gay young fellow like me. Chee, chee, chee.

Robert of Lincoln at length is made Sober with work, and silent with care; Off is his holiday garment laid, Half forgotten that merry air: Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link, Spink, spank, spink; Nobody knows but my mate and I Where our nest and our nestlings lie. Chee, chee, chee.

Summer wanes: the children are grown; Fun and frolic no more he knows: Robert of Lincoln's a humdrum crone; Off he flies, and we sing as he goes: Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link, Spink, spank, spink; When you can pipe that merry old strain, Robert of Lincoln, come back again. Chee, chee, chee. 1855

WAITING BY THE GATE 1

Beside a massive gateway built up in years gone by.

Upon whose top the clouds in eternal shadow

While streams the evening sunshine on quiet wood and lea,

I stand and calmly wait till the hinges turn for me.

The tree-tops faintly rustle beneath the breeze's

A soft and soothing sound, yet it whispers of the night:

I hear the wood-thrush piping one mellow descant more.

And scent the flowers that blow when the heat of day is o'er.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Tennyson's Crossing the Bar, and Browning's Prospice.

Behold, the portals open, and o'er the threshold, now

There steps a weary one with a pale and furrowed brow;

His count of years is full, his allotted task is wrought:

He passes to his rest from a place that needs him not

In sadness then I ponder how quickly fleets the

Of human strength and action, man's courage and his power.

I muse while still the wood-thrush sings down the golden day,

And as I look and listen the sadness wears

Again the hinges turn, and a youth, departing,

A look of longing backward, and sorrowfully goes:

A blooming maid, unbinding the roses from her hair.

Moves mournfully away from amid the young and fair.

O glory of our race that so suddenly decays! O crimson flush of morning that darkens as we gaze! O breath of summer blossoms that on the restless air Scatters a moment's sweetness, and flies we know not where!

I grieve for life's bright promise, just shown and then withdrawn;

But still the sun shines round me: the evening bird sings on,

And I again am soothed, and, beside the ancient

In this soft evening sunlight, I calmly stand and wait.

Once more the gates are opened; an infant group go out,

The sweet smile quenched forever, and stilled the sprightly shout.

O frail, frail tree of Life, that upon the greensward strows

Its fair young buds unopened, with every wind that blows!

So come from every region, so enter, side by

The strong and faint of spirit, the meek and men of pride.

20

30 40

50

Steps of earth's great and mighty, between those pillars gray.

And prints of little feet, mark the dust along the way.

And some approach the threshold whose looks are blank with fear,

And some whose temples brighten with joy in drawing near.

As if they saw dear faces, and caught the gracious eve

Of Him, the Sinless Teacher, who came for us to die.

I mark the joy, the terror; yet these, within my heart.

Can neither wake the dread nor the longing to depart:

And, in the sunshine streaming on quiet wood and lea.

I stand and calmly wait till the hinges turn for me.

1860 1864

JOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE 1796-1820

Outward circumstances in the lives of Drake and Keats have sometimes made the American poet remembered in terms of the more famous Englishman. They were born in the same year, and the death of both was by consumption within the same six months. Drake was born and died in New York City. After obtaining a good schooling which cost him much in effort against adverse circumstances, he was for a time employed in business and then took up the study of medicine, in which he received a degree. Shortly after, he married a woman of means and visited Europe; but less than two years after his return he died. With Halleck he contributed in 1819 to the New York Evening Post a series of poems over the signature of "Croaker & Co.," satirizing local persons and local political and social occurrences.

Like Keats, Drake is lamented because of the brilliant promise that he showed. "The Culprit Fay," his finest poem, was written in two days and shows a degree of inventive imagination lacking in American poetry of his time. Very likely it was inspired in style by Coleridge's "Christabel"; but the poem is original and natively American in setting and details. It will be noticed that the flora, and the animals and insects of the tale, belong to the Hudson River region where the narrative begins. The poem depends for its success upon genuine poetic gifts, and upon a sprightliness of fancy exactly in keeping with the airy subject.

Criticism: J. G. Wilson, "The Author of 'The American Flag," "Cent. 80:439-44; A. E. Corning, "Joseph Rodman Drake," Bookm. 41:574-6.

THE AMERICAN FLAG

When Freedom from her mountain height Unfurled her standard to the air, She tore the azure robe of night.

And set the stars of glory there;
She mingled with its gorgeous dyes
The milky baldric of the skies,
And striped its pure, celestial white
With streakings of the morning light;
Then from his mansion in the sun
She called her eagle bearer down,
And gave into his mighty hand
The symbol of her chosen land.

Majestic monarch of the cloud, Who rear'st aloft thy regal form, To hear the tempest-trumpings loud And see the lightning-lances driven,

When strive the warriors of the storm,
And rolls the thunder-drum of heaven—
Child of the sun! to thee 'tis given
To guard the banner of the free,
To hover in the sulphur smoke
To ward away the battle-stroke,
And bid its blendings shine afar,
Like rainbows on the cloud of war,
The harbingers of victory!

Flag of the brave! thy folds shall fly,
The sign of hope and triumph high,
When speaks the signal-trumpet tone,
And the long line comes gleaming on.
Ere yet the life-blood, warm and wet,
Has dimmed the glistening bayonet.
Each soldier eye shall brightly turn
Where thy sky-born glories burn,
And, as his springing steps advance,
Catch war and vengeance from the glance.
And when the cannon-mouthings loud
Heave in wild wreaths the battle shroud,
And gory sabers rise and fall
-Like shoots of flame on midnight's pall,
Then shall thy meteor-glances glow,

And cowering foes shall shrink beneath Each gallant arm that strikes below That lovely messenger of death.

Flag of the seas! on ocean wave Thy stars shall glitter o'er the brave; When death, careering on the gale, Sweeps darkly round the bellied sail, And frighted waves rush wildly back Before the broadside's reeling rack, Each dying wanderer of the sea Shall look at once to heaven and thee, And smile to see thy splendors fly In triumph o'er his closing eye. Flag of the free heart's hope and home!
By angel hands to valor given;
The stars have lit the welkin dome,
And all thy hues were born in heaven.
Forever float that standard sheet!
Where breathes the foe but falls before us,
With Freedom's soil beneath our feet,
And Freedom's banner streaming o'er us?

1819

THE CULPRIT FAY 2

r

'Tis the middle watch of a summer's night-The earth is dark, but the heavens are bright; Naught is seen in the vault on high But the moon, and the stars, and the cloudless skv. And the flood which rolls its milky hue. A river of light on the welkin blue. The moon looks down on old Cronest, She mellows the shades on his shaggy breast, And seems his huge gray form to throw 10 In a silver cone on the wave below; His sides are broken by spots of shade, By the walnut bough and the cedar made, And through their clustering branches dark Glimmers and dies the fire-fly's spark-Like starry twinkles that momently break. Through the rifts of the gathering tempest's rack.

II

The stars are on the moving stream.
And fling, as its ripples gently flow,
A burnished length of wavy beam
In an eel-like, spiral line below;
The winds are whist, and the owl is still,
The bat in the shelvy rock is hid,
And naught is heard on the lonely hill
But the cricket's chirp, and the answer shrill
Of the gauze-winged katy-did;
And the plaint of the wailing whip-poor-will,
Who moans unseen, and ceaseless sings.
Ever a note of wail and woe,
Till morning spreads her rosy wings,
And earth and sky in her glances glow.

III

'Tis the hour of fairy ban and spell; The wood-tick has kept the minutes well; He has counted them all with click and stroke Deep in the heart of the mountain oak,

<sup>1</sup> The last four lines were written by Ha'leck.
<sup>2</sup> The poem was written by Drake, pe haps as early as 1816, as an answer to one of his friends who remarked that it would be difficult to write a fairy poem without the aid of human characters.

And he has awakened the sentry elve
Who sleeps with him in the haunted tree,
To bid him ring the hour of twelve,
And call the fays to their revelry;
Twelve small strokes on his tinkling bell—
('Twas made of the white snail's pearly shell;)
"Midnight comes, and all is well!
Hither, hither, wing your way!
'Tis the dawn of the fairy-day."

ΙV

They come from beds of lichen green,
They creep from the mullein's velvet screen;
Some on the backs of beetles fly
From the silver tops of moon-touched trees,
Where they swung in their cobweb hammocks high,

And rocked about in the evening breeze;
Some from the hum-bird's downy nest—
They had driven him out by elfin power,
And pillowed on plumes of his rainbow breast

Had slumbered there till the charmed hour; Some had lain in the scoop of the rock,

With glittering ising-stars <sup>8</sup> inlaid; And some had opened the four-o'clock, And stole within its purple shade. And now they throng the moonlight glade, Above—below—on every side,

Their little minim 4 forms arrayed In the tricksy pomp of fairy pride!

37

60

80

They come not now to print the lea, In freak and dance around the tree, Or at the mushroom board to sup. And drink the dew from the buttercup; A scene of sorrow waits them now. For an Ouphe 5 has broken his vestal vow; He has loved an earthly maid, And left for her his woodland shade; 70 He has lain upon her lip of dew, And sunned him in her eye of blue, Fanned her cheek with his wing of air, Played in the ringlets of her hair, And, nestling on her snowy breast. Forgot the lily-king's behest. For this the shadowy tribes of air

To the elfin court must haste away:—And now they stand expectant there,
To hear the doom of the culprit Fay.

VI

The throne was reared upon the grass, Of spice-wood and the sassafras;

a word irregularly compounded from isinglass very least; smallest oaf; strictly, a changeling left by fairies; here a recalcitrant fairy

161

On pillars of mottled tortoise-shell Hung the burnished canopy— And over it gorgeous curtains fell Of the tulip's crimson drapery.

The monarch sat on his judgment-seat, On his brow the crown imperial shone.

The prisoner Fay was at his feet,

And his peers were ranged around the throne. He waved his scepter in the air.

He looked around and calmly spoke; His brow was grave and his eye severe, But his voice in a softened accent broke:

VTT

"Fairy! Fairy! list and mark:

Thou hast broke thine elfin chain; <sup>1</sup> Thy flame-wood lamp is quenched and dark,

And thy wings are dyed with a deadly stain-Thou hast sullied thine elfin purity In the glance of a mortal maiden's eye, 100 Thou hast scorned our dread decree. And thou shouldst pay the forfeit high. But well I know her sinless mind Is pure as the angel forms above, Gentle and meek, and chaste and kind. Such as a spirit well might love; Fairy! had she spot or taint. Bitter had been thy punishment. Tied to the hornet's shardy wings; Tossed on the pricks of nettle's stings: 110 Or seven long ages doomed to dwell With the lazy worm in the walnut-shell; Or every night to writhe and bleed Beneath the tread of the centipede: Or bound in a cobweb dungeon dim, Your jailer a spider huge and grim, Amid the carrion bodies to lie, Of the worm, and the bug, and the murdered fly;

These it had been your lot to bear, Had a stain been found on the earthly fair. Now list, and mark our mild decree— 120 Fairy, this your doom must be:

VIII

"Thou shalt seek the beach of sand Where the water bounds the elfin land; Thou shalt watch the oozy brine Till the sturgeon leaps in the bright moonshine, Then dart the glistening arch below. And catch a drop from his silver bow. The water-sprites will wield their arms

And dash around, with roar and rave, And vain are the woodland spirits' charms, They are the imps that rule the wave. Yet trust thee in thy single might: If thy heart be pure and thy spirit right, Thou shalt win the warlock <sup>2</sup> fight.

TY

"If the spray-bead gem be won,
The stain of thy wing is washed away:

But another errand must be done
Ere thy crime be lost for aye;
Thy flame-wood lamp is quenched and dark;
Thou must reillume its spark.

Mount thy steed and spur him high
To the heaven's blue canopy;
And when thou seest a shooting star,
Follow it fast, and follow it far—
The last faint spark of its burning train
Shall light the elfin lamp again.
Thou hast heard our sentence. Fay:

x

The goblin marked his monarch well; He spake not, but he bowed him low,

Hence! to the water-side, away!"

Then plucked a crimson colen-bell, <sup>3</sup>
And turned him round in act to go.

The way is long, he cannot fly.

His soiled wing has lost its power. And he winds adown the mountain high.

For many a sore and weary hour.
Through dreary beds of tangled fern,
Through groves of nightshade dark and dern,.4
Over the grass and through the brake,
Where toils the ant and sleeps the snake;

Now over the violet's azure flush
He skips along in lightsome mood:

And now he thrids 5 the bramble-bush. Till its points are dyed in fairy blood. He has leaped the bog, he has pierced the brier. He has swum the brook, and waded the mire, Till his spirits sank, and his limbs grew weak. And the red waxed fainter in his cheek. He had fallen to the ground outright,

For rugged and dim was his onward track, But there came a spotted toad in sight, 171

And he laughed as he jumped upon her back: He bridled her mouth with a silkweed twist,

He lashed her sides with an osier thong; And now through evening's dewy mist,

With leap and spring they bound along, Till the mountain's magic verge is past, And the beach of sand is reached at last.

χŢ

Soft and pale is the moony beam, Moveless still the glassy stream;

<sup>2</sup> wizard <sup>4</sup> secret <sup>5</sup> threads

180

<sup>1</sup> possibly the mystic bond of purity that bound him to the other fays

The wave is clear, the beach is bright.
With snowy shells and sparkling stones;
The shore-surge comes in ripples light,

In murmurings faint, and distant moans; And ever afar in the silence deep Is heard the splash of the sturgeon's leap, And the bend of his graceful bow is seen—A glittering arch of silver sheen, Spanning the wave of burnished blue, And dripping with gems of the river-dew.

XII

The elfin cast a glance around,

As he lighted down from his courser toad,
Then round his breast his wings he wound,
And close to the river's brink he strode;
He sprang on a rock, he breathed a prayer,
Above his head his arms he threw,
Then tossed a tiny curve in air,
And headlong plunged in the waters blue.

$_{\rm IIIX}$

199 Up sprung the spirits of the waves. From the sea-silk beds in their coral caves. With snail-plate armor snatched in haste, They speed their way through the liquid waste; Some are rapidly borne along On the mailed shrimp or the prickly prong, 1 Some on blood-red leeches glide, Some on the stony star-fish ride, Some on the back of the lancing squab, 2 Some on the sideling soldier-crab: And some on the jellied quarl, 8 that flings 210 At once a thousand streamy stings; They cut the wave with the living oar. And hurry on to the moonlight shore, To guard their realms and chase away The footsteps of the invading Fay.

XIV

Fearlessly he skims along, His hope is high, and his limbs are strong, He spreads his arms like the swallow's wing, And throws his feet with a frog-like fling; His locks of gold on the waters shine,

At his breast the tiny foam-beads rise, His back gleams bright above the brine, And the wake-line foam behind him lies,

But the water-sprites are gathering near To check his course along the tide; Their warriors come in swift career

And hem him round on every side; On his thigh the leech has fixed his hold, The quarl's long arms are round him rolled, The prickly prong has pierced his skin, And the squab has thrown his javelin,
The gritty star has rubbed him raw,
And the crab has struck with his giant claw,
He howls with rage, and he shrieks with pain,
He strikes around, but his blows are vain;
Hopeless is the unequal fight,
Fairy! naught is left but flight.

χv

He turned him round, and fled amain
With hurry and dash to the beach again.
He twisted over from side to side,
And laid his cheek to the cleaving tide;
The strokes of his plunging arms are fleet,
And with all his might he flings his feet,
But the water-sprites are round him still,
To cross his path and work him ill.
They bade the waves before him rise,
They flung the sea-fire in his eyes,
And they stunned his ears with the scallopstroke.

With the porpoise heave—and the drum-fish croak.

Oh! but a weary wight was he
When he reached the foot of the dog-wood tree.
Gashed and wounded, and stiff and sore,
He laid him down on the sandy shore;
He blessed the force of the charmed line.

And he banned the water-goblins' spite, For he saw around in the sweet moonshine Their little wee faces above the brine.

Giggling and laughing with all their might At the piteous hap of the Fairy wight.

XVI

Soon he gathered the balsam dew
From the sorrel-leaf and the henbane bud;
Over each wound the balm he drew,
And with cobweb lint he stanched the blood.
The mild west wind was soft and low,
It cooled the heat of his burning brow,
And he felt new life in his sinews shoot,
As he suck'd the juice of the calamus 4 root;
And now he treads the fatal shore,
As fresh and vigorous as before.

XVII

Wrapped in musing stands the sprite;
"Tis the middle wane of night;
His task is hard, his way is far,
But he must do his errand right,
Ere dawning mounts her beamy car,
And rolls her chariot wheels of light;
And vain are the spells of fairy-land:
He must work with a human hand.

'sweetflag

&lt;sup>1</sup> perhaps prawn, a small crustacean <sup>2</sup> squid <sup>3</sup> jellyfish

XVIII

He cast a saddened look around,
But he felt new joy his bosom swell,
When glittering on the shadowed ground,
He saw a purple mussel-shell;
Thither he ran, and he bent him low,
He heaved at the stern and he heaved at the bow,

And he pushed her over the yielding sand, Till he came to the verge of the haunted land. She was as lovely a pleasure-boat

As ever fairy had traveled in,
For she glowed with purple paint without,
And shone with silvery pearl within;
A sculler's notch in the stern he made,
An oar he shaped of the bootle-blade; 1 290
Then sprung to his seat with a lightsome leap,
And launched afar, on the calm, blue deep.

XIX

The imps of the river yell and rave;
They had no power above the wave,
But they heaved the billow before the prow,
And they dashed the surge against her side.
And they struck her keel with jerk and blow.
Till the gunwale bent to the rocking tide.
She wimpled <sup>2</sup> about to the pale moon-beam,
Like a feather that floats on a wind-tossed stream;

And momently athwart her track
The quarl upreared his island back,
And the fluttering scallop behind would float.
And spatter the water about the boat:
But he bailed her out with his colen-bell,

And he kept her trimmed with a wary tread, While on every side like lightning fell The heavy strokes of his bootle-blade.

XX

Till he came where the column of moonshine lay,

And saw beneath the surface dim

The brown-backed sturgeon slowly swim;

Around him were the goblin train—

But he sculled with all his might and main.

And followed wherever the sturgeon led,

Till he saw him upward point his head;

Then he dropped his paddle-blade,

And held his colen-goblet up

To catch the drop in its crimson cup.

XXI

320

With sweeping tail and quivering fin, Through the wave the sturgeon flew,

1 perhaps coined for its alliteration

Onward still he held his way,

<sup>2</sup> literally, rippled

And, like the heaven-shot javelin, He sprung above the waters blue.

Instant as the star-fall light

He plunged him in the deep again, But left an arch of silver bright, The rainbow of the moony main. It was a strange and lovely sight <sup>3</sup> To see the puny goblin there:

He seemed an angel form of light, With azure wings and sunny hair, Throned on a cloud of purple fair, Circled with blue and edged with white,

And sitting at the fall of even Beneath the bow of summer heaven.

XXII

A moment, and its luster fell;
But ere it met the billow blue,
He caught within his crimson bell
A droplet of its sparkling dew—
Joy to thee, Fay! thy task is done,
Thy wings are pure, for the gem is won—
Cheerly ply thy dripping oar,
And haste away to the elfin shore.

YYIII

He turns, and lo! on either side

The ripples on his path divide: And the track o'er which his boat must pass Is smooth as a sheet of polished glass. Around, their limbs the sea-nymphs lave, With snowy arms half swelling out, 350 While on the glossed and gleamy wave Their sea-green ringlets loosely float: They swim around with smile and song; They press the bark with pearly hand, And gently urge her course along, Toward the beach of speckled sand; And, as he lightly leaped to land, They bade adieu with nod and bow, Then gaily kissed each little hand, And dropped in the crystal deep below.

XXIV

A moment stayed the fairy there;
He kissed the beach and breathed a prayer;
Then spread his wings of gilded blue,
And on to the elfin court he flew;
As ever he saw a bubble rise,
And shine with a thousand changing dyes,
Till, lessening far, through ether driven,
It mingles with the hues of heaven;
As, at the glimpse of morning pale,
The lance-fly spreads his silken sail,
And gleams with blendings soft and bright,
Till lost in the shades of fading night;

*apparently an echo of Coleridge's "Christabel," i, 280

So rose from earth the lovely Fay—So vanished, far in heaven away!

Up, Fairy! quit thy chick-weed bower, The cricket has called the second hour, Twice again, and the lark will rise To kiss the streaking of the skies—Up! thy charmed armor don, Thou'lt need it ere the night be gone.

XXV

He put his acorn helmet on;

It was plumed of the silk of the thistle down;
The corselet plate that guarded his breast
Was once the wild bee's golden vest;
His cloak, of a thousand mingled dyes,
Was formed of the wings of butterflies;
His shield was the shell of a lady-bug queen,
Studs of gold on a ground of green;
And the quivering lance, which he brandished bright,

Was the sting of a wasp he had slain in fight. Swift he bestrode his fire-fly steed; 390 He bared his blade of the bent grass blue;

He drove his spurs of the cockle-seed,
And away like a glance of thought he flew,

And away like a glance of thought he flew, To skim the heavens and follow far The flery trail of the rocket-star.

XXV

The moth-fly, as he shot in air,
Crept under the leaf, and hid her there;
The katy-did forgot its lay,
The prowling gnat fled fast away,
The fell mosquito checked his drone
And folded his wings till the Fay was gone.
And the wily beetle dropped his head,
And fell on the ground as if he were dead;
They crouched them close in the darksome shade.

They quaked all o'er with awe and fear, For they had felt the blue-bent blade,

And writhed at the prick of the elfin spear; Many a time, on a summer's night, When the sky was clear and the moon was bright.

They had been roused from the haunted ground By the yelp and bay of the fairy hound, 411 They had heard the tiny bugle-horn,

They had heard the twang of the maize-silk string,

When the vine-twig bows were tightly drawn, And the nettle-shaft through air was borne,

Feathered with down of the hum-bird's wing. And now they deemed the courier Ouphe Some hunter-sprite of the elfin ground; And they watched till they saw him mount the

That canopies the world around; Then glad they left their covert lair, And freaked about in the midnight air.

XXVII

Up to the vaulted firmament His path the fire-fly courser bent, And at every gallop on the wind, He flung a glittering spark behind; He flies like a feather in the blast Till the first light cloud in heaven is past,

But the shapes of air have begun their work, And a drizzly mist is round him cast,

He cannot see through the mantle murk, He shivers with cold, but he urges fast,

Through storm and darkness, sleet and shade; He lashes his steed and spurs amain, For shadowy hands have twitched the rein.

And flame-shot tongues around him played, And near him many a fiendish eye Glared with a fell malignity, And yells of rage, and shrieks of fear, Came screaming on his startled ear.

440

XXVIII

His wings are wet around his breast,
The plume hangs dripping from his crest,
His eyes are blurred by the lightning's glare,
And his ears are stunned with the thunder's blare,

But he gave a shout, and his blade he drew.

He thrust before and he struck behind,

Till he pierced their cloudy bodies through,

And gashed their shadowy limbs of wind;

Howling the misty specters flew.

They rend the air with frightful cries, 450 For he has gained the welkin blue,

And the land of clouds beneath him lies.

UVTV

460

Up to the cope, 1 careering swift
In breathless motion fast,
Fleet as the swallow cuts the drift,
Or the sea-roc rides the blast,
The sapphire sheet of eve is shot,
The sphered moon is past,
The earth but seems a tiny blot

On a sheet of azure cast.

O! it was sweet in the clear moonlight,

To tread the starry plain of even,
To meet the thousand eyes of night,
And feel the scaling breath of beauty

And feel the cooling breath of heaven! But the elfin made no stop or stay Till he came to the bank of the milky-way;

<sup>1</sup> vault of heaven

Then he checked his courser's foot,
And watched for the glimpse of the planetshoot

XXX

469 Sudden along the snowy tide That swelled to meet their footsteps' fall. The sylphs of heaven were seen to glide. Attired in sunset's crimson pall: Around the Fay they weave the dance, They skip before him on the plain, And one has taken his wasp-sting lance, And one upholds his bridle-rein; With warblings wild they lead him on To where, through clouds and amber seen, Studded with stars, resplendent shone 480 The palace of the sylphid queen. Its spiral columns, gleaming bright, Were streamers of the northern light; Its curtains light and lovely flush Was of the morning's rosy blush, And the ceiling fair, that rose aboon, 1 The white and feathery fleece of noon.

XXXI

But, O! how fair the shape that lay Beneath a rainbow bending bright: She seemed to the entranced Fay 490 The loveliest of the forms of light; Her mantle was the purple rolled At twilight in the west afar; 'Twas tied with threads of dawning gold And buttoned with a sparkling star. Her face was like the lily roon 2 That veils the vestal planet's hue: Her eyes, two beamlets from the moon, Set floating in the welkin blue. Her hair is like the sunny beam. And the diamond gems which round it gleam Are the pure drops of dewey even That ne'er have left their native heaven.

XXXII

She raised her eyes to the wondering sprite, And they leaped with smiles, for well I ween Never before in the bowers of light Had the form of an earthly Fay been seen. Long she looked in his tiny face; Long with his butterfly cloak she played; She smoothed his wings of azure lace, 510 And handled the tassel of his blade: And as he told in accents low The story of his love and woe, She felt new pains in her bosom rise, And the tear-drop started in her eyes. And "O! sweet spirit of earth," she cried, 1 above 2 horder

"Return no more to your woodland height.
But ever here with me abide
In the land of everlasting light!
Within the fleecy drift we'll he,
We'll hang upon the rainbow's rim;
And all the jewels of the sky
Around thy brow shall brightly beam!
And thou shalt bathe thee in the stream
That rolls its whitening foam aboon,
And ride upon the lightning's gleam,
And dance upon the orbed moon!
We'll sit within the Pleiad ring,
We'll rest on Orion's starry belt,
And I will bid my sylphs to sing

The song that makes the dew-mist melt;
Their harps are of the umber shade
That hides the blush of waking day,
And every gleamy string is made
Of silvery moonshine's lengthened ray;

And thou shalt pillow on my breast,
While heavenly breathings float around,
And, with the sylphs of ether blest,
Forget the joys of fairy ground."

XXXIII

She was lovely and fair to see. 540 And the elfin's heart beat fitfully: But lovelier far, and still more fair, The earthly form imprinted there; Naught he saw in the heavens above Was half so dear as his mortal love. For he thought upon her look so meek, And he thought of the light flush on her cheek; Never again might he bask and lie On that sweet cheek and moonlight eye, But in his dreams her form to see, 550 To clasp her in his revery, To think upon his virgin bride, Was worth all heaven, and earth beside.

XXXIV

"Lady," he cried, "I have sworn tonight, On the word of a fairy-knight, To do my sentence-task aright; My honor scarce is free from stain, I may not soil its snows again; Betide me weal, betide me wo, Its mandate must be answered now." 560 Her bosom heaved with many a sigh, The tear was in her drooping eye; But she led him to the palace-gate, And called the sylphs who hovered there And bade them fly and bring him straight Of clouds condensed a sable car. With charm and spell she blessed it there. From all the fiends of upper air; Then round him cast the shadowy shroud.

And tied his steed behind the cloud;
And pressed his hand as she bade him fly
Far to the verge of the northern sky,
For by its wan and wavering light
There was a star would fall tonight.

XXXV

Borne afar on the wings of the blast,
Northward away, he speeds him fast,
And his courser follows the cloudy wain
Till the hoof-strokes fall like pattering rain.
The clouds roll backward as he flies,
Each flickering star behind him lies,
And he has reached the northern plain,
And backed his fire-fly steed again,
Ready to follow in its flight
The streaming of the rocket-light.

XXXVI

The star is yet in the vault of heaven, But it rocks in the summer gale; And now 'tis fitful and uneven. And now 'tis deadly pale; And now 'tis wrapped in sulphur-smoke. 589 And quenched in its rayless beam, And now with a rattling thunder-stroke It burst in flash and flame. As swift as the glance of the arrowy lance That the storm-spirit flings from high, The star-shot flew o'er the welkin blue, As it fell from the sheeted sky. As swift as the wind in its trail behind The elfin gallops along, The fiends of the cloud are bellowing loud, But the sylphid charm is strong; 600 He gallops unhurt in the shower of fire, While the cloud-fiends fly from the blaze; He watches each flake till its sparks expire, And rides in the light of its rays. But he drove his steed to the lightning's speed, And caught a glimmering spark; Then wheeled around to the fairy ground, And sped through the midnight dark.

Ouphe and Goblin! Imp and Sprite!
Elf of eve! and starry Fay!
Ye that love the moon's soft light,
Hither, hither wend your way;
Twine ye in a jocund ring,
Sing and trip it merrily,
Hand to hand, and wing to wing,
Round the wild witch-hazel tree.

610

Hail the wanderer again,
With dance and song, and lute and lyre.
Pure his wing and strong his chain, <sup>1</sup>

And doubly bright his fairy fire.
Twine ye in an airy round.
Brush the dew and print the lea;
Skip and gambol, hop and bound,
Round the wild witch-hazel tree.

XXXVII

The beetle guards our holy ground,
He flies about the haunted place,
And if mortal there be found,
He hums in his ears and flaps his face;
The leaf-harp sounds our roundelay,
The owlet's eyes our lanterns be;
Thus we sing, and dance, and play,
Round the wild witch-hazel tree.

630

620

But, hark! from tower on tree-top high
The sentry-elf his call has made:
A streak is in the eastern sky,
Shapes of moonlight! flit and fade!
The hill-tops gleam in morning's spring,
The skylark shakes his dabbled wing,
The day-glimpse glimmers on the lawn,
The cock has crowed, and the Fays are gone.

1816?-1819?
1835

FITZ-GREENE HALLECK 1790-1867

The present estimate of Halleck as one of the minor poets of the nineteenth century shows the fickleness of literary fame; for he was one of the most popular poets of his day, and was by Poe placed among the foremost writers of American verse. His statue in bronze was erected in Central Park, New York, ten years after his death. Halleck was educated in the public schools of Guilford, Connecticut, his birthplace, was clerk and bookkeeper there and removed to New York in 1811, where until 1848 he remained as a bookkeeper and accountant. He met Drake in 1813 and the friendship and collaboration of the two is one of the pleasing relationships in American literary biography. Drake's death was the occasion of one of Halleck's best poems, at the same time one of the best American elegies. Halleck's poems were published at various dates from 1819 to 1858, chief among them being the "Croaker" poems with Drake, 1819; Fanny, 1819; Alnwick Castle, 1827. He had a gift for manly, somewhat rhetorical poems, following the lead of Byron. He was especially fortunate in his occasional verse, for he was fortunate in being able to grasp vigorously the elements of a dramatic situation and phrase them in popular if not enduring lines.

Biography and criticism: J. G. Wilson, Life and Letters of Halleck, 1869; Chubb; S. M. Ward, "A Romantic Episode in the Life of the Poet, Fitz-Greene Halleck," Bookm. 47:499-502.

<sup>1</sup> perhaps, here, armor

20 20

ON THE DEATH OF JOSEPH RODMAN DRAKE 1

OF NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER, 1820

The good die first, And they whose hearts are dry as summer dust, Burn to the socket.

Wordsworth

Green be the turf above thee, Friend of my better days! None knew thee but to love thee, Nor named thee but to praise.

Tears fell when thou wert dying, From eyes unused to weep, And long where thou art lying, Will tears the cold turf steep.

When hearts, whose truth was proven, Like thine, are laid in earth. There should a wreath be woven To tell the world their worth;

And I, who woke each morrow
To clasp thy hand in mine,
Who shared thy joy and sorrow,
Whose weal and woe were thine:

It should be mine to braid it
Around thy faded brow,
But I've in vain essayed it,
And feel I cannot now.

While memory bids me weep thee, Nor thoughts nor words are free, The grief is fixed too deeply That mourns a man like thee.

BURNS

TO A ROSE, BROUGHT FROM NEAR ALLOWAY KIRK, <sup>2</sup> IN AYRSHIRE, IN THE AUTUMN OF 1822

Wild Rose of Alloway! my thanks; Thou 'mindst me of that autumn noon When first we met upon "the banks And braes o' bonny Doon."

Like thine, beneath the thorn-tree's bough, My sunny hour was glad and brief,

Drake died at the age of twenty-five.

Alloway Kirk is the scene of Tam O'Shanter's adventure; near it are Burns's birthplace and the monument referred to later; and all are near the banks of the River Doon, familiar from Burns's song, "The Banks o' Doon."

We've crossed the winter sea, and thou Art withered—flower and leaf.

And will not thy death-doom be mine—
The doom of all things wrought of clay—
And withered my life's leaf like thine,
Wild rose of Alloway?

Not so his memory, for whose sake My bosom bore thee far and long, His—who a humbler flower could make Immortal as his song, 3

The memory of Burns—a name
That calls, when brimmed her festal cup,
A nation's glory and her shame,
In silent sadness up.

A nation's glory—be the rest Forgot—she's canonized his mind; And it is joy to speak the best We may of human kind.

I've stood beside the cottage-bed Where the Bard-peasant first drew breath; A straw-thatched roof above his head, A straw-wrought couch beneath.

And I have stood beside the pile.
His monument—that tells to Heaven
The homage of earth's proudest isle
To that Bard-peasant given!

Bid thy thoughts hover o'er that spot, Boy-minstrel. in thy dreaming hour; And know, however low his lot, A Poet's pride and power:

The pride that lifted Burns from earth,
The power that gave a child of song
Ascendency o'er rank and birth,
The rich, the brave, the strong;

And if despondency weigh down
Thy spirit's fluttering pinions then,
Despair—thy name is written on
The roll of common men.

There have been loftier themes than his, And longer scrolls, and louder lyres, And lays lit up with Poesy's Purer and holier fires:

Yet read the names that know not death; Few nobler ones than Burns are there;

referring to Burns's "To a Mountain Daisy"

40

30

50

And few have won a greener wreath Than that which binds his hair.

His is that language of the heart,
In which the answering heart would speak,
Thought, word, that bids the warm tear start,
Or the smile light the cheek;

And his that music, to whose tone
The common pulse of man keeps time,
In cot or castle's mirth or moan,
In cold or sunny clime.

And who hath heard his song, nor knelt Before its spell with willing knee, And listened, and believed, and felt The Poet's mastery

O'er the mind's sea, in calm and storm, O'er the heart's sunshine and its showers, O'er Passion's moments bright and warm, O'er Reason's dark, cold hours;

On field's where brave men "die or do," In halls where rings the banquet's mirth, Where mourners weep, where lovers woo, From throne to cottage hearth?

What sweet tears dim the eye unshed, What wild vows falter on the tongue. When "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled," Or "Auld Lang Syne" is sung!

Pure hopes, that lift the soul above.

Come with his Cotter's hymn of praise,
And dreams of youth, and truth, and love,
With "Logan's" banks and braes.

And when he breathes his master-lay Of Alloway's witch-haunted wall, All passions in our frames of clay Come thronging at his call.

Imagination's world of air,
And our own world, its gloom and glee,
Wit, pathos, poetry, are there,
And death's sublimity.

And Burns—though brief the race he ran,
Though rough and dark the path he trod,
Lived—died—in form and soul a Man,
The image of his God.

Through care and pain, and want, and woe. With wounds that only death could heal. Tortures—the poor alone can know. The proud alone can feel;

He kept his honesty and truth,
His independent tongue and pen,
And moved, in manhood as in youth,
Pride of his fellow-men.

Of coward and of slave:

Strong sense, deep feeling, passions strong, A hate of tyrant and of knave, A love of right, a scorn of wrong, 100

A kind, true heart, a spirit high,
That could not fear and would not bow,
Were written in his manly eye
And on his manly brow.

Praise to the bard! his words are driven,
Like flower-seeds by the far winds sown,
Where'er, beneath the sky of heaven,
The birds of fame have flown.

Praise to the man! a nation stood
Beside his coffin with wet eyes,—
Her brave, her beautiful, her good,
As when a loved one dies.

And still, as on his funeral day,
Men stand his cold earth-couch around,
With the mute homage that we pay
To consecrated ground.

120

And consecrated ground it is.

The last, the hallowed home of one
Who lives upon all memories,
Though with the buried gone.

Such graves as his are pilgrim shrines,
Shrines to no code nor creed confined—
The Delphian vales, 1 the Palestines,
The Meccas of the mind.

Sages with wisdom's garland wreathed, Crowned kings, and mitered priests of power, And warriors with their bright swords sheathed, The mightiest of the hour;

And lowlier names, whose humble home
Is lit by fortune's dimmer star,
Are there—o'er wave and mountain come,
From countries near and far;

Pilgrims whose wandering feet have pressed
The Switzer's snow, the Arab's sand,
Or trod the piled leaves of the West,
My own green forest-land.

At Delphi in Greece was the oracle of the Pythian Apollo, the most famous shrine of the ancient

80

All ask the cottage of his birth. Gaze on the scenes he loved and sung. And gather feelings not of earth His fields and streams among.

They linger by the Doon's low trees, And pastoral Nith, and wooded Avr. And round thy sepulchers. Dumfries! The poet's tomb is there.

But what to them the sculptor's art. 150 His funeral columns, wreaths and urns? Wear they not graven on the heart The name of Robert Burns?

1822 1827

MARCO BOZZARIS 1

At midnight, in his guarded tent. The Turk was dreaming of the hour When Greece, her knee in suppliance bent. Should tremble at his power: In dreams, through camp and court, he bore The trophies of a conqueror: In dreams his song of triumph heard; Then wore his monarch's signet ring: Then pressed that monarch's throne—a king: As wild his thoughts, and gav of wing, As Eden's garden bird.

At midnight, in the forest shades, Bozzaris ranged his Suliote 2 band. True as the steel of their tried blades. Heroes in heart and hand. There had the Persian's thousands stood. There had the glad earth drunk their blood On old Plataea's 3 day; And now there breathed that haunted air 20 The sons of sires who conquered there, With arm to strike, and soul to dare, As quick, as far as they.

An hour passed on-the Turk awoke; That bright dream was his last: He woke—to hear his sentries shriek. "To arms! they come! the Greek! the Greek!" He woke—to die midst flame, and smoke, And shout, and groan, and saber-stroke. And death shots falling thick and fast 30

As lightnings from the mountain cloud; And heard, with voice as trumpet loud,

Bozzaris cheer his band:

a patriot of the Greek war for independence from a patriot of the Greek war for independence from the Turks, 1821-29
 The Suliotes, a Greco-Albanian tribe, driven from their own territory in Albania, took active part in the war against the Turks.
 At Plataea the Greeks overcame the Persians, 479 B.C.

"Strike-till the last armed foe expires: Strike—for your altars and your fires: Strike—for the green graves of your sires: God-and your native land!"

They fought—like brave men, long and well: They piled that ground with Moslem slain. They conquered—but Bozzaris fell. Bleeding at every vein. His few surviving comrades saw His smile when rang their proud hurrah. And the red field was won: Then saw in death his evelids close Calmly, as to a night's repose. Like flowers at set of sun.

Come to the bridal-chamber, Death! Come to the mother's, when she feels, For the first time, her first-born's breath: 50 Come when the blessed seals That close the pestilence are broke. 4 And crowded cities wail its stroke: Come in consumption's ghastly form, The earthquake shock, the ocean storm; Come when the heart beats high and warm With banquet song, and dance, and wine; And thou art terrible—the tear. The groan, the knell, the pall, the bier; And all we know, or dream, or fear 60 Of agony are thine.

But to the hero, when his sword Has won the battle for the free. Thy voice sounds like a prophet's word; And in its hollow tones are heard

The thanks of millions vet to be. Come, when his task of fame is wrought-Come, with her laurel-leaf, blood-bought-Come in her crowning hour—and then

Thy sunken eye's unearthly light To him is welcome as the sight

Of sky and stars to prisoned men; Thy grasp is welcome as the hand Of brother in a foreign land: Thy summons welcome as the cry That told the Indian isles were nigh

To the world-seeking Genoese, When the land wind, from woods of palm, And orange groves, and fields of balm, Blew o'er the Havtian seas.

Bozzaris! with the storied brave Greece nurtured in her glory's time, Rest thee—there is no prouder grave, Even in her own proud clime. She wore no funeral-weeds for thee.

apparently in allus on to the opening of the fourth seal, Revelation, vi, 1-8

a۸

100

1825

Nor hade the dark hearse wave its plume Like torn branch from death's leafless tree In sorrow's pomp and pageantry,

The heartless luxury of the tomb: But she remembers thee as one Long loved and for a season gone: For thee her poet's lyre is wreathed, Her marble wrought, her music breathed: For thee she rings the birthday bells; Of thee her babes' first lisping tells; For thine her evening prayer is said At palace couch and cottage bed; Her soldier, closing with the foe, Gives for thy sake a deadlier blow: His plighted maiden, when she fears For him the joy of her young years, Thinks of thy fate, and checks her tears:

And she, the mother of thy boys, Though in her eye and faded cheek Is read the grief she will not speak,

The memory of her buried joys, And even she who gave thee birth, Will, by their pilgrim-circled hearth, Talk of thy doom without a sigh:

For thou art Freedom's now, and Fame's; One of the few, the immortal names, That were not born to die.

NATHANIEL PARKER WILLIS 1806-1867

Willis was born of staid New England ancestry. His father was the founder of the first religious newspaper in the world, the Boston Recorder, and . later established the Youth's Companion. Willis graduated from Yale, 1827, established the American Monthly Magazine, in New York, in 1829, and later merged it with the Mirror, to which he was a frequent contributor. His published works include Pencilings by the Way, 1835; A l'Abri, or the Tent Pitched, 1839; Loiterings of Travel, 1840; Sacred Poems, 1843; Poems of Passion, 1843; Lady Jane and Humorous Poems, 1844.

Willis belongs to that self-conscious period of American mental and social development when the resources of the country were being developed with a speed that made some Americans obnoxiously boastful. At the same time increasing intelligence was showing other Americans their lack of cultural background, and the absence of the fixed institutions that nourish solid intellectual and artistic growth. Willis found these congenial conditions in Europe, and all that he reported of European society was absorbed by Americans with almost pathetic eagerness. His essays were popular. His poetry was intimately known; it was varied in range, sometimes deeply religious, often vivacious, but usually marked with the sentimentality and didacticism characteristic of much poetry of his time.

Biography: H. A. Beers, N. P. Willis (AML).

1885.

UNSEEN SPIRITS

The shadows lay along Broadway-'T was near the twilight-tide-And slowly there a lady fair Was walking in her pride. Alone walked she; but viewlessly Walked spirits at her side:

Peace charmed the street beneath her feet. And Honor charmed the air: And all astir looked kind on her. And called her good as fair: or all God ever gave to her She kept with chary care.

She kept with care her beauties rare From lovers warm and true: For her heart was cold to all but gold. And the rich came not to woo-But honored well are charms to sell If priests the selling do.

Now walking there was one more fair.— A slight girl, lily-pale; And she had unseen company To make the spirit quail: 'Twixt Want and Scorn she walked forlorn, And nothing could avail.

No mercy now can clear her brow For this world's peace to pray; For, as love's wild prayer dissolved in air. Her woman's heart gave way!-But the sin forgiven by Christ in heaven By man is cursed alway!

1843

From PENCILINGS BY THE WAY From LETTER LXX 1

A BREAKFAST WITH CHARLES LAMB

Invited to breakfast with a gentleman in the Temple 2 to meet Charles Lamb and his sister, -"Elia, and Bridget Elia." I never in my life had an invitation more to my taste. The essays of Elia are certainly the most charming things in the world, and it has been for the last ten years my highest compliment to the literary taste of a friend to present him with a copy. Who has not smiled over the humorous description of Mrs. Battle? 3 Who that has read Elia Pencilings by the Way (1835) first appeared in the form of letters written fo the Mirror. The essays relate Willis's first experiences of foreign society with a gusto that allows the reader at home to lose none of the deliciousness of the event to the writer.

 the lodgings and offices of barristers in London, in buildings occupying the site of the medieval establishment of the Knights Templar would not give more to see him than all the other authors of his time put together?
 "Mrs. Battle's Opinions on Whist" is one of the Essays of Elia.

Essays of Elia.

Our host was rather a character. I had brought a letter of introduction to him from Walter Savage Landor, the author of Imaginary Conversations, living at Florence, with a request that he would put me in a way of seeing one or two men about whom I had a curiosity. Lamb more particularly. I could not have been recommended to a better person. Mr. R. 1 is a gentleman who, everybody says, should have been an author, but who never wrote a book. He is a profound German scholar, has traveled much, is the intimate friend of Southey, Coleridge, and Lamb, has breakfasted with Goethe. traveled with Wordsworth through France and Italy, and spends part of every summer with him, and knows everything and everybody that is distinguished,—in short, is, in his bachelor's chambers in the Temple, the friendly nucleus of a great part of the talent of England.

I arrived a half-hour before Lamb, and had time to learn some of his peculiarities. He lives a little out of London, and is very much of an invalid. Some family circumstances have tended to depress him very much of late years. and unless excited by convivial intercourse, he scarce shows a trace of what he was. He was very much pleased with the American reprint of his Elia, though it contains several things which are not his-written so in his style, however, that it is scarce a wonder the editor should mistake them. If I remember right, they were Valentine's Day, the Nuns of Caverswell, and Twelfth Night. He is excessively given to mystifying his friends, and is never so delighted as when he has persuaded some one into the belief of one of his grave inventions. His amusing biographical sketch of Liston 2 was in this vein, and there was no doubt in anybody's mind that it was authentic, and written in perfectly good faith. Liston was highly enraged with it, and Lamb was delighted in proportion.

There was a rap at the door at last, and enter a gentleman in black small-clothes and gaiters, short and very slight in his person, his head set on his shoulders with a thoughtful forward bent, his hair just sprinkled with gray, a beautiful deep-set eye, aquiline nose, and a very indescribable mouth. Whether it expressed most humor or feeling, good-nature or a kind of whimsical peevishness, or twenty other things which passed over it by turns, I cannot in the least be certain.

His sister, whose literary reputation is associated very closely with her brother's, and who. as the original of "Bridget Elia," is a kind of object for literary affection, came in after him. She is a small, bent figure, evidently a victim to illness, and hears with difficulty. Her face has been, I should think, a fine and handsome one, and her bright gray eye is still full of intelligence and fire. They both seemed quite at home in our friend's chambers, and as there was to be no one else, we immediately drew round the breakfast-table. I had set a large arm-chair for Miss Lamb. "Don't take it. Mary," said Lamb, pulling it away from her very gravely: "it appears as if you were going to have a tooth drawn."

The conversation was very local. Our host and his guest had not met for some weeks, and they had a great deal to say of their mutual friends. Perhaps in this way, however, I saw more of the author; for his manner of speaking of them, and the quaint humor with which he complained of one, and spoke well of another, was so in the vein of his inimitable writings. that I could have fancied myself listening to an audible composition of a new Elia. Nothing could be more delightful than the kindness and affection between the brother and the sister. though Lamb was continually taking advantage of her deafness to mystify her with the most singular gravity upon every topic that was started. "Poor Mary!" said he, "she hears all of an epigram but the point."-"What are you saying of me, Charles?" she asked. Willis," said he, raising his voice, "admires your Confessions of a Drunkard very much; and I was saying that it was no merit of yours, that you understood the subject." We had been speaking of this admirable essay (which is his own) half an hour before.

The conversation turned upon literature after a while; and our host, the Templar, could not express himself strongly enough in admiration of Webster's speeches, which he said were exciting the greatest attention among the politicians and lawyers of England. Lamb said, "I don't know much of American authors. Mary, there, devours Cooper's novels with a ravenous appetite, with which I have no sympathy. The only American book I ever read twice was the Journal of Edward Woolman, a Quaker preacher and tailor, whose character is one of the finest I ever met with. He tells a story or two 3 about negro slaves, that brought the tears into my eyes. I can read no prose now, though Hazlitt 4 sometimes, to be sure-but then, Hazlitt is

Henry Crabb Robinson, 1775-1867
 John Liston, 1776-1846; Lamb's nonsensically grave article certainly did not long interrupt the friendship of the two men.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Lamb's memory was perhaps playing him false. The stories are not in Woolman's Journal. 4 William Hazlitt, English essayist and critic, 1778-1830 worth all modern prose-writers put together."

Mr. R. spoke of buying a book of Lamb's a few days before: and I mentioned my having bought a copy of Elia the last day I was in America, to send as a parting gift to one of the most lovely and talented women in our country.

"What did you give for it?" said Lamb.

"About seven and sixpence."

"Permit me to pay you that," said he, and with the utmost earnestness he counted out the money upon the table.

"I never yet wrote anything that would sell," he continued. "I am the publisher's ruin. My last poem won't sell a copy. Have you seen it, Mr. Willis?"

I had not.

"It's only eighteen pence, and I'll give you sixpence toward it"; and he described to me where I should find it sticking up in a shop-window in the Strand.

Lamb ate nothing, and complained in a querulous tone of the yeal-pie. There was a kind of potted fish (of which I forget the name at this moment) which he had expected our friend would procure for him. He inquired whether there was not a morsel left perhaps in the bottom of the last pot. Mr. R. was not sure. "Send and see," said Lamb; "and if the pot has been cleaned, bring me the cover. I think the sight of it would do me good."

The cover was brought, upon which there was a picture of the fish. Lamb kissed it with a reproachful look at his friend, and then left the table, and began to wander round the room with a broken, uncertain step, as if he almost forgot to put one leg before the other. His sister rose after a while, and commenced walking up and down very much in the same manner on the opposite side of the table; and in the course of half an hour they took their leave.

To any one who loves the writings of Charles Lamb with but half my own enthusiasm, even these little particulars of an hour passed in his company will have an interest. To him who does not, they will seem dull and idle. Wreck as he certainly is, and must be, however, of what he was, I would rather have seen him for that single hour, than the hundred and one sights of London put together.

1835

JOHN HOWARD PAYNE 1792-1852

To Payne belongs the honor of writing a song that is by far the most widely-known piece of American verse. He was of a good New York City family, was sent to Union College but gave up college for the stage. He appeared in New York in 1809, and in London four years later, remaining abroad as a player and playwright for nineteen years. His song, Home, Sweet Home, was sung in an opera, Clari, the Maid of Milan, at Covent Garden, in 1823. Payne produced. adapted, or re-wrote some sixty plays and operas. among which Brutus, 1819, Therese, adapted from the French, 1821, and Charles the Second, 1824, were particularly well received. He retired from the stage in 1832, and from 1841 to 1845, and again in 1851-1852 was American consul at Tunis, where he died. His remains were brought back to America amid much ceremony in 1883 and interred in Washington.

Although Payne was reasonably successful in his work as actor and dramatist he is today virtually a poet of one lyric. This owes its popularity to its appeal to sentiment, and to the music, an Italian melody that Payne had heard in Italy, afterwards adapted by an English composer.

HOME, SWEET HOME!

Mid pleasures and palaces though we may roam. Be it ever so humble, there's no place like

A charm from the sky seems to hallow us there. Which, seek through the world, is ne'er met with elsewhere.

Home, Home, sweet, sweet Home! There's no place like Home! there's no place like Home!

An exile from home, splendor dazzles in vain: Oh, give me my lowly thatched cottage again! The birds singing gayly, that came at my call,— Give me them,—and the peace of mind, dearer than all!

Home! Home! sweet, sweet Home! There's no place like Home! there's no place like Home!

How sweet 't is to sit 'neath a fond father's smile

And the cares of a mother to soothe and beguile!

Let others delight mid new pleasures to roam, But give me, oh, give me, the pleasures of Home! Home! sweet, sweet Home! There's no place like Home! there's no place like Home!

To thee I'll return, overburdened with care: The heart's dearest solace will smile on me there;

No more from that cottage again will I roam;

30

Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home Home! Home! sweet, sweet Home!

There's no place like Home! there's no place like Home!

1823? 1823

GEORGE POPE MORRIS

Though born in Philadelphia, Morris lived in New York from boyhood. In 1823 he founded with Samuel Woodworth the New York Mirror and conducted it successfully for twenty years, after which he engaged in a number of other journalistic enterprises. His most successful sustained work was Brier Cliff, a drama of the Revolution.

Morris represents a small group of journalistic song writers, of whom his partner, Woodward, author of "The Old Oaken Bucket," was another member, who essayed to do in America what Thomas Moore was doing for the popular song of England during the same time.

WOODMAN, SPARE THAT TREE!

Woodman, spare that tree!
Touch not a single bough!
In youth it sheltered me,
And I'll protect it now.
'T was my forefather's hand
That placed it near his cot;
There, woodman, let it stand,
Thy axe shall harm it not.

That old familiar tree,
Whose glory and renown
Are spread o'er land and sea.—
And wouldst thou hew it down?
Woodman, forbear thy stroke!
Cut not its earth-bound ties;
Oh, spare that aged oak
Now towering to the skies!

When but an idle boy,
I sought its grateful shade;
In all their gushing joy
Here, too, my sisters played.
My mother kissed me here;
My father pressed my hand—
Forgive this foolish tear,
But let that old oak stand!

My heart-strings round thee cling, Close as thy bark, old friend!
Here shall the wild-bird sing,
And still thy branches bend.
Old tree! the storm still brave!
And, woodman, leave the spot;
While I've a hand to save,
Thy axe shall harm it not.

FRANCIS SCOTT KEY 1779-1843

Key was not a professional writer, and except for the one stirring poem which may outlast any other memorial of our "Second War of Independence" he would not be remembered as a poet. He was born in Maryland. After graduating at St. John's College, Annapolis, Key studied law and practiced in Frederick, and in Washington, where he became district attorney, and where he died. A volume of his poems was published in 1857

THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER 1

O say, can you see, by the dawn's early light,

What so proudly we hailed at the twilight's last gleaming?

Whose broad stripes and bright stars, through the perilous fight,

O'er the ramparts we watched were so gallantly streaming!

And the rockets' red glare, the bombs bursting in air.

Gave proof through the night that our flag was still there:

O say, does that star-spangled banner yet

O'er the land of the free, and the home of the

On the shore dimly seen through the mists of the deep.

Where the foe's haughty host in dread silence reposes,

What is that which the breeze, o'er the towering

As it fitfully blows, now conceals, now discloses?

Now it catches the gleam of the morning's first beam,

In full glory reflected now shines on the stream:

'T is the star-spangled banner; O long may

O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave.

And where is that band who so vauntingly swore

That the havoc of war and the battle's confusion

A home and a country should leave us no

Their blood has washed out their foul footsteps' pollution.

During the War of 1812 a British fleet unsuccessfully bombarded Fort McHenry, a defense of Baltimore. Key, aboard one of the British vessels as a prisoner of war, watched the battle from that point of vantage and wrote the song immediately after. No refuge could save the hireling and slave From the terror of flight, or the gloom of the

And the star-spangled banner in triumph doth wave

O'er the land of the free, and the home of the brave.

O! thus be it ever, when freemen shall stand Between their loved homes and the war's desolation!

Blest with victory and peace, may the heavenrescued land

Praise the power that hath made and preserved us a nation.

Then conquer we must, for our cause it is just, And this be our motto—"In God is our trust."

And the star-spangled banner in triumph shall wave

O'er the land of the free, and the home of the 1814

SOUTHERN LYRICS

Of WILDE, PINKNEY, and DICKSON it may be said that they represent in their poetry the literary tastes and activities of southern gentlemen, who often made literature their avocation. In their poetry is the graciousness of fine breeding mingled with strains of melody that seem to come out of the courtly manners of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries, made vital by an appreciation of nature that is more modern.

RICHARD HENRY WILDE 1789-1872

Wilde was born in Ireland. Coming with his parents to Augusta, Georgia, as a child, he studied and practiced law, became attorney-general for the state, served for three terms in Congress, and in 1844 was appointed professor of law in the University of Louisiana. He resided abroad from 1835 to 1840, and should be remembered as influential in the discovery and restoration of a fresco portrait of Dante in the Bargello at Florence. He was greatly interested in the Italian poet Tasso, and in 1842 published his Conjectures and Researches Concerning Torquinato Tasso.

"MY LIFE IS LIKE THE SUMMER ROSE"

My life is like the summer rose,
That opens to the morning sky.
But, ere the shades of evening close,
Is scattered on the ground—to die!
Yet on the rose's humble bed
The sweetest dews of night are shed,

As if she wept the waste to see— But none shall weep a tear for me!

My life is like the autumn leaf
That trembles in the moon's pale ray:
Its hold is frail—its date is brief,

Restless—and soon to pass away!

Restless—and soon to pass away! Yet, ere that leaf shall fall and fade, The parent tree will mourn its shade, The winds bewail the leafless tree,— But none shall breathe a sigh for me!

My life is like the prints, which feet Have left on Tampa's desert strand; Soon as the rising tide shall beat,

All trace will vanish from the sand; Yet, as if grieving to efface All vestige of the human race, On that lone shore loud moans the sea,— But none, alas! shall mourn for me!

c. 1815

10

20

TO THE MOCKING-BIRD

Winged mimic of the woods! thou motley fool! Who shall thy gay buffoonery describe? Thine ever-ready notes of ridicule Pursue thy fellows still with jest and gibe: Wit, sophist, songster, Yorick ¹ of thy tribe, Thou sportive satirist of Nature's school, To thee the palm of scoffing we ascribe, Arch-mocker and mad Abbot of Misrule! ² For such thou art by day—but all night long Thou pourest a soft, sweet, pensive, solemn strain.

As if thou didst in this thy moonlight song Like to the melancholy Jacques 3 complain, Musing on falsehood, folly, vice, and wrong, And sighing for thy motley coat again.

EDWARD COATE PINKNEY 1802-1828

Pinkney was born in London, England, son of William Pinkney, United States agent and minister to Great Britain. He was in the United States navy, 1816-1824, and later became a lawyer and a journalist. His best-known work is Rodolph and Other Poems, 1825.

A HEALTH

I fill this cup to one made up Of loveliness alone, A woman, of her gentle sex

<sup>1</sup> Jester; see Hamlet, V, i, 195. <sup>2</sup> the chief character in the medieval English Christmas

3 a character in Shakespeare's As You Like It

30

1825

The seeming paragon;
To whom the better elements
And kindly stars have given
A form so fair, that, like the air,
'T is less of earth than heaven.

Her every tone is music's own,
Like those of morning birds,
And something more than melody
Dwells ever in her words;
The coinage of her heart are they,
And from her lips each flows
As one may see the burdened bee
Forth issue from the rose.

Affections are as thoughts to her,
The measures of her hours;
Her feelings have the fragrancy,
The freshness of young flowers;
And lovely passions, changing oft,
So fill her, she appears
The image of themselves by turns,—
The idol of past years!

Of her bright face one glance will trace A picture on the brain,
And of her voice in echoing hearts
A sound must long remain;
But memory, such as mine of her,
So very much endears,
When death is nigh my latest sigh
Will not be life's, but hers.

I fill this cup to one made up
Of loveliness alone,
A woman, of her gentle sex
The seeming paragon—
Her health! and would on earth there stood
Some more of such a frame,
That life might be all poetry,
And weariness a name.

SAMUEL HENRY DICKSON 1798-1872

Dickson was born in Charleston, South Carolina. After graduating at Yale in 1814 and receiving his degree in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1819, Dr. Dickson was professor of medicine successively at the medical school at Charleston, 1824, at the University of the City of New York, 1847, and at Jefferson College, Philadelphia, 1858. He was the author of several medical works.

"I SIGH FOR THE LAND OF THE CYPRESS AND PINE"

I sigh for the land of the cypress and pine.

Where the jessamine blooms, and the gay woodbine:

Where the moss droops low from the green oak tree.—

Oh, that sun-bright land is the land for me!

The snowy flower of the orange there Sheds its sweet fragrance through the air; And the Indian rose delights to twine Its branches with the laughing vine.

There the deer leaps light through the open

Or hides him far in the forest shade,
When the woods resound in the dewy morn
With the clang of the merry hunter's horn.

There the humming-bird, of rainbow plume, Hangs over the scarlet creeper's bloom; While 'midst the leaves his varying dyes Sparkle like half-seen fairy eyes.

There the echoes ring through the livelong day With the mock-bird's changeful roundelay; And at night, when the scene is calm and still, With the moan of the plaintive whip-poorwill

Oh! I sigh for the land of the cypress and pine, Of the laurel, the rose, and the gay woodbine, Where the long, gray moss decks the rugged oak tree.—

That sun-bright land is the land for me.

WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS 1806-1870

Simms, leading novelist and miscellaneous writer of the South before the Civil War, was born and died in Charleston, South Carolina. After a meager schooling, he studied law, was admitted to the bar, but soon turned to journalism and literature. He lived for a short time in Massachusetts, but supported the South during the Civil War, and suffered as a victim of fire and pillage through Sherman's "march to the sea." His writings include Lyrical and Other Poems, 1827; Atalantis, poem, 1832; The Yemassee, 1835; Areytos, or Songs and Ballads of the South, 1846. He produced poetry, fiction, biography, and drama under more than eighty titles, besides a mass of journalistic work. His narrative is headlong and stirring, inclining toward the melodramatic. Some of his novels have been dramatized. His strong affection for the Southespecially for its customs, history, and legends-is manifest in all his work; and for his treatment of the Indian characters he describes, he has been called the Cooper of the South; some critics hold him to be a truer painter of Indian life than Cooper himself, and also more perfect in his women characters. The Yemassee, which is considered the best of his novels, describes his native state in 1815 when it was still inhabited by the great tribe of the Yemassee Indians.

Criticism: J. Erskine, Leading American Novelists, 1910; W. P. Trent, W. G. Simms (AML), 1892; see also W. C. Bryant (LJ).

THE SWAMP FOX 1

We follow where the Swamp Fox guides, His friends and merry men are we; And when the troop of Tarleton <sup>2</sup> rides, We burrow in the cypress tree.

The turfy hammock <sup>3</sup> is our bed, Our home is in the red deer's den, Our roof, the tree-top overhead, For we are wild and hunted men.

We fly by day and shun its light,
But, prompt to strike the sudden blow,
We mount and start with early night,
And through the forest track our foe.
And soon he hears our chargers leap,
The flashing saber blinds his eyes,
And ere he drives away his sleep,
And rushes from his camp, he dies.

Free bridle-bit, good gallant steed,
That will not ask a kind caress
To swim the Santee at our need,
When on his heels the foemen press—
The true heart and the ready hand,
The spirit stubborn to be free,
The twisted bore, the smiting brand—
And we are Marion's men, you see.

Now light the fire and cook the meal,
The last perhaps that we shall taste;
I hear the Swamp Fox round us steal,
And that's a sign we move in haste.
He whistles to the scouts, and hark!
You hear his order calm and low.
Come, wave your torch across the dark,
And let us see the boys that go.

<sup>1</sup> The nickname given to General Francis Marion, the noted South Carolina partisan, or independent leader, of the Revolutionary War; with but a handful of men (he seldom had over seventy) he performed valiant and valuable service. He was said to be as courteous and honest as he was brave. See Fiske, The American Revolution, ii, 183. Cf. Bryant's "The Song of Marion's Men," p. 255.
<sup>2</sup> a noted British cavalry officer a noted British cavalry officer hummock, a low elevation especially in swampy ground

We may not see their forms again,
God help 'em, should they find the strife!
For they are strong and fearless men,
And make no coward terms for life;
They'll fight as long as Marion bids,
And when he speaks the word to shy,
Then, not till then, they turn their steeds,
Through thickening shade and swamp to fly.

Now stir the fire and lie at ease—
The scouts are gone, and on the brush
I see the Colonel bend his knees,
To take his slumbers too. But hush!
He's praying, comrades; 'tis not strange;
The man that's fighting day by day
May well, when night comes, take a change,
And down upon his knees to pray.

Break up that hoe-cake, boys, and hand
The sly and silent jug that's there
I love not it should idly stand
When Marion's men have need of cheer.
'Tis seldom that our luck affords
A stuff like this we just have quaffed,
And dry potatoes on our boards
May always call for such a draught.

Now pile the brush and roll the log;
Hard pillow, but a soldier's head
That's half the time in brake and bog
Must never think of softer bed.
The owl is hooting to the night;
The cooter a crawling o'er the bank,
And in that pond the flashing light
Tells where the alligator sank.

What! 'tis the signal! start so soon,
And through the Santee swamp so deep,
Without the aid of friendly moon,
And we, Heaven help us! half asleep!
But courage, comrades! Marion leads,
The Swamp Fox takes us out tonight;
So clear your swords and spur your steeds.
There's goodly chance, I think, of fight.

We follow where the Swamp Fox guides,
We leave the swamp and cypress tree,
Our spurs are in our coursers' sides,
And ready for the strife are we.
The Tory camp is now in sight,
And there he cowers within his den;
He hears our shouts, he dreads the fight,
He fears, and flies from Marion's men.

1832

79

50

60

20 30

<sup>4</sup> terrapin

From THE YEMASSEE <sup>1</sup> CHAPTER XXV

The pain of death is nothing. To the chief, The forest warrior, it is good to die! To die as he has lived, battling and hoarse, Shouting a song of triumph. But to live Under such doom as this, were far beyond Even his stoic, cold philosophy.

It was a gloomy amphitheater in the deep forests to which the assembled multitude bore the unfortunate Occonestoga. The whole scene was unique in that solemn grandeur, that somber hue, that deep spiritual repose, in which the human imagination delights to invest the region which has been rendered remarkable for the deed of punishment or crime. A small swamp or morass hung upon one side of the wood, from the rank bosom of which, in numberless millions, the flickering firefly perpetually darted upwards, giving a brilliance and animation to the spot, which at that moment no assemblage of light or life could possibly enliven. The ancient oak, a bearded Druid, was there to contribute to the due solemnity of all associations—the green but gloomy cedar, the ghostly cypress, and here and there, the overgrown pine,—all rose up in their primitive strength, and with an undergrowth around them of shrub and flower that scarcely at any time, in that sheltered and congenial habitation, had found it necessary to shrink from winter. In the center of the area thus invested rose a high and venerable mound, the tumulus of many preceding ages, from the washed sides of which might now and then be seen protruding the bleached bones of some ancient warrior or sage. A circle of trees at a little distance hedged it in. made secure and sacred by the performance there of many of their religious rites and offices. -themselves, as they bore the broad arrow of the Yemassee, being free from all danger of overthrow or desecration by Indian hands.

The hero of the story is Sanutee, one of the most revered and most beloved chiefs of the tribe. His wisdom has foreseen the final victory of the whites and the doom of the Indians. Stung into action by the fact that his son Occonestoga has been given the strong drink of the English, he raises a rebellion intended to exterminate the settlers. A few of the other chiefs, who have been tempted by gifts to side with the English, suffer the punishment of having the yellow arrow, the symbol of their common ancestry, cut and burned from the arm and breast, and of being sent forth exiles from the tribe forever—not only on earth, but in the hereafter. Occonestoga, the son of Sanutee, has also, while intoxicated, taken sides with the English. He has been captured and is to suffer the doom of exile. Matiwan, his mother, has believed in him to the last, but she is loyal to her husband Sanutee, the accuser.

Amid the confused cries of the multitude. they bore the captive to the foot of the tumulus, and bound him backward, half reclining upon a tree. An hundred warriors stood around, armed according to the manner of the nation, each with a tomahawk and knife and bow. They stood up as for battle, but spectators simply, and took no part in a proceeding which belonged entirely to the priesthood. In a wider and denser circle gathered hundreds more-not the warriors, but the people—the old, the young. the women and the children, all fiercely excited, and anxious to see a ceremony so awfully exciting to an Indian imagination; involving as it did not only the perpetual loss of human caste and national consideration, but the eternal doom, the degradation, the denial of and the exile from their simple forest heaven. Interspersed with this latter crowd, seemingly at regular intervals, and with an allotted labor assigned them, came a number of old women, not unmeet representatives, individually, for either of the weird sisters of the Scottish thane,

So withered and so wild in their attireand regarding their cries and actions, of whom we may safely affirm that they looked like anything but inhabitants of earth! In their hands they bore, each of them, a flaming torch of the rich and gummy pine; and these they waved over the heads of the multitude in a thousand various evolutions, accompanying each movement with a fearful cry, which at regular periods was chorused by the assembled mass. A bugle, a native instrument of sound, five feet or more in length hollowed out from the commonest timber—the cracks and breaks of which were carefully sealed up with the resinous gum oozing from their burning torches, and which to this day, borrowed from the natives, our negroes employ on the Southern waters with a peculiar compass and variety of note-was carried by one of the party, and gave forth at intervals timed with much regularity, a long protracted, single blast, adding greatly to the wild and picturesque character of the spectacle. At the articulation of these sounds, the circles continued to contract, though slowly; until at length but a brief space lay between the armed warriors, the crowd, and the unhappy victim.

The night grew dark of a sudden, and the sky was obscured by one of the brief tempests that usually usher in the summer, and mark the transition, in the South, of one season to another. A wild gust rushed along the wood. The leaves were whirled over the heads of the assemblage, and the trees bent downwards until they cracked and groaned again beneath the wind. A feeling of natural superstition crossed the minds of the multitude, as the hurricane, though common enough in that region, passed hurriedly along; and a spontaneous and universal voice of chanted prayer rose from the multitude, in their own wild and emphatic language, to the evil deity whose presence they beheld in its progress:

<sup>2</sup> Macbeth, I, iii, 40

Thy wing, Opitchi-Manneyto, 1 It o'erthrows the tall trees-Thy breath, Opitchi-Manneyto, Makes the waters tremble-Thou art in the hurricane. When the wigwam tumbles-Thou art in the arrow-fire, When the pine is shivered-But upon the Yemassee, Be thy coming gentle-Are they not thy well-beloved? Bring they not a slave to thee? Look! the slave is bound for thee. 'Tis the Yemassee that brings him. Pass, Opitchi-Manneyto-Pass, black spirit, pass from us-Be thy passage gentle.

And as the uncouth strain rose at the conclusion into a diapason of unanimous and contending voices, of old and young, male and female, the brief summer tempest had gone by. A shout of self-gratulation, joined with warm acknowledgments, testified the popular sense and confidence in that especial Providence, which even the most barbarous nations claim as forever working in their behalf.

At this moment, surrounded by the chiefs, and preceded by the great prophet or highpriest, Enoree-Mattee, came Sanutee, the wellbeloved of the Yemassee, to preside over the destinies of his son. There was a due and becoming solemnity, but nothing of the peculiar feelings of the father, visible in his countenance. Blocks of wood were placed around as seats for the chiefs; but Sanutee and the prophet threw themselves, with more of imposing veneration in the proceeding, upon the edge of the tumulus, just where an overcharged spot, bulging out with the crowding bones of its inmates. had formed an elevation answering the purpose of couch or seat. They sat directly looking upon the prisoner; who reclined, bound securely upon his back to a decapitated tree, at a little distance before them. A signal having been given, the women ceased their clamors; and approaching him they waved their torches so closely above his head as to make all his features distinctly visible to the now watchful and silent multitude. He bore the examination with stern, unmoved features, which the sculptor in brass or marble might have been glad to transfer to his statue in the block. While the torches waved, one of the women now cried aloud, in a barbarous chant, above him:—

Is not this a Yemassee? Wherefore is he bound thus—Wherefore with the broad arrow On his right arm growing? Wherefore is he bound thus? Is not this a Yemassee?

A second woman now approached him, waving her torch in like manner, seeming closely to inspect his features, and actually passing her fingers over the emblem upon his shoulder, as if to ascertain more certainly the truth of the image. Having done this, she turned about to the crowd, and in the same barbarous sort of strain with the preceding, replied as follows:—

It is not the Yemassee, But a dog that runs away. From his right arm take the arrow, He is not the Yemassee.

As these words were uttered, the crowd of women and children around cried out for the execution of the judgment thus given; and once again flamed the torches wildly, and the shoutings were general among the multitude. When they had subsided, a huge Indian came forward and sternly confronted the prisoner. This man was Malatchie, the executioner; and he looked the horrid trade which he professed. His garments were stained and smeared with blood, and covered with scalps, which, connected together by slight strings, formed a loose robe over his shoulders. In one hand he carried a torch, in the other a knife. He came forward, under the instructions of Enoree-Mattee, the prophet, to claim the slave of Opitchi-Manneyto,—that is, in our language, the slave of hell. This he did in the following strain:-

'Tis Opitchi-Manneyto
In Malatchie's ear that cries:—
"This is not the Yemassee,—
And the woman's word is true,—
He's a dog that should be mine:
I have hunted for him long.
From his master he had run,
With the stranger made his home;
Now I have him, he is mine:
Hear Opitchi-Manneyto."

And as the besmeared and malignant executioner howled his fierce demand in the very Manneyto is spirit, and Opitchi-Manneyto the evil spirit.

ears of his victim, he hurled the knife which he carried, upwards with such dexterity into the air, that it rested point downward and sticking fast, on its descent, into the tree and just above the head of the doomed Occonestoga. With his hand, the next instant, he laid a resolute gripe upon the shoulder of the victim, as if to confirm and strengthen his claim by actual possession; while at the same time, with a sort of malignant pleasure, he thrust his besmeared and distorted visage close into the face of his prisoner. Writhing against the ligaments which bound him fast. Occonestoga strove to turn his head aside from the disgusting and obtrusive presence; and the desperation of his effort, but that he had been too carefully secured, might have resulted in the release of some of his limbs; for the breast heaved and labored, and every muscle of his arms and legs was wrought, by his severe action, into so many ropes,—hard, full, and indicative of prodigious strength.

There was one person in that crowd who sympathized with the victim. This was Hiwassee, the maiden in whose ears he had uttered a word, which in her thoughtless scream and subsequent declaration of the event, when she had identified him, had been the occasion of his captivity. Something of self-reproach for her share in his misfortune, and an old feeling of regard for Occonestoga,—who had once been a favorite with the young of both sexes among his people, —was at work in her bosom; and turning to Echotee, her newly accepted lover, as soon as the demand of Malatchie had been heard, she prayed him to resist the demand.

In such cases, all that a warrior had to do was simply to join issue upon the claim, and the popular will then determined the question. Echotee could not resist an application so put to him, and by one who had just listened to a prayer of his own so all-important to his own happiness; and being himself a noble youth—one who had been a rival of the captive in his better days,—a feeling of generosity combined with the request of Hiwasee, and he boldly leaped forward. Seizing the knife of Malatchie, which stuck in the tree, he drew it forth and threw it upon the ground; thus removing the sign of property which the executioner had put up in behalf of the evil deity.

"Occonestoga is the brave of the Yemassee," exclaimed the young Echotee, while the eyes of the captive looked what his lips could not have said. "Occonestoga is a brave of Yemassee: he is no dog of Malatchie. Wherefore is the cord upon the limbs of a free warrior? Is not Occonestoga a free warrior of Yemassee?

The eyes of Echotee have looked upon a warrior like Occonestoga when he took many scalps. Did not Occonestoga lead the Yemassee against the Savannahs? The eves of Echotee saw him slav the red-eved Suwannee, the great chief of the Savannahs. Did not Occonestoga go on the war-path with our young braves against the Edistoes.—the brown foxes that came out of the swamp? The eyes of Echotee beheld him. Occonestoga is a brave, and a hunter of Yemassee: he is not the dog of Malatchie. He knows not fear. He hath an arrow with wings, and the panther he runs down in the chase. His tread is the tread of a sly serpent, that comes so that he hears him not upon the track of the red deer feeding down in the valley. Echotee knows the warrior; Echotee knows the hunter; he knows Occonestoga.—but he knows no dog of Opitchi-Manneyto."

"He hath drunk of the poison drink of the pale-faces; his feet are gone from the good path of the Yemassee; he would sell his people to the English for a painted bird. He is the slave of Opitchi-Manneyto," cried Malatchie in reply. Echotee was not satisfied to yield the point so soon, and he responded accordingly.

"It is true; the feet of the young warrior have gone away from the good paths of the Yemassee; but I see not the weakness of the chief when my eye looks back upon the great deeds of the warrior. I see nothing but the shrinking body of Suwannee under the knee—under the knife of the Yemassee. I hear nothing but the war-whoop of the Yemassee, when he broke through the camp of the brown foxes. and scalped them where they skulked in the swamp. I see this Yemassee strike the foe and take the scalp, and I know Occonestoga,—Occonestoga, the son of the well-beloved, the great chief of the Yemassee."

"It is good; Occonestoga has thanks for Echotee: Echotee is a brave warrior!" murmured the captive to his champion, in tones of melancholy acknowledgment. The current of public feeling began to set somewhat in behalf of the victim, and an occasional whisper to that effect might be heard here and there among the multitude. Even Malatchie himself looked for a moment as if he thought it not improbable that he might be defrauded of his prey; and while a free shout from many attested the compliment which all were willing to pay to Echotee for his magnanimous defense of one who had once been a rival-and not always successful-in the general estimation, the executioner turned to the prophet and to Sanutee, as if doubtful whether or not to proceed farther in his claim. But all doubt was soon quieted, as the stern father rose before the assembly. Every sound was stilled in expectation of his words on this so momentous an occasion to himself. They waited not long. The old man had tasked all the energies of the patriot, not less than of the stoic; and having once determined upon the necessity of the sacrifice he had no hesitating fears or scruples palsying his determination. He seemed not to regard the imploring glance of his son, seen and felt by all besides in the assembly, but with a voice entirely unaffected by the circumstances of his position, he spoke forth the doom of the victim in confirmation with that originally expressed.

"Echotee has spoken like a brave warrior with a tongue of truth and a soul that has birth with the sun. But he speaks out of his own heart, and does not speak to the heart of the traitor. The Yemassee will all say for Echotee. but who can say for Occonestoga when Sanutee himself is silent? Does the Yemassee speak with a double tongue? Did not the Yemassee promise Occonestoga to Opitchi-Manneyto with the other chiefs? Where are they? They are gone into the swamp, where the sun shines not, and the eyes of Opitchi-Manneyto are upon them. He knows them for his slaves. arrow is gone from their shoulders and the Yemassee knows them no longer. Shall the dog escape who led the way to the Englishwho brought the poison drink to the chiefs, which made them dogs to the English and slaves to Opitchi-Manneyto? Shall he escape the doom the Yemassee hath put upon them? Sanutee speaks the voice of the Manneyto. Occonestoga is a dog, who would sell his father -who would make our women to carry water for the palefaces. He is not the son of Sanutee -Sanutee knows him no more. Look, Yemassees,-the Well-beloved has spoken!"

He paused, and turning away, sank down silently upon the little bank on which he had before rested; while Malatchie, without further opposition,—for the renunciation of his own son, by one so highly esteemed as Sanutee, was conclusive against the youth,—advanced to execute the terrible judgment upon his victim.

"O father, chief, Sanutee the Well-beloved!" was the cry that now, for the first time. burst convulsively from the lips of the prisoner; "hear me, father,—Occonestoga will go on the warpath with thee and with the Yemassee against the Edisto, against the Spaniard; hear, Sanutee—he will go with thee against the English." But the old man bent not, yielded not, and the crowd gathered nigher in the intensity of their interest.

"Wilt thou have no ear, Sanutee? It is Occonestoga, it is the son of Matiwan, that speaks to thee." Sanutee's head sank as the reference was made to Matiwan, but he showed no other sign of emotion. He moved not, he spoke not; and bitterly and hopelessly the youth exclaimed:—

"Oh! thou art colder than the stone house of the adder, and deafer than his ears. Father, Sanutee, wherefore wilt thou lose me, even as the tree its leaf, when the storm smites it in summer? Save me, my father."

And his head sank in despair as he beheld the unchanging look of stern resolve with which the unbending sire regarded him. For a moment he was unmanned; until a loud shout of derision from the crowd, as they beheld the show of his weakness, came to the support of his pride. The Indian shrinks from humiliation, where he would not shrink from death; and as the shout reached his ears, he shouted back his defiance, raised his head loftly in air, and with the most perfect composure commenced singing his song of death,—the song of many victories.

"Wherefore sings he his death-song?" was the cry from many voices: "he is not to die!"

"Thou art the slave of Opitchi-Manneyto," cried Malatchie to the captive; "thou shalt sing no lie of thy victories in the ear of Yemassee. The slave of Opitchie-Manneyto has no triumph"; and the words of the song were effectually drowned, if not silenced in the tremendous clamor which they raised about him.

It was then that Malatchie claimed his victim. The doom had been already given, but the ceremony of expatriation and outlawry was yet to follow, and under the direction of the prophet, the various castes and classes of the nation prepared to take a final leave of one who could no longer be known among them. First of all came a band of young marriageable women, who, wheeling in a circle three times about him, sang together a wild apostrophe containing a bitter farewell, which nothing in our language could perfectly embody:—

Go; thou hast no wife in Yemassee—thou hast given no lodge to the daughter of Yemassee—thou hast slain no meat for thy children. Thou hast no name—the women of Yemassee know thee no more. They know thee no more.

And the final sentence was reverberated from the entire assembly:—

They know thee no more—they know thee no more.

Then came a number of the ancient men, the patriarchs of the nation, who surrounded him in circular mazes three several times, singing as they did so a hymn of like import:

Go: thou sittest not in the council of Yemasseethou shalt not speak wisdom to the boy that comes. Thou hast no name in Yemassee-the fathers of Yemassee, they know thee no more.

And again the whole assembly cried out, as with one voice:-

They know thee no more—they know thee no

These were followed by the young warriors. his old associates, who now in a solemn band approached him to go through a like performance. His eyes were shut as they came, his blood was chilled in his heart, and the articulated farewell of their wild chant failed seemingly to reach his ear. Nothing but the last sentence he heard:-

> Thou that wast a brother. Thou art nothing now-The young warriors of Yemassee, They know thee no more.

And the crowd cried with them:-

They know thee no more.

"Is no hatchet sharp for Occonestoga?" moaned forth the suffering savage.

But his trials were only then begun. Enoree-Mattee now approached him with the words with which, as the representative of the good Manneyto, he renounced him-with which he denied him access to the Indian heaven, and left him a slave and an outcast, a miserable wanderer amid the shadows and the swamps. and liable to all the dooms and terrors which come with the service of Opitchi-Manneyto.

Thou wast a child of Manneyto-sung the high priest in a solemn chant, and with a deep-toned voice that thrilled strangely amid the silence of the scene.

Thou wast a child of Manneyto-He gave thee arrows and an eye; Thou wast the strong son of Manneyto-He gave thee feathers and a wing; Thou wast a young brave of Manneyto-He gave thee scalps and a war-song: But he knows thee no more—he knows thee no

And the clustering multitude again gave back the last line in wild chorus. The prophet continued his chant:-

That Opitchi-Manneyto! He commands thee for his slave— And the Yemassee must hear him,

Hear, and give thee for his slave: They will take from thee the arrow. The broad arrow of thy people: Thou shalt see no blessed valley. Where the plum-groves always bloom: Thou shalt hear no song of valor From the ancient Yemassee: Father, mother, name, and people, Thou shalt lose with that broad arrow. Thou art lost to the Manneyto-

He knows thee no more, he knows thee no more.

The despair of hell was in the face of the victim, and he howled forth in a cry of agony that for a moment silenced the wild chorus of the crowd around—the terrible consciousness in his mind of that privation which the doom entailed upon him. Every feature was convulsed with emotion: and the terrors of Opitchi-Manneyto's dominion seemed already in strong exercise upon the muscles of his heart, when Sanutee, the father, silently approached him, and with a pause of a few moments, stood gazing upon the son from whom he was to be separated eternally—whom not even the uniting, the restoring, hand of death could possibly restore to him. And he, his once noble son,the pride of his heart, the gleam of his hope, the triumphant warrior, who was even to increase his own glory, and transmit the endearing title of Well-beloved, which the Yemassee had given him, to a succeeding generation—he was to be lost forever! These promises were all blasted; and the father was now present to yield him up eternally-to deny him-to forfeit him, in fearful penalty, to the nation whose genius he had wronged, and whose rights he had violated. The old man stood for a moment,-rather, we may suppose, for the recovery of his resolution, than with any desire for the contemplation of the pitiable form before him. The pride of the youth came back to him—the pride of the strong mind in its desolation—as his eye caught the inflexible gaze of his unswerving father; and he exclaimed bitterly and loud:-

"Wherefore art thou come? Thou hast been my foe, not my father! Away-I would not behold thee!" and he closed his eyes after the speech, as if to relieve himself from a disgusting presence.

'Thou hast said well, Occonestoga; Sanutee is thy foe; he is not thy father. To say this in thy ears has he come. Look on him, Occonestoga—look up and hear thy doom. The young and the old of the Yemassee, the warrior and the chief—they have all denied thee—all given thee up to Opitchi-Manneyto! Occonestoga is no name for the Yemassee. The Yemassee gives it to his dog. The prophet of Manneyto has forgotten thee; thou art unknown to those who were thy people. And I, thy father—with this speech, I yield thee to Opitchi-Manneyto. Sanutee is no longer thy father—thy father knows thee no more."

And once more came to the ears of the victim melancholy chorus of the multitude:

He knows thee no more, he knows thee no more.

Sanutee turned quickly away as he had spoken; and as if he suffered more than he was willing to show, the old man rapidly hastened to the little mound where he had been previously sitting, his eyes averted from the further spectacle. Occonestoga, goaded to madness by these several incidents, shrieked forth the bitterest execrations, until Enoree-Mattee, preceding Malatchie, again approached. Having given some directions in an under-tone to the latter, he retired, leaving the executioner alone with his victim. Malatchie then, while all was silence in the crowd,—a thick silence, in which even respiration seemed to be suspended,—proceeded to his duty; and lifting the feet of Occonestoga carefully from the ground, he placed a log under them; then addressing him, as he again bared his knife, which he stuck in the tree above his head, he sung:—

I take from thee the earth of Yemassee—I take from thee the water of Yemassee—I take from thee the arrow of Yemassee—Thou art no longer a Yemassee—The Yemassee knows thee no more.

"The Yemassee knows thee no more," cried the multitude; and their universal shout was deafening upon the ear. Occonestoga said no word now: he could offer no resistance to the unnerving hands of Malatchie, who now bared the arm more completely of its covering. But his limbs were convulsed with the spasms of that dreadful terror of the future which was racking and raging in every pulse of his heart. He had full faith in the superstitions of his people. His terrors acknowledged the full horrors of their doom. A despairing agony, which no language could describe, had possession of his soul. Meanwhile the silence of all indicated the general anxiety; and Malatchie prepared to seize the knife and perform the operation, when a confused murmur arose from the crowd around: the mass gave way and parted; and rushing wildly into the area came Matiwan, his mother—the long black hair streaming—the features, an astonishing likeness to his own, convulsed like his; and her action that of one reckless of all things in the way of the forward progress she was making to the person of her child. She cried aloud as she came, with a voice that rang like a sudden death-bell through the ring:—

"Would you keep the mother from her boy, and he be lost to her for ever? Shall she have no parting with the young brave she bore in her bosom? Away, keep me not back—I will look upon, I will love him. He shall have the blessing of Matiwan, though the Yemassee and the Manneyto curse."

The victim heard; and a momentary renovation of mental life, perhaps a renovation of hope, spoke out in the simple exclamation which fell from his lips:—

"Oh Matiwan—Oh mother!"

She rushed towards the spot where she heard his appeal; and thrusting the executioner aside, threw her arms desperately about his neck.

"Touch him not, Matiwan," was the general cry from the crowd. "Touch him not, Matiwan: Manneyto knows him no more."

"But Matiwan knows him; the mother knows her child, though the Manneyto denies him. O boy—O boy, boy, boy!" And she sobbed like an infant on his neck.

"Thou art come, Matiwan, thou art come; but wherefore? To curse like the father—to curse like the Manneyto?" mournfully said the captive.

"No, no, no! Not to curse—not to curse! When did mother curse the child she bore? Not to curse but to bless thee. To bless thee and forgive."

"Tear her away," cried the prophet; "let Opitchi-Manneyto have his slave."

"Tear her away, Malatchie," cried the crowd, now impatient for the execution. Malatchie approached.

"Not yet—not yet," appealed the woman. "Shall not the mother say farewell to the child she shall see no more?" and she waved Malatchie back, and in the next instant drew hastily from the drapery of her dress a small hatchet, which she had there carefully concealed.

"What wouldst thou do, Matiwan?" asked Occonestoga, as his eye caught the glare of the weapon.

"Save thee, my boy—save thee for thy mother, Occonestoga—save thee for the happy valley."

"Wouldst thou slay me, mother? Wouldst strike the heart of thy son?" he asked, with a something of reluctance to receive death from the hands of a parent.

"I strike thee but to save thee, my son; since they cannot take the totem from thee after the life is gone. Turn away from me thy head; let me not look upon thine eyes as I strike, lest my hands grow weak and tremble. Turn thine eyes away—I will not lose thee."

His eyes closed; and the fatal instrument, lifted above her head, was now visible in the sight of all. The executioner rushed forward to interpose, but he came too late. The tomahawk was driven deep into the skull, and but a single sentence from his lips preceded the final insensibility of the victim.

"It is good, Matiwan, it is good; thou hast saved me—the death is in my heart." And back he sank as he spoke; while a shriek of mingled joy and horror from the lips of the mother announced the success of her effort to defeat the doom, the most dreadful in the imagination of the Yemassee.

"He is not lost—he is not lost! They may not take the child from his mother. They may not keep him from the valley of Manneyto. He is free—he is free!" And she fell back in a deep swoon into the arms of Sanutee, who by this time had approached. She had defrauded Opitchi-Manneyto of his victim, for they may not remove the badge of the nation from any but the living victim.

1835

EDGAR ALLAN POE 1809-1849

As the years recede and with them sinks many a figure that once seemed of prime importance, the interest in Poe looms ever greater. Poe's mother was of English birth; his father was from a distinguished Maryland family. Both were actors playing in Boston when their son was born. They died in 1811 and Poe was adopted by John Allan of Richmond, Virginia. He had good educational opportunities in Richmond, in England, and at the University of Virginia. There he ran into debt so heavily that Mr. Allan withdrew him from the institution, whereupon Poe enlisted in the United States Army. After two years' service he was given a cadetship at West Point but was dismissed a few months later. After 1831 he lived by journalism. He became editor of The Southern Library Messenger, 1835, and from then until 1845 was editor or associate editor of The Gentleman's Magazine, Graham's Magazine, and The Broadway Journal, to which in succession he contributed his tales, poems, and criticisms. His death, in Baltimore, was under distressing circumstances. Important titles in Poe's works are Tamerlane and Other Poems, 1827; Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque, 1839; The Raven and Other Poems,

The reading of American verse in chronological order from the beginning strongly impresses the fact that Poe is the first American poet whose work needs no apology. In melody, imagery, and the haunting spell laid on the emotions, Poe's verse more than makes up for its comparative lack of substance. We may use it as a standard by which we may measure our lyric poetry.

Poe was the first American poet to be received with enthusiasm by Europeans, who even today give him and Whitman the honor of being the greatest poetical geniuses that have come from the New World. But the grounds for the European acceptance of Poe and Whitman are very different. Whitman is bizarrely American: Poe belongs to no era or culture. His incentive is to express the emotion that all men feel in the presence of beauty. He has a wizardry of words that no analysis can explain; yet the melody of lines and individual words, and the association between the mere sound of the words and the images they convey, are some of its elements. In his prose, the use of the elements of sound is much the same; though in the detective story and the pseudo-scientific tale he drops the poetic coloring for an intellectual ingenuity. He is the virtual creator of the detective story as practiced by Conan Doyle and a host of others.

Poe's literary criticism, though sometimes hasty and ill-timed, was stimulating, and ranked among the best of its day in this country.

Works: 10 vols. ed. E. C. Stedman and G. E. Woodberry, 1914; 17 vols. ed. J. A. Harrison, 1902. Biography and criticism: J. Macy (BB), 1907; G. E. Woodberry, Life of E. A. Poe, Personal and Literary, with his Chief Correspondence, 2 vols. 1909; also (AML); H. Allen, Israfel, 2 vols. 1926; J. W. Krutch, Edgar Allan Poe: a Study in Genius, 1926; C. A. Smith (HKA); More (Shel. 1); Stedman (Poets); Chubb; M. S. Yewdale, "Edgar Allan Poe, Pathologically," No. Am. 212:686-96; B. Matthews, "Poe's Cosmopolitan Fame," Cent. 81:271-5; J. Macy, Atlan. 102:835-43; L. Melville, "The Centenary of Edgar Allan Poe," roth Cent. 65:140-52.

TO HELEN 1

Helen, thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicaean <sup>2</sup> barks of yore,
That gently, o'er a perfumed sea,
The weary, wayworn wanderer bore
To his own native shore. <sup>3</sup>

On desperate seas long wont to roam, Thy hyacinth hair, thy classic face, Thy Naiad airs, have brought me home To the glory that was Greece And the grandeur that was Rome. 4

The poem was written, Poe says, "to the first purely ideal love of my soul—to Helen Stannard . .".
 See Harrison's Life and Letters of Poe, ii, 294.
 The word, as here used, is not in ancient geography.
 Nothing but an intelligent reading of Poe aloud can bring out the music of such lines.

<sup>4</sup> It is concerning an equally famous expression in Keats that Kipling in "Wireless" says "Remember that in all the millions permitted there are no more than five—five little lines of which one can say: "These are the Vision. The rest is only poetry."

10

20

Lo! in von brilliant window-niche How statue-like I see thee stand. The agate lamp within thy hand! Ah, Psyche, 1 from the regions which Are Holy Land!

1831 18232

ISRAFEL.

And the angel Israfel, whose heart-strings are a lute, and who has the sweetest voice of all God's creatures.—Koran.

In Heaven a spirit doth dwell Whose heart-strings are a lute; None sing so wildly well As the angel Israfel, And the giddy stars (so legends tell), Ceasing their hymns 3 attend the spell Of his voice, all mute.

Tottering above In her highest noon. The enamoured moon Blushes with love. While, to listen, the red levin (With the rapid Pleiads, even, Which were seven) Pauses in Heaven.

And they say (the starry choir 3 And the other listening things) That Israfeli's fire Is owing to that lyre By which he sits and sings, The trembling living wire Of those unusual strings.

But the skies that angel trod, 4 Where deep thoughts are a duty, Where Love's a grown-up God, Where the Houri glances are Imbued with all the beauty Which we worship in a star.

Therefore thou art not wrong, Israfeli, who despisest An unimpassioned song; To thee the laurels belong, Best bard, because the wisest: Merrily live, and long!

 the Greek word for soul, often, as here, personified
 The motto comes, through Moore's Lalla Rookh, from Sale's Introduction to the Koran. It is inexact, for Poe added "whose heartstrings are a lute."
 According to an ancient theory, the fixed stars were set in a crystalline sphere. The planets were also thus set, each in its sphere. These spheres, moving or one another made music that might be ing on one another, made music that might be heard by celestial beings.

"But that angel trod skies where," etc.

The ecstasies above With thy burning measures suit: Thy grief, thy joy, thy hate, thy love, With the fervor of thy lute: Well may the stars be mute!

Yes, Heaven is thine; but this Is a world of sweets and sours: Our flowers are merely-flowers, And the shadow of thy perfect bliss Is the sunshine of ours.

40

20

30

If I could dwell Where Israfel Hath dwelt, and he where I. He might not sing so wildly well 49 A mortal melody, While a bolder note than this might swell From my lyre within the sky. 1831

THE CITY IN THE SEA

Lo! Death has reared himself a throne In a strange city lying alone Far down within the dim West, Where the good and the bad and the worst and the best Have gone to their eternal rest. There shrines and palaces and towers (Time-eaten towers that tremble not) Resemble nothing that is ours. Around, by lifting winds forgot, 10 Resignedly beneath the sky The melancholy waters lie.

No rays from the holy heaven come down On the long night-time of that town; But light from out the lurid sea Streams up the turrets silently, Gleams up the pinnacles far and free: Up domes, up spires, up kingly halls, Up fanes, up Babylon-like walls, Up shadowy long-forgotten bowers Of sculptured ivy and stone flowers, Up many and many a marvelous shrine Whose wreathed friezes intertwine The viol, the violet, and the vine.

Resignedly beneath the sky The melancholy waters lie. So blend the turrets and shadows there That all seem pendulous in air, While from a proud tower in the town Death looks gigantically down.

There open fanes and gaping graves Yawn level with the luminous waves:

10

But not the riches there that lie In each idol's diamond eve.-Not the gavly-ieweled dead. Tempt the waters from their bed: For no ripples curl, alas, Along that wilderness of glass: No swellings tell that winds may be Upon some far-off happier sea: No heavings hint that winds have been On seas less hideously serene!

But lo. a stir is in the air! The wave—there is a movement there! As if the towers had thrust aside, In slightly sinking, the dull tide: As if their tops had feebly given A void within the filmy Heaven! The waves have now a redder glow. The hours are breathing faint and low: And when, amid no earthly moans, Down, down that town shall settle hence, Hell, rising from a thousand thrones, Shall do it reverence.

THE SLEEPER

At midnight, in the month of June, I stand beneath the mystic moon. An opiate vapor, dewy, dim, Exhales from out her golden rim. And, softly dripping, drop by drop, Upon the quiet mountain-top, Steals drowsily and musically Into the universal valley. The rosemary nods upon the grave; The lily lolls upon the wave; Wrapping the fog about its breast, The ruin molders into rest; Looking like Lethe, see! the lake A conscious slumber seems to take, And would not, for the world, awake. All beauty sleeps!—and lo! where lies Irene, with her destinies!

O lady bright! can it be right, This window open to the night? The wanton airs, from the tree-top, Laughingly through the lattice drop; The bodiless airs, a wizard rout, Flit through thy chamber in and out, And wave the curtain canopy So fitfully, so fearfully, Above the closed and fringed lid 'Neath which thy slumb'ring soul lies hid, That, o'er the floor and down the wall, Like ghosts the shadows rise and fall.

O lady dear, hast thou no fear? Why and what art thou dreaming here? Sure thou art come o'er far-off seas. A wonder to these garden trees! Strange is thy pallor: strange thy dress: Strange, above all, thy length of tress, And this all solemn silentness!

The lady sleeps. Oh, may her sleep, Which is enduring, so be deep! Heaven have her in its sacred keep! This chamber changed for one more holy. This bed for one more melancholy. I pray to God that she may lie Forever with unopened eve. While the pale sheeted ghosts go by.

My love, she sleeps. Oh, may her sleep, As it is lasting, so be deep! 50 Soft may the worms about her creep! Far in the forest, dim and old. For her may some tall vault unfold: 50 Some vault that oft hath flung its black And winged panels fluttering back, Triumphant, o'er the crested palls Of her grand family funerals: Some sepulcher, remote, alone, Against whose portal she hath thrown, In childhood many an idle stone: Some tomb from out whose sounding door She ne'er shall force an echo more. Thrilling to think, poor child of sin, It was the dead who groaned within! 1831, 1845 1831, 1845

THE COLISEUM 1

Type of the antique Rome! Rich reliquary Of lofty contemplation left to Time By buried centuries of pomp and power! At length—at length—after so many days Of weary pilgrimage and burning thirst, (Thirst for the springs of lore that in thee

I kneel, an altered and an humble man, Amid thy shadows, and so drink within My very soul thy grandeur, gloom, and glory.

Vastness, and Age, and Memories of Eld! Silence, and Desolation, and dim Night! I feel ye now, I feel ye in your strength, O spells more sure than e'er Judaean king

Poe never visited Rome. The poem may have been suggested by Byron's well-known lines: "While stands the Coliseum, Rome shall stand; When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall"; Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, iv, 145

30

.t 1

59

10

Taught in the gardens of Gethsemane! O charms more potent than the rapt Chaldee 1 Ever drew down from out the quiet stars!

Here, where a hero fell, a column falls; Here, where the mimic eagle glared in gold, A midnight vigil holds the swarthy bat; Here, where the dames of Rome their gilded

Waved to the wind, now wave the reed and thistle:

Here, where on golden throne the monarch lolled.

Glides, specter-like, unto his marble home, Lit by the wan light of the horned moon, The swift and silent lizard of the stones.

But stay! these walls, these ivy-clad arcades, These moldering plinths, these sad and blackened shafts.

These vague entablatures, this crumbling frieze, These shattered cornices, this wreck, this ruin, These stones—alas! these gray stones—are they

All of the famed and the colossal left By the corrosive Hours to Fate and me?

"Not all"—the Echoes answer me—"not all! Prophetic sounds and loud, arise forever From us, and from all Ruin, unto the wise, As melody from Memnon 2 to the Sun. We rule the hearts of mightiest men—we rule With a despotic sway all giant minds. We are not impotent, we pallid stones: 40 Not all our power is gone, not all our fame, Not all the magic of our high renown, Not all the wonder that encircles us, Not all the mysteries that in us lie, Not all the memories that hang upon And cling around about us as a garment, Clothing us in a robe of more than glory." 1833 1833

TO ONE IN PARADISE 3

Thou wast all that to me, love, For which my soul did pine: A green isle in the sea, love, A fountain and a shrine All wreathed with fairy fruits and flowers, And all the flowers were mine.

The Chaldeans were famous as astrologers.
 A colossal statue near Thebes, in Egypt, supposed to be that of Memnon, a solar hero-divinity, was said to give forth a musical note when struck by the rays of the rising sun.
 from Poe's tale, "The Assignation"

Ah, dream too bright to last! Ah, starry Hope, that didst arise But to be overcast!

A voice from out the Future cries. "On! on!"-but o'er the Past (Dim gulf!) my spirit hovering lies Mute, motionless, aghast.

For, alas! alas! with me The light of Life is o'er! No more-no more-no more-(Such language holds the solemn sea To the sands upon the shore) Shall bloom the thunder-blasted tree, Or the stricken eagle sore.

And all my days are trances, And all my nightly dreams Are where thy gray eye glances, And where thy footstep gleams -In what ethereal dances,

By what eternal streams.

1834, 1845

10 20 10

TO FRANCES S. OSGOOD 4

Thou wouldst be loved?—then let thy heart From its present pathway part not: Being everything which now thou art, Be nothing which thou art not. So with the world thy gentle ways, Thy grace, thy more than beauty, Shall be an endless theme of praise, And love—a simple duty. 1835, 1845 1835, 1845

THE CONQUEROR WORM 5

Lo! 't is a gala night Within the lonesome latter years. An angel throng, bewinged, bedight In veils, and drowned in tears, Sit in a theater to see A play of hopes and fears. While the orchestra breathes fitfully The music of the spheres.

Mimes, in the form of God on high, Mutter and mumble low, And hither and thither fly; Mere puppets they, who come and go At bidding of vast formless things That shift the scenery to and fro, Flapping from out their condor wings Invisible Woe.

4 Mrs. Osgood belonged to Poe's literary circle. 5 from Poe's tale, "Ligeia"

That motley drama—oh, be sure
It shall not be forgot!

With its Phantom chased for evermore By a crowd that seize it not.

Through a circle that ever returneth in To the self-same spot;

And much of Madness, and more of Sin, And Horror the soul of the plot.

But see amid the mimic rout A crawling shape intrude:

A blood-red thing that writhes from out The scenic solitude!

It writhes—it writhes!—with mortal pangs
The mimes become its food.

And seraphs sob at vermin fangs In human gore imbued.

Out—out are the lights—out all!
And over each quivering form
The curtain, a funeral pall,

Comes down with the rush of a storm,

While the angels, all pallid and wan, Uprising, unveiling, affirm

That the play is the tragedy, "Man," And its hero, the Conqueror Worm.

1843

THE RAVEN 1

Once upon a midnight dreary, while I pondered, weak and weary,

Over many a quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore.—

While I nodded, nearly napping, suddenly there came a tapping,

As of some one gently rapping, rapping at my chamber door.

"'T is some visitor," I muttered, "tapping at my chamber door:

Only this and nothing more."

1 "In 'The Philosophy of Composition,' Poe gives an account of the manner in which he constructed 'The Raven,' saying that he did it as he would work out a mathematical problem, by reasoning beforehand upon the nature of poetry, determining that beauty should be the essence of a poem, that sadness is the tone of the highest manifestation of beauty, that the refrain is the most effective of artistic devices, and that the refrain should be composed of sonorous and protractible sounds. The account may be taken for what it is worth. The present editor is inclined to regard it merely as part of a defense which Poe had been moved to make against an insinuation that in 'The Raven' he had imitated the repetitions of phrases in Coleridge's 'Ancient Mariner.' . . . At any rate, against his peculiar explanation of the composition of 'The Raven' should be set a sentence from his own preface to the 1845 edition of his poems: 'With me poetry has been not a purpose, but a passion, and the passions should be held in reverence.'" Poems and Tales of Edgar Allan Poe, edited by Alphonso G. Newcomer, The Lake English Classics.

Ah, distinctly I remember it was in the bleak December.

And each separate dying ember wrought its ghost upon the floor.

Eagerly I wished the morrow;—vainly I had sought to borrow

From my books surcease of sorrow—sorrow for the lost Lenore.

For the rare and radiant maiden whom the angels name Lenore:

Nameless here for evermore.

And the silken sad uncertain rustling of each purple curtain

Thrilled me—filled me with fantastic terrors never felt before:

So that now, to still the beating of my heart,
I stood repeating

"'T is some visitor entreating entrance at my chamber door,

Some late visitor entreating entrance at my chamber door:

This it is and nothing more."

Presently my soul grew stronger; hesitating then no longer.

"Sir," said I, "or Madam, truly your forgiveness I implore;

But the fact is I was napping, and so gently you came rapping,

And so faintly you came tapping, tapping at my chamber door,

That I scarce was sure I heard you"—here I opened wide the door:—

Darkness there and nothing more.

Deep into that darkness peering, long I stood there wondering, fearing,

Doubting, dreaming dreams no mortals ever dared to dream before;

But the silence was unbroken, and the stillness gave no token.

And the only word there spoken was the whispered word, "Lenore?"

This I whispered, and an echo murmured back the word, "Lenore!"

Merely this and nothing more.

Back into the chamber turning, all my soul within me burning,

Soon again I heard a tapping somewhat louder than before.

"Surely," said I, "surely that is something at my window lattice;

Let me see, then, what thereat is, and this mystery explore;

Let my heart be still a moment and this mysterv explore:

"T is the wind and nothing more."

Open here I flung the shutter, when, with many a flirt and flutter.

In there stepped a stately Raven of the saintly days of yore.

Not the least obeisance made he; not a minute stopped or stayed he;

But, with mien of lord or lady, perched above my chamber door,

Perched upon a bust of Pallas just above my chamber door:

Perched and sat, and nothing more.

Then this ebony bird beguiling my sad fancy into smiling

By the grave and stern decorum of the countenance it wore,-

"Though thy crest be shorn and shaven, thou," I said. "art sure no craven, Ghastly grim and ancient Raven wandering from the Nightly shore:

Tell me what thy lordly name is on the Night's Plutonian 1 shore!"

Ouoth the Raven, "Nevermore."

Much I marveled this ungainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly,

Though its answer little meaning-little relevancy bore;

For we cannot help agreeing that no living human being

Ever yet was blessed with seeing bird above his chamber door,

Bird or beast upon the sculptured bust above his chamber door,

With such name as "Nevermore."

But the Raven, sitting lonely on the placid bust, spoke only That one word, as if his soul in that one word he did outpour. Nothing further then he uttered, not a feather then he fluttered, Till I scarcely more than muttered,—"Other friends have flown before; On the morrow he will leave me, as my Hopes have flown before." Then the bird said, "Nevermore."

Startled at the stillness broken by reply so aptly spoken,

"Doubtless," said I, "what it utters is its only stock and store.

1 Pluto, in the Roman mythology, was ruler of the dead.

Caught from some unhappy master whom unmerciful Disaster

Followed fast and followed faster till his songs one burden bore:

Till the dirges of his Hope that melancholy burden bore

Of 'Never-nevermore.'"

But the Raven still beguiling all my fancy into smiling.

Straight I wheeled a cushioned seat in front of bird and bust and door;

Then, upon the velvet sinking, I betook myself to linking

Fancy unto fancy, thinking, what this ominous bird of yore,

What this grim, ungainly, ghastly, gaunt, and ominous bird of yore

Meant in croaking "Nevermore."

This I sat engaged in guessing, but no syllable expressing

To the fowl whose fiery eyes now burned into my bosom's core:

This and more I sat divining, with my head at ease reclining

On the cushion's velvet lining that the lamplight gloated o'er.

But whose velvet violet lining with the lamplight gloating o'er

She shall press, ah, nevermore!

Then, methought, the air grew denser, perfumed from an unseen censer

Swung by seraphim whose foot-falls tinkled on the tufted floor.

"Wretch," I cried, "thy God hath lent theeby these angels he hath sent thee

Respite-respite and nepenthe 2 from thy memories of Lenore!

Quaff, oh quaff this kind nepenthe, and forget this lost Lenore!"

Quoth the Raven, "Nevermore."

"Prophet!" said I, "thing of evil! prophet still, if bird or devil!

Whether Tempter sent, or whether tempest tossed thee here ashore,

Desolate yet all undaunted, on this desert land enchanted-

On this home by Horror haunted-tell me truly, I implore:

Is there—is there balm in Gilead? 3 tell me tell me, I implore!" 90

Quoth the Raven, "Nevermore."

<sup>2</sup> a draft producing forgetfulness of pain
 <sup>3</sup> a region in eastern Palestine where a balm was produced; Jeremiah viii, 22

"Prophet!" said I, "thing of evil—prophet still. if hird or devil!

By that Heaven that bends above us, by that God we both adore.

Tell this soul with sorrow laden if, within the distant Aidenn. 1

It shall clasp a sainted maiden whom the angels name Lenore:

Clasp a rare and radiant maiden whom the angels name Lenore!" Ouoth the Raven, "Nevermore,"

"Be that word our sign of parting, bird or fiend!" I shrieked, upstarting:

"Get thee back into the tempest and the Night's Plutonian shore!

Leave no black plume as a token of that lie thy soul hath spoken!

Leave my loneliness unbroken! quit the bust above my door!

Take thy beak from out my heart, and take thy form from off my door!" Ouoth the Raven, "Nevermore."

And the Raven, never flitting, still is sitting, still is sitting

On the pallid bust of Pallas just above my chamber door:

And his eyes have all the seeming of a demon's that is dreaming.

And the lamp-light o'er him streaming throws his shadow on the floor:

And my soul from out that shadow that lies floating on the floor

Shall be lifted—nevermore!

1845

ULALUME 2

The skies they were ashen and sober; The leaves they were crisped and sere, The leaves they were withering and sere; It was night in the lonesome October

Of my most immemorial year; It was hard by the dim lake of Auber,

In the misty mid region of Weir: It was down by the dank tarn of Auber,.

In the ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir.

<sup>1</sup> from Arabic adn, Eden, Paradise
<sup>2</sup> "The appeal of Poe's poetry is to the sentiment of Beauty—the one appeal which, according to Poe's theory, is the final justification of any poem.
Language is made to yield its utmost of melody. From words, even from letters, one might sayfor Poe actually fabricated words whose sounds as had never been wrested before." . . "This fantasy ['Ulalume'] is perhaps the supremetes of one's power to enjoy the strange music and imagery of Poe's verse without demanding any

10 Here once, through an alley Titanic Of cypress, I roamed with my Soul-Of cypress, with Psyche, my Soul, These were days when my heart was volcanic

As the scoriac rivers that roll, As the lavas that restlessly roll Their sulphurous currents down Yaanek

In the ultimate climes of the pole.

That groan as they roll down Mount Yaanek In the realms of the boreal pole.

20 Our talk had been serious and sober. But our thoughts they were palsied and

Our memories were treacherous and sere. For we knew not the month was October, And we marked not the night of the year. (Ah, night of all nights in the year!)

We noted not the dim lake of Auber (Though once we had journeyed down here).

Remembered not the dank tarn of Auber Nor the ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir.

And now, as the night was senescent And star-dials pointed to morn, As the star-dials hinted of morn.

At the end of our path a liquescent And nebulous luster was born. Out of which a miraculous crescent Arose with a duplicate horn, Astarte's <sup>3</sup> bediamonded crescent Distinct with its duplicate horn.

And I said—"She is warmer than Dian: She rolls through an ether of sighs, She revels in a region of sighs:

She has seen that the tears are not dry on These cheeks, where the worm never dies,

And has come past the stars of the Lion 4 To point us the path to the skies.

To the Lethean peace of the skies:

Come up, in despite of the Lion. To shine on us with her bright eyes:

Come up through the lair of the Lion, With love in her luminous eyes."

intellectual basis for the enjoyment. It is about as idle to search for a meaning in 'Ulalu' e' as it would be to search in an atlas for the geographical names, and criticism will most safely keep silence." Poems and Tales of Edgar Alan Poc, edited by Alphonso G. Newcomer, The Lake English Classics. Perhaps, however, as one reader suggests, this poem portrays a slight rising of hope in a gloomy soul the gloom coming back when the soul sinks soul, the gloom coming back when the soul sinks again to its normal level. If so, it may have some definite biographical significance.

Astarte, the Greek form of the Hebrew Ashtoreth, moon goddess of the Phoenicians, corresponding to Diagna of the Greek form to Diana (Dian) of the Greeks

* the constellation Leo

40

50

But Psyche, uplifting her finger,
Said—"Sadly this star I mistrust,
Her pallor I strangely mistrust:
Oh, hasten!—oh, let us not linger!
Oh, fly!—let us fly!—for we must."
In terror she spoke, letting sink her
Wings until they trailed in the dust;
In agony sobbed, letting sink her
Plumes till they trailed in the dust,
Till they sorrowfully trailed in the dust.

I replied—"This is nothing but dreaming:

Let us on by this tremulous light!

Let us bathe in this crystalline light!

Its sibyllic splendor is beaming

With hope and in beauty tonight:

See, it flickers up the sky through the night!

Ah, we safely may trust to its gleaming, And be sure it will lead us aright:

We safely may trust to a gleaming
That cannot but guide us aright,
Since it flickers up to Heaven through the night."

Thus I pacified Psyche and kissed her, And tempted her out of her gloom, And conquered her scruples and gloom;

And we passed to the end of the vista, But were stopped by the door of a tomb, By the door of a legended tomb;

And I said—"What is written, sweet sister,
On the door of this legended tomb?"
She replied—"Ulalume—Ulalume—
"T is the vault of thy lost Ulalume!"

Then my heart it grew ashen and sober
As the leaves that were crisped and sere,
As the leaves that were withering and sere,

And I cried—"It was surely October
On this very night of last year
That I journeyed—I journeyed down here,
That I brought a dread burden down here:
On this night of all nights in the year,

Ah, what demon has tempted me here? 90 Well I know, now, this dim lake of Auber,

This misty mid region of Weir:

Well I know, now, this dank tarn of Auber, This ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir."

1847

THE BELLS

Ι

Hear the sledges with the bells, Silver bells!

What a world of merriment their melody foretells! How they tinkle, tinkle, tinkle,
In the icy air of night!
While the stars, that oversprinkle
All the heavens, seem to twinkle
With a crystalline delight;
Keeping time, time, time,

In a sort of Runic <sup>1</sup> rime, <sup>10</sup>
To the tintinnabulation that so musically wells From the bells, bells, bells, bells,

Bells, bells—
From the jingling and the tinkling of the

TT

Hear the mellow wedding bells, Golden bells!

What a world of happiness their harmony foretells!

Through the balmy air of night How they ring out their delight!

From the molten-golden notes, And all in tune,

What a liquid ditty floats

To the turtle-dove that listens, while she gloats

20

30

40

On the moon!

Oh, from out the sounding cells,

What a gush of euphony voluminously wells!

How it dwells

On the Future! how it tells Of the rapture that impels

To the swinging and the ringing Of the bells, bells, bells,

Of the bells, bells, bells, bells, Bells bells, bells—

To the riming and the chiming of the bells!

TT

Hear the loud alarum bells, Brazen bells!

What a tale of terror, now, their turbulency tells!

In the startled ear of night

How they scream out their affright!

Too much horrified to speak, They can only shriek, shriek,

Out of tune,

In a clamorous appealing to the mercy of the fire,

In a mad expostulation with the deaf and frantic fire,

Leaping higher, higher, higher, With a desperate desire,

And a resolute endeavor

<sup>1</sup> secret, mysterious, as the ancient inscriptions or runes of northern Europe were secret to all but the initiated

| Now—now to sit or never,                           |    | To the throbbing of the bells,   |
|--|----|--|
|  | 50 | Of the bells, bells, bells—  |
| Oh, the bells, bells!                              |    | To the sobbing of the bells;   |
| What a tale their terror tells                     |    | Keeping time, time, time,  |
| Of Despair!  |    | As he knells, knells, knells,  |
| How they clang, and clash, and roar!               |    | In a happy Runic rime,   |
|  |    | To the rolling of the bells,   |
| What a horror they outpour                         |    |  |
| On the bosom of the palpitating air!               |    | Of the bells, bells, bells:  |
| Yet the ear it fully knows,                        |    | 10 the toning of the bens,   |
| By the twanging                                    |    | Of the bells, bells, bells,  |
| And the clanging,                                  | 60 | Bells, bells, bells—   |
| How the danger cobs and nows,                      | 00 | To the moaning and the groaning of the bells.                                      |
| Yet the ear distinctly tells,                      |    | 1848-49 1849  |
| In the jangling                                    |    |  |
| And the wrangling,                                 |    | ANNABEL LEE <sup>1</sup>   |
| How the danger sinks and swells,—                  |    |  |
| By the sinking or the swelling in the ange         | er | It was many and many a year ago,   |
| of the bells,                                      |    | In a kingdom by the sea,   |
| Of the bells,                                      |    | That a maiden there lived whom you may know  |
| Of the bells, bells, bells,                        |    | By the name of Annabel Lee;  |
| Bells, bells, bells—                               |    | And this maiden she lived with no other thought                                    |
| In the clamor and the clangor of the bells!        |    | Than to love and be loved by me.   |
| -  |    |  |
| IV   |    | I was a child and she was a child,   |
|  | 70 | In this kingdom by the sea,  |
| riear the tolling of the bens,                     | 10 | But we loved with a love that was more than  |
| Iron bells!  |    | love,  |
| What a world of solemn thought their monod         | ly | I and my Annabel Lee;  |
| compels!   |    | With a love that the winged seraphs of heaven                                      |
| In the silence of the night                        |    | Coveted her and me.  |
| How we shiver with affright                        |    |  |
| At the melancholy menace of their tone!            |    | And this was the reason that, long ago,  |
| For every sound that floats                        |    | In this kingdom by the sea,  |
| From the rust within their throats                 |    | A wind blew out of a cloud, chilling   |
| Is a groan.  |    | My beautiful Annabel Lee;  |
| And the people—ah, the people,                     |    | So that her highborn kinsmen came  |
| They that dwell up in the steeple, 8               | 30 | And bore her away from me,   |
| All alone,   |    | To shut her up in a sepulcher  |
| And who tolling, tolling, tolling                  |    | In this kingdom by the sea.  |
| In that muffled monotone,                          |    | • •  |
| Feel a glory in so rolling                         |    | The angels, not half so happy in heaven,   |
| On the human heart a stone—                        |    | Went envying her and me;   |
| They are neither man nor woman,                    |    | Yes! that was the reason (as all men know,   |
| They are neither brute nor human,                  |    | In this kingdom by the sea)  |
| They are Ghouls:                                   |    | That the wind came out of the cloud by night,                                      |
| And their king it is who tolls;                    |    | Chilling and killing my Annabel Lee.   |
| And he rolls, rolls,                               | 90 | comming and morning and a second   |
| Rolls  |    | But our love it was stronger by far than the                                       |
| A paean from the bells;                            |    | love   |
| And his merry bosom swells                         |    | Of those who were older than we,   |
| With the paean of the bells,                       |    | Of many far wiser than we;   |
| And he dances, and he yells:                       |    | And neither the angels in heaven above.  |
| Keeping time, time, time,                          |    | Nor the demons down under the sea,   |
| In a sort of Runic rime,                           |    | Can ever dissever my soul from the soul  |
| To the paean of the bells,                         |    | Of the beautiful Annabel Lee:  |
| Of the bells:                                      |    | Of the beautiful filliabet bee.  |
|  | 00 | 1 Stedman in his introduction to the poems of Poe says                             |
| Keeping time, time, time, In a sort of Runic rime, |    | that this poem was doubtless inspired by the memory of Poe's wife, Virginia Clemm. |
| in a soil of Rume time,                            |    | memory or roca nite, virginia ciennii.   |

For the moon never beams, without bringing me dreams

Of the beautiful Annabel Lee:

And the stars never rise, but I feel the bright

Of the beautiful Annabel Lee;

And so, all the night-tide. I lie down by the side Of my darling-my darling-my life and my bride.

In her sepulcher there by the sea. In her tomb by the sounding sea.

1840 1849

ELDORADO 1

Gayly bedight. A gallant knight, In sunshine and in shadow, Had journeyed long. Singing a song, In search of Eldorado.

But he grew old. This knight so bold. And o'er his heart a shadow Fell as he found No spot of ground That looked like Eldorado.

And, as his strength Failed him at length. He met a pilgrim shadow: "Shadow," said he, "Where can it be, This land of Eldorado?"

"Over the Mountains Of the Moon. Down the Valley of the Shadow, Ride, boldly ride," The shade replied, "If you seek for Eldorado!"

1850

THE FALL OF THE HOUSE OF USHER 2

Son coeur est un luth suspendu: Sitôt qu'on le touche il résonne.

Béranger. 3

During the whole of a dull, dark, and soundless day in the autumn of the year, when the

<sup>1</sup> Spanish, golden; here, the land of the ideal <sup>2</sup> Poe's purely imaginative tales move in a land that no man has ever visited, under clouds or sunshine such as none have ever seen. It is not a little pathetic, and it shows, if proof were needed, the essential poetry of his nature, that amid all the misfortunes and wretchedness of his actual life he could still live in this all-enveloping realm of his own creation. 3"His boart is a lute suspended; as soon as it is touched it resounds." Béranger was a French lyric poet contemporary with Poe, but the lines quoted have not been found in his work.

clouds hung oppressively low in the heavens. I had been passing alone, on horseback, through a singularly dreary tract of country, and at length found myself, as the shades of the evening drew on, within view of the melancholy House of Usher. I know not how it was-but. with the first glimpse of the building, a sense of insufferable gloom pervaded my spirit. I say insufferable; for the feeling was unrelieved by any of that half-pleasurable, because poetic, sentiment with which the mind usually receives even the sternest natural images of the desolate or terrible. I looked upon the scene before me—upon the mere house, and the simple landscape features of the domain, upon the bleak walls, upon the vacant eve-like windows, upon a few rank sedges, and upon a few white trunks of decayed trees—with an utter depression of soul which I can compare to no earthly sensation more properly than to the after-dream of the reveler upon opium: the bitter lapse into every-day life, the hideous dropping off of the veil. There was an iciness, a sinking, a sickening of the heart, an unredeemed dreariness of thought which no goading of the imagination could torture into aught of the sublime. What was it—I paused to think—what was it that so unnerved me in the contemplation of the House of Usher? It was a mystery all insoluble; nor could I grapple with the shadowy fancies that crowded upon me as I pondered. I was forced to fall back upon the unsatisfactory conclusion, that while, beyond doubt, there are combinations of very simple natural objects which have the power of thus affecting us, still the analysis of this power lies among considerations beyond our depth. It was possible, I reflected, that a mere different arrangement of the particulars of the scene, of the details of the picture, would be sufficient to modify, or perhaps to annihilate. its capacity for sorrowful impression; and acting upon this idea, I reined my horse to the precipitous brink of a black and lurid tarn that lav in unruffled luster by the dwelling, and gazed down—but with a shudder even more thrilling than before—upon the remodeled and inverted images of the gray sedge, and the ghastly treestems, and the vacant and eye-like windows.

Nevertheless, in this mansion of gloom I now proposed to myself a sojourn of some weeks. Its proprietor, Roderick Usher, had been one of my boon companions in boyhood; but many years had elapsed since our last meeting. A letter, however, had lately reached me in a distant part of the country—a letter from him -which in its wildly importunate nature had admitted of no other than a personal reply.

The MS. gave evidence of nervous agitation. The writer spoke of acute bodily illness, of a mental disorder which oppressed him, and of an earnest desire to see me, as his best and indeed his only personal friend, with a view of attempting, by the cheerfulness of my society, some alleviation of his malady. It was the manner in which all this, and much more, was said—it was the apparent heart that went with his request—which allowed me no room for hesitation; and I accordingly obeyed forthwith what I still considered a very singular summons.

Although as boys we had been even intimate associates, yet I really knew little of my friend. His reserve had been always excessive and habitual. I was aware, however, that his very ancient family had been noted, time out of mind, for a peculiar sensibility of temperament. displaying itself, through long ages, in many works of exalted art, and manifested of late in repeated deeds of munificent yet unobtrusive charity, as well as in a passionate devotion to the intricacies, perhaps even more than to the orthodox and easily recognizable beauties, of musical science. I had learned, too, the very remarkable fact that the stem of the Usher race, all timehonored as it was, had put forth at no period any enduring branch; in other words, that the entire family lay in the direct line of descent, and had always, with very trifling and very temporary variation, so lain. It was this deficiency, I considered, while running over in thought the perfect keeping of the character of the premises with the accredited character of the people, and while speculating upon the possible influence which the one, in the long lapse of centuries, might have exercised upon the other—it was this deficiency, perhaps, of collateral issue, and the consequent undeviating transmission from sire to son of the patrimony with the name, which had, at length, so identified the two as to merge the original title of the estate in the quaint and equivocal appellation of the "House of Usher"—an appellation which seemed to include, in the minds of the peasantry who used it, both the family and the family mansion.

I have said that the sole effect of my somewhat childish experiment, that of looking down within the tarn, had been to deepen the first singular impression. There can be no doubt that the consciousness of the rapid increase of my superstition—for why should I not so term it?—served mainly to accelerate the increase itself. Such, I have long known, is the paradoxical law of all sentiments having terror as a basis. And it might have been for this reason only, that, when I again uplifted my eyes to the house itself, from its image in the pool, there grew in my mind a strange fancy—a fancy so ridiculous, indeed, that I but mention it to show the vivid force of the sensations which oppressed me. I had so worked upon my imagination as really to believe that about the whole mansion and domain there hung an atmosphere peculiar to themselves and their immediate vicinity: an atmosphere which had no affinity with the air of heaven, but which had reeked up from the decayed trees, and the gray wall, and the silent tarn: a pestilent and mystic vapor, dull, sluggish, faintly discernible. and leaden-hued.

Shaking off from my spirit what must have been a dream, I scanned more narrowly the real aspect of the building. Its principal feature seemed to be that of an excessive antiquity. The discoloration of ages had been great. Minute fungi overspread the whole exterior, hanging in a fine tangled web-work from the eaves. Yet all this was apart from any extraordinary dilapidation. No portion of the masonry had fallen; and there appeared to be a wild inconsistency between its still perfect adaptation of parts and the crumbling condition of the individual stones. In this there was much that reminded me of the specious totality of old wood-work which has rotted for long vears in some neglected vault, with no disturbance from the breath of the external air. Beyound this indication of extensive decay, however, the fabric gave little token of instability. Perhaps the eye of a scrutinizing observer might have discovered a barely perceptible fissure. which, extending from the roof of the building in front, made its way down the wall in a zigzag direction, until it became lost in the sullen waters of the tarn.

Noticing these things, I rode over a short causeway to the house. A servant in waiting took my horse, and I entered the Gothic archway of the hall. A valet, of stealthy step, thence conducted me, in silence, through many dark and intricate passages in my progress to the studio of his master. Much that I encountered on the way contributed, I know not how. to heighten the vague sentiments of which I have already spoken. While the objects around me-while the carvings of the ceilings, the somber tapestries of the walls, the ebon blackness of the floors, and the phantasmagoric armorial trophies which rattled as I strode, were but matters to which, or to such as which. I had been accustomed from my infancy-while I hesitated not to acknowledge how familiar was all this—I still wondered to find how unfamiliar were the fancies which ordinary images were stirring up. On one of the staircases, I met the physician of the family. His countenance, I thought, wore a mingled expression of low cunning and perplexity. He accosted me with trepidation and passed on. The valet now threw open a door and ushered me into the presence of his master.

The room in which I found myself was very large and lofty. The windows were long, narrow, and pointed, and at so vast a distance from the black oaken floor as to be altogether inaccessible from within. Feeble gleams of encrimsoned light made their way through the trellised panes, and served to render sufficiently distinct the more prominent objects around; the eve, however, struggled in vain to reach the remoter angles of the chamber, or the recesses of the vaulted and fretted ceiling. Dark draperies hung upon the walls. The general furniture was profuse, comfortless, antique, and tat-Many books and musical instruments lay scattered about, but failed to give any vitality to the scene. I felt that I breathed an atmosphere of sorrow. An air of stern, deep, and irredeemable gloom hung over and pervaded all.

Upon my entrance, Usher arose from a sofa on which he had been lying at full length, and greeted me with a vivacious warmth which had much in it. I at first thought, of an overdone cordiality-of the constrained effort of the ennuvé 1 man of the world. A glance, however, at his countenance convinced me of his perfect sincerity. We sat down; and for some moments, while he spoke not, I gazed upon him with a feeling half of pity, half of awe. Surely man had never before so terribly altered, in so brief a period, as had Roderick Usher! It was with difficulty that I could bring myself to admit the identity of the wan being before me with the companion of my early boyhood. Yet the character of his face had been at all times remarkable. A cadaverousness of complexion; an eye large, liquid, and luminous beyond comparison; lips somewhat thin and very pallid, but of a surpassingly beautiful curve; a nose of a delicate Hebrew model, but with a breadth of nostril unusual in similar formations; a finely molded chin, speaking, in its want of prominence, of a want of moral energy; hair of a more than web-like softness and tenuity; these features, with an inordinate expansion above the regions of the temple, made up altogether a countenance not easily to be forgotten. And now in the mere exaggeration of the prevailing character of these features, and of the expression they were wont to convey, lay so much of change that I doubted to whom I spoke. The now ghostly pallor of the skin, and the now miraculous luster of the eye, above all things startled and even awed me. The silken hair, too, had been suffered to grow all unheeded, and as, in its wild gossamer texture, it floated rather than fell about the face, I could not, even with effort, connect its arabesque <sup>2</sup> expression with any idea of simple humanity.

In the manner of my friend I was at once struck with an incoherence, an inconsistency; and I soon found this to arise from a series of feeble and futile struggles to overcome an habitual trepidancy, an excessive nervous agitation. For something of this nature I had indeed been prepared, no less by his letter than by reminiscences of certain boyish traits, and by conclusions deduced from his peculiar physical conformation and temperament. His action was alternately vivacious and sullen. His voice varied rapidly from a tremulous indecision (when the animal spirits seemed utterly in abeyance) to that species of energetic concision-that abrupt, weighty, unhurried, and hollow-sounding enunciation—that leaden, selfbalanced and perfectly modulated guttural utterance-which may be observed in the lost drunkard, or the irreclaimable eater of opium, during the periods of his most intense excite-

It was thus that he spoke of the object of my visit, of his earnest desire to see me, and of the solace he expected me to afford him. He entered, at some length, into what he conceived to be the nature of his malady. It was, he said, a constitutional and a family evil, and one for which he despaired to find a remedy—a mere nervous affection, he immediately added, which would undoubtedly soon pass off. It displayed itself in a host of unnatural sensations. Some of these, as he detailed them, interested and bewildered me; although, perhaps, the terms and the general manner of the narration had their weight. He suffered much from a morbid acuteness of the senses; the most insipid food was alone endurable; he could wear only garments of certain texture; the odors of all flowers were oppressive; his eyes were tortured by even a faint light; and there were but peculiar sounds. and these from stringed instruments, which did not inspire him with horror.

To an anomalous species of terror I found him a bounden slave. "I shall perish," said he,

<sup>2</sup> fantastic; unusual in this sense

"I must perish in this deplorable folly. Thus, thus, and not otherwise, shall I be lost. I dread the events of the future, not in themselves, but in their results. I shudder at the thought of any, even the most trivial, incident, which may operate upon this intolerable agitation of soul. I have, indeed, no abhorrence of danger, except in its absolute effect—in terror. In this unnerved—in this pitiable condition, I feel that the period will sooner or later arrive when I must abandon life and reason together, in some struggle with the grim phantasm, Fear."

I learned moreover at intervals, and through broken and equivocal hints, another singular feature of his mental condition. He was enchained by certain superstitious impressions in regard to the dwelling which he tenanted, and whence, for many years, he had never ventured forth-in regard to an influence whose supposititious force was conveyed in terms too shadowy here to be restated—an influence which some peculiarities in the mere form and substance of his family mansion, had, by dint of long sufferance, he said, obtained over his spirit-an effect which the physique of the gray walls and turrets, and of the dim tarn into which they all looked down, had, at length, brought about upon the morale of his existence.

He admitted, however, although with hesitation, that much of the peculiar gloom which thus afflicted him could be traced to a more natural and far more palpable origin-to the severe and long-continued illness, indeed to the evidently approaching dissolution, of a tenderly beloved sister-his sole companion for long years, his last and only relative on earth. 'Her decease,' he said, with a bitterness which I can never forget, 'would leave him (him the hopeless and the frail) the last of the ancient race While he spoke the lady of the Ushers.' Madeline (for so was she called) passed slowly through a remote portion of the apartment, and, without having noticed my presence, disappeared. I regarded her with an utter astonishment not unmingled with dread, and yet I found it impossible to account for such feelings. A sensation of stupor oppressed me, as my eyes followed her retreating steps. When a door, at length, closed upon her, my glance sought instinctively and eagerly the countenance of the brother; but he had buried his face in his hands, and I could only perceive that a far more than ordinary wanness had overspread the emaciated fingers through which trickled many passionate tears.

The disease of the lady Madeline had long baffled the skill of her physicians. A settled apathy, a gradual wasting away of the person, and frequent although transient affections of a partially cataleptical character, were the unusual diagnosis. Hitherto she had steadily borne up against the pressure of her malady, and had not betaken herself finally to bed; but, on the closing in of the evening of my arrival at the house, she succumbed (as her brother told me at night with inexpressible agitation) to the prostrating power of the destroyer; and I learned that the glimpse I had obtained of her person would thus probably be the last I should obtain—that the lady, at least while living, would be seen by me no more.

For several days ensuing, her name was unmentioned by either Usher or myself; and during this period I was busied in earnest endeavors to alleviate the melancholy of my friend. We painted and read together; or I listened, as if in a dream, to the wild improvisations of his speaking guitar. And thus, as a closer and still closer intimacy admitted me more unreservedly into the recesses of his spirit, the more bitterly did I perceive the futility of all attempt at cheering a mind from which darkness, as if an inherent positive quality, poured forth upon all objects of the moral and physical universe, in one unceasing radiation of gloom.

I shall ever bear about me a memory of the many solemn hours I thus spent alone with the master of the House of Usher. Yet I should fail in any attempt to convey an idea of the exact character of the studies, or of the occupations, in which he involved me, or led the way. An excited and highly distempered ideality threw a sulphurous luster over all. His long improvised dirges will ring forever in my ears. Among other things, I hold painfully in mind a certain singular perversion and amplification of the wild air of the last waltz of Von Weber. 1 From the paintings over which his elaborate fancy brooded, and which grew, touch by touch, into vaguenesses at which I shuddered the more thrillingly because I shuddered knowing not why; -from these paintings (vivid as their images now are before me) I would in vain endeavor to educe more than a small portion which should lie within the compass of merely written words. By the utter simplicity, by the nakedness of his designs, he arrested and overawed attention. If ever mortal painted an idea, that mortal was Roderick Usher. For me at least, in the circumstances then surrounding me, there arose, out of the pure abstractions which the hypochondriac contrived to throw upon his canvas, an intensity of intolerable

1 a German composer, 1786-1826

awe, no shadow of which felt I ever yet in the contemplation of the certainly glowing yet too concrete reveries of Fuseli. <sup>1</sup>

One of the phantasmagoric conceptions of my friend, partaking not so rigidly of the spirit of abstraction, may be shadowed forth, although feebly, in words. A small picture presented the interior of an immensely long and rectangular vault or tunnel, with low walls, smooth, white, and without interruption or device. Certain accessory points of the design served well to convey the idea that this excavation lay at an exceeding depth below the surface of the earth. No outlet was observed in any portion of its vast extent, and no torch or other artificial source of light was discernible; yet a flood of intense rays rolled throughout, and bathed the whole in a ghastly and inappropriate splendor.

I have just spoken of that morbid condition of the auditory nerve which rendered all music intolerable to the sufferer, with the exception of certain effects of stringed instruments. It was, perhaps, the narrow limits to which he thus confined himself upon the guitar, which gave birth, in great measure, to the fantastic character of his performances. But the fervid facility of his impromptus could not be so accounted for. They must have been, and were, in the notes, as well as in the words of his wild fantasias (for he not unfrequently accompanied himself with rimed verbal improvisations), the result of that intense mental collectedness and concentration to which I have previously alluded as observable only in particular moments of the highest artificial excitement. The words of one of these rhapsodies I have easily remembered. I was, perhaps, the more forcibly impressed with it, as he gave it, because, in the under or mystic current of its meaning, I fancied that I perceived, and for the first time, a full consciousness, on the part of Usher, of the tottering of his lofty reason upon her throne. The verses, which were entitled "The Haunted Palace," ran very nearly, if not accurately, thus:-

1

In the greenest of our valleys
By good angels tenanted,
Once a fair and stately palace—
Radiant palace—reared its head.
In the monarch Thought's dominion,
It stood there;
Never seraph spread a pinion
Over fabric half so fair.

n

Banners yellow, glorious, golden,
On its roof did float and flow,
(This—all this—was in the olden Time long ago)
And every gentle air that dallied,
In that sweet day,
Along the ramparts plumed and pallid,
A wingéd odor went away.

TTT

Wanderers in that happy valley
Through two luminous windows saw Spirits moving musically
To a lute's well-tuned law,
Round about a throne where, sitting,
Porphyrogene,
In state his glory well befitting,
The ruler of the realm was seen.

ΙV

And all with pearl and ruby glowing
Was the fair palace door,
Through which came flowing, flowing, flowing,
And sparkling evermore,
A troop of Echoes whose sweet duty
Was but to sing,
In voices of surpassing beauty,
The wit and wisdom of their king.

v

But evil things, in robes of sorrow,
Assailed the monarch's high estate;
(Ah, let us mourn, for never morrow Shall dawn upon him, desolate!)
And round about his home the glory
That blushed and bloomed
Is but a dim-remembered story
Of the old time entombed.

VI

And travelers now within that valley
Through the red-litten windows see Vast forms that move fantastically
To a discordant melody;
While, like a ghastly rapid river,
Through the pale door
A hideous throng rush out forever,
And laugh—but smile no more.

I well remember that suggestions arising from this ballad led us into a train of thought, wherein there became manifest an opinion of Usher's which I mention not so much on account of its novelty, (for other men <sup>3</sup> have thought

2 "Born to the purple"; said of a son born to a reigning monarch

Watson, Dr. Percival, Spallanzini, and especially the Bishop of Landaff.—See Chemical Essays, Vol. V' (Poe's note). Richard Watson, Bishop of Landaff, friend of Franklin, 1737-1816; Spallanzini, an Italian scientist, 1729-1790; Percival, an American scientist and poet, 1795-1856.

&lt;sup>1</sup> A Swiss-English painter, 1741-1825; his work is noted for its fantastic intensity.

thus), as on account of the pertinacity with which he maintained it. This opinion, in its general form, was that of the sentience of all vegetable things. But in his disordered fancy the idea had assumed a more daring character and trespassed, under certain conditions, upon the kingdom of inorganization. 1 I lack words to express the full extent, or the earnest abandon of his persuasion. The belief, however, was connected (as I have previously hinted) with the gray stones of the home of his forefathers. The conditions of the sentience had been here. he imagined fulfilled in the method of collocation of these stones-in the order of their arrangement, as well as in that of the many fungi which overspread them, and of the decaved trees which stood around-above all, in the long undisturbed endurance of this arrangement, and in its reduplication in the still waters of the tarn. Its evidence—the evidence of the sentience—was to be seen, he said (and I here started as he spoke), in the gradual yet certain condensation of an atmosphere of their own about the waters and the walls. The result was discoverable, he added, in that silent, vet importunate and terrible influence which for centuries had molded the destinies of his family, and which made him what I now saw himwhat he was. Such opinions need no comment, and I will make none.

Our books, the books which, for years, had formed no small portion of the mental existence of the invalid—were, as might be supposed, in strict keeping with this character of phantasm. We pored together over such works as the Ververt and Chartreuse of Gresset: the Belphegor of Machiavelli; the Heaven and Hell of Swedenborg; the Subterranean Voyage of Nicholas Klimm by Holberg; the Chiromancy of Robert Flud, of Jean d'Indaginé, and of De la Chambre; the Journey into the Blue Distance of Tieck; and the City of the Sun of Campanella. One favorite volume was a small octavo edition of the Directorium Inquisitorum by the Dominican Eymeric de Gironne, and there were passages in Pomponius Mela, about the old African Satyrs and Aegipans, over which Usher would sit dreaming for hours. His chief delight, however, was found in the perusal of an exceedingly rare and curious book in quarto Gothic-the manual of a forgotten church—the Vigiliae Mortuorum secundum Chorum Ecclesiae Maguntinae. 2

1 inorganic matter

I could not belo thinking of the wild ritual of this work, and of its probable influence upon the hypochondriac, when one evening, having informed me abruptly that the lady Madeline was no more, he stated his intention of preserving her corpse for a fortnight, (previously to its final interment) in one of the numerous vaults within the main walls of the building. The worldly reason, however, assigned for this singular proceeding, was one which I did not feel at liberty to dispute. The brother had been led to his resolution (so he told me) by consideration of the unusual character of the malady of the deceased, of certain obtrusive and eager inquiries on the part of her medical men, and of the remote and exposed situation of the burial-ground of the family. I will not deny that when I called to mind the sinister countenance of the person whom I met upon the staircase, on the day of my arrival at the house, I had no desire to oppose what I regarded as at best but a harmless, and by no means an unnatural precaution.

At the request of Usher, I personally aided him in the arrangements for the temporary entombment. The body having been encoffined, we two alone bore it to its rest. The vault in which we placed it (and which had been so long unopened that our torches, half smothered in its oppressive atmosphere, gave us little opportunity for investigation) was small, damp, and entirely without means of admission for light; lying, at great depth, immediately beneath that portion of the building in which was my own sleeping apartment. It had been used, apparently, in remote feudal times, for the worst purposes of a donjon-keep, and in later days as a place of deposit for powder, or some other highly combustible substance, as a portion of its floor, and the whole interior of a long archway through which we reached it, were carefully sheathed with copper. The door, of massive iron, had been, also, similarly protected. Its immense weight caused an unusually sharp grating sound, as it moved upon its hinges.

Having deposited our mournful burden upon tressels within this region of horror, we partially turned aside the yet unscrewed lid of the coffin, and looked upon the face of the tenant. A striking similitude between the brother and sister now first arrested my attention; and Usher, divining, perhaps, my thoughts, murmured out some few words from which I

One may reasonably infer that Poe in marshaling this array of rather out-of-the-way books, most of which are tinged with mysticism or the occult, wishes to deepen the atmosphere of horror as well ns to impress us with the width of his reading. The last mentioned book, Vigits for the Dead According to the Choir of the Church of Mayence, has not been traced. Poe did not scruple to invent when actual material failed.

learned that the deceased and himself had been twins, and that sympathies of a scarcely intelligible nature had always existed between them. Our glances, however, rested not long upon the dead—for we could not regard her unawed. The disease which had thus entombed the lady in the maturity of youth, had left, as usual in all maladies of a strictly cataleptical character, the mockery of a faint blush upon the bosom and the face, and that suspiciously lingering smile upon the lip which is so terrible in death. We replaced and screwed down the lid, and, having secured the door of iron, made our way, with toil, into the scarcely less gloomy apartments of the upper portions of the house.

And now, some days of bitter grief having elapsed, an observable change came over the features of the mental disorder of my friend. His ordinary manner had vanished. His ordinary occupations were neglected or forgotten. He roamed from chamber to chamber with hurried, unequal, and objectless step. pallor of his countenance had assumed, if possible, a more ghastly hue—but the luminousness of his eye had utterly gone out. The once occasional huskiness of his tone was heard no more: and a tremulous quaver, as if of extreme terror, habitually characterized his utterance. There were times, indeed, when I thought his unceasingly agitated mind was laboring with some oppressive secret, to divulge which he struggled for the necessary courage. At times, again, I was obliged to resolve all into the mere inexplicable vagaries of madness, for I beheld him gazing upon vacancy for long hours, in an attitude of the profoundest attention, as if listening to some imaginary sound. It was no wonder that his condition terrified—that it infected me. I felt creeping upon me, by slow yet certain degrees, the wild influences of his own fantastic yet impressive superstitions.

It was, especially, upon retiring to bed late in the night of the seventh or eighth day after the placing of the lady Madeline within the donjon, that I experienced the full power of such feelings. Sleep came not near my couch, while the hours waned and waned away. I struggled to reason off the nervousness which had dominion over me. I endeavored to believe that much, if not all, of what I felt was due to the bewildering influence of the gloomy furniture of the room—of the dark and tattered draperies which, tortured into motion by the breath of a rising tempest, swayed fitfully to and fro upon the walls, and rustled uneasily. about the decorations of the bed. But my efforts were fruitless. An irrepressible tremor gradually pervaded my frame; and at length there sat upon my very heart an incubus of utterly causeless alarm. Shaking this off with a gasp and a struggle, I uplifted myself upon the pillows, and, peering earnestly within the intense darkness of the chamber, hearkened—I know not why, except that an instinctive spirit prompted me—to certain low and indefinite sounds which came, through the pauses of the storm, at long intervals, I knew not whence. Overpowered by an intense sentiment of horror, unaccountable yet unendurable, I threw on my clothes with haste (for I felt that I should sleep no more during the night) and endeavored to arouse myself from the pitiable condition into which I had fallen, by pacing rapidly to and fro through the apartment.

I had taken but few turns in this manner, when a light step on an adjoining staircase arrested my attention. I presently recognized it as that of Usher. In an instant afterward he rapped with a gentle touch at my door, and entered, bearing a lamp. His countenance was, as usual, cadaverously wan—but, moreover, there was a species of mad hilarity in his eyes—an evidently restrained hysteria in his whole demeanor. His air appalled me—but anything was preferable to the solitude which I had so long endured, and I even welcomed his presence as a relief.

"And you have not seen it?" he said abruptly, after having stared about him for some moments in silence—"you have not then seen it?—but, stay! you shall." Thus speaking, and having carefully shaded his lamp, he hurried to one of the casements, and threw it freely open to the storm.

The impetuous fury of the entering gust nearly lifted us from our feet. It was, indeed, a tempestuous yet sternly beautiful night, and one wildly singular in its terror and its beauty. A whirlwind had apparently collected its force in our vicinity; for there were frequent and violent alterations in the direction of the wind; and the exceeding density of the clouds (which hung so low as to press upon the turrets of the house) did not prevent our perceiving the lifelike velocity with which they flew careering from all points against each other, without passing away into the distance. I say that even their exceeding density did not prevent our perceiving this; yet we had no glimpse of the moon or stars, nor was their any flashing forth of the lightning. But the under surfaces of the huge masses of agitated vapor, as well as all terrestrial objects immediately around us, were glowing in the unnatural light of a faintly luminous and distinctly visible gaseous exhalation which hung about and enshrouded the mansion.

"You must not—you shall not behold this!" said I, shudderingly, to Usher, as I led him with a gentle violence from the window to a seat. "These appearances which bewilder you, are merely electrical phenomena not uncommon—or it may be that they have their ghastly origin in the rank miasma of the tarn. Let us close this casement; the air is chilling and dangerous to your frame. Here is one of your favorite romances. I will read, and you shall listen;—and so we will pass away this terrible night together."

The antique volume which I had taken up was the Mad Trist of Sir Launcelot Canning, 1 but I had called it a favorite of Usher's more in sad jest than in earnest; for, in truth, there is little in its uncouth and unimaginative prolixity which could have had interest for the lofty and spiritual ideality of my friend. It was, however, the only book immediately at hand; and I indulged a vague hope that the excitement which now agitated the hypochondriac might find relief (for the history of mental disorder is full of similar anomalies) even in the extremeness of the folly which I should read. Could I have judged, indeed, by the wild overstrained air of vivacity with which he hearkened, or apparently hearkened, to the words of the tale, I might well have congratulated myself upon the success of my design.

I had arrived at that well-known portion of the story where Ethelred, the hero of the Trist, having sought in vain for peaceable admission into the dwelling of the hermit, proceeds to make good an entrance by force. Here, it will be remembered, the words of the narrative run thus:—

And Ethelred, who was by nature of a doughty heart, and who was now mighty withal, on account of the powerfulness of the wine which he had drunken, waited no longer to hold parley with the hermit, who, in sooth, was of an obstinate and maliceful turn, but, feeling the rain upon his shoulders, and fearing the rising of the tempest, uplifted his mace outright, and with blows made quickly room in the plankings of the door for his gauntleted hand and now pulling therewith sturdily, he so cracked, and ripped, and tore all asunder, that the noise of the dry and hollow-sounding wood alarumed and reverberated throughout the forest.

At the termination of this sentence I started, and for a moment paused; for it appeared to me (although I at once concluded that my excited fancy had deceived me)—it appeared to me that from some very remote portion of the mansion there came, indistinctly, to my ears, what might have been, in its exact similarity of character, the echo (but a stifled and dull one certainly) of the very cracking and ripping sound which Sir Launcelot had so particularly described. It was, beyond doubt, the coincidence alone which had arrested my attention; for, amid the rattling of the sashes of the casements, and the ordinary commingled noises of the still increasing storm, the sound, in itself, had nothing, surely, which should have interested or disturbed me. I continued the story:—

But the good champion Ethelred, now entering within the door, was sore enraged, and amazed to perceive no signal of the maliceful hermit; but, in the stead thereof, a dragon of a scaly and prodigious demeanor, and of a fiery tongue, which sate in guard before a palace of gold, with a floor of silver; and upon the wall there hung a shield of shining brass with this legend enwritten—

Who entereth herein, a conqueror hath bin;
Who slayeth the dragon, the shield he shall win.

And Ethelred uplifted his mace, and struck upon the head of the dragon, which fell before him, and gave up his pesty breath, with a shriek so horrid and harsh, and withal so piercing, that Ethelred had fain to close his ears with his hands against the dreadful noise of it, the like whereof was never before heard.

Here again I paused abruptly, and now with a feeling of wild amazement; for there could be no doubt whatever that, in this instance, I did actually hear (although from what direction it proceeded I found it impossible to say) a low and apparently distant, but harsh, protracted, and most unusual screaming or grating sound—the exact counterpart of what my fancy had already conjured up for the dragon's unnatural shriek as described by the romancer.

Oppressed, as I certainly was, upon the occurrence of this second and most extraordinary coincidence, by a thousand conflicting sensations, in which wonder and extreme terror were predominant, I still retained sufficient presence of mind to avoid exciting, by any observation, the sensitive nervousness of my companion. I was by no means certain that he had noticed the sounds in question; although, assuredly, a strange alteration had during the last few minutes taken place in his demeanor. From a position fronting my own, he had gradually brought round his chair, so as to sit with his face to the door of the chamber; and thus I could but partially perceive his features, although I saw that his lips trembled as if he were murmuring inaudibly. His head had dropped upon his breast—yet I knew that he was not asleep, from the wide and rigid opening of the eye as I caught a glance of it in profile. The motion of his body, too, was at variance with this idea—for he rocked from side to side with a gentle yet constant and uniform sway. Having rapidly taken notice of all this, I resumed the narrative of Sir Launcelot, which thus proceeded:—

&lt;sup>1</sup> Since no one has identified author or book, both are probably the invention of Poe.

And now, the champion, having escaped from the terrible fury of the dragon, bethinking himself of the brazen shield, and of the breaking up of the enchantment, which was upon it, removed the carcass from out of the way before him, and approached valorously over the silver pavement of the castle to where the shield was upon the wall, which in sooth tarried not for his full coming, but fell down at his feet upon the silver floor, with a mighty great and terrible ringing sound.

No sooner had these syllables passed my lips. than—as if a shield of brass had indeed, at the moment, fallen heavily upon a floor of silver-I became aware of a distinct, hollow, metallic and clangorous yet apparently muffled reverberation. Completely unnerved, I leaped to my feet: but the measured rocking movement of Usher was undisturbed. I rushed to the chair in which he sat. His eyes were bent fixedly before him, and throughout his whole countenance there reigned a stony rigidity. But as I placed my hand upon his shoulder, there came a strong shudder over his whole person; a sickly smile quivered about his lips; and I saw that he spoke in a low, hurried, and gibbering murmur, as if unconscious of my presence. Bending closely over him, I at length drank in the hideous import of his words.

"Not hear it?—ves, I hear it, and have heard it. Long-long-long-many minutes, many hours, many days, have I heard it-yet I dared not—oh, pity me, miserable wretch that I am! -I dared not-I dared not speak! We have put her living in the tomb! Said I not that my senses were acute? I now tell you that I heard her first feeble movements in the hollow coffin. I heard them—many, many days ago—yet I dared not—I dared not speak! And now tonight-Ethelred-ha! ha!-the breaking of the hermit's door, and the death-cry of the dragon, and the clangor of the shield!—say, rather, the rending of her coffin, and the grating of the iron hinges of her prison, and her struggles within the coppered archway of the vault! Oh, whither shall I fly? Will she not be here anon? Is she not hurrying to upbraid me for my haste? Have I not heard her footstep on the stair? Do I not distinguish that heavy and horrible beating of her heart? Madman!"—here he sprang furiously to his feet, and shrieked out his syllables, as if in the effort he were giving up his soul—"Madman! I tell you that she now stands without the door!"

As if in the superhuman energy of his utterance there had been found the potency of a spell, the huge antique panels to which the speaker pointed threw slowly back, upon the instant, their ponderous and ebony jaws. It was the work of the rushing gust 1-but then without those doors there did stand the lofty and enshrouded figure of the lady Madeline of Usher. There was blood upon her white robes, and the evidence of some bitter struggle upon every portion of her emaciated frame. For a moment she remained trembling and reeling to and fro upon the threshold—then, with a low moaning cry, fell heavily inward upon the person of her brother, and, in her violent and now final death-agonies, bore him to the floor a corpse, and a victim to the terrors he had anticipated.

From that chamber, and from that mansion, I fled aghast. The storm was still abroad in all its wrath as I found myself crossing the old causeway. Suddenly there shot along the path a wild light, and I turned to see whence a gleam so unusual could have issued; for the vast house and its shadows were alone behind me. The radiance was that of the full, setting, and blood-red moon, which now shone vividly through that once barely discernible fissure, of which I have before spoken as extending from the roof of the building, in a zigzag direction, to the base. While I gazed, this fissure rapidly widened-there came a fierce breath of the whirlwind—the entire orb of the satellite burst at once upon my sight-my brain reeled as I saw the mighty walls rushing asunder-there was a long tumultuous shouting sound like the voice of a thousand waters-and the deep and dank tarn at my feet closed sullenly and silently over the fragments of the "House of Usher." 2

1 "Perhaps this is the finest touch in the tale. The reader is fully prepared for the apparition of the lady Madeline. Then, for the briefest possible moment, with the natural explanation of the opening of the doors, his expectation is disappointed, to the great intensifying of the thrill that follows when, after all, the apparition is revealed." Poems and Tales of Eduar Allan Poe, edited by Alphonso G. Newcomer, The Lake English Classics.

2 If the student does not at first see the perfection of p'an in this story he should re-read it until he understands how ingeniously part answers to part. Poe himself in reviewing Hawthorne's Twice-Told Talcs said: "A skilful literary artist has constructed a tale. If wise, he has not fashioned his thoughts to accommodate his incidents;

A DESCENT INTO THE MAELSTROM 1

The ways of God in Nature, as in Providence, are not as our ways; nor are the models that we frame any way commensurate to the vastness, profundity, and unsearchableness of His works, which have a depth in them greater than the well of Democritus.

TOSEPH GLANVILL"

We had now reached the summit of the loftiest crag. For some minutes the old man seemed too much exhausted to speak.

"Not long ago," said he at length, "and I could have guided you on this route as well as the youngest of my sons; but, about three years past, there happened to me an event such as never happened before to mortal manor at least such as no man ever survived to tell of-and the six hours of deadly terror which I then endured have broken me up body and soul. You suppose me a very old manbut I am not. It took less than a single day to change these hairs from a jetty black to white, to weaken my limbs, and to unstring my nerves, so that I tremble at the least exertion, and am frightened at a shadow. Do you know I can scarcely look over this little cliff without getting giddy?"

The "little cliff," upon whose edge he had so carelessly thrown himself down to rest that the weightier portion of his body hung over it, while he was only kept from falling by the tenure of his elbow on its extreme and slippery edge—this "little cliff" arose, a sheer unobstructed precipice of black shining rock, some fifteen or sixteen hundred feet from the world of crags beneath us. Nothing would have tempted me to within half a dozen yards of its brink. In truth so deeply was I excited by the perilous position of my companion, that I fell but having conceived, with deliberate care, a certain unique or single effect to be wrought out, he then invents such incidents—he then combines such events as may best aid him in establishing this preconceived effect. If his very initial sentence tend not to the outbringing of this effect, then he has failed in his first step. In the whole composition there should be no word written, of which the tendency, direct or indirect, is not to the one preëstablished design. And by such means, with such care and skill, a picture is at length painted which leaves in the mind of him who contemplates it with a kindred art, a sense of the fullest satisfaction. The idea of the tale has at full length upon the ground, clung to the shrubs around me, and dared not even glance upward at the sky—while I struggled in vain to divest myself of the idea that the very foundations of the mountain were in danger from the fury of the winds. It was long before I could reason myself into sufficient courage to sit up and look out into the distance.

"You must get over these fancies," said the guide, "for I have brought you here that you might have the best possible view of the scene of that event I mentioned—and to tell you the whole story with the spot just under your eye.

"We are now," he continued, in that particularizing manner which distinguished him—"we are now close upon the Norwegian coast—in the sixty-eighth degree of latitude—in the great province of Nordland—and in the dreary district of Lofoden. The mountain upon whose top we sit is Helseggen, the Cloudy. Now raise yourself up a little higher—hold on to the grass if you feel giddy—so—and look out, beyond the belt of vapor beneath us, into the sea."

I looked dizzily, and beheld a wide expanse of ocean, whose waters wore so inky a hue as to bring at once to my mind the Nubian geographer's account of the Mare Tenebrarum. 3 A panorama more deplorably desolate no human imagination can conceive. To the right and left, as far as the eye could reach, there lay outstretched, like ramparts of the world, lines of horridly black and beetling cliff, whose character of gloom was but the more forcibly illustrated by the surf which reared high up against it its white and ghastly crest, howling and shrieking forever. Just opposite the promontory upon whose apex we were placed, and at a distance of some five or six miles out at sea, there was visible a small, bleak-looking island; or, more properly, its position was discernible through the wilderness of surge in which it was enveloped. About two miles nearer the land arose another of smaller size, hideously craggy and barren, and encompassed at various intervals by a cluster of dark rocks.

The appearance of the ocean, in the space between the more distant island and the shore, had something very unusual about it. Although, at the time, so strong a gale was blowing landward that a brig in the remote offing lay to under a double-reefed trysail, and constantly plunged her whole hull out of sight, still, there was here nothing like a regular swell, but only the fullest satisfaction. The idea of the tale has been presented unblemished, because undisturbed."

A strong and dangerous tidal current, not literally a whirlpool, really exists on the coast of Norway. Although Poe had never been there, he is fairly correct in his references to actual places.

Joseph Glanvill was an English divine of the seventeenth century. Democritus of Abdera was a

&lt;sup>2</sup> Joseph Glanvill was an English divine of the seventeenth century. Democritus of Abdera was a contemporary of Socrates and one of the founders of the atomic philosophy. The "well" is perhaps the infinite void through which he conceived atoms, the ultimate material of all things, to be moving.

&lt;sup>3</sup> The sea of darkness, the outer ocean unexplored by the dwellers about the Mediterranean; "the Nubian geographer" is Ptolemy Chennus, an Alexandrian of the time of Trajan. There is no proof that he was a Nubian.

a short, quick, angry cross-dashing of water in every direction—as well in the teeth of the wind as otherwise. Of foam there was little except in the immediate vicinity of the rocks.

"The island in the distance," resumed the old man, "is called by the Norwegians Vurrgh. The one midway is Moskoe. That a mile to the northward is Ambaaren. Yonder are Iflesen, Hoeyholm, Kieldholm, Suarven, and Buckholm. Farther off—between Moskoe and Vurrgh—are Otterholm, Flimen, Sandflesen, and Skarholm. These are the true names of the places—but why it has been thought necessary to name them at all is more than either you or I can understand. Do you hear anything? Do you see any change in the water?"

We had now been about ten minutes upon the top of Helseggen, to which we had ascended from the interior of Lofoden, so that we had caught no glimpse of the sea until it had burst upon us from the summit. As the old man spoke. I became aware of a loud and gradually increasing sound, like the moaning of a vast herd of buffaloes upon an American prairie; and at the same moment I perceived that what seamen term the chopping character of the ocean beneath us, was rapidly changing into a current which set to the eastward. Even while I gazed, this current acquired a monstrous velocity. Each moment added to its speed—to its headlong impetuosity. In five minutes the whole sea, as far as Vurrgh, was lashed into ungovernable fury: but it was between Moskoe and the coast that the main uproar held its sway. Here the vast bed of the waters, seamed and scarred into a thousand conflicting channels, burst suddenly into frenzied convulsion—heaving, boiling, hissing—gyrating in gigantic and innumerable vortices, and all whirling and plunging on to the eastward with a rapidity which water never elsewhere assumes, except in precipitous

In a few minutes more, there came over the scene another radical alteration. The general surface grew somewhat more smooth, and the whirlpools, one by one, disappeared, while prodigious streaks of foam became apparent where none had been seen before. These streaks, at length, spreading out to a great distance, and entering into combination, took unto themselves the gyratory motion of the subsided vortices, and seemed to form the germ of another more vast. Suddenly—very suddenly—this assumed a distinct and definite existence, in a circle of more than a mile in diameter. The edge of the whirl was represented by a broad belt of gleaming spray; but no particle of this slipped into the mouth of the terrific funnel, whose interior, as far as the eye could fathom it, was a smooth, shining, and jet-black wall of water, inclined to the horizon at an angle of some forty-five degrees, speeding dizzily round and round with a swaying and sweltering motion, and sending forth to the winds an appalling voice, half shriek, half roar, such as not even the mighty cataract of Niagara ever lifts up in its agony to Hayren.

The mountain trembled to its very base, and the rock rocked. I threw myself upon my face, and clung to the scant herbage in an excess of nervous agitation.

"This," said I at length, to the old man— "this can be nothing else than the great whirlpool of the Maelström."

"So it is sometimes termed," said he. "We Norwegians call it the Moskoe-ström, from the island of Moskoe in the midway."

The ordinary accounts of this vortex had by no means prepared me for what I saw. That of Jonas Ramus, 1 which is perhaps the most circumstantial of any, cannot impart the faintest conception either of the magnificence or the horror of the scene-or of the wild bewildering sense of the novel which confounds the beholder. I am not sure from what point of view the writer in question surveyed it, nor at what time: but it could neither have been from the summit of Helseggen, nor during a storm. There are some passages of his description, nevertheless, which may be quoted for their details, although their effect is exceedingly feeble in conveying an impression of the spectacle.

"Between Lofoden and Moskoe," he says, "the depth of the water is between thirty-six and forty fathoms; but on the other side, toward Ver (Vurrgh), this depth decreases so as not to afford a convenient passage for a vessel, without the risk of splitting on the rocks, which happens even in the calmest weather. When it is flood, the stream runs up the country between Lofoden and Moskoe with a boisterous rapidity; but the roar of its impetuous ebb to the sea is scarce equaled by the loudest and most dreadful cataracts, the noise being heard several leagues off; and the vortices or pits are of such an extent and depth, that if a ship comes within its attraction, it is inevitably absorbed and carried down to the bottom, and there beat to pieces against the rocks; and when the water relaxes, the fragments thereof are thrown up again. But these intervals of tranquillity are only at the turn of the ebb and flood, and in calm weather, and last but a quarter of an hour, its violence gradually returning. When the stream is most boisterous, and its fury heightened by a storm, it is dangerous to come within a Norway mile of it. Boats, vachts, and ships have been carried away by not guarding against it before they were within its reach. It likewise happens frequently that whales come too near the stream, and are overpowered by its violence; but then it is impossible to describe their howlings and bellowings in their fruitless struggles to disengage themselves. A bear once, attempting to swim from Lofoden to Moskoe, was caught by the stream and borne down, while he roared terribly, so as to be heard on shore. Large stocks of firs and pine trees, after being absorbed by the current, rise again broken and torn to such a degree as if bristles grew upon them. This plainly shows the bottom to consist of craggy rocks, among which they are whirled to and fro. This stream is regulated by the flux and reflux of the sea-it being constantly high and low water every six hours. In the year 1645, early in the morning of Sexagesima Sunday, it raged with such noise and impetuosity that the very stones of the houses on the coast fell to the ground."

&lt;sup>1</sup> a Norse historian of the seventeenth century

In regard to the depth of the water, I could not see how this could have been ascertained at all in the immediate vicinity of the vortex. The "forty fathoms" must have reference only to portions of the channel close upon the shore either of Moskoe or Lofoden. The depth in the center of the Moskoe-ström must be immeasurably greater; and no better proof of this fact is necessary than can be obtained from even the sidelong glance into the abyss of the whirl which may be had from the highest crag of Helseggen. Looking down from this pinnacle upon the howling Phlegethon 1 below, I could not help smiling at the simplicity with which the honest Ionas Ramus records, as a matter difficult of belief, the anecdotes of the whales and the bears; for it appeared to me, in fact, a self-evident thing that the largest ships of the line in existence, coming within the influence of that deadly attraction, could resist it as little as a feather the hurricane, and must disappear bodily and at once.

The attempts to account for the phenomenon—some of which, I remember, seemed to me sufficiently plausible in perusal—now wore a very different and unsatisfactory aspect. The idea generally received is that this, as well as three smaller vortices among the Feroe Islands, "have no other cause than the collision of waves rising and falling, at flux and reflux, against a ridge of rocks and shelves, which confines the water so that it precipitates itself like a cataract; and thus the higher the flood rises, the deeper must the fall be, and the natural result of all is a whirlpool or vortex, the prodigious suction of which is sufficiently known by lesser experiments."—These are the words of the Encyclopedia Britannica. Kircher 2 and others imagine that in the center of the channel of the Maelström is an abyss penetrating the globe. and issuing in some very remote part—the Gulf of Bothnia being somewhat decidedly named in one instance. This opinion, idle in itself, was the one to which, as I gazed, my imagination most readily assented; and, mentioning it to the guide, I was rather surprised to hear him say that, although it was the view almost universally entertained of the subject by the Norwegians, it nevertheless was not his own. As to the former notion he confessed his inability to comprehend it; and here I agreed with himfor, however conclusive on paper, it becomes altogether unintelligible, and even absurd, amid the thunder of the abvss.

"You have had a good look at the whirl now," said the old man, "and if you will creep round this crag, so as to get in its lee, and deaden the roar of the water. I will tell you a story that will convince you I ought to know something of the Moskoe-ström."

I placed myself as desired, and he proceeded. "Myself and my two brothers once owned a schooner-rigged smack of about seventy tons burden, with which we were in the habit of fishing among the islands beyond Moskoe, nearly to Vurrgh. In all violent eddies at sea there is good fishing, at proper opportunities, if one has only the courage to attempt it; but among the whole of the Lofoden coastmen we three were the only ones who made a regular business of going out to the islands, as I tell you. The usual grounds are a great way lower down to the southward. There fish can be got at all hours, without much risk, and therefore these places are preferred. The choice spots over here among the rocks, however, not only yield the finest variety, but in far greater abundance; so that we often got in a single day what the more timid of the craft could not scrape together in a week. In fact, we made it a matter of desperate speculation—the risk of life standing instead of labor, and courage answering for capital.

"We kept the smack in a cove about five miles higher up the coast than this; and it was our practice, in fine weather, to take advantage of the fifteen minutes' slack to push across the main channel of the Moskoe-ström, far above the pool, and then drop down upon anchorage somewhere near Otterholm, or Sandflesen, where the eddies are not so violent as elsewhere. Here we used to remain until nearly time for slack water again, when we weighed and made for home. We never set out upon this expedition without a steady side wind for going and coming—one that we felt sure would not fail us before our return—and we seldom made a miscalculation upon this point. Twice, during six years, we were forced to stay all night at anchor on account of a dead calm, which is a rare thing indeed just about here: and once we had to remain on the grounds nearly a week, starving to death, owing to a gale which blew up shortly after our arrival, and made the channel too boisterous to be thought of. Upon this occasion we should have been driven out to sea in spite of everything (for the whirlpools threw us round and round so violently that, at length, we fouled our anchor and dragged it) if it had not been that we drifted into one of the innumerable cross currents—here today and gone tomorrow—which drove us under the lee of Flimen, where, by good luck, we brought

<sup>1</sup> the flaming river of the lower world

&lt;sup>2</sup> a seventeenth century German mathematician

"I could not tell you the twentieth part of the difficulties we encountered 'on the ground' it is a bad spot to be in, even in good weather -but we made shift always to run the gauntlet of the Moskoe-ström itself without accident: although at times my heart has been in my mouth when we happened to be a minute or so behind or before the slack. The wind sometimes was not as strong as we thought it at starting, and then we made rather less way than we could wish, while the current rendered the smack unmanageable. My eldest brother had a son eighteen years old, and I had two stout boys of my own. These would have been of great assistance at such times, in using the sweeps, 1 as well as afterward in fishing—but, somehow, although we ran the risk ourselves, we had not the heart to let the young ones get into the danger—for, after all said and done, it was a horrible danger, and that is the truth.

"It is now within a few days of three years since what I am going to tell you occurred. It was on the tenth of July, 18—, a day which the people of this part of the world will never forget—for it was one in which blew the most terrible hurricane that ever came out of the heavens. And yet all the morning, and indeed until late in the afternoon, there was a gentle and steady breeze from the southwest, while the sun shone brightly, so that the oldest seaman among us could not have foreseen what was to follow.

"The three of us—my two brothers and myself—had crossed over to the islands about two o'clock P.M., and soon nearly loaded the smack with fine fish, which, we all remarked, were more plenty that day than we had ever known them. It was just seven, by my watch, when we weighed and started for home, so as to make the worst of the Ström at slack water, which we knew would be at eight.

"We set out with a fresh wind on our star-board quarter, and for some time spanked along at a great rate, never dreaming of danger, for indeed we saw not the slightest reason to apprehend it. All at once we were taken aback <sup>2</sup> by a breeze from over Helseggen. This was most unusual—something that had never happened to us before—and I began to feel a little uneasy, without exactly knowing why. We put the boat on the wind, but could make no headway at all for the eddies, and I was upon the point of proposing to return to the anchorage, when, looking astern, we saw the whole horizon covered with a singular copper-colored cloud that rose with the most amazing velocity.

"In the mean time the breeze that had headed us off fell away, and we were dead becalmed, drifting about in every direction. This state of things, however, did not last long enough to give us time to think about it. In less than a minute the storm was upon us—in less than two the sky was entirely overcast—and what with this and the driving spray, it became suddenly so dark that we could not see each other in the smack.

"Such a hurricane as then blew it is folly to attempt describing. The oldest seaman in Norway never experienced anything like it. We had let our sails go by the run before it cleverly a took us; but, at the first puff, both our masts went by the board as if they had been sawed off—the mainmast taking with it my youngest brother, who had lashed himself to it for safety.

"Our boat was the lightest feather of a thing that ever sat upon water. It had a complete flush deck, with only a small hatch near the bow, and this hatch it had always been our custom to batten down when about to cross the Ström, by way of precaution against the chopping seas. But for this circumstance we should have foundered at once—for we lay entirely buried for some moments. How my elder brother escaped destruction I cannot say, for I never had an opportunity of ascertaining. For my part, as soon as I had let the foresail run. I threw myself flat on deck, with my feet against the narrow gunwale of the bow, and with my hands grasping a ringbolt near the foot of the foremast. It was mere instinct that prompted me to do this-which was undoubtedly the very best thing I could have done—for I was too much flurried to think.

actuan

<sup>1</sup> large oars used in guiding or propelling a vessel

&lt;sup>2</sup> See note 2, Cooper, The Pilot, p. 220. <sup>3</sup> actually

"For some moments we were completely deluged, as I say, and all this time I held my breath, and clung to the bolt. When I could stand it no longer I raised myself upon my knees, still keeping hold with my hands, and thus got my head clear. Presently our little boat gave herself a shake, just as a dog does in coming out of the water, and thus rid herself, in some measure, of the seas. I was now trying to get the better of the stupor that had come over me, and to collect my senses so as to see what was to be done, when I felt somebody grasp my arm. It was my elder brother, and my heart leaped for joy, for I had made sure that he was overboard—but the next moment all this joy was turned into horror-for he put his mouth close to my ear, and screamed out the word 'Moskoe-ström!'

"No one will ever know what my feelings were at that moment. I shook from head to foot as if I had had the most violent fit of the ague. I knew what he meant by that one word well enough—I knew what he wished to make me understand. With the wind that now drove us on, we were bound for the whirl of the Ström, and nothing could save us!

"You perceive that in crossing the Ström channel, we always went a long way up above the whirl, even in the calmest weather, and then had to wait and watch carefully for the slack—but now we were driving right upon the pool itself, and in such a hurricane as this! 'To be sure,' I thought, 'we shall get there just about the slack—there is some little hope in that'—but in the next moment I cursed myself for being so great a fool as to dream of hope at all. I knew very well that we were doomed, had we been ten times a ninety-gun ship.

"By this time the first fury of the tempest had spent itself, or perhaps we did not feel it so much as we scudded before it; but at all events the seas, which at first had been kept down by the wind, and lay flat and frothing, now got up into absolute mountains. A singular change, too, had come over the heavens. Around in every direction it was still as black as pitch, but nearly overhead there burst out, all at once, a circular rift of clear sky—as clear as I ever saw—and of a deep bright blue—and through it there blazed forth the full moon with a luster that I never before knew her to wear. She lit up everything about us with the greatest distinctness—but, oh God, what a scene it was to light up!

"I now made one or two attempts to speak to my brother—but, in some manner which I could not understand, the din had so increased that I could not make him hear a single word, although I screamed at the top of my voice in his ear. Presently he shook his head, looking as pale as death, and held up one of his fingers, as if to say listen!

"At first I could not make out what he meant—but soon a hideous thought flashed upon me. I dragged my watch from its fob. It was not going. I glanced at its face by the moonlight, and then burst into tears as I flung it far away into the ocean. It had run down at seven o'clock! We were behind the time of the slack, and the whirl of the Ström was in full fury!

"When a boat is well built, properly trimmed, and not deep laden, the waves in a strong gale, when she is going large, 1 seem always to slip from beneath her—which appears very strange to a landsman—and this is what is called riding, in sea phrase.

"Well. so far we had ridden the swells very cleverly; but presently a gigantic sea happened to take us right under the counter, and bore us with it as it rose-up-up-as if into the sky. I would not have believed that any wave could rise so high. And then down we came with a sweep, a slide, and a plunge, that made me feel sick and dizzy, as if I was falling from some lofty mountain-top in a dream. while we were up I had thrown a quick glance around-and that one glance was all-sufficient. I saw our exact position in an instant. The Moskoe-ström whirlpool was about a quarter of a mile dead ahead—but no more like the everyday Moskoe-ström, than the whirl as you now see it is like a mill-race. If I had not known where we were, and what we had to expect, I should not have recognized the place at all. As it was, I involuntarily closed my eves in horror. The lids clenched themselves together as if in a spasm.

"It could not have been more than two minutes afterwards until we suddenly felt the waves subside, and were enveloped in foam. The boat made a sharp half turn to larboard, and then shot off in its new direction like a thunderbolt. At the same moment the roaring noise of the water was completely drowned in a kind of shrill shriek-such a sound as you might imagine given out by the water-pipes of many thousand steam vessels, letting off their steam all together. We were now in the belt of surf that always surrounds the whirl; and I thought. of course, that another moment would plunge us into the abyss—down which we could only see indistinctly on account of the amazing velocity with which we were borne along. The boat did not seem to sink into the water at all, but to skim like an air-bubble upon the surface of the surge. Her starboard side was next the whirl, and on the larboard arose the world of ocean we had left. It stood like a huge writhing wall between us and the horizon.

<sup>1</sup> See note 4, Cooper, The Pilot, p. 220.

"It may appear strange, but now, when we were in the very jaws of the gulf, I felt more composed than when we were only approaching it. Having made up my mind to hope no more, I got rid of a great deal of that terror which unmanned me at first. I suppose it was despair that strung my nerves.

"It may look like boasting—but what I tell you is truth—I began to reflect how magnificent a thing it was to die in such a manner, and how foolish it was in me to think of so paltry a consideration as my own individual life, in view of so wonderful a manifestation of God's power. I do believe that I blushed with shame when this idea crossed my mind. After a little while I became possessed with the keenest curiosity about the whirl itself. I positively felt a wish to explore its depths, even at the sacrifice I was going to make; and my principal grief was that I should never be able to tell my old companions on shore about the mysteries I should see. These, no doubt, were singular fancies to occupy a man's mind in such extremity-and I have often thought since, that the revolutions of the boat around the pool might have rendered me a little light-headed.

"There was another circumstance which tended to restore my self-possession; and this was the cessation of the wind, which could not reach us in our present situation-for, as you saw yourself, the belt of surf is considerably lower than the general bed of the ocean, and this latter now towered above us, a high, black, mountainous ridge. If you have never been at sea in a heavy gale, you can form no idea of the confusion of mind occasioned by the wind and spray together. They blind, deafen, and strangle you, and take away all power of action or reflection. But we were now, in a great measure, rid of these annoyances-just as death-condemned felons in prisons are allowed petty indulgences, forbidden them while their doom is yet uncertain.

"How often we made the circuit of the belt it is impossible to say. We careered round and round for perhaps an hour, flying rather than floating, getting gradually more and more into the middle of the surge, and then nearer and nearer to its horrible inner edge. All this time I had never let go of the ring-bolt. My brother was at the stern, holding on to a small empty water-cask which had been securely lashed under the coop of the counter, and was the only thing on deck that had not been swent overboard when the gale first took us. As we approached the brink of the pit he let go his hold upon this, and made for the ring, from which, in the agony of his terror, he endeavored to force my hands, as it was not large enough to afford us both a secure grasp. I never felt deeper grief than when I saw him attempt this act-although I knew he was a madman when he did it—a raving maniac through sheer fright. I did not care, however, to contest the point with him. I knew it could make no difference whether either of us held on at all: so I let him have the bolt, and went astern to the cask. This there was no great difficulty in doing: for the smack flew round steadily enough, and upon an even keel-only swaving to and fro, with the immense sweeps and swelters of the whirl. Scarcely had I secured myself in my new position, when we gave a wild lurch to starboard. and rushed headlong into the abyss. I muttered a hurried prayer to God, and thought all was over.

"As I felt the sickening sweep of the descent, I had instinctively tightened my hold upon the barrel, and closed my eyes. For some seconds I dared not open them—while I expected instant destruction, and wondered that I was not already in my death-struggles with the water. But moment after moment elapsed. I still lived. The sense of falling had ceased; and the motion of the vessel seemed much as it had been before, while in the belt of foam, with the exception that she now lay more along. I took courage and looked once again upon the scene.

"Never shall I forget the sensations of awe, horror, and admiration with which I gazed about me. The boat appeared to be hanging, as if by magic, midway down, upon the interior surface of a funnel vast in circumference, prodigious in depth, and whose perfectly smooth sides might have been mistaken for ebony, but for the bewildering rapidity with which they spun around, and for the gleaming and ghastly radiance they shot forth, as the rays of the full moon, from that circular rift amid the clouds, which I have already described, streamed in a flood of golden glory along the black walls, and far away down into the inmost recesses of the abvss.

"At first I was too much confused to observe anything accurately. The general burst of terrific grandeur was all that I beheld. When I recovered myself a little, however, my gaze fell instinctively downward. In this direction I was able to obtain an unobstructed view, from the manner in which the smack hung on the inclined surface of the pool. She was quite upon an even keel—that is to say, her deck lay in a plane parallel with that of the water—but this latter sloped at an angle of more than forty-five degrees, so that we seemed to be lying upon our beam-ends. I could not help observing, nevertheless, that I had scarcely more difficulty in maintaining my hold and footing in this situation, than if we had been upon a dead level; and this, I suppose, was owing to the speed at which we revolved.

<sup>1</sup> lay more over, as if under a side wind

"The rays of the moon seemed to search the very bottom of the profound gulf; but still I could make out nothing distinctly, on account of a thick mist in which everything there was enveloped, and over which there hung a magnificent rainbow, I like that narrow and tottering bridge which Mussulmen say is the only pathway between Time and Eternity. This mist, or spray, was no doubt occasioned by the clashing of the great walls of the funnel, as they all met together at the bottom—but the yell that went up to the heavens from out of that mist, I dare not attempt to describe.

"Our first slide into the abyss itself, from the belt of foam above, had carried us to a great distance down the slope; but our farther descent was by no means proportionate. Round and round we swept—not with any uniform movement, but in dizzying swings and jerks, that sent us sometimes only a few hundred yards—sometimes nearly the complete circuit of the whirl. Our progress downward, at each revolution, was slow, but very perceptible.

"Looking about me upon the wide waste of liquid ebony on which we were thus borne. I perceived that our boat was not the only object in the embrace of the whirl. Both above and below us were visible fragments of vessels, large masses of building timber and trunks of trees, with many smaller articles, such as pieces of house furniture, broken boxes, barrels, and staves. I have already described the unnatural curiosity which had taken the place of my original terrors. It appeared to grow upon me as I drew nearer and nearer to my dreadful doom. I now began to watch, with a strange interest, the numerous things that floated in our company. I must have been delirious—for I even sought amusement in speculating upon the relative velocities of their several descents toward the foam below. 'This fir tree,' I found myself at one time saying, 'will certainly be the next thing that takes the awful plunge and disappears,'—and then I was disappointed to find that the wreck of a Dutch merchant ship overtook it and went down before. At length, after making several guesses of this nature, and being deceived in all—this fact—the fact of my invariable miscalculation, set me upon a train of reflection that made my limbs again tremble, and my heart beat heavily once more.

"It was not a new terror that thus affected me, but the dawn of a more exciting hope. This hope arose partly from memory, and partly from present observation. I called to mind the great variety of buoyant matter that strewed the coast of Lofoden, having been absorbed and then thrown forth by the Moskoe-ström. By far the greater number of the articles were shattered in the most extraordinary wav-so chafed and roughened as to have the appearance of being stuck full of splinters-but then I distinctly recollected that there were some of them which were not disfigured at all. Now I could not account for this difference except by supposing that the roughened fragments were the only ones which had been completely absorbed—that the others had entered the whirl at so late a period of the tide, or, from some reason, had descended so slowly after entering. that they did not reach the bottom before the turn of the flood came, or of the ebb, as the case might be. I conceived it possible, in either instance, that they might thus be whirled up again to the level of the ocean, without undergoing the fate of those which had been drawn in more early or absorbed more rapidly. made, also, three important observations. The first was, that as a general rule, the larger the bodies were, the more rapid their descent; the second, that, between two masses of equal extent, the one spherical, and the other of any other shape, the superiority in speed of descent was with the sphere; the third, that, between two masses of equal size, the one cylindrical, and the other of any other shape, the cylinder was absorbed the more slowly. Since my escape. I have had several conversations on this subject with an old schoolmaster of the district; and it was from him that I learned the use of the words 'cylinder' and 'sphere.' He explained to me-although I have forgotten the explanation-how what I observed was, in fact, the natural consequence of the forms of the floating fragments, and showed me how it happened that a cylinder, swimming in a vortex, offered more resistance to its suction, and was drawn in with greater difficulty, than an equally bulky body, of any form whatever. 1

&lt;sup>1</sup> Poe exaggerates here; a rainbow by moonlight is really very faint. But this error need not prejudice us against the imaginative vigor of the scene. The bridge Al Sirat, no broader than the edge of a scimitar, conducts the faithful across the gulf of hell, to paradise.

"There was one startling circumstance which went a great way in enforcing these observations, and rendering me anxious to turn them to account, and this was that, at every revolution, we passed something like a barrel, or else the yard or the mast of a vessel, while many of these things, which had been on our level when I first opened my eyes upon the wonders of the whirlpool, were now high up above us, and seemed to have moved but little from their original station.

"I no longer hesitated what to do. I resolved to lash myself securely to the water cask upon which I now held, to cut it loose from the counter, and to throw myself with it into the water. I attracted my brother's attention by signs, pointed to the floating barrels that came near us, and did everything in my power to make him understand what I was about to do. I thought at length that he comprehended my design-but, whether this was the case or not, he shook his head despairingly, and refused to move from his station by the ring-bolt. It was impossible to reach him; the emergency admitted of no delay; and so, with a bitter struggle, I resigned him to his fate, fastened myself to the cask by means of the lashings which secured it to the counter, and precipitated myself with it into the sea, without another moment's hesitation.

"The result was precisely what I had hoped it might be. As it is myself who now tell you this tale—as you see that I did escape—and as you are already in possession of the mode in which this escape was effected, and must therefore anticipate all that I have farther to say—I will bring my story quickly to conclusion. It might have been an hour, or thereabout, after my quitting the smack, when, having descended to a vast distance beneath me. it made three or four wild gyrations in rapid succession, and, bearing my loved brother with it, plunged headlong, at once and forever, into the chaos of foam below. The barrel to which I was attached sunk very little farther than half the distance between the bottom of the gulf and the spot at which I leaped overboard, before a great change took place in the character of the whirlpool. The slope of the sides of the vast funnel became momently less and less steep. The gyrations of the whirl grew, gradually, less and less violent. By degrees, the froth and the rainbow disappeared, and the bottom of the gulf seemed slowly to uprise. The sky was clear, the winds had gone down. and the full moon was setting radiantly in the west, when I found myself on the surface of the ocean, in full view of the shores of Lofoden. and above the spot where the pool of the Moskoe-ström had been. It was the hour of the slack, but the sea still heaved in mountainous waves from the effects of the hurricane. I was borne violently into the channel of the Ström, and in a few minutes was hurried down the coast into the 'grounds' of the fishermen. A boat picked me up—exhausted from fatigue -and (now that the danger was removed) speechless from the memory of its horror. Those who drew me on board were my old mates and daily companions, but they knew me no more than they would have known a traveler from the spirit-land. My hair, which had been raven-black the day before, was as white as you see it now. They say, too, that the whole expression of my countenance had changed. I told them my story—they did not believe it. I now tell it to you-and I can scarcely expect you to put more faith in it than did the merry fishermen of Lofoden."

1841

THE MASQUE OF THE RED DEATH 2

(NORTHERN ITALY)

The "Red Death" had long devastated the country. No pestilence had ever been so fatal, or so hideous. Blood was its avatar and its seal—the redness and the horror of blood. There were sharp pains, and sudden dizziness, and then profuse bleeding at the pores, with dissolution. The scarlet stains upon the body, and especially upon the face, of the victim were the pest ban which shut him out from the aid and from the sympathy of his fellow-men. And the whole seizure, progress, and termination of the disease were the incidents of half an hour.

But the Prince Prospero was happy and dauntless and sagacious. When his dominions were half depopulated, he summoned to his presence a thousand hale and light-hearted friends from among the knights and dames of his court, and with these retired to the deep seclusion of one of his castellated abbeys. was an extensive and magnificent structure, the creation of the Prince's own eccentric vet august taste. A strong and lofty wall girdled it in. This wall had gates of iron. The courtiers, having entered, brought furnaces and massy hammers. and welded the bolts. They resolved to leave means neither of ingress or egress to the sudden impulses of despair or of frenzy from within. The abbey was amply provisioned. With such precautions the courtiers might bid defiance to contagion. The external world could take care of itself. In the mean time it was folly to grieve, or to think. The Prince had provided all the appliances of pleasure. There were buffoons, there were improvisatori, there were ballet-dancers, there were musicians, there was Beauty, there was wine. All these and security were within. Without was the "Red Death."

&lt;sup>1</sup> "See Archimedes, De iis Quae Humido Vehuntur, lib. ii," Poe's note.

<sup>2 &</sup>quot;In this tale are to be found again all those properties of ultra-Gothic romance of which Poe was the final master. As a work of art it stands quite apart from the more or less famous realistic descriptions of actual pestilence by Boccaccio, Manzoni, Defoe, and Charles Brockden Brown, though at the outset it is not a little like Boccaccio's account (see the Decameron, Introduction). [It is] allegorical, but without moral significance—the fear it symbolizes is purely physical. But this is another of Poe's most successful fantasies, at once porgeous and spectral, ridiculously impossible, yet awfully real." Poems and Tales of Edgar Allan Poe, edited by Alphonso G. Newcomer, The Lake English Classics.

It was toward the close of the fifth or sixth month of his seclusion, and while the pestilence raged most furiously abroad, that the Prince Prospero entertained his thousand friends at a masked ball of the most unusual magnificence.

It was a voluptuous scene, that masquerade, But first let me tell of the rooms in which it was held. There were seven—an imperial suite. In many palaces, however, such suites form a long and straight vista, while the folding-doors slide back nearly to the walls on either hand, so that the view of the whole extent is scarcely impeded. Here the case was very different, as might have been expected from the Prince's love of the bizarre. The apartments were so irregularly disposed that the vision embraced but little more than one at a time. There was a sharp turn at every twenty or thirty yards, and at each turn a novel effect. To the right and left, in the middle of each wall, a tall and narrow Gothic window looked out upon a closed corridor which pursued the windings of the These windows were of stained glass, whose color varied in accordance with the prevailing hue of the decorations of the chamber into which it opened. That at the eastern extremity was hung, for example, in blue-and vividly blue were its windows. The second chamber was purple in its ornaments and tapestries, and here the panes were purple. third was green throughout, and so were the The fourth was furnished and lighted with orange, the fifth with white, the sixth with violet. The seventh apartment was closely shrouded in black velvet tapestries that hung all over the ceiling and down the walls. falling in heavy folds upon a carpet of the same material and hue. But, in this chamber only, the color of the windows failed to correspond with the decorations. The panes here were scarlet-a deep blood-color. Now in no one of the seven apartments was there any lamp or candelabrum, amid the profusion of golden ornaments that lav scattered to and fro or depended from the roof. There was no light of any kind emanating from lamp or candle within the suite of chambers. But in the corridors that followed the suite there stood, opposite to each window, a heavy tripod, bearing a brazier of fire, that projected its rays through the tinted glass and so glaringly illumined the room. And thus were produced a multitude of gaudy and fantastic appearances. But in the western or black chamber the effect of the firelight that streamed upon the dark hangings through the blood-tinted panes was ghastly in the extreme, and produced so wild a look upon the countenances of those who entered that there were few of the company bold enough to set foot within its precincts at all.

It was in this apartment, also, that there stood against the western wall a gigantic clock of ebony. Its pendulum swung to and fro with a dull, heavy, monotonous clang; and when the minute-hand made the circuit of the face, and the hour was to be stricken, there came from the brazen lungs of the clock a sound which was clear and loud and deep and exceedingly musical, but of so peculiar a note and emphasis that, at each lapse of an hour, the musicians of the orchestra were constrained to pause, momentarily, in their performance, to hearken to the sound; and thus the waltzers perforce ceased their evolutions; and there was a brief disconcert of the whole gay company; and, while the chimes of the clock yet rang, it was observed that the giddiest grew pale, and the more aged and sedate passed their hands over their brows as if in confused revery or meditation. But when the echoes had fully ceased, a light laughter at once pervaded the assembly; the musicians looked at each other and smiled as if at their own nervousness and folly, and made whispering vows, each to the other, that the next chiming of the clock should produce in them no similar emotion; and then, after the lapse of sixty minutes (which embrace three thousand and six hundred seconds of the Time that flies) there came yet another chiming of the clock, and then were the same disconcert and tremulousness and meditation as before.

<sup>1</sup> those who improvise: poets

But, in spite of these things, it was a gay and magnificent revel. The tastes of the Prince were peculiar. He had a fine eye for colors and effects. He disregarded the decora of mere fashion. His plans were bold and fiery, and his conceptions glowed with barbaric luster. There are some who would have thought him mad. His followers felt that he was not. It was necessary to hear and see and touch him to be sure that he was not.

He had directed, in great part, the movable embellishments of the seven chambers, upon occasion of this great fête; and it was his own guiding taste which had given character to the masqueraders. Be sure they were grotesque. There were much glare and glitter and piquancy and phantasm-much of what has been since seen in Hernani. 1 There were arabesque figures with unsuited limbs and appointments. There were delirious fancies such as the madman fashions. There was much of the beautiful, much of the wanton, much of the bizarre, something of the terrible, and not a little of that which might have excited disgust. To and fro in the seven chambers there stalked. in fact. a multitude of dreams. And these-the dreams -writhed in and about, taking hue from the rooms, and causing the wild music of the orchestra to seem as the echo of their steps. And, anon, there strikes the ebony clock which stands in the hall of the velvet. And then, for a moment, all is still, and all is silent save the voice of the clock. The dreams are stiff-frozen as they stand. But the echoes of the chime die away-they have endured but an instant-and a light, half-subdued laughter floats after them as they depart. And now again the music swells, and the dreams live, and writhe to and fro more merrily than ever, taking hue from the many tinted windows through which stream the rays from the tripods. But to the chamber which lies most westwardly of the seven, there are now none of the maskers who venture; for the night is waning away, and there flows a ruddier light through the blood-colored panes; and the blackness of the sable drapery appalls; and to him whose foot falls upon the sable carpet, there comes from the near clock of ebony a muffled peal more solemnly emphatic than any which reaches their ears who indulge in the more remote gayeties of the other apartments.

But these other apartments were densely crowded, and in them beat feverishly the heart of life. And the revel went whirlingly on, until at length there commenced the sounding of midnight upon the clock. And then the music ceased, as I have told; and the evolutions of the waltzers were quieted; and there was an uneasy cessation of all things as before. But now there were twelve strokes to be sounded by the bell of the clock; and thus it happened, perhaps, that more of thought crept, with more of time, into the meditations of the thoughtful among those who reveled. And thus, too, it happened, perhaps, that before the last echoes of the last chime had utterly sunk into silence, there were many individuals in the crowd who had found leisure to become aware of the presence of a masked figure which had arrested the attention of no single individual before. And the rumor of this new presence having spread itself whisperingly around, there arose at length from the whole company a buzz, or murmur, expressive of disapprobation and surprise—then, finally, of terror, of horror, and of disgust.

In an assembly of phantasms such as I have painted, it may well be supposed that no ordinary appearance could have excited such sensation. In truth the masquerade license of the night was nearly unlimited; but the figure in question had out-Heroded Herod, 2 and gone beyond the bounds of even the Prince's indefinite decorum. There are chords in the hearts of the most reckless which cannot be touched without emotion. Even with the utterly lost, to whom life and death are equally jests, there are matters of which no jest can be made. The whole company, indeed, seemed now deeply to feel that in the costume and bearing of the stranger neither wit nor propriety existed. The figure was tall and gaunt, and shrouded from head to foot in the habiliments of the grave. The mask which concealed the visage was made so nearly to resemble the countenance of a stiffened corpse that the closest scrutiny must have had difficulty in detecting the cheat. And yet all this might have been endured, if not approved, by the mad revelers around. But the mummer had gone so far as to assume the type of the Red Death. His vesture was dabbled in blood-and his broad brow, with all the features of the face, was besprinkled with the scarlet horror.

When the eyes of Prince Prospero fell upon this spectral image (which with a slow and solemn movement, as if more fully to sustain its rôle, stalked to and fro among the waltzers) he was seen to be convulsed, in the first moment, with a strong shudder, either of terror or distaste; but, in the next, his brow reddened with rage.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a tragedy by Victor Hugo, 1830: the beginning of the modern romantic drama in France

&lt;sup>2</sup> Herod, a character in the old Mystery Plays, was usually over-acted. See Hamlet III, ii, 15.

"Who dares?" he demanded hoarsely of the courtiers who stood near him-"who dares insult us with this blasphemous mockery? Seize him and unmask him—that we may know whom we have to hang at sunrise, from the battlements!"

It was in the eastern or blue chamber in which stood the Prince Prospero as he uttered these words. They rang throughout the seven rooms loudly and clearly—for the Prince was a bold and robust man, and the music had become hushed at the waving of his hand.

It was in the blue room where stood the Prince, with a group of pale courtiers by his side. At first, as he spoke, there was a slight rushing movement of this group in the direction of the intruder, who at the moment was also near at hand, and now, with deliberate and stately step, made closer approach to the speaker. But from a certain nameless awe with which the mad assumptions of the mummer had inspired the whole party, there were found none who put forth hand to seize him; so that, unimpeded, he passed within a yard of the Prince's person; and while the vast assembly, as if with one impulse, shrank from the centers of the rooms to the wall, he made his way uninterruptedly, but with the same solemn and measured step which had distinguished him from the first, through the blue chamber to the purple—through the purple to the green through the green to the orange—through this again to the white-and even thence to the violet, ere a decided movement had been made to arrest him. It was then, however, that the Prince Prospero, maddening with rage and the shame of his own momentary cowardice, rushed hurriedly through the six chambers, while none followed him, on account of a deadly terror that had seized upon all. He bore aloft a drawn dagger, and had approached, in rapid impetuosity, to within three or four feet of the retreating figure, when the latter, having attained the extremity of the velvet apartment, turned suddenly and confronted his pursuer. There was a sharp cry-and the dagger dropped gleaming upon the sable carpet, upon which, instantly afterwards, fell prostrate in death the Prince Prospero. Then, summoning the wild courage of despair, a throng of the revelers at once threw themselves into the black apartment, and, seizing the mummer, whose tall figure stood erect and motionless within the shadow of the ebony clock, gasped in unutterable horror at finding the grave cerements and corpse-like mask, which they handled with so violent a rudeness, untenanted by any tangible form.

And now was acknowledged the presence of the Red Death. He had come like a thief in the night. And one by one dropped the revelers in the blood-bedewed halls of their revel, and died each in the despairing posture of his fall. And the life of the ebony clock went out with that of the last of the gay. And the flames of the tripods expired. And Darkness and Decay and the Red Death held illimitable dominion over all.

1845

THE PURLOINED LETTER 1

Nil sapientiae odiosius acumine nimio.2

SENECA

At Paris, just after dark one gusty evening in the autumn of 18—. I was enjoying the twofold luxury of meditation and a meerschaum. in company with my friend, C. Auguste Dupin, in his little back library, or book closet, au troisième, <sup>3</sup> No. 33 Rue Dunôt, Faubourg St. Germain. For one hour at least we had maintained a profound silence: while each, to any casual observer, might have seemed intently and exclusively occupied with the curling eddies of smoke that oppressed the atmosphere of the chamber. For myself, however, I was mentally discussing certain topics which had formed matter for conversation between us at an earlier period of the evening; I mean the affair of the Rue Morgue, and the mystery attending the murder of Marie Rogêt. I looked upon it. therefore, as something of a coincidence, when the door of our apartment was thrown open and admitted our old acquaintance. Monsieur —, the Prefect of the Parisian police.

We gave him a hearty welcome; for there was nearly half as much of the entertaining as of the contemptible about the man, and we had not seen him for several years. We had been sitting in the dark, and Dupin now arose for the purpose of lighting a lamp, but sat down again, without doing so, upon G---'s saying that he had called to consult us, or rather to ask the opinion of my friend, about some official

One realm of Poe's genius was that of logical or psychological analysis. "The Gold Bug." "The Murders in the Rue Morgue," "The Mystery of Marie Roget," and the present tale belong to this class. This type of fiction lies close to journalism, which was indeed Poe's occupation, and in the hands. was, indeed, Poe's occupation, and in the hands of a person of less skill and creative power degenerates into the ordinary detective story.

"nothing more hateful to wisdom than over-acuteness" on the third floor, really the fourth, since the first, usually occupied in Paris by shops, is not counted business which had occasioned a great deal of trouble.

"If it is any point requiring reflection," observed Dupin, as he forbore to enkindle the wick, "we shall examine it to better purpose in the dark."

"That is another of your odd notions," said the Prefect, who had a fashion of calling everything "odd" that was beyond his comprehension. and thus lived amid an absolute legion of "oddities "

"Very true," said Dupin, as he supplied his visitor with a pipe, and rolled towards him a comfortable chair.

"And what is the difficulty now?" I asked. "Nothing more in the assassination way. I hone?"

"Oh, no; nothing of that nature. The fact is, the business is very simple indeed, and I make no doubt that we can manage it sufficiently well ourselves; but then I thought Dupin would like to hear the details of it, because it is so excessively odd."

"Simple and odd," said Dupin.

"Why, yes; and not exactly that, either. The fact is, we have all been a good deal puzzled because the affair is so simple, and yet baffles us altogether."

"Perhaps it is the very simplicity of the thing which puts you at fault," said my friend.

"What nonsense you do talk!" replied the Prefect, laughing heartily.

"Perhaps the mystery is a little too plain," said Dupin.

"Oh, good heavens! who ever heard of such an idea?"

"A little too self evident."

"Ha! ha! ha!—ha! ha! ha!—ho! ho! ho!" roared our visitor, profoundly amused, "oh, Dupin, you will be the death of me yet!"

"And what, after all, is the matter on hand?"

"Why, I will tell you," replied the Prefect, as he gave a long, steady, and contemplative puff, and settled himself in his chair. "I will tell you in a few words; but, before I begin, let me caution you that this is an affair demanding the greatest secrecy, and that I should most probably lose the position I now hold were it known that I confided it to any one."

"Proceed," said I.
"Or not," said Dupin.

"Well, then; I have received personal information from a very high quarter that a certain document of the last importance has been purloined from the royal apartments. The individual who purloined it is known; this beyond a doubt: he was seen to take it. It is known. also, that it still remains in his possession."

"How is this known?" asked Dupin.

"It is clearly inferred," replied the Prefect, "from the nature of the document, and from the non-appearance of certain results which would at once arise from its passing out of the robber's possession; that is to say, from his employing it as he must design in the end to employ it."

"Be a little more explicit." I said.

"Well, I may venture so far as to say that the paper gives its holder a certain power in a certain guarter where such power is immensely valuable." The Prefect was fond of the cant of diplomacy.

"Still I do not quite understand," said Dupin. "No? Well; the disclosure of the document to a third person, who shall be nameless, would bring in question the honor of a personage of most exalted station; and this fact gives the holder of the document an ascendancy over the illustrious personage whose honor and peace are so ieopardized."

"But this ascendancy," I interposed, "would depend upon the robber's knowledge of the loser's knowledge of the robber. Who would dare"-

"The thief," said G---, "is the Minister D-, who dares all things, those unbecoming as well as those becoming a man. The method of the theft was not less ingenious than bold. The document in question—a letter, to be frank —had been received by the personage robbed while alone in the royal boudoir. During its perusal she was suddenly interrupted by the entrance of the other exalted personage, from whom especially it was her wish to conceal it. After a hurried and vain endeavor to thrust it in a drawer, she was forced to place it, open as it was, upon a table. The address, however, was uppermost, and, the contents thus unexposed, the letter escaped notice. At this juncture enters the Minister D---. His lynx eye immediately perceives the paper, recognizes the handwriting of the address, observes the confusion of the personage addressed, and fathoms her secret. After some business transactions, hurried through in his ordinary manner, he produces a letter somewhat similar to the one in question, opens it, pretends to read it, and then places it in close juxtaposition to the other. Again he converses for some fifteen minutes upon the public affairs. At length in taking leave he takes also from the table the letter to which he had no claim. Its rightful owner saw, but of course dared not call attention to the act, in the presence of the third personage, who stood at her elbow. The Minister decamped, leaving his own letter—one of no importance—upon the table."

"Here, then," said Dupin to me, "you have precisely what you demand to make the ascendancy complete—the robber's knowledge of the loser's knowledge of the robber."

"Yes," replied the Prefect; "and the power thus attained has, for some months past, been wielded, for political purposes, to a very dangerous extent. The personage robbed is more thoroughly convinced, every day, of the necessity of reclaiming her letter. But this, of course, cannot be done openly. In fine, driven to despair, she has committed the matter to me."

"Than whom," said Dupin, amid a perfect whirlwind of smoke, "no more sagacious agent could, I suppose, be desired, or even imagined."

"You flatter me," replied the Prefect; "but it is possible that some such opinion may have been entertained."

"It is clear," said I, "as you observe, that the letter is still in possession of the Minister; since it is this possession, and not any employment of the letter, which bestows the power. With the employment the power departs."

"True," said G——; "and upon this conviction I proceeded. My first care was to make thorough search of the Minister's Hotel; <sup>1</sup> and here my chief embarrassment lay in the necessity of searching without his knowledge. Beyond all things, I have been warned of the danger which would result from giving him reason to suspect our design."

"But," said I, "you are quite au fait 2 in these investigations. The Parisian police have done this thing often before."

"Oh, yes; and for this reason I did not despair. The habits of the Minister gave me, too, a great advantage. He is frequently absent from home all night. His servants are by no means numerous. They sleep at a distance from their master's apartment, and, being chiefly Neapolitans, are readily made drunk. I have keys, as you know, with which I can open any chamber or cabinet in Paris. For three months a night has not passed, during the greater part of which I have not been engaged. personally, in ransacking the D-Hotel. My honor is interested, and, to mention a great secret, the reward is enormous. So I did not abandon the search until I had become fully satisfied that the thief is a more astute man than myself. I fancy that I have investigated every nook and corner of the premises in which it is possible that the paper can be concealed."

"But is it not possible," I suggested, "that although the letter may be in possession of the Minister, as it unquestionably is, he may have concealed it elsewhere than upon his own premises?"

"This is barely possible," said Dupin. "The present peculiar condition of affairs at court, and especially of those intrigues in which D—— is known to be involved, would render the instant availability of the document—its susceptibility of being produced at a moment's notice—a point of nearly equal importance with its possession."

"Its susceptibility of being produced?" said I. "That is to say, of being destroyed," said Dupin.

"True," I observed; "the paper is clearly then upon the premises. As for its being upon the person of the Minister, we may consider that as out of the question."

"Entirely," said the Prefect. "He has been twice waylaid, as if by footpads, and his person rigorously searched under my own inspection."

"You might have spared yourself this trouble," said Dupin. "D——, I presume, is not altogether a fool, and, if not, must have anticipated these waylayings as a matter of course."

"Not altogether a fool," said G——, "but then he's a poet, which I take to be only one remove from a fool."

"True," said Dupin, after a long and thoughtful whiff from his meerschaum, "although I have been guilty of certain doggerel myself."

"Suppose you detail," said I, "the particulars of your search."

"Why, the fact is, we took our time, and we searched everywhere. I have had long experience in these affairs. I took the entire building, room by room, devoting the nights of a whole week to each. We examined, first, the furniture of each apartment. We opened every possible drawer; and I presume you know that, to a properly trained police agent, such a thing as a secret drawer is impossible. Any man is a dolt who permits a 'secret' drawer to escape him in a search of this kind. The thing is so plain. There is a certain amount of bulk—of space—to be accounted for in every cabinet. Then we have accurate rules. The fiftieth part of a line could not escape us. After the cabinets we took the chairs. The cushions we probed with the fine long needles you have seen me employ. From the tables we removed the tops."

<sup>1</sup> residence, mansion

<sup>2</sup> expert

"Why so?"

"Sometimes the top of a table, or other similarly arranged piece of furniture, is removed by the person wishing to conceal an article; then the leg is excavated, the article deposited within the cavity, and the top replaced. The bottoms and tops of bed-posts are employed in the same way."

"But could not the cavity be detected by sounding?" I asked.

"By no means, if, when the article is deposited, a sufficient wadding of cotton be placed around it. Besides, in our case we were obliged to proceed without noise."

Eut you could not have removed—you could not have taken to pieces all articles of furniture in which it would have been possible to make a deposit in the manner you mention. A letter may be compressed into a thin spiral roll, not differing much in shape or bulk from a large knitting-needle, and in this form it might be inserted into the rung of a chair, for example. You did not take to pieces all the chairs?"

"Certainly not; but we did better—we examined the rungs of every chair in the Hotel, and indeed, the jointings of every description of furniture. by the aid of a most powerful microscope. Had there been any traces of recent disturbance we should not have failed to detect it instantly. A single grain of gimlet-dust, for example, would have been as obvious as an apple. Any disorder in the gluing—any unusual gaping in the joints—would have sufficed to insure detection."

"I presume you looked to the mirrors, between the boards and the plates, and you probed the beds and the bedclothes, as well as the curtains and carpets?"

"That, of course; and when we had absolutely completed every particle of the furniture in this way, then we examined the house itself. We divided its entire surface into compartments, which we numbered, so that none might be missed; then we scrutinized each individual square inch throughout the premises, including the two houses immediately adjoining, with the microscope, as before."

"The two houses adjoining!" I exclaimed; "you must have had a great deal of trouble."

"We had; but the reward offered is prodigious."

"You include the grounds about the houses?"
"All the grounds are paved with brick. They gave us comparatively little trouble. We examined the moss between the bricks, and found it undisturbed."

"You looked among D——'s papers, of course, and into the books of the library?"

"Certainly; we opened every package and parcel; we not only opened every book, but we turned over every leaf in each volume, not contenting ourselves with a mere shake, according to the fashion of some of our police officers. We also measured the thickness of every bookcover, with the most accurate admeasurement, and applied to each the most jealous scrutiny of the microscope. Had any of the bindings been recently meddled with, it would have been utterly impossible that the fact should have escaped observation. Some five or six volumes, just from the hands of the binder, we carefully probed, longitudinally, with the needles."

"You explored the floors beneath the carpets?"

"Beyond doubt. We removed every carpet, and examined the boards with the microscope."

"And the paper on the walls?"

"Yes."

"You looked into the cellars?"

"We did."

"Then," I said, "you have been making a miscalculation, and the letter is not upon the premises, as you suppose."

"I fear you are right, there," said the Prefect. "And now, Dupin, what would you advise me to do?"

"To make a thorough re-search of the premises"

"That is absolutely needless," replied G.
"I am not more sure that I breathe than I am that the letter is not at the Hotel."

"I have no better advice to give you," said Dupin. "You have, of course, an accurate description of the letter?"

"Oh, yes!"—And here the Prefect, producing a memorandum-book, proceeded to read aloud a minute account of the internal, and especially of the external appearance of the missing document. Soon after finishing the perusal of this description, he took his departure, more entirely depressed in spirits than I had ever known the good gentleman before.

In about a month afterwards he paid us another visit, and found us occupied very nearly as before. He took a pipe and a chair, and entered into some ordinary conversation. At length I said.—

"Well, but G——, what of the purloined letter? I presume you have at last made up your mind that there is no such thing as over-reaching the Minister?"

"Confound him, say I—yes; I made the reexamination, however, as Dupin suggested but it was all labor lost, as I knew it would be."

<sup>1</sup> measurement that determines the capacity or the com-

"How much was the reward offered, did you say?" asked Dupin.

"Why, a very great deal—a very liberal reward—I don't like to say how much precisely; but one thing I will say, that I wouldn't mind giving my individual check for fifty thousand francs to any one who could obtain me that letter. The fact is, it is becoming of more and more importance every day; and the reward has been lately doubled. If it were trebled, however, I could do no more than I have done."

"Why, yes," said Dupin, drawlingly, between the whiffs of his meerschaum, "I really—think, G—, you have not exerted yourself—to the utmost in this matter. You might—do a little more, I think, eh?"

"How?—in what way?"

"Why—puff, puff—you might—puff, puff—employ counsel in the matter, eh?—puff, puff, puff—Do you remember the story they tell of Abernethy?" 1

"No; hang Abernethy!"

"To be sure! hang him and welcome. But, once upon a time, a certain rich miser conceived the design of sponging upon this Abernethy for a medical opinion. Getting up, for this purpose, an ordinary conversation in a private company, he insinuated his case to the physician, as that of an imaginary individual.

"'We will suppose,' said the miser, 'that his symptoms are such and such; now, doctor, what would you have directed him to take?"

"'Take!' said Abernethy, 'why, take advice, to be sure.'"

"But," said the Prefect, a little discomposed, "I am perfectly willing to take advice, and to pay for it. I would really give fifty thousand francs to any one who would aid me in the matter."

"In that case," replied Dupin, opening a drawer, and producing a check-book, "you may as well fill me up a check for the amount mentioned. When you have signed it, I will hand you the letter."

I was astounded. The Prefect appeared absolutely thunderstricken. For some minutes he remained speechless and motionless, looking incredulously at my friend with open mouth, and eyes that seemed starting from their sockets; then, apparently recovering himself in some measure, he seized a pen, and after several pauses and vacant stares, finally filled up and signed a check for fifty thousand francs, and handed it across the table to Dupin. The latter examined it carefully and deposited it in his pocketbook; then, unlocking an escritoire, took thence a letter and gave it to the Prefect. This functionary grasped it in a perfect agony of joy, opened it with a trembling hand, cast a rapid glance at its contents, and then, scrambling and struggling to the door, rushed at length unceremoniously from the room and from the house, without having uttered a syllable since Dupin had requested him to fill up the check.

When he had gone, my friend entered into some explanations.

"The Parisian police," he said, "are exceedingly able in their way. They are persevering, ingenious, cunning, and thoroughly versed in the knowledge which their duties seem chiefly to demand. Thus, when G—— detailed to us his mode of searching the premises at the Hotel D——, I felt entire confidence in his having made a satisfactory investigation—so far as his labors extended."

"So far as his labors extended?" said I.

"Yes," said Dupin. "The measures adopted were not only the best of their kind, but carried out to absolute perfection. Had the letter been deposited within the range of their search, these fellows would, beyond a question, have found it."

I merely laughed—but he seemed quite serious in all that he said.

"The measures, then," he continued, "were good in their kind, and well executed; their defect lay in their being inapplicable to the case, and to the man. A certain set of highly ingenious resources are, with the Prefect, a sort of Procrustean 2 bed to which he forcibly adapts his designs. But he perpetually errs by being too deep or too shallow, for the matter in hand; and many a schoolboy is a better reasoner than he. I knew one about eight years of age, whose success at guessing in the game of 'even and odd' attracted universal admiration. This game is simple, and is played with marbles. One player holds in his hand a number of these toys, and demands of another whether that number is even or odd. If the guess is right, the guesser wins one; if wrong, he loses one. The boy to whom I allude won all the marbles of the school. Of course he had some principle of guessing; and this lay in mere observation and admeasurement of the astuteness of his opponents. For example, an arrant simpleton is his opponent, and, holding up his closed hand, asks, 'Are they even or odd?' Our schoolboy replies, 'Odd,' and loses; but upon the second trial he wins, for he then says to himself, 'The simpleton had them even upon the first trial, and his amount of cunning is just sufficient to make him have them odd upon the second: I will therefore guess odd:' he guesses odd, and wins. Now, with a simpleton a degree above the first he would have reasoned thus: 'This fellow finds that in the first instance I guessed odd, and in the second he will propose to himself, upon the first impulse, a simple variation from even to odd, as did the first simpleton: but then a second thought will suggest that this is too simple a variation, and finally he will decide upon putting it even as before. I will therefore guess even'; he guesses even, and wins. Now, this mode of reasoning in the schoolboy, whom his fellows termed 'lucky'—what, in its last analysis, is it?"

&lt;sup>1</sup> a celebrated and rather eccentric English surgeon, 1764-1831

&lt;sup>2</sup> Procrustes, a legendary Attic robber, tortured his victims by stretching or lopping them to fit a certain had

"It is merely," I said, "an identification of the reasoner's intellect with that of his opponent."

"It is," said Dupin; "and, upon inquiring of the boy by what means he effected the thorough identification in which his success consisted. I received answer as follows: 'When I wish to find out how wise, or how stupid, or how good, or how wicked is any one, or what are his thoughts at the moment, I fashion the expression of my face, as accurately as possible, in accordance with the expression of his, and then wait to see what thoughts or sentiments arise in my mind or heart, as if to match or correspond with the expression.' This response of the schoolboy lies at the bottom of all the spurious profundity which has been attributed to Rochefoucauld, to La Bruyère, to Machiavelli, and to Campanella." 1

"And the identification," I said, "of the reasoner's intellect with that of his opponent, depends, if I understand you aright, upon the accuracy with which the opponent's intellect is admeasured."

"For its practical value it depends upon this," replied Dupin, "and the Prefect and his cohort fail so frequently, first, by default of this identification, and secondly, by ill-admeasurement, or rather through non-admeasurement, of the intellect with which they are engaged. They consider only their own ideas of ingenuity; and, in searching for anything hidden, advert only to the modes in which they would have hidden it. They are right in this much—that their own ingenuity is a faithful representative of that of the mass: but when the cunning of the individual felon is diverse in character from their own, the felon foils them, of course. This always happens when it is above their own, and very usually when it is below. They have no variation of principle in their investigations; at best, when urged by some unusual emergency by some extraordinary reward—they extend or exaggerate their old modes of practice, without touching their principles. What, for example, in this case of D—, has been done to vary the principle of action? What is all this boring, and probing, and sounding, and scrutinizing with the microscope, and dividing the surface of the building into registered square incheswhat is it all but an exaggeration of the application of the one principle or set of principles of search, which are based upon the one set of notions regarding human ingenuity, to which the Prefect, in the long routine of his duty, has been accustomed? Do you not see he has taken it for granted that all men proceed to conceal a letter,-not exactly in a gimlet-hole bored in a chair-leg-but, at least, in some out-of-theway hole or corner suggested by the same tenor of thought which would urge a man to secrete a letter in a gimlet-hole bored in a chair leg? And do you not see, also, that such recherchés 2 nooks for concealment are adapted only for ordinary occasions and would be adopted only by ordinary intellects; for, in all cases of concealment, a disposal of the article concealed a disposal of it in this recherché manner-is. in the very first instance, presumable and presumed; and thus its discovery depends, not at all upon the acumen, but altogether upon the mere care, patience, and determination of the seekers; and where the case is of importanceor, what amounts to the same thing in the policial eyes, when the reward is of magnitude —the qualities in question have never been known to fail. You will now understand what I meant in suggesting that, had the purloined letter been hidden anywhere within the limits of the Prefect's examination—in other words. had the principle of its concealment been comprehended within the principles of the Prefect its discovery would have been a matter altogether beyond question. This functionary, however, has been thoroughly mystified; and the remote source of his defeat lies in the supposition that the Minister is a fool because he has acquired renown as a poet. All fools are poets; this the Prefect feels; and he is merely guilty of a non distributio medii 3 in thence inferring that all poets are fools."

&lt;sup>1</sup> Rochefoucauld and La Bruyère, French moralists of the seventeenth century; Machiavelli, an Italian statesman of the sixteenth century, celebrated for his open cynicism concerning the morals of statecraft; Campanella, Italian philosopher, born 1568

 &lt;sup>2</sup> carefully sought out, hidden <sup>3</sup> undistributed middle term (of a logical syllogism), causing a fallacious conclusion

"But is this really the poet?" I asked. "There are two brothers, I know; and both have attained reputation in letters. The Minister I believe, has written learnedly on the Differential Calculus. He is a mathematician and no poet "

"You are mistaken; I know him well; he is both. As poet and mathematician he would reason well; as mere mathematician he could not have reasoned at all, and thus would have been at the mercy of the Prefect.'

"You surprise me," I said, "by these opinions, which have been contradicted by the voice of the world. You do not mean to set at naught the well-digested idea of centuries. The mathematical reason has long been regarded as the reason par excellence." 1

"'Il y a à parier,'" replied Dupin, quoting from Chamfort, "'que toute idée publique, toute convention reque, est une sottise, car elle a convenu au plus grand nombre.' 2 The mathematicians, I grant you, have done their best to promulgate the popular error to which you allude, and which is none the less an error for its promulgation as truth. With an art worthy a better cause, for example, they have insinuated the term 'analysis' into application to algebra. The French are the originators of this particular deception: but if a term is of any importance if words derive any value from applicabilitythen 'analysis' conveys 'algebra,' about as much as, in Latin, 'ambitus' implies 'ambition,' 'religio,' 'religion,' or 'homines honesti,' a set of honorable men." 3

"You have a quarrel on hand, I see," said I, "with some of the algebraists of Paris; but proceed."

"I dispute the availability, and thus the value of that reason which is cultivated in any especial form other than the abstractly logical. I dispute, in particular, the reason educed by mathematical study. The mathematics are the science of form and quantity; mathematical reasoning is merely logic applied to observation upon form and quantity. The great error lies in supposing that even the truths of what is called pure algebra are abstract or general truths. And this error is so egregious that I am confounded at the universality with which it has been received. Mathematical axioms are not axioms of general truth. What is true of relation-of form and quantity-is often grossly false in regard to morals, for example. In this latter science it is very usually untrue that the aggregated parts are equal to the whole. In chemistry, also, the axiom fails. In the consideration of motive it fails; for two motives. each of a given value, have not, necessarily, a value, when united, equal to the sum of their values apart. There are numerous other mathematical truths which are only truths within the limits of relation. But the mathematician argues, from his finite truths, through habit, as if they were of an absolutely general applicability —as the world indeed imagines them to be. Bryant, 4 in his very learned 'Mythology,' mentions an analogous source of error, when he says that 'although the Pagan fables are not believed, vet we forget ourselves continually, and make inferences from them as existing realities.' With the algebraists, however, who are Pagans themselves, the 'Pagan fables' are believed and the inferences are made, not so much through lapse of memory as through an unaccountable addling of the brains. In short I never yet encountered the mere mathematician who could be trusted out of equal roots, or one who did not clandestinely hold it as a point of his faith that  $x^2 + px$  was absolutely and unconditionally equal to q. Say to one of these gentlemen, by way of experiment, if you please, that you believe occasions may occur where  $x^2 + px$  is not altogether equal to q, and, having made him understand what you mean, get out of his reach as speedily as convenient, for, beyond doubt, he will endeavor to knock you down.

"I mean to say," continued Dupin, while I merely laughed at his last observations, "that if the Minister had been no more than a mathematician, the Prefect would have been under no necessity of giving me this check. I knew him, however, as both mathematician and poet, and my measures were adapted to his capacity with reference to the circumstances by which he was surrounded. I knew him as courtier, too, and as a bold intriguant. 5 Such a man, I considered, could not fail to be aware of the ordinary policial modes of action. He could not have failed to anticipate—and events have proved that he did not fail to anticipate—the waylayings to which he was subjected. He must have foreseen, I reflected, the secret investigations of his premises. His frequent absences from home at night, which were hailed by the Prefect as certain aids to his success, I regarded only as ruses, to afford opportunity for received convention, is a piece of stupidity, since it has found favor with the majority." Nicholas Chamfort, 1741-1794, was a French writer of thorough search to the police, and thus the sooner to impress them with the conviction to which G-, in fact, did finally arrive.-the conviction that the letter was not upon the premises. I felt, also, that the whole train of thought, which I was at some pains in detailing to you just now concerning the invariable principle of policial action in searches for articles concealed-I felt that this whole train of thought would necessarily pass through the mind of the Minister. It would imperatively lead him to despise all the ordinary nooks of concealment. He could not. I reflected be so weak as not to see that the most intricate and remote recess of his Hotel would be as open as his commonest closets to the eyes, to the probes, to the gimlets, and to the microscopes of the Prefect. I saw, in fine, that he would be driven, as a matter of course, to simplicity, if not deliberately induced to it as a matter of choice. You will remember, perhaps, how desperately the Prefect laughed when I suggested, upon our first interview, that it was just possible this mystery troubled him so much on account of its being so very self-evident."

<sup>1</sup> above all others <sup>2</sup> "It is safe to wager that every common notion, every

<sup>3</sup> Ambitus really means "a going round, office-seeking"; religio may mean "punctiliousness," and homines honest; "distinguished men."

<sup>4</sup> Jacob Bryant, 1715-1804, an English antiquary 5 intriguer

"Yes," said I, "I remember his merriment well. I really thought he would have fallen into convulsions."

"The material world," continued Dupin, "abounds with very strict analogies to the immaterial; and thus some color of truth has been given to the rhetorical dogma, that metaphor, or simile, may be made to strengthen an argument, as well as to embellish a description. The principle of the vis inertiae. 1 for example, seems to be identical in physics and metaphysics. It is not more true in the former, that a large body is with more difficulty set in motion than a smaller one, and that its subsequent momentum is commensurate with this difficulty, than it is, in the latter, that intellects of the vaster capacity, while more forcible, more constant, and more eventful in their movements than those of inferior grade, are yet the less readily moved, and more embarrassed and full of hesitation in the first few steps of their progress. Again: have you ever noticed which of the street signs over the shop doors are the most attractive of attention?"

"I have never given the matter a thought," I said

"There is a game of puzzles," he resumed, "which is played upon a map. One party playing requires another to find a given word,—the name of town, river, state, or empire,—any word, in short, upon the motley and perplexed surface of the chart. A novice in the game generally seeks to embarrass his opponents by giving them the most minutely lettered names; but the adept selects such words as stretch in large characters, from one end of the chart to the other. These, like the over-largely lettered signs and placards of the street, escape observation by dint of being excessively obvious; and here the physical oversight is precisely analogous with the moral inapprehension by which the intellect suffers to pass unnoticed those considerations which are too obtrusively and too palpably self-evident. But this is a point, it appears, somewhat above or beneath the understanding of the Prefect. He never once thought it probable, or possible, that the Minister had deposited the letter immediately beneath the nose of the whole world by way of best preventing any portion of that world from perceiving it.

"But the more I reflected upon the daring, dashing, and discriminating ingenuity of D—; upon the fact that the document must always have been at hand, if he intended to use it to good purpose; and upon the decisive evidence, obtained by the Prefect, that it was not hidden within the limits of that dignitary's ordinary search—the more satisfied I became that, to conceal this letter, the Minister had resorted to the comprehensive and sagacious expedient of not attempting to conceal it at all.

"Full of these ideas, I prepared myself with a pair of green spectacles, and called one fine morning, quite by accident, at the Ministerial Hotel. I found D— at home, yawning, lounging, and dawdling, as usual, and pretending to be in the last extremity of ennui. He is, perhaps, the most really energetic human being now alive—but that is only when nobody sees him.

"To be even with him, I complained of my weak eyes, and lamented the necessity of the spectacles, under cover of which I cautiously and thoroughly surveyed the whole apartment, while seemingly intent only upon the conversation of my host.

"I paid especial attention to a large writingtable near which he sat, and upon which lay confusedly some miscellaneous letters and other papers, with one or two musical instruments and a few books. Here, however, after a long and very deliberate scrutiny, I saw nothing to excite particular suspicion.

"At length my eyes, in going the circuit of the room, fell upon a trumpery filigree card-rack of paste-board, that hung, dangling, by a dirty blue ribbon, from a little brass knob just beneath the middle of the mantelpiece. In this rack, which had three or four compartments, were five or six visiting cards and a solitary letter. This last was much soiled and crumpled. It was torn nearly in two, across the middleas if a design, in the first instance, to tear it entirely up as worthless had been altered, or stayed, in the second. It had a large black seal, bearing the D- cipher very conspicuously, and was addressed, in a diminutive female hand, to D-, the Minister himself. It was thrust carelessly, and even, as it seemed, contemptuously, into one of the upper divisions of the rack.

<sup>1</sup> force of inertia

"No sooner had I glanced at this letter than I concluded it to be that of which I was in search. To be sure, it was, to all appearance, radically different from the one of which the Prefect had read us so minute a description. Here the seal was large and black, with the D-cipher: there it was small and red, with the ducal arms of the S- family. Here, the address, to the Minister, was diminutive and feminine; there, the superscription, to a certain royal personage, was markedly bold and decided: the size alone formed a point of correspondence. But, then, the radicalness of these differences, which was excessive; the dirt; the soiled and torn condition of the paper, so inconsistent with the true methodical habits of D-, and so suggestive of a design to delude the beholder into an idea of the worthlessness of the document; these things, together with the hyper-obtrusive situation of this document. full in the view of every visitor, and thus exactly in accordance with the conclusions to which I had previously arrived; these things, I say, were strongly corroborative of suspicion. in one who came with the intention to suspect.

"I protracted my visit as long as possible. and while I maintained a most animated discussion with the Minister, upon a topic which I knew well had never failed to interest and excite him, I kept my attention really riveted upon the letter. In this examination, I committed to memory its external appearance and arrangement in the rack; and also fell, at length, upon a discovery which set at rest whatever trivial doubt I might have entertained. scrutinizing the edges of the paper. I observed them to be more chafed than seemed necessary. They presented the broken appearance which is manifested when a stiff paper, having been once folded and pressed with a folder, is refolded in a reversed direction, in the same creases or edges which had formed the original fold. This discovery was sufficient. It was clear to me that the letter had been turned, as a glove, inside out, re-directed, and re-sealed. I bade the Minister good-morning, and took my departure at once, leaving a gold snuff-box upon the table.

"The next morning I called for the snuff-box, when we resumed, quite eagerly, the conversation of the preceding day. While thus engaged. however, a loud report, as if of a pistol, was heard immediately beneath the windows of the Hotel, and was succeeded by a series of fearful screams, and the shoutings of a terrified mob. - rushed to a casement, threw it open, and looked out. In the meantime, I stepped to the card-rack, took the letter, put it in my pocket, and replaced it by a facsimile (so far as regards externals) which I had carefully prepared at my lodgings—imitating the D—— cipher very readily by means of a seal formed of bread.

"The disturbance in the street had been occasioned by the frantic behavior of a man with a musket. He had fired it among a crowd of women and children. It proved, however, to have been without ball, and the fellow was suffered to go his way as a lunatic or a drunkard. When he had gone, D—— came from the window. whither I had followed him immediately upon securing the object in view. Soon afterwards I bade him farewell. The pretended lunatic was a man in my own pay."

"But what purpose had you," I asked, "in replacing the letter by a facsimile? Would it not have been better, at the first visit, to have seized it openly and departed?"

"D-," replied Dupin, "is a desperate man, and a man of nerve. His Hotel, too, is not without attendants devoted to his interest. Had I made the wild attempt you suggest. I might never have left the Ministerial presence alive. The good people of Paris might have heard of me no more. But I had an object apart from these considerations. You know my political prepossessions. In this matter I act as a partisan of the lady concerned. For eighteen months the Minister has had her in his power. She has now him in hers-since, being unaware that the letter is not in his possession, he will proceed with his exactions as if it was. Thus will he inevitably commit himself at once to his political destruction. His downfall, too, will not be more precipitate than awkward. It is all very well to talk about the facilis descensus Averni: 1 but in all kinds of climbing, as Catalani 2 said of singing, it is far more easy to get up than to come down. In the present instance I have no &quot;Easy is the descent into Avernus" (the lower regions).

 Vergil, Aenetd, vi, 126.
 Angelica Catalani, a celebrated Italian singer of Poe's time

sympathy—at least no pity—for him who descends. He is that monstrum horrendum, <sup>1</sup> an unprincipled man of genius. I confess, however, that I should like very well to know the precise character of his thoughts, when, being defied by her whom the Prefect terms 'a certain personage,' he is reduced to opening the letter which I left for him in the card-rack."

"How? Did you put anything particular in it?"

"Why—it did not seem altogether right to leave the interior blank—that would have been insulting. D——, at Vienna once, did me an evil turn, which I told him, quite good-humoredly, that I should remember. So, as I knew he would feel some curiosity in regard to the identity of the person who had outwitted him, I thought it a pity not to give him a clew. He is well acquainted with my MS., and I just copied into the middle of the blank sheet the word:—

'—Un dessein si funeste, S'il n'est digne d'Atrée, est digne de Thyeste.<sup>2</sup> They are to be found in Crébillon's <sup>3</sup> Atrée."

184

THE CASK OF AMONTILLADO

(ROME)

The thousand injuries of Fortunato I had borne as I best could; but when he ventured upon insult, I vowed revenge. You, who so well know the nature of my soul, will not suppose, however, that I gave utterance to a threat. At length I would be avenged; this was a point definitively settled—but the very definitiveness with which it was resolved precluded the idea of risk. I must not only punish, but punish with impunity. A wrong is unredressed when retribution overtakes its redresser. It is equally unredressed when the avenger fails to make himself felt as such to him who has done the wrong.

It must be understood that neither by word nor deed had I given Fortunato cause to doubt my good-will. I continued, as was my wont, to smile in his face, and he did not perceive that my smile now was at the thought of his immolation.

He had a weak point—this Fortunato—although in other regards he was a man to be respected and even feared. He prided himself on his connoisseurship in wine. Few Italians have the true virtuoso spirit. For the most part their enthusiasm is adopted to suit the time and opportunity—to practice imposture upon the British and Austrian millionaires. In painting and gemmary, Fortunato, like his countrymen, was a quack—but in the matter of old wines he was sincere. In this respect I did not differ from him materially: I was skilful in the Italian vintages myself, and bought largely whenever I could.

It was about dusk, one evening during the supreme madness of the carnival season, that I encountered my friend. He accosted me with excessive warmth, for he had been drinking much. The man wore motley. He had on a tight-fitting parti-striped dress, and his head was surmounted by the conical cap and bells. I was so pleased to see him that I thought I should never have done wringing his hand.

I said to him, "My dear Fortunato, you are luckily met. How remarkably well you are looking today! But I have received a pipe of what passes for Amontillado, and I have my doubts."

"How?" said he. "Amontillado? A pipe? Impossible. And in the middle of the carnival!"

"I have my doubts," I replied; "and I was silly enough to pay the full Amontillado price without consulting you in the matter. You were not to be found, and I was fearful of losing a bargain."

"Amontillado!"

"I have my doubts."

"Amontillado!"

"And I must satisfy them."

"Amontillado!"

"As you are engaged, I am on my way to Luchesi. If any one has a critical turn, it is he. He will tell me—"

"Luchesi cannot tell Amontillado from Sherry."

"And yet some fools will have it that his taste is a match for your own."

"Come, let us go."

"Whither?"

"To your vaults."

"My friend, no; I will not impose upon your good-nature. I perceive you have an engagement. Luchesi—"

"I have no engagement;—come."

"My friend, no. It is not the engagement, but the severe cold with which I perceive you are afflicted. The vaults are insufferably damp. They are incrusted with niter."

"Let us go, nevertheless. The cold is merely nothing. Amontillado! You have been im-dreadful monster; Aeneid, iii, 658

 "So baleful a design, if not worthy of Atreus, is worthy of Thyestes." These two brothers, according to legend, were both guilty of great crimes

a French tragic poet of the eighteenth century

By permission of The Commercial Photograph Company EDGAR ALLAN POE

posed upon. And as for Luchesi, he cannot distinguish Sherry from Amontillado."

Thus speaking, Fortunato possessed himself of my arm. Putting on a mask of black silk. and drawing a roquelaire 1 closely about my person, I suffered him to hurry me to my palazzo. 2

There were no attendants at home: they had absconded to make merry in honor of the time. I had told them that I should not return until the morning, and had given them explicit orders not to stir from the house. These orders were sufficient. I well knew, to insure their immediate disappearance, one and all, as soon as my back was turned.

I took from their sconces two flambeaus, and giving one to Fortunato, bowed him through several suites of rooms to the archway that led into the vaults. I passed down a long and winding staircase, requesting him to be cautious as he followed. We came at length to the foot of the descent, and stood together on the damp ground of the catacombs of the Montresors.

The gait of my friend was unsteady, and the bells upon his cap jingled as he strode.

"The pipe," said he.

"It is farther on," said I; "but observe the white web-work which gleams from these cavern walls."

He turned towards me, and looked into my eves with two filmy orbs that distilled the rheum of intoxication.

"Niter?" he asked at length.

"Niter," I replied. "How long have you had that cough?"

"Ugh! ugh! ugh! ugh! ugh! ugh! ugh! ugh! ugh!-ugh! ugh! ugh!-ugh! ugh! ugh!"

My poor friend found it impossible to reply for many minutes.

"It is nothing," he said, at last.

"Come," I said, with decision, "we will go back; your health is precious. You are rich. respected, admired, beloved; you are happy, as once I was. You are a man to be missed. For me it is no matter. We will go back; you will be ill, and I cannot be responsible. Besides, there is Luchesi-"

"Enough," he said; "the cough is a mere nothing; it will not kill me. I shall not die of a cough."

"True-true," I replied; "and, indeed, I had no intention of alarming you unnecessarilybut you should use all proper caution. A draught of this Medoc will defend us from the damps."

Here I knocked off the neck of a bottle which I drew from a long row of its fellows that lav upon the mold.

"Drink," I said, presenting him the wine.

He raised it to his lips with a leer. He paused and nodded to me familiarly, while his bells iingled.

"I drink," he said, "to the buried that repose around us."

"And I to your long life."

He again took my arm, and we proceeded.

"These vaults," he said, "are extensive."

"The Montresors," I replied, "were a great and numerous family."

"I forget your arms."

"A huge human foot d'or, in a field azure; 3 the foot crushes a serpent rampant whose fangs are embedded in the heel."

"And the motto?"

"Nemo me imbune lacessit." 4

"Good!" he said.

The wine sparkled in his eyes and the bells jingled. My own fancy grew warm with the Medoc. We had passed through walls of piled bones, with casks and puncheons intermingling, into the inmost recesses of the catacombs. I paused again, and this time I made bold to seize Fortunato by an arm above the elbow.

"The niter!" I said: "see, it increases. It hangs like moss upon the vaults. We are below the river's bed. The drops of moisture trickle among the bones. Come, we will go back ere it is too late. Your cough-"

"It is nothing." he said: "let us go on. But first, another draught of the Medoc."

I broke and reached him a flagon of De Grâve. He emptied it at a breath. His eyes flashed with a fierce light. He laughed and threw the bottle upwards with a gesticulation I did not understand.

I looked at him in surprise. He repeated the movement-a grotesque one.

"You do not comprehend?" he said.

"Not I," I replied.

"Then you are not of the brotherhood."

"How?"

"You are not of the masons."

"Yes, yes," I said, "yes, yes." "You? Impossible! A mason?"

"A mason," I replied.
"A sign," he said.

"It is this," I answered, producing a trowel from beneath the folds of my roquelaire.

"You jest," he exclaimed, recoiling a few paces. "But let us proceed to the Amontillado."

short cloak 2 literally, palace; residence of a person of wealth

&lt;sup>8</sup> golden foot in a blue field <sup>4</sup> "No one challenges me in safety."

"Be it so," I said, replacing the tool beneath the cloak, and again offering him my arm. He leaned upon it heavily. We continued our route in search of the Amontillado. We passed through a range of low arches, descended, passed on, and, descending again, arrived at a deep crypt, in which the foulness of the air caused our flambeaus rather to glow than flame.

At the most remote end of the crypt there appeared another less spacious. Its walls had been lined with human remains, piled to the vault overhead, in the fashion of the great catacombs of Paris. Three sides of this interior crypt were still ornamented in this manner. From the fourth the bones had been thrown down, and lay promiscuously upon the earth, forming at one point a mound of some size. Within the wall thus exposed by the displacing of the bones, we perceived a still interior recess, in depth about four feet, in width three, in height six or seven. It seemed to have been constructed for no especial use within itself. but formed merely the interval between two of the colossal supports of the roof of the catacombs, and was backed by one of their circumscribing walls of solid granite.

It was in vain that Fortunato, uplifting his dull torch, endeavored to pry into the depth of the recess. Its termination the feeble light did not enable us to see.

"Proceed," I said; "herein is the Amontillado. As for Luchesi—"

"He is an ignoramus," interrupted my friend, as he stepped unsteadily forward, while I followed immediately at his heels. In an instant he had reached the extremity of the niche, and finding his progress arrested by the rock, stood stupidly bewildered. A moment more and I had fettered him to the granite. In its surface were two iron staples, distant from each other about two feet, horizontally. From one of these depended a short chain, from the other a padlock. Throwing the links about his waist, it was but the work of a few seconds to secure it. He was too much astounded to resist. Withdrawing the key, I stepped back from the recess.

"Pass your hand," I said, "over the wall; you cannot help feeling the niter. Indeed it is very damp. Once more let me implore you to return. No? Then I must positively leave you. But I must first render you all the little attentions in my power."

"The Amontillado!" ejaculated my friend, not yet recovered from his astonishment.

"True," I replied; "the Amontillado."

As I said these words I busied myself among the pile of bones of which I have before spoken. Throwing them aside, I soon uncovered a quantity of building stone and mortar. With these materials and with the aid of my trowel, I began vigorously to wall up the entrance of the niche.

I had scarcely laid the first tier of the masonry when I discovered that the intoxication of Fortunato had in a great measure worn off. The earliest indication I had of this was a low moaning cry from the depth of the recess. It was not the cry of a drunken man. There was then a long and obstinate silence. I laid the second tier, and the third, and the fourth; and then I heard the furious vibrations of the chain. The noise lasted for several minutes, during which, that I might hearken to it with the more satisfaction. I ceased my labors and sat down upon the bones. When at last the clanking subsided. I resumed the trowel, and finished without interruption the fifth, the sixth, and the seventh tier. The wall was now nearly upon a level with my breast. I again paused, and holding the flambeaus over the mason work, threw a few feeble rays upon the figure within.

A succession of loud and shrill screams, bursting suddenly from the throat of the chained form, seemed to thrust me violently back. For a brief moment I hesitated—I trembled. Unsheathing my rapier, I began to grope with it about the recess; but the thought of an instant reassured me. I placed my hand upon the solid fabric of the catacombs, and felt satisfied. I reapproached the wall. I replied to the yells of him who clamored. I reëchoed—I aided—I surpassed them in volume and in strength. I did this, and the clamorer grew still.

It was now midnight, and my task was drawing to a close. I had completed the eighth, the ninth, and the tenth tier. I had finished a portion of the last and the eleventh; there remained but a single stone to be fitted and plastered in. I struggled with its weight; I placed it partially in its destined position. But now there came from out the niche a low laugh that erected the hairs upon my head. It was succeeded by a sad voice, which I had difficulty in recognizing as that of the noble Fortunato. The voice said—

"Ha! ha! ha!—he! he! he!—a very good joke indeed—an excellent jest. We will have many a rich laugh about it at the palazzo—he! he! he—over our wine—he! he! he!"

"The Amontillado!" I said.

"He! he! he!—he! he! he!—yes, the Amontillado. But is it not getting late? Will not they be awaiting us at the palazzo,—the Lady Fortunato and the rest? Let us be gone."

"Yes," I said, "let us be gone."
"For the love of God, Montresor!"

"Yes," I said, "for the love of God!"

But to these words I hearkened in vain for a reply. I grew impatient. I called aloud—

"Fortunato!"

No answer. I called again-

"Fortunato!"

No answer still. I thrust a torch through the remaining aperture and let it fall within. There came forth in return only a jingling of the bells. My heart grew sick—on account of the dampness of the catacombs. I hastened to make an end of my labor. I forced the last stone into its position; I plastered it up. Against the new masonry I reërected the old rampart of bones. For the half of a century no mortal has disturbed them. In pace requiescat. <sup>1</sup>

1846

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE 1804-1864

Hawthorne was born in Salem, Massachusetts, of an old New England family prominent in the witchcraft days but for some generations afterwards in obscurity. He graduated in 1825 with Longfellow from Bowdoin College, one year later than his friend Franklin Pierce. After the appearance of his first work of fiction, Fanshawe, 1828, he spent several years writing short stories. From 1839 to 1841 he was weigher at the Salem custom house; the following year he spent at Brook Farm, a community of idealists; and in 1842 he married. From 1853 to 1857 he was consul at Liverpool. His home was at various places in Massachusetts, notably at Concord. He died while on a journey with ex-President Pierce, at Plymouth, New Hampshire. His principal works are Twice-Told Tales, 1837; Mosses from an Old Manse, 1846; The Scarlet Letter, 1850; The House of the Seven Gables, 1851; The Blithedale Romance, 1852; The Marble Faun, 1860.

Hawthorne's work is the finest literary expression of New England Puritanism. To give it expression Hawthorne was well prepared, for his ancestry and experience had steeped him in its ideas, its superstitions as well as its vital spirit. No outsider could so sympathize with it and comprehend it, for its psychology was as familiar to him as its severe, solid architecture. The deepest problem with which Puritanism wrestled was also Hawthorne's problem—the mystery, in a world divinely ordered, of the presence and the results of sin. This problem he faced earnestly and continuously throughout his life, ever examining it in some new light, but reaching no conclusion.

Hawthorne stands with Poe high above all previous American writers. His work is original in material and in theme; it is American in scene and in spirit. As a stylist Hawthorne bears comparison with any of his contemporaries writing in English. He is rich and satisfying in suggestion; a robust though refined humor keeps him in balance; and a constant play of fancy, often whimsical and tantalizing and sometimes serious, fills his work. Above all, his work is made vital by an imagination so rich and penetrating as to be a positive, constructive force.

Biography and criticism: J. Hawthorne, N. Hawthorne and His Wife, 1893; H. James, Jr., (EML) 1889; G. E. Woodberry (HKA), (AML), 1902; M. D. Conway (GW); G. W. Curtis (LJ); L. Morris, The Rebellious Puritan, 1927; Stephen (HL 1); More (Shel. 1 and 2); Sherman; C. Van Doren, "The Flower of Puritanism," Nation 111:649-50; W. C. Brownell, "Hawthorne," Scrib. M. 43:69-84; B. Perry, "The Centenary of Hawthorne," Atlan. 94:195-206; see also Sat. R. Lit. 3:727-8, 866, 916.

From TWICE-TOLD TALES

DR. HEIDEGGER'S EXPERIMENT

That very singular man, old Dr. Heidegger, once invited four venerable friends to meet him in his study. There were three white-bearded gentlemen. Mr. Medbourne. Colonel Killigrew, and Mr. Gascoigne, and a withered gentlewoman, whose name was the Widow Wycherly. They were all melancholy old creatures, who had been unfortunate in life, and whose greatest misfortune it was that they were not long ago in their graves. Mr. Medbourne, in the vigor of his age, had been a prosperous merchant, but had lost his all by a frantic speculation, and was now little better than a mendicant. Colonel Killigrew had wasted his best years, and his health and substance, in the pursuit of sinful pleasures which had given birth to a brood of pains, such as the gout, and divers other torments of soul and body. Mr. Gascoigne was a ruined politician, a man of evil fame, or at least had been so, till time had buried him from the knowledge of the present generation, and made him obscure instead of infamous. As for the Widow Wycherly, tradition tells us that she was a great beauty in her day; but, for a long while past, she had lived in deep seclusion, on account of certain scandalous stories which had prejudiced the gentry of the town against her. It is a circumstance worth mentioning, that each of these three old gentlemen, Mr. Medbourne, Colonel Killigrew, and Mr. Gascoigne, were early lovers of the Widow Wycherly, and had once been on the point of cutting each other's throats for her sake. And, before proceeding farther, I will merely hint that Dr. Heidegger and all his four guests were sometimes thought to be a little beside themselves; as is not unfrequently the case with old people, when worried either by present troubles or woful recollections.

<sup>1 &</sup>quot;May he rest in peace."

"My dear old friends," said Dr. Heidegger, motioning them to be seated, "I am desirous of your assistance in one of those little experiments with which I amuse myself here in my study."

If all stories were true, Dr. Heidegger's study must have been a very curious place. It was a dim. old-fashioned chamber, festooned with cobwebs, and besprinkled with antique dust. Around the walls stood several oaken bookcases, the lower shelves of which were filled with rows of gigantic folios and black-letter quartos, and the upper with little parchmentcovered duodecimos. Over the central bookcase was a bronze bust of Hippocrates. 1 with which, according to some authorities, Dr. Heidegger was accustomed to hold consultations in all difficult cases of his practice. In the obscurest corner of the room stood a tall and narrow oaken closet, with its door ajar, within which doubtfully appeared a skeleton. Between two of the bookcases hung a looking-glass, presenting its high and dusty plate within a tarnished gilt frame. Among many wonderful stories related of this mirror, it was fabled that the spirits of all the doctor's deceased patients dwelt within its verge, and would stare him in the face whenever he looked thitherward. The opposite side of the chamber was ornamented with the full-length portrait of a young lady, arrayed in the faded magnificence of silk, satin, and brocade, and with a visage as faded as her dress. Above half a century ago, Dr. Heidegger had been on the point of marriage with this young lady; but, being affected with some slight disorder, she had swallowed one of her lover's prescriptions, and died on the bridal evening. The greatest curiosity of the study remains to be mentioned; it was a ponderous folio volume. bound in black leather, with massive silver clasps. There were no letters on the back and nobody could tell the title of the book. But it was well known to be a book of magic; and once, when a chambermaid had lifted it, merely to brush away the dust, the skeleton had rattled in its closet, the picture of the young lady had stepped one foot upon the floor, and several ghastly faces had peeped forth from the mirror;

while the brazen head of Hippocrates frowned, and said.—"Forbear."

Such was Dr. Heidegger's study. On the summer afternoon of our tale, a small round table, as black as ebony, stood in the center of the room, sustaining a cut-glass vase of beautiful form and elaborate workmanship. The sunshine came through the window, between the heavy festoons of two faded damask curtains, and fell directly across this vase; so that a mild splendor was reflected from it on the ashen visages of the five old people who sat around. Four champagne glasses were also on the table.

"My dear old friends," repeated Dr. Heidegger, "may I reckon on your aid in performing an exceedingly curious experiment?"

Now Dr. Heidegger was a very strange old gentleman, whose eccentricity had become the nucleus for a thousand fantastic stories. Some of these fables, to my shame be it spoken, might possibly be traced back to mine own veracious self; and if any passages of the present tale should startle the reader's faith, I must be content to bear the stigma of a fiction-monger.

When the doctor's four guests heard him talk of his proposed experiment, they anticipated nothing more wonderful than the murder of a mouse in an air-pump, or the examination of a cobweb by the microscope, or some similar nonsense, with which he was constantly in the habit of pestering his intimates. But without waiting for a reply. Dr. Heidegger hobbled across the chamber, and returned with the same ponderous folio, bound in black leather, which common report affirmed to be a book of magic. Undoing the silver clasps, he opened the volume, and took from among its black-letter pages a rose, or what was once a rose, though now the green leaves and crimson petals had assumed one brownish hue, and the ancient flower seemed ready to crumble to dust in the doctor's hands.

"This rose," said Dr. Heidegger, with a sigh, "this same withered and crumbling flower, blossomed five-and-fifty years ago. It was given me by Sylvia Ward, whose portrait hangs yonder; and I meant to wear it in my bosom at our wedding. Five-and-fifty years it has been treasured between the leaves of this old volume. Now, would you deem it possible that this rose of half a century could ever bloom again?"

"Nonsense!" said the Widow Wycherly, with a peevish toss of her head. "You might as well ask whether an old woman's wrinkled face could ever bloom again."

&lt;sup>1</sup> a Greek physician, 460-377 B.C., called the Father of Medicine

"See!" answered Dr. Heidegger.

He uncovered the vase, and threw tne faded rose into the water which it contained. At first, it lay lightly on the surface of the fluid, appearing to imbibe none of its moisture. Soon, however, a singular change began to be visible. The crushed and dried petals stirred, and assumed a deepening tinge of crimson, as if the flower were reviving from a deathlike slumber; the slender stalk and twigs of foliage became green; and there was the rose of half a century, looking as fresh as when Sylvia Ward had first given it to her lover. It was scarcely full blown; for some of its delicate red leaves curled modestly around its moist bosom, within which two or three dewdrops were sparkling.

"That is certainly a very pretty deception," said the doctor's friends; carelessly, however, for they had witnessed greater miracles at a conjurer's show; "pray how was it effected?"

"Did you never hear of the 'Fountain of Youth?'" asked Dr. Heidegger, "which Ponce De Leon, 1 the Spanish adventurer, went in search of two or three centuries ago?"

"But did Ponce De Leon ever find it?" said the Widow Wycherly.

"No," answered Dr. Heidegger, "for he never sought it in the right place. The famous Fountain of Youth, if I am rightly informed, is situated in the southern part of the Floridian peninsula, not far from Lake Macaco. Its source is overshadowed by several gigantic magnolias, which, though numberless centuries old, have been kept as fresh as violets by the virtues of this wonderful water. An acquaintance of mine, knowing my curiosity in such matters, has sent me what you see in the vase."

"Ahem!" said Colonel Killigrew, who believed not a word of the doctor's story; "and what may be the effect of this fluid on the human frame?"

"You shall judge for yourself, my dear Colonel," replied Dr. Heidegger; "and all of you, my respected friends, are welcome to so much of this admirable fluid as may restore to you the bloom of youth. For my own part, having had much trouble in growing old, I am in no hurry to grow young again. With your permission, therefore, I will merely watch the progress of the experiment."

While he spoke, Dr. Heidegger had been filling the four champagne glasses with the water of the Fountain of Youth. It was apparently impregnated with an effervescent gas, for little bubbles were continually ascending from the depths of the glasses, and bursting in silvery spray at the surface. As the liquor diffused a pleasant perfume, the old people doubted not that it possessed cordial and comfortable properties; and, though utter skeptics as to its rejuvenescent power, they were inclined to swallow it at once. But Dr. Heidegger besought them to stay a moment.

"Before you drink, my respectable old friends," said he, "it would be well that, with the experience of a lifetime to direct you, you should draw up a few general rules for your guidance, in passing a second time through the perils of youth. Think what a sin and a shame it would be, if with your peculiar advantages, you should not become patterns of virtue and wisdom to all the young people of the age!"

The doctor's four venerable friends made him no answer, except by a feeble and tremulous laugh; so very ridiculous was the idea, that, knowing how closely repentance treads behind the steps of error, they should ever go astray again.

"Drink, then," said the doctor, bowing: "I rejoice that I have so well selected the subjects of my experiment."

With palsied hands, they raised the glasses to their lips. The liquor, if it really possessed such virtues as Dr. Heidegger imputed to it. could not have been bestowed on four human beings who needed it more wofully. They looked as if they had never known what youth or pleasure was, but had been the offspring of Nature's dotage, and always the gray, decrepit, sapless, miserable creatures, who now sat stooping round the doctor's table, without life enough in their souls or bodies to be animated even by the prospect of growing young again. They drank off the water, and replaced their glasses on the table.

Assuredly there was an almost immediate improvement in the aspect of the party, not unlike what might have been produced by a glass of generous wine, together with a sudden glow of cheerful sunshine brightening over all their visages at once. There was a healthful suffusion on their cheeks, instead of the ashen hue that had made them look so corpse-like. They gazed at one another, and fancied that some magic power had really begun to smooth away the deep and sad inscriptions which Father Time had been so long engraving on their brows. The Widow Wycherly adjusted her cap, for she felt almost like a woman again.

"Give us more of this wondrous water!" cried they, eagerly. "We are younger—but we are still too old! Ouick-give us more!"

&lt;sup>1</sup> the Spanish explorer who discovered Florida, March 27, 1513, while in search of the island wherein was the Fountain of Youth

"Patience, patience!" quoth Dr. Heidegger, who sat watching the experiment with philosophic coolness. "You have been a long time growing old. Surely you might be content to grow young in half an hour! But the water is at your service."

Again he filled their glasses with the liquor of youth, enough of which still remained in the vase to turn half the old people in the city to the age of their own grandchildren. While the bubbles were yet sparkling on the brim, the doctor's four guests snatched their glasses from the table, and swallowed the contents at a single gulp. Was it delusion? Even while the draught was passing down their throats, it seemed to have wrought a change on their whole systems. Their eyes grew clear and bright; a dark shade deepened among their silvery locks, they sat around the table, three gentlemen of middle age, and a woman hardly beyond her buxom prime.

"My dear widow, you are charming!" cried Colonel Killigrew, whose eyes had been fixed upon her face, while the shadows of age were flitting from it like darkness from the crimson daybreak.

The fair widow knew, of old, that Colonel Killigrew's compliments were not always measured by sober truth; so she started up and ran to the mirror, still dreading that the ugly visage of an old woman would meet her gaze. Meanwhile, the three gentlemen behaved in such a manner as proved that the water of the Fountain of Youth possessed some intoxicating qualities; unless, indeed, their exhilaration of spirits were merely a lightsome dizziness caused by the sudden removal of the weight of years. Mr. Gascoigne's mind seemed to run on political topics, but whether relating to the past, present, or future, could not easily be determined, since the same ideas and phrases have been in vogue these fifty years. Now he rattled forth fullthroated sentences about patriotism, national glory, and the people's right; now he muttered some perilous stuff or other, in a sly and doubtful whisper, so cautiously that even his own conscience could scarcely catch the secret; and now again he spoke in measured accents, and a deeply deferential tone, as if a royal ear were listening to his well-turned periods. Colonel Killigrew all this time had been trolling forth a jolly bottle-song, and ringing his glass in symphony with the chorus, while his eyes wandered towards the buxom figure of the Widow Wycherly. On the other side of the table, Mr. Medbourne was involved in a calculation of dollars and cents, with which was strangely intermingled a project for supplying the East Indies with ice, by harnessing a team of whales to the polar icebergs.

As for the Widow Wycherly, she stood before the mirror curtsying and simpering to her own image, and greeting it as the friend whom she loved better than all the world beside. She thrust her face close to the glass, to see whether some long-remembered wrinkle or crow's-foot had indeed vanished. She examined whether the snow had so entirely melted from her hair, that the venerable cap could be safely thrown aside. At last, turning briskly away, she came with a sort of dancing step to the table.

"My dear old doctor," cried she, "pray favor me with another glass!"

"Certainly, my dear madam, certainly!" replied the complaisant doctor; "see! I have already filled the glasses."

There, in fact, stood the four glasses, brimful of this wonderful water, the delicate spray of which, as it effervesced from the surface, resembled the tremulous glitter of diamonds. It was now so nearly sunset that the chamber had grown duskier than ever; but a mild and moonlike splendor gleamed from within the vase, and rested alike on the four guests, and on the doctor's venerable figure. He sat in a high-backed, elaborately carved, oaken arm-chair, with a gray dignity of aspect that might have well befitted that very Father Time whose power had never been disputed save by this fortunate company. Even while quaffing the third draught of the Fountain of Youth, they were almost awed by the expression of his mysterious visage.

But, the next moment, the exhilarating gush of young life shot through their veins. They were now in the happy prime of youth. Age, with its miserable train of cares, and sorrows, and diseases, was remembered only as the trouble of a dream from which they had joyously awoke. The fresh gloss of the soul, so early lost, and without which the world's successive scenes had been but a gallery of faded pictures, again threw its enchantment over all their prospects. They felt like new-created beings in a new-created universe.

"We are young! We are young!" they cried exultingly.

Youth, like the extremity of age, had effaced the strongly-marked characteristics of middle life, and mutually assimilated them all. They were a group of merry youngsters, almost maddened with the exuberant frolicsomeness of their years. The most singular effect of their gayety was an impulse to mock the infirmity and decrepitude of which they had so lately been the victims. They laughed loudly at their old-fashioned attire, the wide-skirted coats and flapped waistcoats of the young men, and the ancient cap and gown of the blooming girl. One limped across the floor like a gouty grandfather: one set a pair of spectacles astride of his nose. and pretended to pore over the black-letter pages of the book of magic; a third seated himself in an arm-chair, and strove to imitate the venerable dignity of Dr. Heidegger. Then all shouted mirthfully, and leaped about the room. The Widow Wycherly-if so fresh a damsel could be called a widow-tripped up to the doctor's chair, with a mischievous merriment in her rosy face.

"Doctor, you dear old soul," cried she, "get up and dance with me!" And then the four young people laughed louder than ever, to think what a queer figure the poor old doctor would cut

"Pray excuse me," answered the doctor quietly. "I am old and rheumatic, and my dancing days were over long ago. But either of these gay young gentlemen will be glad of so pretty a partner."

"Dance with me, Clara!" cried Colonel Killi-grew

"No, no, I will be her partner!" shouted Mr. Gascoigne.

"She promised me her hand, fifty years ago!"

exclaimed Mr. Medbourne.

They all gathered round her. One caught both her hands in his passionate grasp-another threw his arm about her waist-the third buried his hand among the glossy curls that clustered beneath the widow's cap. Blushing, panting, struggling, chiding, laughing, her warm breath fanning each of their faces by turns, she strove to disengage herself, yet still remained in their triple embrace. Never was there a livelier picture of youthful rivalship, with bewitching beauty for the prize. Yet, by a strange deception, owing to the duskiness of the chamber, and the antique dresses which they still wore, the tall mirror is said to have reflected the figures of the three old, gray, withered grandsires, ridiculously contending for the skinny ugliness of a shriveled grandam.

But they were young: their burning passions proved them so. Inflamed to madness by the coquetry of the girl-widow, who neither granted nor quite withheld her favors, the three rivals began to interchange threatening glances. Still keeping hold of the fair prize, they grappled fiercely at one another's throats. As they struggled to and fro, the table was overturned, and the vase dashed into a thousand fragments. The precious Water of Youth flowed in a bright stream across the floor, moistening the wings of a butterfly, which, grown old in the decline of summer, had alighted there to die. The insect fluttered lightly through the chamber, and settled on the snowy head of Dr. Heidegger.

"Come, come, gentlemen!—come, Madame Wycherly," exclaimed the doctor, "I really must protest against this riot."

They stood still, and shivered; for it seemed as if gray Time were calling them back from their sunny youth, far down into the chill and darksome vale of years. They looked at old Dr. Heidegger, who sat in his carved arm-chair, holding the rose of half a century, which he had rescued from among the fragments of the shattered vase. At the motion of his hand, the four rioters resumed their seats; the more readily, because their violent exertions had wearied them, youthful though they were.

"My poor Sylvia's rose!" ejaculated Dr. Heidegger, holding it in the light of the sunset clouds; "it appears to be fading again."

And so it was. Even while the party were looking at it, the flower continued to shrivel up, till it became as dry and fragile as when the doctor had first thrown it into the vase. He shook off the few drops of moisture which clung to its petals.

"I love it as well thus as in its dewy freshness," observed he, pressing the withered rose to his withered lips. While he spoke, the butterfly fluttered down from the doctor's snowy head, and fell upon the floor.

His guests shivered again. A strange chilliness, whether of the body or spirit they could not tell, was creeping gradually over them all. They gazed at one another, and fancied that each fleeting moment snatched away a charm, and left a deepening furrow where none had been before. Was it an illusion? Had the changes of a lifetime been crowded into so brief a space, and were they now four aged people, sitting with their old friend, Dr. Heidegger?

"Are we grown old again, so soon?" cried

they, dolefully.

In truth they had. The Water of Youth possessed merely a virtue more transient than that of wine. The delirium which it created had effervesced away. Yes! they were old again. With a shuddering impulse, that showed her a woman still, the widow clasped her skinny hands before her face, and wished that the coffin lid were over it, since it could be no longer beautiful.

"Yes, friends, ye are old again," said Dr. Heidegger, "and lo! the Water of Youth is all lavished on the ground. Well-I bemoan it not: for if the fountain gushed at my very doorstep. I would not stoop to bathe my lips in itno, though its delirium were for years instead of moments. Such is the lesson ve have taught me !"

But the doctor's four friends had taught no such lesson to themselves. They resolved forthwith to make a pilgrimage to Florida, and quaff at morning, noon, and night, from the Fountain of Youth.

Note.—In an English review, not long since, I have been accused of plagiarizing the idea of this story from a chapter in one of the novels of Alexandre Dumas. There has undoubtedly been a plagiarism on one side or the other; but as my story was written a good deal more than twenty years ago, and as the novel is of considerably more recent date, I take pleasure in thinking that M. Dumas has done me the honor to appropriate one of the fanciful conceptions of my earlier days. He is heartily welcome to it; nor is it the only instance, by many, in which the great French romancer has exercised the privilege of commanding genius by confiscating the intellectual property of less famous people to his own use and behoof.

September, 1860.

From TWICE-TOLD TALES LEGENDS OF THE PROVINCE HOUSE 1

LADY ELEANORE'S MANTLE

Mine excellent friend, the landlord of the Province House, was pleased, the other evening, to invite Mr. Tiffany and myself to an oyster supper. This slight mark of respect and gratitude, as he handsomely observed, was far less than the ingenious tale-teller, and I, the humble note-taker of his narratives, had fairly earned, by the public notice which our joint lucubrations 2 had attracted to his establishment. Many a cigar had been smoked within his premises-many a glass of wine, or more potent aqua vitae, 3 had been quaffed-many a <sup>1</sup> The first four stories of the second series of the Twice-Told Tales have their setting in the old Boston Province House, which stood nearly opposite the Old South Church on Washington Street. This old three-story brick building built by Peter Sergeant, third husband of Sir W. Phipps's widow, was bought in 1716 to be the home of the royal governors of Massachusetts, but in Hawthorne's time was used as an inn. Mr. Thomas Waite, the landlord, and Mr. Bela Tiffany, the elderly lodger, are supposed to have told Hawthorne the lodger, are supposed to have told Hawthorne the legends connected with the place.

2 the Twice-Told Tales

any kind of distilled spirits

dinner had been eaten by curious strangers, who. save for the fortunate conjunction of Mr. Tiffany and me, would never have ventured through that darksome avenue which gives access to the historic precincts of the Province House. In short, if any credit be due to the courteous assurances of Mr. Thomas Waite, we had brought his forgotten mansion almost as effectually into public view as if we had thrown down the vulgar range of shoe shops and dry goods stores which hides its aristocratic front from Washington Street. It may be unadvisable, however, to speak too loudly of the increased custom of the house, lest Mr. Waite should find it difficult to renew the lease on so favorable terms as heretofore.

Being thus welcomed as benefactors, neither Mr. Tiffany nor myself felt any scruple in doing full justice to the good things that were set before us. If the feast were less magnificent than those same paneled walls had witnessed. in a by-gone century,—if mine host presided with somewhat less of state than might have befitted a successor of the royal governors,if the guests made a less imposing show than the bewigged, and powdered, and embroidered dignitaries, who erst banqueted at the gubernatorial table, and now sleep within their armorial tombs on Copp's Hill. 4 or round King's Chapel 5—yet never, I may boldly say, did a more comfortable little party assemble in the Province House, from Queen Anne's days to the Revolution. The occasion was rendered more interesting by the presence of a venerable personage, whose own actual reminiscences went back to the epoch of Gage and Howe, 6 and even supplied him with a doubtful anecdote or two of Hutchinson. 7 He was one of that small. and now all but extinguished class, whose attachment to royalty, and to the colonial institutions and customs that were connected with it, had never yielded to the democratic heresies of after times. The young queen of Britain has not a more loyal subject in her realmperhaps not one who would kneel before her throne with such reverential love-as this old grandsire, whose head has whitened beneath the mild sway of the republic, which still, in his mellower moments, he terms a usurpation. Yet prejudices so obstinate have not made him an ungentle or impracticable companion. If the truth must be told, the life of the aged loyalist

The Copp's Hill burying ground, at the north end of Boston, dates from 1660.
 The first King's Chapel on Tremont Street was built by Andros in 1689; but the present one, on the same site, dates from 1754.

<sup>6</sup> British generals in the Revolutionary War governor of Massachusetts 1771-1774 has been of such a scrambling and unsettled character.—he has had so little choice of friends, and been so often destitute of any,that I doubt whether he would refuse a cup of kindness 1 with either Oliver Cromwell or John Hancock:-to say nothing of any democrat now upon the stage. In another paper of this series. I may perhaps give the reader a closer glimpse of his portrait.

Our host, in due season, uncorked a bottle of Madeira, of such exquisite perfume and admirable flavor, that he surely must have discovered it in an ancient bin, down deep beneath the deepest cellar, where some jolly old butler stored away the Governor's choicest wine, and forgot to reveal the secret on his deathbed. Peace to his red-nosed ghost, and a libation to his memory! This precious liquor was imbibed by Mr. Tiffany with peculiar zest: and after sipping the third glass, it was his pleasure to give us one of the oddest legends which he had yet raked from the storehouse where he keeps such matters. With some suitable adornments from my own fancy, it ran pretty much as follows.

Not long after Colonel Shute 2 had assumed the government of Massachusetts Bay, now nearly a hundred and twenty years ago, a young lady of rank and fortune arrived from England. to claim his protection as her guardian. He was her distant relative, but the nearest who had survived the gradual extinction of her family; so that no more eligible shelter could be found for the rich and high-born Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe than within the Province House of a transatlantic colony. The consort of Governor Shute, moreover, had been as a mother to her childhood, and was now anxious to receive her, in the hope that a beautiful young woman would be exposed to infinitely less peril from the primitive society of New England than amid the artifices and corruptions of a court. If either the Governor or his lady had especially consulted their own comfort, they would probably have sought to devolve the responsibility on other hands; since, with some noble and splendid traits of character, Lady Eleanore was remarkable for a harsh, unyielding pride, a haughty consciousness of her hereditary and personal advantages, which made her almost incapable of control. Judging from many traditionary anecdotes, this peculiar temper was hardly less than a monomania; or, if the acts which it inspired were those of a sane person.

1 Cf. Burns's "Auld Lang Syne."

it seemed due from Providence that pride so sinful should be followed by as severe a retribution. That tinge of the marvelous, which is thrown over so many of these half-forgotten legends, has probably imparted an additional wildness to the strange story of Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe.

The ship in which she came passenger had arrived at Newport, whence Lady Eleanore was conveyed to Boston in the Governor's coach. attended by a small escort of gentlemen on horseback. The ponderous equipage, with its four black horses, attracted much notice as it rumbled through Cornhill, 3 surrounded by the prancing steeds of half a dozen cavaliers, with swords dangling to their stirrups and pistols at their holsters. Through the large glass windows of the coach, as it rolled along, the people could discern the figure of Lady Eleanore, strangely combining an almost queenly stateliness with the grace and beauty of a maiden in her teens. A singular tale had gone abroad among the ladies of the province, that their fair rival was indebted for much of the irresistible charm of her appearance to a certain article of dress-an embroidered mantle-which had been wrought by the most skilful artist in London. and possessed even magical properties of adornment. On the present occasion, however, she owed nothing to the witchery of dress, being clad in a riding habit of velvet, which would have appeared stiff and ungraceful on any other

The coachman reined in his four black steeds. and the whole cavalcade came to a pause in front of the contorted iron balustrade that fenced the Province House from the public street. It was an awkward coincidence that the bell of the Old South 4 was just then tolling for a funeral; so that, instead of a gladsome peal with which it was customary to announce the arrival of distinguished strangers, Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe was ushered by a doleful clang, as if calamity had come embodied in her beautiful person.

"A very great disrespect!" exclaimed Captain Langford, an English officer, who had recently brought dispatches to Governor Shute. "The funeral should have been deferred, lest Lady Eleanore's spirits be affected by such a dismal welcome."

"With your pardon, sir," replied Doctor Clarke, a physician, and a famous champion of the popular party, "whatever the heralds may pretend, a dead beggar must have precedence of a living queen. King Death confers high privileges.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Samuel Shute, governor of Massachusetts, 1716-1727

&lt;sup>2</sup> Hawthorne is here perhaps slightly mistaken. Cornhill was the part of Washington Street north of the Old South Church and of the Province House; not the south part, over which Lady Eleanore would have entered Boston. See Bonner's Map of Poeters. Boston, 1722. the Old South Church

These remarks were interchanged while the speakers waited a passage through the crowd, which had gathered on each side of the gateway, leaving an open avenue to the portal of the Province House. A black slave in livery now leaped from behind the coach, and threw open the door; while at the same moment. Governor Shute descended the flight of steps from his mansion, to assist Lady Eleanore in alighting. But the Governor's stately approach was anticipated in a manner that excited general astonishment. A pale young man, with his black hair all in disorder, rushed from the throng, and prostrated himself beside the coach, thus offering his person as a footstool for Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe to tread upon. She held back an instant, yet with an expression as if doubting whether the young man were worthy to bear the weight of her footstep, rather than dissatisfied to receive such awful reverence from a fellow-mortal.

"Up, sir," said the Governor, sternly, at the same time lifting his cane over the intruder. "What means the bedlamite 1 by this freak?"

"Nay," answered Lady Eleanore playfully, but with more scorn than pity in her tone, "Your Excellency shall not strike him. When men seek only to be trampled upon, it were a pity to deny them a favor so easily granted—and so well deserved!"

Then, though as lightly as a sunbeam on a cloud, she placed her foot upon the cowering form, and extended her hand to meet that of the Governor. There was a brief interval, during which Lady Eleanore retained this attitude; and never, surely, was there an apter emblem of aristocracy and hereditary pride, trampling on human sympathies and the kindred of nature, than these two figures presented at that moment. Yet the spectators were so smitten with her beauty, and so essential did pride seem to the existence of such a creature, that they gave a simultaneous exclamation of applause.

"Who is this insolent young fellow?" inquired Captain Langford, who still remained beside Doctor Clarke. "If he be in his senses, his impertinence demands the bastinado. If mad, Lady Eleanore should be secured from further inconvenience by his confinement."

"His name is Jervase Helwyse," answered the doctor, "a youth of no birth or fortune, or other advantages, save the mind and soul that nature gave him; and being secretary to our colonial agent in London, it was his misfortune to meet this Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe. He loved her—and her scorn has driven him mad."

"He was mad so to aspire," observed the English officer.

"It may be so," said Doctor Clarke, frowning as he spoke. "But I tell you, sir, I could well-nigh doubt the justice of the Heaven above us, if no signal humiliation overtake this lady, who now treads so haughtily into yonder mansion. She seeks to place herself above the sympathies of our common nature, which envelops all human souls. See if that nature do not assert its claim over her in some mode that shall bring her level with the lowest!"

"Never!" cried Captain Langford, indignantly: "neither in life, nor when they lay her with her ancestors."

Not many days afterward the Governor gave a ball in honor of Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe. The principal gentry of the colony received invitations, which were distributed to their residences, far and near, by messengers on horseback, bearing missives sealed with all the formality of official dispatches. In obedience to the summons, there was a general gathering of rank, wealth, and beauty; and the wide door of the Province House had seldom given admittance to more numerous and honorable guests than on the evening of Lady Eleanore's ball. Without much extravagance of eulogy, the spectacle might even be termed splendid; for, according to the fashion of the times, the ladies shone in rich silks and satins, outspread over wide projecting hoops; and the gentlemen glittered in gold embroidery, laid unsparingly upon the purple, or scarlet, or sky-blue velvet, which was the material of their coats and waistcoats. The latter article of dress was of great importance, since it enveloped the wearer's body nearly to the knees, and was perhaps bedizened with the amount of his whole year's income, in golden flowers and foliage. The altered taste of the present day-a taste symbolic of a deep change in the whole system of society-would look upon almost any of those gorgeous figures as ridiculous; although that evening the guests sought their reflections in the pier-glasses, and rejoiced to catch their own glitter amid the glittering crowd. What a pity that one of the stately mirrors has not preserved a picture of the scene, which, by the very traits that were so transitory, might have taught us much that would be worth knowing and remembering!

&lt;sup>1</sup> lunatic (originally an inmate of the hospital of St. Mary of Bethlehem in London where lunatics were confined)

Would, at least, that either painter or mirror could convey to us some faint idea of a garment, already noticed in this legend,—the Lady Eleanore's embroidered mantle,—which the gossips whispered was invested with magic properties, so as to lend a new and untried grace to her figure each time that she put it on! Idle fancy as it is, this mysterious mantle has thrown an awe around my image of her, partly from its fabled virtues, and partly because it was the handiwork of a dying woman, and, perchance, owed the fantastic grace of its conception to the delirium of approaching death.

After the ceremonial greetings had been paid, Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe stood apart from the mob of guests, insulating herself within a small and distinguished circle, to whom she accorded a more cordial favor than to the general throng. The waxen torches threw their radiance vividly over the scene, bringing out its brilliant points in strong relief; but she gazed carelessly, and with now and then an expression of weariness or scorn, tempered with such feminine grace that her auditors scarcely perceived the moral deformity of which it was the utterance. She heheld the spectacle not with vulgar ridicule, as disdaining to be pleased with the provincial mockery of a court festival, but with the deeper scorn of one whose spirit held itself too high to participate in the enjoyment of other human souls. Whether or no the recollections of those who saw her that evening were influenced by the strange events with which she was subsequently connected, so it was that her figure ever after recurred to them as marked by something wild and unnatural, although at the time the general whisper was of her exceeding beauty, and of the indescribable charm which her mantle threw around her. Some close observers, indeed, detected a feverish flush and alternate paleness of countenance, with a corresponding flow and revulsion of spirits, and once or twice, a painful and helpless betrayal of lassitude, as if she were on the point of sinking to the ground. Then, with a nervous shudder, she seemed to arouse her energies, and threw some bright and playful, yet half-wicked sarcasm, into the conversation. There was so strange a characteristic in her manners and sentiments, that it astonished every right-minded listener; till looking in her face, a lurking and incomprehensible glance and smile perplexed them with doubts both as to her seriousness and sanity. Gradually, Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe's circle grew smaller, till only four gentlemen remained in it. These were Captain Langford, the English officer before mentioned; a Virginian planter, who had come to Massachusetts on some political errand; a young Episcopal clergyman, the grandson of a British earl; and, lastly, the private secretary of Governor Shute, whose obsequiousness had won a sort of tolerance from Lady Eleanore.

At different periods of the evening the liveried servants of the Province House passed among the guests, bearing huge trays of refreshments, and French and Spanish wines. Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe, who refused to wet her beautiful lips even with a bubble of champagne, had sunk back into a large damask chair, apparently overwearied either with the excitement of the scene or its tedium; and while, for an instant, she was unconscious of voices, laughter, and music, a young man stole forward, and knelt down at her feet. He bore a salver in his hand, on which was a chased silver goblet, filled to the brim with wine, which he offered as reverentially as to a crowned queen, or rather with the awful devotion of a priest doing sacrifice to his idol. Conscious that some one touched her robe. Lady Eleanore started, and unclosed her eyes upon the pale, wild features and disheveled hair of Jervase Helwyse.

"Why do you haunt me thus?" said she, in a languid tone, but with a kindlier feeling than she ordinarily permitted herself to express. "They tell me that I have done you harm."

"Heaven knows if that be so," replied the young man, solemnly. "But, Lady Eleanore, in requital of that harm, if such there be, and for your own earthly and heavenly welfare, I pray you to take one sip of this holy wine, and then to pass the goblet round among the guests. And this shall be a symbol that you have not sought to withdraw yourself from the chain of human sympathies—which whoso would shake off must keep company with fallen angels."

"Where has this mad fellow stolen that sacramental vessel?" exclaimed the Episcopal clergyman.

This question drew the notice of the guests to the silver cup, which was recognized as appertaining to the communion plate of the Old South Church; and, for aught that could be known, it was brimming over with the consecrated wine.

"Perhaps it is poisoned," half whispered the Governor's secretary.

"Pour it down the villain's throat!" cried the Virginian, fiercely.

"Turn him out of the house!" cried Captain Langford, seizing Jervase Helwyse so roughly by the shoulder that the sacramental cup was overturned, and its contents sprinkled upon Lady Eleanore's mantle. "Whether knave, fool, or bedlamite, it is intolerable that the fellow should go at large."

"Pray, gentlemen, do my poor admirer no harm," said Lady Eleanore, with a faint and weary smile. "Take him out of my sight, if such be your pleasure; for I can find in my heart to do nothing but laugh at him; whereas, in all decency and conscience, it would become me to weep for the mischief I have wrought!"

But while the bystanders were attempting to lead away the unfortunate young man, he broke from them, and with a wild, impassioned earnestness, offered a new and equally strange petition to Lady Eleanore. It was no other than that she should throw off the mantle, which, while he pressed the silver cup of wine upon her, she had drawn more closely around her form, so as almost to shroud herself within it.

"Cast it from you!" exclaimed Jervase Helwyse, clasping his hands in an agony of entreaty. "It may not yet be too late! Give the accursed garment to the flames!"

But Lady Eleanore, with a laugh of scorn, drew the rich folds of the embroidered mantle over her head in such a fashion as to give a completely new aspect to her beautiful face, which—half hidden, half revealed—seemed to belong to some being of mysterious character and purposes.

"Farewell, Jervase Helwyse!" said she. "Keep my image in your remembrance as you behold it now."

"Alas, lady!" he replied, in a tone no longer wild, but sad as a funeral bell. "We must meet shortly, when your face may wear another aspect—and that shall be the image that must abide within me."

He made no more resistance to the violent efforts of the gentlemen and servants, who almost dragged him out of the apartment, and dismissed him roughly from the iron gate of the Province House. Captain Langford, who had been very active in this affair, was returning to the presence of Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe, when he encountered the physician, Doctor Clarke, with whom he had held some casual talk on the day of her arrival. The Doctor stood apart, separated from Lady Eleanore by the width of the room, but eyeing her with such keen sagacity that Captain Langford involuntarily gave him credit for the discovery of some deep secret.

"You appear to be smitten, after all, with the charms of this queenly maiden," said he, hoping thus to draw forth the physician's hidden knowledge.

"God forbid!" answered Doctor Clarke, with a grave smile; "and if you be wise, you will put up the same prayer for yourself. Woe to those who shall be smitten by this beautiful Lady Eleanore! But yonder stands the Governor—and I have a word or two for his private ear. Good night!"

He accordingly advanced to Governor Shute, and addressed him in so low a tone that none of the bystanders could catch a word of what he said; although the sudden change of His Excellency's hitherto cheerful visage betokened that the communication could be of no agreeable import. A very few moments afterwards, it was announced to the guests that an unforeseen circumstance rendered it necessary to put a premature close to the festival.

The ball at the Province House supplied a topic of conversation for the colonial metropolis for some days after its occurrence, and might still longer have been the general theme, only that a subject of all-engrossing interest thrust it, for a time, from the public recollection. This was the appearance of a dreadful epidemic, which, in that age, and long before and afterwards, was wont to slay its hundreds and thousands on both sides of the Atlantic. On the occasion of which we speak it was distinguished by a peculiar virulence, insomuch that it has left its traces—its pitmarks, to use an appropriate figure-on the history of the country, the affairs of which were thrown into confusion by its ravages. 1 At first, unlike its ordinary course, the disease seemed to confine itself to the higher circles of society, selecting its victims from among the proud, the well-born, and the wealthy, entering unabashed into stately chambers, and lying down with the slumberers in silken beds. Some of the most distinguished guests of the Province House-even those whom the haughty Lady Eleanore Rochcliffe had deemed not unworthy of her favor-were stricken by this fatal scourge. It was noticed. with an ungenerous bitterness of feeling, that the four gentlemen—the Virginian, the British officer, the young clergyman, and the Governor's secretary—who had been her most devoted attendants on the evening of the ball were the foremost on whom the plague-stroke fell. But the disease, pursuing its onward progress, soon ceased to be exclusively a prerogative of aristocracy. Its red brand was no longer conferred like a noble's star, or an order of knighthood. It threaded its way through the narrow and crooked streets, and entered the low, mean, darksome dwellings, and laid its hand of death upon the artisans and laboring classes of the town. It compelled rich and poor to feel themselves brethren then; and stalking to and fro across the Three Hills, 1 with a fierceness which made it almost a new pestilence, there was that mighty conqueror—that scourge and horror of our forefathers—the Smallpox!

<sup>1</sup> See Cotton Mather's Diary, pp. 46-48.

We cannot estimate the affright which this plague inspired of vore, by contemplating it as the fangless monster of the present day. We must remember, rather, with what awe we watched the gigantic footsteps of the Asiatic cholera striding from shore to shore of the Atlantic, and marching like destiny upon cities far remote, which flight had already half depopulated. There is no other fear so horrible and unhumanizing as that which makes man dread to breathe heaven's vital air, lest it be poison, or to grasp the hand of a brother or friend, lest the gripe of the pestilence should clutch him. Such was the dismay that now followed in the track of the disease, or ran before it throughout the town. Graves were hastily dug, and the pestilential relics as hastily covered, because the dead were enemies of the living, and strove to draw them headlong, as it were, into their own dismal pit. The public councils were suspended, as if mortal wisdom might relinquish its devices now that an unearthly usurper had found his way into the ruler's mansion. Had an enemy's fleet been hovering on the coast, or his armies trampling on our soil, the people would probably have committed their defense to that same direful conqueror who had wrought their own calamity, and would permit no interference with his sway. This conqueror had a symbol of his triumphs. It was a blood-red flag, that fluttered in the tainted air over the door of every dwelling into which the smallpox had entered.

Such a banner was long since waving over the portal of Province House; for thence, as was proved by tracking its footsteps back, had all this dreadful mischief issued. It had been traced back to a lady's luxurious chamber—to the proudest of the proud—to her that was so delicate, and hardly owned herself of earthly mold—to the haughty one who took her stand above human sympathies—to Lady Eleanore! There remained no room for doubt that the contagion had lurked in that gorgeous mantle, which threw so strange a grace around her at the festival. Its fantastic splendor had been conceived in the delirious brain of a woman on her deathbed, and was the last toil of her stiffening fingers, which had interwoven fate and misery with its golden threads. This dark tale. whispered at first, was now bruited far and wide. The people raved against the Lady Eleanore, and cried out that her pride and scorn had evoked a fiend, and that between them both this monstrous evil had been born. At times their rage and despair took the semblance of grinning mirth; and whenever the red flag of the pestilence was hoisted over another, and yet another door, they clapped their hands and shouted through the streets, in bitter mockery: "Behold a new triumph for the Lady Eleanore!"

One day, in the midst of these dismal times, a wild figure approached the portal of the Province House, and folding his arms. stood contemplating the scarlet banner, which a passing breeze shook fitfully as if to fling abroad the contagion that it typified. At length, climbing one of the pillars by means of the iron balustrade, he took down the flag and entered the mansion, waving it above his head. At the foot of the staircase he met the Governor, booted and spurred, with his cloak drawn around him, evidently on the point of setting forth upon a journey.

"Wretched lunatic, what do you seek here?" exclaimed Shute, extending his cane to guard himself from contact. "There is nothing here but Death. Back—or you will meet him!"

"Death will not touch me, the banner-bearer of the pestilence!" cried Jervase Helwyse, shaking the red flag aloft. "Death and the Pestilence, who wears the aspect of the Lady Eleanore, will walk through the streets tonight, and I must march before them with this banner!"

"Why do I waste words on the fellow?" muttered the governor, drawing his cloak across his mouth. "What matters his miserable life, when none of us are sure of twelve hours' breath?

On, fool, to your own destruction!"

He made way for Jervase Helwyse, who immediately ascended the staircase, but on the first landing-place was arrested by the firm grasp of a hand upon his shoulder. Looking fiercely up, with a madman's impulse to struggle with and rend asunder his opponent, he found himself powerless beneath a calm, stern eye, which possessed the mysterious property of quelling frenzy at its height. The person whom he had now encountered was the physician, Doctor Clarke, the duties of whose sad profession had led him to the Province House, where he was an infrequent guest in more prosperous times.

"Young man, what is your purpose?" demanded he.

Trimountaine was the early name given Boston (Cf. Tremont) because of its conspicuous three-topped hill afterwards named Beacon Hill.

"I seek the Lady Eleanore," answered Jer-vase Helwyse, submissively.

"All have fled from her," said the physician. "Why do you seek her now? I tell you, youth, her nurse fell death-stricken on the threshold of that fatal chamber. Know ye not that never came such a curse to our shores as this lovely Lady Eleanore?—that her breath has filled the air with poison?—that she has shaken pestilence and death upon the land from the folds of her accursed mantle?"

"Let me look upon her!" rejoined the mad youth, more wildly. "Let me behold her, in her awful beauty, clad in the regal garments of the pestilence! She and Death sit on a throne together. Let me kneel down before them!"

"Poor youth!" said Doctor Clarke; and, moved by a deep sense of human weakness, a smile of caustic humor curled his lip even then. "Wilt thou still worship the destroyer, and surround her image with fantasies the more magnificent the more evil she has wrought? Thus man doth ever to his tyrants. Approach, then! Madness, as I have noted, has that good efficacy that it will guard you from contagion—and perchance its own cure may be found in yonder chamber."

Ascending another flight of stairs, he threw open a door and signed to Jervase Helwyse that he should enter. The poor lunatic, it seems probable, had cherished a delusion that his haughty mistress sat in state, unharmed herself by the pestilential influence which, as by enchantment, she scattered round about her. He dreamed, no doubt, that her beauty was not dimmed, but brightened into superhuman splendor. With such anticipations he stole reverentially to the door at which the physician stood, but paused upon the threshold, gazing fearfully into the gloom of the darkened chamber.

"Where is the Lady Eleanore?" whispered he.

"Call her," replied the physician.

"Lady Eleanore!—Princess!—Queen of Death!" cried Jervase Helwyse, advancing three steps into the chamber. "She is not here! There, on yonder table, I behold the sparkle of a diamond which once she wore upon her bosom. There"—and he shuddered—"there hangs her mantle, on which a dead woman embroidered a spell of dreadful potency. But where is the Lady Eleanore?"

Something stirred within the silken curtains of a canopied bed; and a low moan was uttered, which, listening intently, Jervase Helwyse began to distinguish as a woman's voice, complaining dolefully of thirst. He fancied even that he recognized its tones.

"My throat!—my throat is scorched," murmured the voice. "A drop of water!"

"What thing art thou?" said the brainstricken youth, drawing near the bed and tearing asunder its curtains. "Whose voice hast thou stolen for thy murmurs and miserable petitions, as if Lady Eleanore could be conscious of mortal infirmity? Fie! Heap of diseased mortality, why lurkest thou in my lady's chamber?"

"Oh, Jervase Helwyse," said the voice—and as it spoke the figure contorted itself, struggling to hide its blasted face—"look not now on the woman you once loved! The curse of Heaven hath stricken me, because I would not call man my brother. nor woman sister. I wrapt myself in pride as in a Mantle, and scorned the sympathies of nature; and therefore has nature made this wretched body the medium of a dreadful sympathy. You are avenged—they are all avenged—nature is avenged—for I am Eleanore Rochcliffe!"

The malice of his mental disease, the bitterness lurking at the bottom of his heart, mad as he was, for a blighted and ruined life, and love that had been paid with cruel scorn, awoke within the breast of Jervase Helwyse. He shook his finger at the wretched girl, and the chamber echoed, the curtains of the bed were shaken, with his outburst of insane merriment.

"Another triumph for the Lady Eleanore!" he cried. "All have been her victims! Who so worthy to be the final victim as herself?"

Impelled by some new fantasy of his crazed intellect, he snatched the fatal mantle, and rushed from the chamber and the house. That night a procession passed by torch-light through the streets, bearing in the midst the figure of a woman enveloped with a richly embroidered mantle: while in advance stalked Jervase Helwyse, waving the red flag of the pestilence. Arriving opposite the Province House, the mob burned the effigy, and a strong wind came and swept away the ashes. It was said that from that very hour the pestilence abated, as if its sway had some mysterious connection, from the first plague-stroke to the last, with Lady Eleanore's mantle. A remarkable uncertainty broods over that unhappy lady's fate. There is a belief, however, that, in a certain chamber of this mansion, a female form may sometimes be duskily discerned, shrinking into the darkest corner, and muffling her face within an embroidered mantle. Supposing the legend true, can this be other than the once proud Lady Eleanore?

Mine host, and the old loyalist, and I, bestowed no little warmth of applause upon this narrative, in which we had all been deeply interested; for the reader can scarcely conceive how unspeakably the effect of such a tale is heightened when, as in the present case, we may repose perfect confidence in the veracity of him who tells it. For my own part, knowing how scrupulous is Mr. Tiffany to settle the foundation of his facts. I could not have believed him one whit the more faithfully had he professed himself an eve-witness of the doings and sufferings of poor Lady Eleanore. Some skeptics, it is true, might demand documentary evidence, or even require him to produce the embroidered mantle, forgetting that-Heaven be praised-it was consumed to ashes. But now the old loyalist, whose blood was warmed by the good cheer, began to talk, in his turn, about the traditions of the Province House, and hinted that he, if it were agreeable, might add a few reminiscences to our legendary stock. Mr. Tiffany, having no cause to dread a rival, immediately besought him to favor us with a specimen: my own entreaties, of course, were urged to the same effect: and our venerable guest, well pleased to find willing auditors, awaited only the return of Mr. Thomas Waite, who had been summoned forth to provide accommodation for several new arrivals. Perchance the publicbut be this as its own caprice and ours shall settle the matter-may read the result in another Tale of the Province House.

1842

From MOSSES FROM AN OLD MANSE THE OLD MANSE 1

Between two tall gateposts of rough-hewn stone (the gate itself having fallen from its hinges at some unknown epoch) we beheld the gray front of the old parsonage terminating

Back some distance from the street, and surrounded by great elms, there still stands, in -Concord, Mass., the Old Manse, or parsonage, first built by the Rev. William Emerson in 1765, and occupied by Emerson during one year (1834-35) and by Hawthorne during the first three years (1842-45) of his married life. The friends that occasionally entered this "Paradise," as the Hawthornes named it, included George S. Hillard, the Boston lawyer and journalist; William Ellery Channing, a poet and journalist, the nephew of the more famous William Ellery Channing; Margaret Fuller: Horatio Bridge, of the U. S. navy, whose Journal of an African Cruiser Hawthorne edited; Franklin Pierce, later President of the United States; and Thoreau and Emerson. From the upstairs study at the rear, in which Emerson had written Nature, and where Hawthorne wrote the Mosses, there can be seen the river where Hawthorne and Emerson skated together, and the Concord Bridge, where was shed almost the first blood in the Revolution. The essay descriptive of the manse was written last to introduce the stories and essays—some of them written much earlier—which make up the book called Mosses from an Old Manse.

the vista of an avenue of black ash trees. It was now a twelvemonth since the funeral procession of the venerable clergyman, its last inhabitant, had turned from that gateway towards the village burying ground. The wheeltrack leading to the door as well as the whole breadth of the avenue, was almost overgrown with grass, affording dainty mouthfuls to two or three vagrant cows, and an old white horse who had his own living to pick up along the The glimmering shadows that lay roadside. half asleep between the door of the house and the public highway were a kind of spiritual medium, seen through which the edifice had not quite the aspect of belonging to the material world. Certainly it had little in common with those ordinary abodes which stand so imminent upon the road that every passer-by can thrust his head, as it were, into the domestic circle. From these quiet windows the figures of passing travelers looked too remote and dim to disturb the sense of privacy. In its near retirement and accessible seclusion it was the very spot for the residence of a clergyman,-a man not estranged from human life, yet enveloped, in the midst of it, with a veil woven of intermingled gloom and brightness. It was worthy to have been one of the time-honored parsonages of England in which, through many generations, a succession of holy occupants pass from youth to age, and bequeath each an inheritance of sanctity to pervade the house and hover over it as with an atmosphere.

Nor, in truth, had the Old Manse ever been profaned by a lay occupant until that memorable summer afternoon when I entered it as my home. A priest had built it; a priest had succeeded to it; other priestly men from time to time had dwelt in it; and children born in its chambers had grown up to assume the priestly character. It was awful to reflect how many sermons must have been written there. The latest inhabitant alone—he by whose translation to paradise the dwelling was left vacant had penned nearly three thousand discourses. besides the better, if not the greater, number that gushed living from his lips. How often, no doubt, had he paced to and fro along the avenue, attuning his meditations to the sighs and gentle murmurs and deep and solemn peals of the wind among the lofty tops of the trees! In that variety of natural utterances he could find something accordant with every passage of his sermon, were it of tenderness or reverential fear. The boughs over my head seemed shadowy with solemn thoughts as well as with rustling leaves. I took shame to myself for having been so long a writer of idle stories, and ventured to hope that wisdom would descend upon me with the falling leaves of the avenue, and that I should light upon an intellectual treasure in the Old Manse well worth those hoards of long-hidden gold which people seek for in moss-grown houses. Profound treatises of morality: a layman's unprofessional. and therefore unprejudiced, views of religion: histories (such as Bancroft 1 might have written had he taken up his abode here as he once proposed) bright with picture, gleaming over a depth of philosophic thought.—these were the works that might fitly have flowed from such a retirement. In the humblest event, I resolved at least to achieve a novel that should evolve some deep lesson and should possess physical substance enough to stand alone.

In furtherance of my design, and as if to leave me no pretext for not fulfilling it, there was in the rear of the house the most delightful little nook of a study that ever afforded its snug seclusion to a scholar. It was here that Emerson wrote Nature; for he was then an inhabitant of the Manse, and used to watch the Assyrian dawn and Paphian sunset 2 and moonrise from the summit of our eastern hill. When I first saw the room its walls were blackened with the smoke of unnumbered years and made still blacker by the grim prints of Puritan ministers that hung around. These worthies looked strangely like bad angels, or at least like men who had wrestled so continually and so sternly with the devil that somewhat of his sooty fierceness had been imparted to their own visages. They had all vanished now; a cheerful coat of paint and golden tinted paper-hangings lighted up the small apartment; while the shadow of a willow tree that swept against the overhanging eaves attempered the cheery western sunshine. In place of the grim prints there was the sweet and lovely head of one of Raphael's Madonnas and two pleasant little pictures of the Lake of Como. The only other decorations were a purple vase of flowers, always fresh, and a bronze one containing graceful ferns. My books (few, and by no means choice; for they were chiefly such waifs as chance had thrown in my way) stood in order about the room, seldom to be disturbed.

The study had three windows, set with little old-fashioned panes of glass, each with a crack across it. The two on the western side looked, or rather peeped between the willow branches. down into the orchard, with glimpses of the river through the trees. The third, facing northward, commanded a broader view of the river, at a spot where its hitherto obscure waters gleam forth into the light of history. It was at this window that the clergyman who then dwelt in the Manse stood watching the outbreak of a long and deadly struggle between two nations; he saw the irregular array of his parishioners on the farther side of the river and the glittering line of the British on the hither bank. He awaited, in an agony of suspense, the rattle of the musketry. It came; and there needed but a gentle wind to sweep the battle smoke around this quiet house.

Perhaps the reader, whom I cannot help considering as my guest in the Old Manse and entitled to all courtesy in the way of sightshowing,—perhaps he will choose to take a nearer view of the memorable spot. We stand now on the river's brink. It may well be called the Concord, the river of peace and quietness; for it is certainly the most unexcitable and sluggish stream that ever loitered imperceptibly towards its eternity—the sea. Positively I had lived three weeks beside it before it grew quite clear to my perception which way the current flowed. It never has a vivacious aspect except when a northwestern breeze is vexing its surface on a sunshiny day. From the incurable indolence of its nature, the stream is happily incapable of becoming the slave of human ingenuity, as is the fate of so many a wild. free mountain torrent. While all things else are compelled to subserve some useful purpose, it idles its sluggish life away in lazy liberty. without turning a solitary spindle or affording even water power enough to grind the corn that grows upon its banks. The torpor of its movement allows it nowhere a bright, pebbly shore, nor so much as a narrow strip of glistening sand. in any part of its course. It slumbers between broad prairies, kissing the long meadow grass, and bathes the overhanging boughs of elder bushes and willows or the roots of elms and ash trees and clumps of maples. Flags and rushes grow along its plashy shore; the yellow water lily spreads its broad, flat leaves on the margin; and the fragrant white pond-lily abounds, generally selecting a position just so far from the river's brink that it cannot be grasped save at the hazard of plunging in.

It is a marvel whence this perfect flower derives its loveliness and perfume, springing as it does from the black mud over which the river sleeps, and where lurk the slimy eel, and

George Bancroft, American historian, 1800-1891
 Emerson says in Nature, "Give me health and a day, and I will make the pomp of emperors ridiculous. The dawn is my Assyria; the sunset and moonrise my Paphos, and unimaginable realms of faerie." Paphos was a city in western Cyprus notable as a site of the worship of Venus.

speckled frog, and the mud turtle, whom continual washing cannot cleanse. It is the very same black mud out of which the yellow lily sucks its obscene life and noisome odor. Thus we see, too, in the world that some persons assimilate only what is ugly and evil from the same moral circumstances which supply good and beautiful results—the fragrance of celestial flowers—to the daily life of others.

The reader must not, from any testimony of mine. contract a dislike towards our slumberous stream. In the light of a calm and golden sunset it becomes lovely beyond expression; the more lovely for the quietude that so well accords with the hour, when even the wind, after blustering all day long, usually hushes itself to rest. Each tree and rock and every blade of grass is distinctly imaged, and, however unsightly in reality, assumes ideal beauty in the reflection. The minutest things of earth and the broad aspect of the firmament are pictured equally without effort and with the same felicity of success. All the sky glows downward at our feet; the rich clouds float through the unruffled bosom of the stream like heavenly thoughts through a peaceful heart. We will not, then, malign our river as gross and impure while it can glorify itself with so adequate a picture of the heaven that broods above it; or, if we remember its tawny hue and the muddiness of its bed. let it be a symbol that the earthliest human soul has an infinite spiritual capacity and may contain the better world within its depths. But. indeed, the same lesson might be drawn out of any mud puddle in the streets of a city; and. being taught us everywhere, it must be true.

Come, we have pursued a somewhat devious track in our walk to the battle-ground. Here we are, at the point where the river was crossed by the old bridge, the possession of which was the immediate object of the contest. On the hither side grow two or three elms, throwing a wide circumference of shade, but which must have been planted at some period within the threescore years and ten that have passed since the battle day. On the farther shore, overhung by a clump of elder bushes, we discern the stone abutment of the bridge. Looking down into the river, I once discovered some heavy fragments of the timbers, all green with half a century's growth of water moss; for during that length of time the tramp of horses and human footsteps have ceased along this ancient highway. The stream has here about the breadth of twenty strokes of a swimmer's arm-a space not too wide when the bullets were whistling across. Old people who dwell hereabouts will point out the very spots on the western bank where our countrymen fell down and died; and on this side of the river an obelisk of granite has grown up from the soil that was fertilized with British blood. The monument, not more than twenty feet in height, is such as it befitted the inhabitants of a village to erect in illustration of a matter of local interest rather than what was suitable to commemorate an epoch of national history. Still, by the fathers of the village this famous deed was done; and their descendants might rightfully claim the privilege of building a memorial.

A humbler token of the fight, yet a more interesting one than the granite obelisk, may be seen close under the stone wall which separates the battle-ground from the precincts of the parsonage. It is the grave—marked by a small. mossgrown fragment of stone at the head and another at the foot—the grave of two British soldiers who were slain in the skirmish, and have ever since slept peacefully where Zechariah Brown and Thomas Davis buried them. Soon was their warfare ended: a weary night march from Boston, a rattling volley of musketry across the river, and then these many years of rest. In the long procession of slain invaders who passed into eternity from the battle-fields of the Revolution, these two nameless soldiers led the way.

Lowell, the poet, as we were once standing over this grave, told me a tradition in reference to one of the inhabitants below. The story has something deeply impressive, though its circumstances cannot altogether be reconciled with probability. A youth in the service of the clergyman happened to be chopping wood, that April morning, at the back door of the Manse. and when the noise of battle rang from side to side of the bridge he hastened across the intervening field to see what might be going forward. It is rather strange, by the way, that this lad should have been so diligently at work when the whole population of town and country were startled out of their customary business by the advance of the British troops. Be that as it might, the tradition says that the lad now left his task and hurried to the battle-field with the axe still in his hand. The British had by this time retreated, the Americans were in pursuit; and the late scene of strife was thus deserted by both parties. Two soldiers lay on the ground -one was a corpse; but, as the young New Englander drew nigh, the other Briton raised himself painfully upon his hands and knees and gave a ghastly stare into his face. The boy,—it must have been a nervous impulse, without purpose, without thought, and betokening a sensitive and impressible nature rather than a hardened one,—the boy uplifted his axe and dealt the wounded soldier a fierce and fatal blow upon the head.

I could wish that the grave might be opened; for I would fain know whether either of the skeleton soldiers has the mark of an axe in his skull. The story comes home to me like truth. Oftentimes, as an intellectual and moral exercise, I have sought to follow that poor youth through his subsequent career, and observe how his soul was tortured by the blood stain, contracted as it had been before the long custom of war had robbed human life of its sanctity and while it still seemed murderous to slay a brother man. This one circumstance has borne more fruit for me than all that history tells us of the fight.

Many strangers come in the summer time to view the battle-ground. For my own part, I have never found my imagination much excited by this or any other scene of historic celebrity; nor would the placid margin of the river have lost any of its charm for me had men never fought and died there. There is a wilder interest in the tract of land-perhaps a hundred vards in breadth-which extends between the battle-field and the northern face of our Old Manse with its contiguous avenue and orchard. Here, in some unknown age, before the white man came, stood an Indian village, convenient to the river, whence its inhabitants must have drawn so large a part of their subsistence. The site is identified by the spear and arrow heads, the chisels, and other implements of war, labor, and the chase, which the plow turns up from the soil. You see a splinter of stone, half hidden beneath a sod; it looks like nothing worthy of note; but, if you have faith enough to pick it up, behold a relic! Thoreau, who has a strange faculty of finding what the Indians have left behind them, first set me on the search; and I afterwards enriched myself with some very perfect specimens, so rudely wrought that it seemed almost as if chance had fashioned them. Their great charm consists in this rudeness and in the individuality of each article, so different from the productions of civilized machinery, which shapes everything on one pattern. There is exquisite delight, too, in picking up for one's self an arrow head that was dropped centuries ago and has never been handled since, and which we thus receive directly from the hand of the red hunter, who purposed to shoot it at his game or at an enemy. Such an incident builds up again the Indian village and its encircling forest, and recalls to life the painted chiefs and warriors, the squaws at their household toil, and the children sporting among the wigwams, while the little wind-rocked papoose swings from the branch of a tree. It can hardly be told whether it is a joy or a pain, after such a momentary vision, to gaze around in the broad daylight of reality and see stone fences, white houses, potato fields, and men doggedly hoeing in their shirt sleeves and homespun pantaloons. But this is nonsense. The Old Manse is better than a thousand wigwams.

The Old Manse! We had almost forgotten it, but will return thither through the orchard. This was set out by the last clergyman, in the decline of his life, when the neighbors laughed at the hoary-headed man for planting trees from which he could have no prospect of gathering fruit. Even had that been the case, there was only so much the better motive for planting them, in the pure and unselfish hope of benefiting his successors,—an end so seldom achieved by more ambitious efforts. But the old minister, before reaching his patriarchal age of ninety. ate the apples from this orchard during many years, and added silver and gold to his annual stipend by disposing of the superfluity. It is pleasant to think of him walking among the trees in the quiet afternoons of early autumn and picking up here and there a windfall, while he observes how heavily the branches are weighed down, and computes the number of empty flour barrels that will be filled by their burden. He loved each tree, doubtless, as if it had been his own child. An orchard has a relation to mankind, and readily connects itself with matters of the heart. The trees possess a domestic character; they have lost the wild nature of their forest kindred, and have grown humanized by receiving the care of man as well as by contributing to his wants. There is so much individuality of character, too, among apple trees that it gives them an additional claim to be the objects of human interest. One is harsh and crabbed in its manifestations; another gives us fruit as mild as charity. One is churlish and illiberal, evidently grudging the few apples that it bears; another exhausts itself in freehearted benevolence. The variety of grotesque shapes into which apple trees contort themselves has its effect on those who get acquainted with them: they stretch out their crooked branches, and take such hold of the imagination that we remember them as humorists and odd fellows. And what is more melancholy than the old apple trees that linger about the spot where once stood a homestead, but where there is now only a ruined chimney rising out of a grassy and weedgrown cellar? They offer their fruit to every wayfarer,—apples that are bitter sweet with the moral of Time's vicissitude.

I have met with no other such pleasant trouble in the world as that of finding myself. with only the two or three mouths which it was my privilege to feed, the sole inheritor of the old clergyman's wealth of fruits. Throughout the summer there were cherries and currents: and then came autumn, with his immense burden of apples, dropping them continually from his overladen shoulders as he trudged along. In the stillest afternoon, if I listened, the thump of a great apple was audible, falling without a breath of wind, from the mere necessity of perfect ripeness. And, besides, there were pear trees, that flung down bushels upon bushels of heavy pears; and peach trees, which, in a good year, tormented me with peaches, neither to be eaten nor kept, nor, without labor and perplexity, to be given away. The idea of an infinite generosity and exhaustless bounty on the part of our mother Nature was well worth obtaining through such cares as these. That feeling can be enjoyed in perfection only by the natives of summer islands where the breadfruit, the cocoa, the palm and the orange grow spontaneously and hold forth the ever-ready meal: but likewise almost as well by a man long habituated to city life, who plunges into such a solitude as that of the Old Manse, where he plucks the fruit of trees that he did not plant, and which therefore, to my heterodox taste, bear the closest resemblance to those that grew in Eden. It has been an apothegm these five thousand years, that toil sweetens the bread it earns. For my part, (speaking from hard experience, acquired while belaboring the rugged furrows of Brook Farm 1), I relish best the free gifts of Providence.

Not that it can be disputed that the light toil requisite to cultivate a moderately-sized garden imparts such zest to kitchen vegetables as is never found in those of the market gardener. Childless men, if they would know something of the bliss of paternity, should plant a seed,—be it squash, bean, Indian corn, or perhaps a mere flower or worthless weed,—should plant it with their own hands, and nurse it from infancy to maturity altogether by their own care. If there be not too many of them, each individual plant becomes an object of separate interest. My garden, that skirted the avenue of the Manse. was of precisely the right extent. An hour or two of morning labor was all that it required. But I used to visit and revisit it a dozen times a day, and stand in deep contemplation over my vegetable progeny with a love that nobody could share or conceive of, who had never taken part in the process of creation. It was one of the most bewitching sights in the world to observe a hill of beans thrusting aside the soil, or a row of early peas just peeping forth sufficiently to trace a line of delicate green. Later in the season the humming-birds were attracted by the blossoms of a peculiar variety of bean; and they were a joy to me, those little spiritual visitants, for deigning to sip airy food out of my nectar cups. Multitudes of bees used to bury themselves in the yellow blossoms of the summer squashes. This, too, was a deep satisfaction; although, when they had laden themselves with sweets, they flew away to some unknown hive, which would give back nothing in requital of what my garden had contributed. But I was glad thus to fling a benefaction upon the passing breeze with the certainty that somebody must profit by it, and that there would be a little more honey in the world to allay the sourness and bitterness which mankind is always complaining of. Yes, indeed; my life was the sweeter for that honey.

Speaking of summer squashes, I must say a word of their beautiful and varied forms. They presented an endless diversity of urns and vases, shallow or deep, scalloped or plain, moulded in patterns which a sculptor would do well to copy, since Art has never invented any thing more graceful. A hundred squashes in the garden were worthy, in my eyes at least, of being rendered indestructible in marble. If ever Providence (but I know it never will) should assign me a superfluity of gold, part of it shall be expended for a service of plate, or most delicate porcelain, to be wrought into the shapes of summer squashes gathered from vines which I will plant with my own hands. As dishes for containing vegetables, they would be peculiarly appropriate.

But not merely the squeamish love of the beautiful was gratified by my toil in the kitchen garden. There was a hearty enjoyment, likewise, in observing the growth of the crooknecked winter squashes, from the first little bulb, with the withered blossom adhering to it, until they lay strewn upon the soil, big, round fellows, hiding their heads beneath the leaves, but turning up their great yellow rotundities to the noontide sun. Gazing at them, I felt that by my agency something worth living for had been done. A new substance was born into the world. They were real and tangible existences, which the mind could seize hold of and rejoice in. A cabbage, too,—especially the early Dutch cabbage, which swells to a monstrous circumference, until its ambitious heart often bursts asunder,—is a matter to be proud of when we can claim a share with the earth and sky in producing it. But after all, the hugest pleasure is reserved until these vegetable children of ours are smoking on the table, and we, like Saturn, make a meal of them.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Brook Farm in West Roxbury, Mass., was the scene of an attempt on the part of a group of philosophers to solve the problems of life by the establishment of an ideal community. Hawthorne remained there some months, and like the other enthusiasts did hard manual work on the farm.

What with the river, the battle-field, the orchard and the garden, the reader begins to despair of finding his way back into the Old Manse. But, in agreeable weather, it is the truest hospitality to keep him out of doors. I never grew quite acquainted with my habitation till a long spell of sulky rain had confined me beneath its roof. There could not be a more somber aspect of external nature than as then seen from the windows of my study. The great willow tree had caught and retained among its leaves a whole cataract of water, to be shaken down at intervals by the frequent gusts of wind. All day long, and for a week together, the rain was drip-drip-dripping and splash-splash-splashing from the eaves and bubbling and foaming into the tubs beneath the spouts. The old, unpainted shingles of the house and out buildings were black with moisture; and the mosses of ancient growth upon the walls looked green and fresh, as if they were the newest things and afterthought of Time. The usually mirrored surface of the river was blurred by an infinity of raindrops; the whole landscape had a completely water-soaked appearance, conveying the impression that the earth was wet through like a sponge; while the summit of a wooded hill, about a mile distant, was enveloped in a dense mist, where the demon of the tempest seemed to have his abiding-place and to be plotting still direr inclemencies.

Nature has no kindness, no hospitality, during a rain. In the fiercest heat of sunny days she retains a secret mercy, and welcomes the wayfarer to shady nooks of the woods whither the sun cannot penetrate; but she provides no shelter against her storms. It makes us shiver to think of those deep, umbrageous recesses, those overshadowing banks, where we found such enjoyment during the sultry afternoons. Not a twig of foliage there but would dash a little shower into our faces. Looking reproachfully towards the impenetrable sky,—if sky there be above that dismal uniformity of cloud, —we are apt to murmur against the whole system of the universe, since it involves the extinction of so many summer days in so short a life by the hissing and spluttering rain. In such spells of weather—and it is to be supposed such weather came—Eve's bower in paradise must have been but a cheerless and aguish kind of shelter, nowise comparable to the old parsonage, which had resources of its own to beguile the week's imprisonment. The idea of sleeping on a couch of wet roses!

Happy the man who in a rainy day can betake himself to a huge garret, stored, like that of the Manse with lumber that each generation has left behind it from a period before the revolution. Our garret was an arched hall, dimly illuminated through small and dusty windows: it was but a twilight at the best, and there were nooks, or rather caverns, of deep obscurity, the secrets of which I never learned. being too reverent of their dust and cobwebs. The beams and rafters roughly hewn and with strips of bark still on them and the rude masonry of the chimneys, made the garret look wild and uncivilized,-an aspect unlike what was seen elsewhere in the quiet and decorous old house. But on one side there was a little whitewashed apartment, which bore the traditionary title of the Saint's Chamber, because holy men in their youth had slept, and studied, and prayed there. With its elevated retirement, its one window, its small fireplace, and its closet convenient for an oratory, 1 it was the very spot where a young man might inspire himself with solemn enthusiasm and cherish saintly dreams. The occupants, at various epochs, had left brief records and ejaculations inscribed upon the walls. There, too, hung a tattered and shriveled roll of canvas, which on inspection proved to be the forcibly wrought picture of a clergyman, in wig, band, and gown. holding a Bible in his hand. As I turned his face towards the light he eyed me with an air of authority such as men of his profession seldom assume in our days. The original 2 had been pastor of the parish more than a century ago, a friend of Whitefield, and almost his equal in fervid eloquence. I bowed before the effigy of the dignified divine, and felt as if I had now met face to face with the ghost by whom, as there was reason to apprehend, the Manse was haunted.

Houses of any antiquity in New England are so invariably possessed with spirits that the matter seems hardly worth alluding to. Our ghost used to heave deep sighs in a particular corner of the parlor, and sometimes rustled paper, as if he were turning over a sermon in the long upper entry-where nevertheless he was invisible, in spite of the bright moonshine that fell through the eastern window. Not improbably he wished me to edit and publish a selection from a chest full of manuscript discourses that stood in the garret. Once, while Hillard and other friends sat talking with us in the twilight, there came a rustling noise as of a minister's silk gown, sweeping through the very midst of the company, so closely as almost to brush against the chairs. Still there was nothing visible. A vet stranger business was that of a ghostly servant maid, who used to be heard in the kitchen at deepest midnight, grinding coffee, cooking, ironing,-performing, in short, all kinds of domestic labor,-although no traces of anything accomplished could be detected the next morning. Some neglected duty of her servitude-some ill-starched ministerial band-disturbed the poor damsel in her grave and kept her at work without any wages.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a small private chapel for prayer
<sup>2</sup> Very possibly Dr. Bliss, predecessor to Rev. William Emerson, grandfather of Ralph Waldo Emerson; George Whitefield, 1714-1770, was one of the founders of Methodism.

But to return from this digression. A part of my predecessor's library was stored in the garret,-no unfit receptacle indeed for such dreary trash as comprised the greater number of volumes. The old books would have been worth nothing at an auction. In this venerable garret, however, they possessed an interest, quite apart from their literary value, as heirlooms, many of which had been transmitted down through a series of consecrated hands from the days of the mighty Puritan divines. Autographs of famous names were to be seen in faded ink on some of their flyleaves; and there were marginal observations or interpolated pages closely covered with manuscript in illegible shorthand, perhaps concealing matter of profound truth and wisdom. The world will never be the better for it. A few of the books were Latin folios, written by Catholic authors; others demolished Papistry, as with a sledgehammer, in plain English. A dissertation on the book of Job-which only Job himself could have had patience to read-filled at least a score of small, thickset quartos, at the rate of two or three volumes to a chapter. there was a vast folio body of divinity-too corpulent a body, it might be feared, to comprehend the spiritual element of religion. Volumes of this form dated back two hundred years or more, and were generally bound in black leather, exhibiting precisely such an appearance as we should attribute to books of enchantment. Others equally antique were of a size proper to be carried in the large waist-coat pockets of old times,—diminutive, but as black as their bulkier brethren, and abundantly interfused with Greek and Latin quotations. These little old volumes impressed me as if they had been intended for very large ones, but had been unfortunately blighted at an early stage of their growth.

The rain pattered upon the roof and the sky gloomed through the dusty garret windows, while I burrowed among these venerable books in search of any living thought which should burn like a coal of fire, or glow like an inextinguishable gem, beneath the dead trumpery that had long hidden it. But I found no such treasure; all was dead alike; and I could not but muse deeply and wonderingly upon the humiliating fact that the works of man's intellect decay like those of his hands. Thought grows moldy. What was good and nourishing food for the spirits of one generation affords no sustenance for the next. Books of religion, however, cannot be considered a fair test of the enduring and vivacious properties of human thought, because such books so seldom really touch upon their ostensible subject, and have, therefore, so little business to be written at all. So long as an unlettered soul can attain to saving grace there would seem to be no deadly error in holding theological libraries to be accumulations of, for the most part, stupendous impertinence.

Many of the books had accrued in the latter years of the last clergyman's lifetime. These threatened to be of even less interest than the elder works a century hence to any curious inquirer who should then rummage them as I was doing now. Volumes of the Liberal Preacher and Christian Examiner, occasional sermons, controversial pamphlets, tracts, and other productions of a like fugitive nature took the place of the thick and heavy volumes of past time. In a physical point of view, there was much the same difference as between a feather and a lump of lead; but, intellectually regarded, the specific gravity of old and new was about upon a par. Both also were alike frigid. The elder books nevertheless seemed to have been earnestly written, and might be conceived to have possessed warmth at some former period; although, with the lapse of time, the heated masses had cooled down even to the freezing point. The frigidity of the modern productions, on the other hand, was characteristic and inherent, and evidently had little to do with the writer's qualities of mind and heart. In fine, of this whole dusty heap of literature I tossed aside all the sacred part, and felt myself none the less a Christian for eschewing it. There appeared no hope of either mounting to the better world on a Gothic staircase of ancient folios or of flying thither on the wings of a modern tract. <sup>1</sup>

Nothing, strange to say, retained any sap except what had been written for the passing day and year without the remotest pretension or idea of permanence. There were a few old newspapers, and still older almanacs, which reproduced to my mental eye the epochs when they had issued from the press with a distinctness that was altogether unaccountable. It was as if I had found bits of magic looking-glass among the books with the images of a vanished century in them. I turned my eyes towards the tattered picture above mentioned, and asked of the austere divine wherefore it was that he and his brethren, after the most painful rummaging and groping into their minds, had been able to produce nothing half so real as these newspaper scribblers and almanac makers had thrown off in the effervescence of a moment. The portrait responded not; so I sought an answer for myself. It is the age itself that writes newspapers and almanacs, which therefore have a distinct purpose and meaning at the time, and a kind of intelligible truth for all times; whereas most other works—being written by men who, in the very act, set themselves apart from their age—are likely to possess little significance when new, and none at all when old. Genius, indeed, melts many ages into one, and thus effects something permanent, yet still with a similarity of office to that of the more ephemeral writer. A work of genius is but the newspaper of a century, or perchance of a hundred centuries.

Lightly as I have spoken of these old books, there yet lingers with me a superstitious reverence for literature of all kinds. A bound volume has a charm in my eyes similar to what scraps of manuscript possess for the good Mussulman. He imagines that those wind-wafted records are perhaps hallowed by some sacred verse; and I, that every new book or antique one may contain the "open sesame,"—the spell to disclose treasures hidden in some unsuspected cave of Truth. Thus it was not without sadness that I turned away from the library of the Old Manse.

Blessed was the sunshine when it came again at the close of another stormy day, beaming from the edge of the western horizon; while the massive firmament of clouds threw down all the gloom it could, but served only to kindle the golden light into a more brilliant glow by the strongly contrasted shadows. Heaven smiled at the earth, so long unseen, from beneath its heavy eyelid. Tomorrow for the hill tops and the wood paths.

Or it might be that Ellery Channing came up the avenue to join me in a fishing excursion on the river. Strange and happy times were those when we cast aside all irksome forms and strait-laced habitudes and delivered ourselves up to the free air, to live like the Indians or any less conventional race during one bright semicircle of the sun. Rowing our boats against the current, between wide meadows, we turned aside into the Assabeth. A more lovely stream than this, for a mile above its junction with the Concord, has never flowed on earth,nowhere, indeed, except to lave the interior regions of a poet's imagination. It is sheltered from the breeze by woods and a hillside: so that elsewhere there might be a hurricane, and here scarcely a ripple across the shaded water. The current lingers along so gently that the mere force of the boatman's will seems sufficient to propel his craft against it. It comes flowing softly through the midmost privacy and deepest heart of a wood which whispers it to be quiet: while the stream whispers back again from its sedgy borders, as if river and wood were hushing one another to sleep. Yes; the river sleeps along its course and dreams of the sky and of the clustering foliage, amid which fall showers of broken sunlight, imparting specks of vivid cheerfulness, in contrast with the quiet depth of the prevailing tint. Of all this scene, the slumbering river has a dream picture in its bosom. Which, after all, was the most real—the picture, or the original?—the objects palpable to our grosser senses, or their apotheosis in the stream beneath? Surely the disembodied images stand in closer relation to the soul. But both the original and the reflection had here an ideal charm; and, had it been a thought more wild. I could have fancied that this river had strayed forth out of the rich scenery of my companion's inner world; only the vegetation along its banks should then have had an Oriental character.

Gentle and unobtrusive as the river is, yet the tranquil woods seem hardly satisfied to allow it passage. The trees are rooted on the very verge of the water, and dip their pendent branches into it. At one spot there is a lofty bank, on the slope of which grow some hemlocks, declining across the stream with outstretched arms, as if resolute to take the plunge. In other places the banks are almost on a level with the water; so that the quiet congregation of trees set their feet in the flood, and are fringed with foliage down to the surface. Cardinal flowers kindle their spiral flames and illuminate the dark nooks among the shrubbery. The pond-lily grows abundantly along the margin-that delicious flower, which, as Thoreau tells me, opens its virgin bosom to the first sunlight and perfects its being through the magic of that genial kiss. He has beheld beds of them unfolding in due succession as the sunrise stole gradually from flower to flowera sight not to be hoped for unless when a poet adjusts his inward eve to a proper focus with the outward organ. Grapevines here and there twine themselves around shrub and tree and hang their clusters over the water within reach of the boatman's hand. Oftentimes they unite two trees of alien race in an inextricable twine. marrying the hemlock and the maple against their will and enriching them with a purple offspring of which neither is the parent. One of these ambitious parasites has climbed into the upper branches of a tall white pine, and is still ascending from bough to bough, unsatisfied till it shall crown the tree's airy summit with a wreath of its broad foliage and a cluster of its grapes.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Hawthorne seems to contrast medieval and modern theology.

The winding course of the stream continually shut out the scene behind us and revealed as calm and lovely a one before. We glided from depth to depth and breathed new seclusion at every turn. The shy kingfisher flew from the withered branch close at hand to another at a distance, uttering a shrill cry of anger or alarm. Ducks that had been floating there since the preceding eve were startled at our approach and skimmed along the glassy river, breaking its dark surface with a bright streak. pickerel leaped from among the lily pads. The turtle, sunning itself upon a rock or at the root of a tree, slid suddenly into the water with a plunge. The painted Indian who paddled his canoe along the Assabeth three hundred years ago could hardly have seen a wilder gentleness displayed upon its banks and reflected in its bosom than we did. Nor could the same Indian have prepared his noontide meal with more simplicity. We drew up our skiff at some point where the overarching shade formed a natural bower, and there kindled a fire with the pine cones and decayed branches that lay strewn plentifully around. Soon the smoke ascended among the trees, impregnated with a savory incense, not heavy, dull, and surfeiting, like the steam of cookery within doors, but sprightly and piquant. The smell of our feast was akin to the woodland odors with which it mingled: there was no sacrilege committed by our intrusion there: the sacred solitude was hospitable, and granted us free leave to cook and eat in the recess that was at once our kitchen and banqueting hall. It is strange what humble offices may be performed in a beautiful scene without destroying its poetry. Our fire, redgleaming among the trees, and we beside it. busied with culinary rites and spreading out our meal on a mossgrown log, all seemed in unison with the river gliding by and the foliage rustling over us. And, what was strangest, neither did our mirth seem to disturb the propriety of the solemn woods: although the hobgoblins of the old wilderness and the will-of-the-wisps that glimmered in the marshy places might have come trooping to share our table talk and have added their shrill laughter to our merriment. It was the very spot in which to utter the extremest nonsense or the profoundest wisdom, or that ethereal product of the mind which partakes of both, and may become one or the other, in correspondence with the faith and insight of the auditor.

So, amid sunshine and shadow, rustling leaves and sighing waters, up gushed our talk like the babble of a fountain. The evanescent spray was Ellery's; and his, too, the lumps of golden thought that lay glimmering in the fountain's bed and brightened both our faces by the reflection. Could he have drawn out that virgin gold, and stamped it with the mint mark that alone gives currency, the world might have had the profit, and he the fame. My mind was the richer merely by the knowledge that it was there. But the chief profit of those wild days, to him and me, lay, not in any definite idea, not in any angular or rounded truth, which we dug out of the shapeless mass of problematical stuff, but in the freedom which we thereby won from all custom and conventionalism and fettering influences of man on man. We were so free today that it was impossible to be slaves again tomorrow. When we crossed the threshold of the house or trod the thronged pavements of a city, still the leaves of the trees that overhang the Assabeth were whispering to us, "Be free! be free!" Therefore along that shady river bank there are spots, marked with a heap of ashes and half-consumed brands, only less sacred in my remembrance than the hearth of a household fire.

And yet how sweet, as we floated homeward adown the golden river at sunset,—how sweet was it to return within the system of human society, not as to a dungeon and a chain, but as to a stately edifice, whence we could go forth at will into statelier simplicity! How gently, too, did the sight of the Old Manse, best seen from the river, overshadowed with its willow, and all environed about with the foliage of its orchard and avenue.—how gently did its gray, homely aspect rebuke the speculative extravagances of the day! It had grown sacred in connection with the artificial life against which we inveighed: it had been a home for many years in spite of all; it was my home too; and, with these thoughts, it seemed to me that all the artifice and conventionalism of life was but an impalpable thinness upon its surface, and that the depth below was none the worse for it. Once, as we turned our boat to the bank, there was a cloud, in the shape of an immensely gigantic figure of a hound, couched above the house, as if keeping guard over it. Gazing at this symbol. I prayed that the upper influences might long protect the institutions that had grown out of the heart of mankind.

If ever my readers should decide to give up civilized life, cities, houses, and whatever moral or material enormities in addition to these the perverted ingenuity of our race has contrived. let it be in the early autumn. Then Nature will love him better than at any other season. and will take him to her bosom with a more motherly tenderness. I could scarcely endure the roof of the old house above me in those first autumnal days. How early in the summer. too, the prophecy of autumn comes! Earlier in some years than in others; sometimes even in the first weeks of July. There is no other feeling like what is caused by this faint, doubtful, yet real perception—if it be not rather a foreboding-of the year's decay, so blessedly sweet and sad in the same breath.

Did I say that there was no feeling like it? Ah, but there is a half-acknowledged melancholy like to this when we stand in the perfected vigor of our life and feel that Time has now given us all his flowers, and that the next work of his never idle fingers must be to steal them one by one away.

I have forgotten whether the song of the cricket be not as early a token of autumn's approach as any other,—that song which may be called an audible stillness; for though very loud and heard afar, yet the mind does not take note of it as a sound, so completely is its individual existence merged among the accompanying characteristics of the season. Alas for the pleasant summer time! In August the grass is still verdant on the hills and in the valleys: the foliage of the trees is as dense as ever and as green; the flowers gleam forth in richer abundance along the margin of the river and by the stone walls and deep among the woods: the days, too, are as fervid now as they were a month ago: and yet in every breath of wind and in every beam of sunshine we hear the whispered farewell and behold the parting smile of a dear friend. There is a coolness amid all the heat, a mildness in the blazing noon. Not a breeze can stir but it thrills us with the breath of autumn. A pensive glory is seen in the far golden gleams, among the shadows of the trees. The flowers—even the brightest of them, and they are the most gorgeous of the vear—have this gentle sadness wedded to their pomp, and typify the character of the delicious time each within itself. The brilliant cardinal flower has never seemed gay to me.

Still later in the season Nature's tenderness waxes stronger. It is impossible not to be fond of our mother now; for she is so fond of us! At other periods she does not make this impression on me, or only at rare intervals; but in those genial days of autumn, when she has perfected her harvests and accomplished every needful thing that was given her to do, then she overflows with a blessed superfluity of love. She has leisure to caress her children now. It is good to be alive at such times. Thank Heaven for breath—yes, for mere breath—when it is made up of a heavenly breeze like this! It comes with a real kiss upon our cheeks: it would linger fondly around us if it might; but. since it must be gone, it embraces us with its whole kindly heart and passes onward to embrace likewise the next thing that it meets. A blessing is flung abroad and scattered far and wide over the earth, to be gathered up by all who choose. I recline upon the still unwithered grass and whisper to myself, "O perfect day! O beautiful world! O beneficent God!" And it is the promise of a blessed eternity; for our Creator would never have made such lovely days and have given us the deep hearts to enjoy them, above and beyond all thought, unless we were meant to be immortal. This sunshine is the golden pledge thereof. It beams through the gates of paradise and shows us glimpses far inward.

By and by, in a little time, the outward world puts on a drear austerity. On some October morning there is a heavy hoarfrost on the grass and along the tops of the fences; and at sunrise the leaves fall from the trees of our avenue without a breath of wind, quietly descending by their own weight. All summer long they have murmured like the noise of waters; they have roared loudly while the branches were wrestling with the thunder gust; they have made music both glad and solemn; they have attuned my thoughts by their quiet sound as I paced to and fro beneath the arch of intermingling boughs. Now they can only rustle under my feet. Henceforth the gray parsonage begins to assume a larger importance, and draws to its fireside.—for the abomination of the air-tight stove is reserved till wintry weather,—draws closer and closer to its fireside the vagrant impulses that had gone wandering about through the summer.

When summer was dead and buried the Old Manse became as lonely as a hermitage. Not that ever-in my time at least-it had been thronged with company; but, at no rare intervals, we welcomed some friend out of the dusty glare and tumult of the world and rejoiced to share with him the transparent obscurity that was floating over us. In one respect our precincts were like the Enchanted Ground through which the pilgrim traveled on his way to the Celestial City. 1 The guests, each and all, felt a slumberous influence upon them: they fell asleep in chairs, or took a more deliberate siesta on the sofa, or were seen stretched among the shadows of the orchard, looking up dreamily through the boughs. They could not have paid a more acceptable compliment to my abode nor to my own qualities as a host. I held it as a proof that they left their cares behind them as they passed between the stone gateposts at the entrance of our avenue, and that the so powerful opiate was the abundance of peace and quiet within and all around us. Others could give them pleasure and amusement or instruction—these could be picked up anywhere; but it was for me to give them restrest in a life of trouble. What better could be done for those weary and world-worn spirits?for him whose career of perpetual action was impeded and harassed by the rarest of his powers and the richest of his acquirements? for another who had thrown his ardent heart from earliest youth into the strife of politics. and now, perchance, began to suspect that one lifetime is too brief for the accomplishment of any lofty aim?—for her on whose feminine nature had been imposed the heavy gift of intellectual power, such as a strong man might have staggered under, and with it the necessity to act upon the world? 2—in a word, not to multiply instances, what better could be done for anybody who came within our magic circle than to throw the spell of a tranquil spirit over him? And when it had wrought its full effect. then we dismissed him, with but misty reminiscences, as if he had been dreaming of us.

Were I to adopt a pet idea as so many people do and fondle it in my embraces to the exclusion of all others, it would be, that the great want which mankind labors under at this present period is sleep. The world should recline its vast head on the first convenient pillow and take an age-long nap. It has gone distracted through a morbid activity, and, while preternaturally wide awake, is nevertheless tormented by visions that seem real to it now, but would assume their true aspect and character were all things once set right by an interval of sound repose. This is the only method of getting rid of old delusions and avoiding new ones; of regenerating our race, so that it might in due time awake as an infant out of dewy slumber: of restoring to us the simple perception of what is right and the single-hearted desire to achieve it, both of which have long been lost in consequence of this weary activity of brain and torpor or passion of the heart that now afflict the universe. Stimulants, the only mode of treatment hitherto attempted, cannot quell the disease: they do but heighten the delirium.

Let not the above paragraph ever be quoted against the author; for, though tinctured with its modicum of truth, it is the result and expression of what he knew, while he was writing. to be but a distorted survey of the state and prospects of mankind. There were circumstances around me which made it difficult to view the world precisely as it exists; for, severe and sober as was the Old Manse, it was necessary to go but a little way beyond its threshold before meeting with stranger moral shapes of men than might have been encountered elsewhere in a circuit of a thousand miles.

These hobgoblins of flesh and blood were attracted thither by the widespreading influence of a great original thinker, who had his earthly abode at the opposite extremity of our village. His mind acted upon other minds of a certain constitution with wonderful magnetism, and drew many men upon long pilgrimages to speak with him face to face. Young visionaries—to whom just so much of insight had been imparted as to make life all a labyrinth around them-came to seek the clew that should guide them out of their self-involved bewilderment. Grayheaded theorists-whose systems, at first air, had finally imprisoned them in an iron framework-traveled painfully to his door, not to ask deliverance, but to invite the free spirit into their own thraldom. People that had lighted on a new thought, or a thought that they fancied new, came to Emerson, as the finder of a glittering gem hastens to a lapidary. to ascertain its quality and value. Uncertain, troubled, earnest wanderers through the midnight of the moral world beheld his intellectual fire as the beacon burning on a hill-top, and, climbing the difficult ascent, looked forth into the surrounding obscurity more hopefully than The light revealed objects unseen before,-mountains, gleaming lakes, glimpses of a creation among the chaos; but also, as was unavoidable, it attracted bats and owls and the whole host of night birds, which flapped their dusky wings against the gazer's eyes, and sometimes were mistaken for fowls of angelic Such delusions always hover nigh feather. whenever a beacon fire of truth is kindled.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Cf. Bunyan, The Pilgrim's Progress. The shepherds in the Delectable Mountains warned Christian of the enchanted ground, "whose air naturally tended to make one sleepy."

&lt;sup>2</sup> Hawthorne probably refers respectively to Horatio Bridge, Franklin Pierce, and Margaret Fuller. See note 1, p. 335.

For myself, there had been epochs of my life when I, too, might have asked of this prophet the master word that should solve me the riddle of the universe, but now, being happy, I felt as if there were no question to be put, and therefore admired Emerson as a poet of deep beauty and austere tenderness, but sought nothing from him as a philosopher. It was good. nevertheless, to meet him in the woodpaths, or sometimes in our avenue, with that pure, intellectual gleam diffused about his presence like the garment of a shining one; and he, so quiet. so simple, so without pretension, encountering each man alive as if expecting to receive more than he could impart. And, in truth, the heart of many an ordinary man had, perchance, inscriptions which he could not read. But it was impossible to dwell in his vicinity without inhaling more or less the mountain atmosphere of his lofty thought, which, in the brains of some people, wrought a singular giddiness,-new truth being as heady as new wine. Never was a poor little country village infested with such a variety of queer, strangely-dressed, oddlybehaved mortals, most of whom took upon themselves to be important agents of the world's destiny, vet were simply bores of a very intense water. Such, I imagine, is the invariable character of persons who crowd so closely about an original thinker as to draw in his unuttered breath and thus become imbued with a false originality. This triteness of novelty is enough to make any man of common sense blaspheme at all ideas of less than a century's standing, and pray that the world may be petrified and rendered immovable in precisely the worst moral and physical state that it ever yet arrived at, rather than be benefited by such schemes of such philosophers.

And now I begin to feel-and perhaps should have sooner felt-that we have talked enough of the Old Manse. Mine honored reader. it may be, will vilify the poor author as an egotist for babbling through so many pages about a mossgrown country parsonage, and his life within its walls and on the river and in the woods, and the influences that wrought upon him, from all these sources. My conscience. however, does not reproach me with betraying anything too sacredly individual to be revealed by a human spirit to its brother or sister spirit. How narrow-how shallow and scanty too-is the stream of thought that has been flowing from my pen, compared with the broad tide of dim emotions, ideas, and associations which swell around me from that portion of my existence! How little have I told! and of that little, how almost nothing is even tinctured with any quality that makes it exclusively my own! Has the reader gone wandering, hand in hand with me, through the inner passages of my being? and have we groped together into all its chambers and examined their treasures or their rubbish? Not so. We have been standing on the greensward, but just within the cavern's mouth, where the common sunshine is free to penetrate, and where every footstep is therefore free to come. I have appealed to no sentiment or sensibilities save such as are diffused among us all. So far as I am a man of really individual attributes I veil my face; nor am I. nor have I ever been, one of those supremely hospitable people who serve up their own hearts, delicately fried, with brain sauce, as a tidbit for their beloved public.

Glancing back over what I have written, it seems but the scattered reminiscences of a single summer. In fairyland there is no measurement of time; and, in a spot so sheltered from the turmoil of life's ocean, three years hastened away with a noiseless flight, as the breezy sunshine chases the cloud shadows across the depths of a still valley. Now came hints, growing more and more distinct, that the owner of the old house was pining for his native air. Carpenters next appeared making a tremendous racket among the out-buildings, strewing the green grass with pine shavings and chips of chestnut joists, and vexing the whole antiquity of the place with their discordant renovations. Soon, moreover, they divested our abode of the veil of woodbine which had crept over a large portion of its southern face. All the aged mosses were cleared unsparingly away: and there were horrible whispers about brushing up the external walls with a coat of paint—a purpose as little to my taste as might be that of rouging the venerable cheeks of one's grandmother. But the hand that renovates is always more sacrilegious than that which destroys. In fine, we gathered up our household goods, drank a farewell cup of tea in our pleasant little breakfast room.-delicately fragrant tea, an unpurchasable luxury, one of the many angel gifts that had fallen like dew upon us.-and passed forth between the tall stone gate-posts as uncertain as the wandering Arabs where our tent might next be pitched. Providence took me by the hand, and—an oddity of dispensation which, I trust, there is no irreverence in smiling at-has led me, as the newspapers announce while I am writing, from the Old Manse into a custom house. 1 As a story teller, I have often contrived strange vicissitudes for my imaginary personages, but none like this.

The treasure of intellectual gold which I had hoped to find in our secluded dwelling had never come to light. No profound treatise of ethics, no philosophic history, no novel even, that could stand unsupported on its edges. All that I had to show, as a man of letters, were these few tales and essays, which had blossomed out like flowers in the calm summer of my heart and mind. Save editing (an easy task) the journal of my friend of many years, the African Cruiser, I had done nothing else. With these idle weeds and withering blossoms I have intermixed some that were produced long ago,—old, faded things. reminding me of flowers pressed between the leaves of a book,—and now offer the bouquet, such as it is, to any whom it may please. These fitful sketches, with so little of external life about them, yet claiming no profundity of purpose,—so reserved, even while they sometimes seem so frank,-often but half in earnest, and never, even when most so, expressing satisfactorily the thoughts which they profess to image. —such trifles, I truly feel, afford no solid basis for a literary reputation. Nevertheless, the public-if my limited number of readers, whom I venture to regard rather as a circle of friends, may be termed a public-will receive them the more kindly, as the last offering, the last collection, of this nature which it is my purpose ever to put forth. Unless I could do better, I have done enough in this kind. For myself the book will always retain one charm—as reminding me of the river, with its delightful solitudes, and of the avenue, the garden, and the orchard, and especially the dear Old Manse, with the little study on its western side, and the sunshine glimmering through the willow branches while I wrote.

Let the reader, if he will do me so much honor, imagine himself my guest, and that, having seen whatever may be worthy of notice within and about the Old Manse, he has finally been ushered into my study. There, after seating him in an antique elbow-chair, an heirloom of the house, I take forth a roll of manuscript and entreat his attention to the following tales—an act of personal inhospitality, however, which I never was guilty of, nor ever will be, even to my worst enemy.

1846

From THE SCARLET LETTER 2

I THE PRISON DOOR

A throng of bearded men, in sad-colored garments and gray steeple-crowned hats, intermixed with women, some wearing hoods, and others bareheaded, was assembled in front of a wooden edifice, the door of which was heavily timbered with oak, and studded with iron spikes.

The founders of a new colony, whatever Utopia 3 of human virtue and happiness they might originally project, have invariably recognized it among their earliest practical necessities to allot a portion of the virgin soil as a cemetery, and another portion as the site of a prison. In accordance with this rule, it may safely be assumed that the forefathers of Boston had built the first prison-house somewhere in the vicinity of Cornhill, 4 almost as seasonably as they marked out the first burial-ground, on Isaac Johnson's 5 lot, and round about his grave, which subsequently became the nucleus of all the congregated sepulchers in the old churchvard of King's Chapel. Certain it is that, some fifteen or twenty years after the settlement of the town, the wooden jail was already marked with weather-stains and other indications of age. which gave a yet darker aspect to its beetlebrowed and gloomy front. The rust on the

&lt;sup>1</sup> Hawthorne, whose literary work had as yet naid him but poorly, had obtained the position of Surveyor in the Salem Custom House.

In the introduction to this novel Hawthorne relates how he found in the attic of the Salem Custom House a parchment roll containing an embroidered scarlet letter A and its history briefly written out.
 an ideal commonwealth described in a work published by Sir Thomas More in 1516

See note 3, page 329.

He came to Massachusetts with Winthrop in 1630 and died the same year. His lot was bounded by the present School, Tremont, Court, and Washington Streets.

ponderous iron-work of its oaken door looked more antique than anything else in the New World. Like all that pertains to crime, it seemed never to have known a vouthful era. Before this ugly edifice, and between it and the wheel-track of the street, was a grass-plot, much overgrown with burdock, pig-weed, apple-peru, and such unsightly vegetation, which evidently found something congenial in the soil that had so early borne the black flower of civilized society, a prison. But on one side of the portal. and rooted almost at the threshold, was a wild rose-bush, covered, in this month of June, with its delicate gems, which might be imagined to offer their fragrance and fragile beauty to the prisoner as he went in, and to the condemned criminal as he came forth to his doom, in token that the deep heart of Nature could pity and be kind to him.

This rose-bush, by a strange chance, has been kept alive in history; but whether it had merely survived out of the stern old wilderness, so long after the fall of the gigantic pines and oaks that originally overshadowed it,-or whether, as there is fair authority for believing, it had sprung up under the footsteps of the sainted Ann Hutchinson 1 as she entered the prisondoor,-we shall not take upon us to determine. Finding it so directly on the threshold of our narrative, which is now about to issue from that inauspicious portal, we could hardly do otherwise than pluck one of its flowers, and present it to the reader. It may serve, let us hope, to symbolize some sweet moral blossom that may be found along the track, or relieve the darkening close of a tale of human frailty and sorrow.

II

THE MARKET PLACE

The grass-plot before the jail, in Prison Lane, on a certain summer morning, not less than two centuries ago, was occupied by a pretty large number of the inhabitants of Boston, all with their eyes intently fastened on the iron-clamped oaken door. Amongst any other population, or at a later period in the history of New England, the grim rigidity that petrified the bearded physiognomies of these good people would have augured some awful business in hand. It could have betokened nothing short of the anticipated execution of some noted culprit, on whom the sentence of a legal tribunal had but confirmed the verdict of public sentiment. But, in that early severity of the Puritan character, an inference of this kind could not so indubitably be drawn. It might be that a sluggish bondservant, or an undutiful child, whom his parents had given over to the civil authority, was to be corrected at the whipping-post. It might be that an Antinomian. 2 a Quaker, or other heterodox religionist, was to be scourged out of the town, or an idle and vagrant Indian, whom the white man's firewater had made riotous about the streets, was to be driven with stripes into the shadow of the forest. It might be, too, that a witch, like old Mistress Hibbins, 3 the bitter-tempered widow of the magistrate, was to die upon the gallows. In either case, there was very much the same solemnity of demeanor on the part of the spectators, as befitted a people amongst whom religion and law were almost identical, and in whose character both were so thoroughly interfused, that the mildest and severest acts of public discipline were alike made venerable and awful. Meager, indeed, and cold, was the sympathy that a transgressor might look for, from such bystanders, at the scaffold. On the other hand, a penalty which, in our days, would infer a degree of mocking infamy and ridicule, might then be invested with almost as stern a dignity as the punishment of death itself.

It was a circumstance to be noted on the summer morning when our story begins its course, that the women, of whom there were several in the crowd, appeared to take a peculiar interest in whatever penal infliction might be expected to ensue. The age had not so much refinement, that any sense of impropriety restrained the wearers of petticoat and farthingale 4 from stepping forth into the public ways, and wedging their not unsubstantial persons, if occasion were, into the throng nearest to the scaffold at an execution. Morally, as well as materially, there was a coarser fiber in those wives and maidens of old English birth and breeding than in their fair descendants, separated from them by a series of six or seven

<sup>2</sup> Christians who held that the moral law of the Old Testament was not binding

&lt;sup>1</sup> Mrs. Hutchinson, one of the most intellectual women of early Boston, was placed on trial and finally banished for her unorthodox views.

&lt;sup>3</sup> "Mrs. Ann Hibbins was the widow of an immigrant of special distinction. He had been agent for the colony in England, and one of the Assistants (magistrates). He had lost his property, and the melancholy and ill-temper to which his disappointed wife gave way appear to have exposed her to misconstructions and hatred, in the sequel of which she was convicted as a witch, and after some opposition on the part of the magistrates was hanged." Palfrey, History of New England, IV, 08. John Norton, teacher of the First Church, said she was hanged only for having more wit than her neighbors.

* hoop-petticoat

generations: for, throughout that chain of ancestry, every successive mother had transmitted to her child a fainter bloom, a more delicate and briefer beauty, and a slighter physical frame, if not a character of less force and solidity than her own. The women who were now standing about the prison-door stood within less than half a century of the period when the man-like Elizabeth had been the not altogether unsuitable representative of the sex. They were her countrywomen; and the beef and ale of their native land, with a moral diet not a whit more refined, entered largely into their composition. The bright morning sun, therefore, shown on broad shoulders and well-developed busts, and on round and ruddy cheeks, that had ripened in the far-off island, and had hardly yet grown paler or thinner in the atmosphere of New England. There was, moreover, a boldness and rotundity of speech among these matrons, as most of them seemed to be, that would startle us at the present day, whether in respect to its purport or its volume of tone.

"Goodwives," said a hard-featured dame of fifty, "I'll tell ye a piece of my mind. It would be greatly for the public behoof, if we women, being of mature age and church-members in good repute, should have the handling of such malefactresses as this Hester Prynne. What think ye, gossips? If the hussy stood up for judgment before us five, that are now here in a knot together, would she come off with such a sentence as the worshipful magistrates have awarded? Marry, I trow not!"

"People say," said another, "that the Reverend Master Dimmesdale, her godly pastor, takes it very grievously to heart that such a scandal should have come upon his congregation."

"The magistrates are God-fearing gentlemen, but merciful overmuch,—that is a truth," added a third autumnal matron. "At the very least, they should have put the brand of a hot iron on Hester Prynne's forehead. Madam Hester would have winced at that, I warrant me. But she,—the naughty baggage,—little will she care what they put upon the bodice of her gown! Why, look you, she may cover it with a brooch, or such like heathenish adornment, and so walk the streets as brave as ever!"

"Ah, but," interposed more softly a young wife, holding a child by the hand, "let her cover the mark as she will, the pang of it will be always in her heart."

"What do we talk of marks and brands, whether on the bodice of her gown or the flesh of her forehead?" cried another female, the ugliest as well as the most pitiless of these selfconstituted judges. "This woman has brought shame upon us all, and ought to die. Is there not a law for it?" Truly there is, both in the Scripture and the statute-book. Then let the magistrates, who have made it of no effect, thank themselves if their own wives and daughters go astray!"

"Mercy on us, goodwife!" exclaimed a man in the crowd, "is there no virtue in woman, save what springs from a wholesome fear of the gallows? That is the hardest word yet! Hush, now, gossips! for the lock is turning in the prison-door, and here comes Mistress Prynne herself."

The door of the jail being flung open from within, there appeared, in the first place, like a black shadow emerging into sunshine, the grim and grisly presence of the town-beadle. with a sword by his side, and his staff of office This personage prefigured and in his hand. represented in his aspect the whole dismal severity of the Puritanic code of law, which it was his business to administer in its final and closest application to the offender. Stretching forth the official staff in his left hand, he laid his right upon the shoulder of a young woman, whom he thus drew forward, until, on the threshold of the prison-door, she repelled him. by an action marked with natural dignity and force of character, and stepped into the open air as if by her own free will. She bore in her arms a child, a baby of some three months old, who winked and turned aside its little face from the too vivid light of day; because its existence, heretofore, had brought it acquaintance only with the gray twilight of a dungeon, or other darksome apartment of the prison.

When the young woman—the mother of this child-stood fully revealed before the crowd. it seemed to be her first impulse to clasp the infant closely to her bosom; not so much by an impulse of motherly affection, as that she might thereby conceal a certain token, which was wrought or fastened into her dress. In a moment, however, wisely judging that one token of her shame would but poorly serve to hide another, she took the baby on her arm, and with a burning blush, and yet a haughty smile, and a glance that would not be abashed. looked around at her townspeople and neighbors. On the breast of her gown, in fine red cloth, surrounded with an elaborate embroidery and fantastic flourishes of gold thread, appeared the letter A. It was so artistically done, and with so much fertility and gorgeous luxuriance of fancy, that it had all the effect of a last and fitting decoration to the apparel which she wore; and which was of a splendor in accordance with the taste of the age, but greatly beyond what was allowed by the sumptuary regulations of the colony.

The young woman was tall, with a figure of perfect elegance on a large scale. She had dark and abundant hair, so glossy that it threw off the sunshine with a gleam and a face which, besides being beautiful from regularity of feature and richness of complexion, had the impressiveness belonging to a marked brow and deep black eyes. She was ladylike, too, after the manner of the feminine gentility of those days; characterized by a certain state and dignity, rather than by the delicate, evanescent, and indescribable grace which is now recognized as its indication. And never had Hester Prynne appeared more ladylike, in the antique interpretation of the term, than as she issued from the prison. Those who had before known her, and had expected to behold her dimmed and obscured by a disastrous cloud, were astonished, and even startled, to perceive how her beauty shone out, and made a halo of the misfortune and ignominy in which she was enveloped. It may be true that, to a sensitive observer, there was something exquisitely painful in it. Her attire, which indeed, she had wrought for the occasion in prison, and had modeled much after her own fancy, seemed to express the attitude of her spirit, the desperate recklessness of her mood, by its wild and picturesque peculiarity. But the point which drew all eyes, and, as it were, transfigured the wearer-so that both men and women who had been familiarly acquainted with Hester Prynne were now impressed as if they beheld her for the first timewas that SCARLET LETTER, so fantastically embroidered and illuminated upon her bosom. It had the effect of a spell, taking her out of the ordinary relations with humanity, and enclosing her in a sphere by herself.

"She hath good skill at her needle, that's certain," remarked one of her female spectators; "but did ever a woman, before this brazen hussy, contrive such a way of showing it! Why, gossips, what is it but to laugh in the faces of our godly magistrates, and make a pride out of what they, worthy gentlemen, meant for a punishment?"

"It were well," muttered the most ironvisaged of the old dames, "if we stripped Madame Hester's rich gown off her dainty shoulders; and as for the red letter which she hath stitched so curiously, I'll bestow a rag of mine own rheumatic flannel to make a fitter one!" "Oh, peace, neighbors, peace!" whispered their youngest companion; "do not let her hear you! Not a stitch in that embroidered letter but she has felt it in her heart."

The grim beadle now made a gesture with his staff

"Make way, good people, make way, in the King's name!" cried he. "Open a passage; and, I promise ye, Mistress Prynne shall be set where man, woman, and child may have a fair sight of her brave apparel from this time till an hour past meridian. A blessing on the righteous colony of the Massachusetts, where iniquity is dragged out into the sunshine! Come along, Madam Hester, and show your scarlet letter in the market-place!"

A lane was forthwith opened through the crowd of spectators. Preceded by the beadle, and attended by an irregular procession of sternbrowed men and unkindly visaged women, Hester Prynne set forth towards the place appointed for her punishment. A crowd of eager and curious schoolboys, understanding little of the matter in hand, except that it gave them a half-holiday, ran before her progress, turning their heads continually to stare into her face and at the winking baby in her arms, and at the ignominious letter on her breast. It was no great distance, in those days, from the prison door to the market-place. Measured by the prisoner's experience, however, it might be reckoned a journey of some length; for haughty as her demeanor was, she perchance underwent an agony from every footstep of those that thronged to see her, as if her heart had been flung into the street for them all to spurn and trample upon. In our nature, however, there is a provision, alike marvelous and merciful, that the sufferer should never know the intensity of what he endures by its present torture, but chiefly by the pang that rankles after it. With almost a serene deportment, therefore, Hester Prynne passed through this portion of her ordeal, and came to a sort of scaffold, at the western extremity of the market-place. It stood nearly beneath the eaves of Boston's earliest church, and appeared to be a fixture there.

In fact, this scaffold constituted a portion of a penal machine, which now, for two or three generations past, has been merely historical and traditionary among us, but was held, in the old time, to be as effectual an agent, in the promotion of good citizenship, as ever was the guillotine among the terrorists of France. It was, in short, the platform of the pillory; and above it rose the framework of that instrument of discipline, so fashioned as to confine the human head in its tight grasp, and thus hold it up to the public gaze. The very ideal of ignominy was embodied and made manifest in this contrivance of wood and iron. There can be no outrage, methinks, against our common nature. —whatever be the delinquencies of the individual,—no outrage more flagrant than to forbid the culprit to hide his face for shame: as it was the essence of this punishment to do. In Hester Prynne's instance, however, as not unfrequently in other cases, her sentence bore that she should stand a certain time upon the platform, but without undergoing that gripe about the neck and confinement of the head, the proneness to which was the most devilish characteristic of this ugly engine. Knowing well her part, she ascended a flight of wooden steps. and was thus displayed to the surrounding multitude, at about the height of a man's shoulders above the street.

Had there been a Papist among the crowd of Puritans, he might have seen in this beautiful woman, so picturesque in her attire and mien, and with the infant at her bosom, an object to remind him of the image of Divine Maternity, which so many illustrious painters have vied with one another to represent; something which should remind him, indeed, but only by contrast, of that sacred image of sinless motherhood, whose infant was to redeem the world. Here, there was the taint of deepest sin in the most sacred quality of human life, working such effect, that the world was only the darker for this woman's beauty, and the more lost for the infant that she had borne.

The scene was not without a mixture of awe. such as must always invest the spectacle of guilt and shame in a fellow-creature, before society shall have grown corrupt enough to smile, instead of shuddering at it. The witnesses of Hester Prynne's disgrace had not yet passed beyond their simplicity. They were stern enough to look upon her death, had that been the sentence, without a murmur at its severity, but had none of the heartlessness of another social state, which would find only a theme for jest in an exhibition like the present. Even had there been a disposition to turn the matter into ridicule, it must have been repressed and overpowered by the solemn presence of men no less dignified than the Governor, and several of his counsellors, a judge, a general, and the ministers of the town, all of whom sat or stood in a balcony of the meeting-house, looking down upon the platform. When such personages could constitute a part of the spectacle, without risking the majesty, or reverence of rank and office, it was safely to be inferred that the infliction of a legal sentence would have an earnest and effectual meaning. Accordingly, the crowd was somber and grave. The unhappy culprit sustained herself as best a woman might. under the heavy weight of a thousand unrelenting eyes, all fastened upon her, and concentrated at her bosom. It was almost intolerable to be borne. Of an impulsive and passionate nature, she had fortified herself to encounter the stings and venomous stabs of public contumely, wreaking itself in every variety of insult: but there was a quality so much more terrible in the solemn mood of the popular mind, that she longed rather to behold all those rigid countenances contorted with scornful merriment, and herself the object. Had a roar of laughter burst from the multitude.—each man, each woman, each little shrill-voiced child, contributing their individual parts,-Hester Prynne might have repaid them all with a bitter and disdainful smile. But, under the leaden infliction which it was her doom to endure, she felt, at moments, as if she must needs shriek out with the full power of her lungs, and cast herself from the scaffold down upon the ground, or else go mad at once.

Yet there were intervals when the whole scene, in which she was the most conspicuous object, seemed to vanish from her eyes, or, at least, glimmered indistinctly before them, like a mass of imperfectly shaped and spectral images. Her mind, and especially her memory, was preternaturally active, and kept bringing up other scenes than this roughly hewn street of a little town, on the edge of the western wilderness: other faces than were lowering upon her from beneath the brims of those steeplecrowned hats. Reminiscences, the most trifling and immaterial, passages of infancy and school days, sports, childish quarrels, and the little domestic traits of her maiden years, came swarming back upon her, intermingled with recollections of whatever was gravest in her subsequent life; one picture precisely as vivid as another; as if all were of similar importance, or all alike a play. Possibly, it was an instinctive device of her spirit to relieve itself, by the exhibition of these phantasmagoric forms, from the cruel weight and hardness of the reality.

Be that as it might, the scaffold of the pillory was a point of view that revealed to Hester Prynne the entire track along which she had been treading, since her happy infancy. Standing on that miserable eminence, she saw her native village, in Old England, and her paternal home: a decayed house of gray stone, with a poverty-stricken aspect, but retaining a half obliterated shield of arms over the portal, in token of antique gentility. She saw her father's face, with its bald brow, and reverend white beard, that flowed over the old-fashioned Elizabethan ruff; her mother's, too, with the look of heedful and anxious love which it always wore in her remembrance, and which, even since her death, had so often laid the impediment of a gentle remonstrance in her daughter's pathway. She saw her own face, glowing with girlish beauty, and illuminating all the interior of the dusky mirror in which she had been wont to gaze at it. There she beheld another countenance, of a man well stricken in years, a pale. thin, scholar-like visage, with eyes dim and bleared by the lamplight that had served them to pore over many ponderous books. Yet those same bleared optics had a strange, penetrating power, when it was their owner's purpose to read the human soul. This figure of the study and the cloister, as Hester Prynne's womanly fancy failed not to recall, was slightly deformed. with the left shoulder a trifle higher than the right. Next rose before her, in memory's picture-gallery, the intricate and narrow thoroughfares, the tall, gray houses, the huge cathedrals, and the public edifices, ancient in date and quaint in architecture, of a Continental city; where new life had awaited her, still in connection with the misshapen scholar: a new life. but feeding itself on time-worn materials, like a tuft of green moss on a crumbling wall. Lastly, in lieu of these shifting scenes, came back the rude market-place of the Puritan settlement. with all the townspeople assembled, and leveling their stern regards at Hester Prynne,—yes. at herself,-who stood on the scaffold of the pillory, an infant on her arm, and the letter A. in scarlet, fantastically embroidered with gold thread, upon her bosom!

Could it be true? She clutched the child so fiercely to her breast that it sent forth a cry; she turned her eyes downward at the scarlet letter, and even touched it with her finger to assure herself that the infant and the shame were real. Yes!—these were her realities—all else had vanished!

III

THE RECOGNITION

From this intense consciousness of being the object of severe and universal observation, the wearer of the scarlet letter was at length relieved, by discerning, on the outskirts of the crowd, a figure which irresistibly took possession of her thoughts. An Indian in his native garb was standing there; but the red men were not so infrequent visitors of the English settlements that one of them would have attracted any notice from Hester Prynne at such a time; much less would he have excluded all other objects and ideas from her mind. By the Indian's side, and evidently sustaining a companionship with him, stood a white man, clad in a strange disarray of civilized and savage costume.

He was small in stature, with a furrowed visage, which as yet could hardly be termed aged. There was a remarkable intelligence in his features, as of a person who had so cultivated his mental part that it could not fail to mold the physical to itself, and become manifest by unmistakable tokens. Although by a seemingly careless arrangement of his heterogeneous garb, he had endeavoured to conceal or abate the peculiarity, it was sufficiently evident to Hester Prynne that one of this man's shoulder's rose higher than the other. Again, at the first instant of perceiving that thin visage, and the slight deformity of the figure, she pressed her infant to her bosom with so convulsive a force that the poor babe uttered another cry of pain. But the mother did not seem to hear it.

At his arrival in the market-place, and some time before she saw him, the stranger had bent his eyes on Hester Prynne. It was carelessly at first, like a man chiefly accustomed to look inward, and to whom external matters are of little value and import, unless they bear relation to something within his mind. Very soon, however, his look became keen and penetrative. A writhing horror twisted itself across his features. like a snake gliding swiftly over them, and making one little pause, with all its wreathed intervolutions in open sight. His face darkened with some powerful emotion, which, nevertheless, he so instantaneously controlled by an effort of his will, that, save at a single moment, its expression might have passed for calmness. After a brief space, the convulsion grew almost imperceptible, and finally subsided into the depths of his nature. When he found the eves of Hester Prynne fastened on his own, and saw that she appeared to recognize him, he slowly and calmly raised his finger, made a gesture with it in the air, and laid it on his lips.

Then touching the shoulder of a townsman who stood next to him, he addressed him in a formal and courteous manner.

"I pray you, good Sir," said he, "who is this woman?—and wherefore is she here set up to public shame?"

"You must needs be a stranger in this region, friend." answered the townsman, looking curiously at the questioner and his savage companion. "else you would surely have heard of Mistress Hester Prynne and her evil doings. She hath raised a great scandal, I promise you, in godly Master Dimmesdale's church."

"You say truly," replied the other. "I am a stranger, and have been a wanderer, sorely against my will. I have met with grievous mishaps by sea and land, and have been long held in bonds among the heathen-folk to the southward; and am now brought hither by this Indian to be redeemed out of my captivity. Will it please you, therefore, to tell me of Hester Prynne's—have I her name rightly?—of this woman's offences, and what has brought her to yonder scaffold?"

"Truly, friend; and methinks it must gladden your heart, after your troubles and sojourn in the wilderness," said the townsman, "to find yourself at length in a land where iniquity is searched out and punished in the sight of rulers and people, as here in our godly New England. Yonder woman, sir, you must know, was the wife of a certain learned man, English by birth, but who had long dwelt in Amsterdam, whence some good time agone he was minded to cross over and cast in his lot with us of the Massachusetts. To this purpose he sent his wife before him, remaining himself to look after some necessary affairs. Marry, good sir, in some two years, or less, that the woman has been a dweller here in Boston, no tidings have come of this learned gentleman, Master Prynne; and his young wife, look you, being left to her own misguidance"-

"Ah!—aha!—I conceive you," said the stranger with a bitter smile. "So learned a man as you speak of should have learned this too in his books. And who, by your favor, sir, may be the father of yonder babe—it is some three or four months old, I should judge—which Mistress Prynne is holding in her arms?"

"Of a truth, friend, that matter remaineth a riddle; and the Daniel who shall expound it is yet a-wanting," answered the townsman. "Madame Hester absolutely refuseth to speak, and the magistrates have laid their heads together in vain. Peradventure the guilty one stands looking on at this sad spectacle, unknown of man, and forgetting that God sees him."

"The learned man," observed the stranger with another smile, "should come himself to look into the mystery."

"It behooves him well if he be still in life," responded the townsman. "Now, good sir, our Massachusetts magistracy, bethinking themselves that this woman is youthful and fair, and doubtless was strongly tempted to her fall, and that, moreover, as is most likely, her husband may be at the bottom of the sea, they have not been bold to put in force the extremity of our righteous law against her. The penalty thereof is death. But in their great mercy and tenderness of heart they have doomed Mistress Prynne to stand only a space of three hours on the platform of the pillory, and then and thereafter, for the remainder of her natural life, to wear a mark of shame upon her bosom."

"A wise sentence!" remarked the stranger, gravely bowing his head. "Thus she will be a living sermon against sin, until the ignominious letter be engraved upon her tombstone. It irks me, nevertheless, that the partner of her iniquity should not, at least, stand on the scaffold by her side. But he will be known!—he will be known!—he will be known!

He bowed courteously to the communicative townsman, and whispering a few words to his Indian attendant, they both made their way through the crowd.

While this passed, Hester Prynne had been standing on her pedestal, still with a fixed gaze towards the stranger-so fixed a gaze that, at moments of intense absorption, all other objects in the visible world seemed to vanish, leaving only him and her. Such an interview, perhaps, would have been more terrible than even to meet him as she now did, with the hot mid-day sun burning down upon her face, and lighting up its shame; with the scarlet token of infamy on her breast; with the sin-born infant in her arms; with a whole people, drawn forth as to a festival, staring at the features that should have been seen only in the quiet gleam of the fireside, in the happy shadow of a home, or beneath a matronly veil at church. Dreadful as it was, she was conscious of a shelter in the presence of these thousand witnesses. It was better to stand thus, with so many betwixt him and her, than to greet him face to face, they two alone. She fled for refuge, as it were, to the public exposure, and dreaded the moment when its protection should be withdrawn from her. Involved in these thoughts, she scarcely heard a voice behind her until it had repeated her name more than once, in a loud and solemn tone, audible to the whole multitude.

"Hearken unto me, Hester Prynne!" said the voice.

It has already been noticed that directly over the platform on which Hester Prynne stood was a kind of balcony, or open gallery, appended to the meeting-house. It was the place whence proclamations were wont to be made, amidst an assemblage of the magistracy, with all the ceremonial that attended such public observances in those days. Here, to witness the scene which we are describing, sat Governor Bellingham 1 himself with four sergeants about his chair, bearing halberds, as a guard of honor. He wore a dark feather in his hat, a border of embroidery on his cloak, and a black velvet tunic beneath; a gentleman advanced in years, with a hard experience written in his wrinkles. He was not ill fitted to be the head and representative of a community which owed its origin and progress, and its present state of development, not to the impulses of youth, but to the stern and tempered energies of manhood and the somber sagacity of age; accomplishing so much, precisely because it imagined and hoped so little. The other eminent characters by whom the chief ruler was surrounded were distinguished by a dignity of mien, belonging to a period when the forms of authority were felt to possess the sacredness of divine institutions. They were, doubtless, good men, just and sage. But, out of the whole human family, it would not have been easy to select the same number of wise and virtuous persons, who should be less capable of sitting in judgment on an erring woman's heart, and disentangling its mesh of good and evil, than the sages of rigid aspect towards whom Hester Prynne now turned her face. She seemed conscious, indeed, that whatever sympathy she might expect lay in the larger and warmer heart of the multitude; for, as she lifted her eyes towards the balcony, the unhappy woman grew pale, and trembled.

The voice which had called her attention was that of the reverend and famous John Wilson, 2 the eldest clergyman of Boston, a great scholar. like most of his contemporaries in the profession, and withal a man of kind and genial spirit. This last attribute, however, had been less carefully developed than his intellectual gifts, and was, in truth, rather a matter of shame than self-congratulation with him. There he stood, with a border of grizzled locks beneath his skullcap; while his gray eyes, accustomed to the shaded light of his study, were winking, like those of Hester's infant, in the unadulterated sunshine. He looked like the darkly engraved portraits which we see prefixed to old volumes of sermons, and had no more right than one of those portraits would have to step forth, as he now did, and meddle with a question of human guilt, passion, and anguish.

"Hester Prynne," said the clergyman, "I have striven with my young brother here, under whose preaching of the Word you have been privileged to sit"—here Mr. Wilson laid his hand on the shoulder of a pale young man beside him—"I have sought, I say, to persuade this godly youth, that he should deal with you. here in the face of Heaven, and before these wise and upright rulers, and in hearing of all the people, as touching the vileness and blackness of your sin. Knowing your natural temper better than I, he could the better judge what arguments to use, whether of tenderness or terror, such as might prevail over your hardness and obstinacy: insomuch that you should no longer hide the name of him who tempted you to this grievous fall. But he opposes to me (with a young man's over-softness, albeit wise beyond his years), that it were wronging the very nature of woman to force her to lay open her heart's secrets in such broad daylight, and in presence of so great a multitude. Truly, as I sought to convince him, the shame lay in the commission of the sin, and not in the showing of it forth. What say you to it, once again. Brother Dimmesdale? Must it be thou, or I. that shall deal with this poor sinner's soul?"

There was a murmur among the dignified and reverend occupants of the balcony; and Governor Bellingham gave expression to its purport, speaking in an authoritative voice, although tempered with respect towards the youthful clergyman whom he addressed.

"Good Master Dimmesdale," said he, "the responsibility of this woman's soul lies greatly with you. It behooves you, therefore, to exhort her to repentance and to confession, as a proof and consequence thereof."

The directness of this appeal drew the eyes of the whole crowd upon the Reverend Mr. Dimmesdale—a young clergyman, who had come from one of the great English universities. bringing all the learning of the age into our wild forest land. His eloquence and religious fervor had already given the earnest of high eminence in his profession. He was a person of very striking aspect, with a white, lofty, and impending brow, large, brown, melancholy eyes, and a mouth which, unless when he forcibly compressed it, was apt to be tremulous, expressing both nervous sensibility and a vast power of self-restraint. Notwithstanding his high native gifts and scholar-like attainments, there was an air about this young minister—an apprehensive, a startled, a half-frightened look, as of a being who felt himself quite astray, and at a loss in the pathway of human existence, and governor of Massachusetts in 1641, 1654, and 1665-72

 John Wilson, pastor of the First Church, Boston, from 1632 till 1667

could only be at ease in some seclusion of his own. Therefore, so far as his duties would permit, he trod in the shadowy by-paths, and thus kept himself simple and childlike; coming forth, when occasion was, with a freshness, and fragrance, and dewy purity of thought, which, as many people said, affected them like the speech of an angel.

Such was the young man whom the Reverend Mr. Wilson and the Governor had introduced so openly to the public notice, bidding him speak, in the hearing of all men, to that mystery of a woman's soul, so sacred even in its pollution. The trying nature of his position drove the blood from his cheek, and made his lips tremulous.

"Speak to the woman, my brother," said Mr. Wilson. "It is of moment to her soul, and, therefore, as the worshipful Governor says, momentous to thine own, in whose charge hers is. Exhort her to confess the truth!"

The Reverend Mr. Dimmesdale bent his head, in silent prayer, as it seemed, and then came forward.

"Hester Prynne," said he, leaning over the balcony and looking down steadfastly into her eyes, "thou hearest what this good man says, and seest the accountability under which I labor. If thou feelest it to be for thy soul's peace, and that thy earthly punishment will thereby be made more effectual to salvation, I charge thee to speak out the name of thy fellow-sinner and fellow-sufferer! Be not silent from any mistaken pity and tenderness for him: for, believe me, Hester, though he were to step down from a high place, and stand there beside thee, on thy pedestal of shame, yet better were it so than to hide a guilty heart through life. What can thy silence do for him, except it tempt him-yea, compel him, as it were-to add hypocrisy to sin? Heaven hath granted thee an open ignominy, that thereby thou mayest work out an open triumph over the evil within thee, and the sorrow without. heed how thou deniest to him—who, perchance, hath not the courage to grasp it for himself the bitter, but wholesome, cup that is now presented to thy lips!"

The young pastor's voice was tremulously sweet, rich, deep, and broken. The feeling that it so evidently manifested, rather than the direct purport of the words, caused it to vibrate within all hearts, and brought the listeners into one accord of sympathy. Even the poor baby at Hester's bosom was affected by the same influence, for it directed its hitherto vacant gaze towards Mr. Dimmesdale, and held up its little arms with a half-pleased, half-plaintive murmur. So powerful seemed the minister's appeal that the people could not believe but that Hester Prynne would speak out the guilty name; or else that the guilty one himself, in whatever high or lowly place he stood, would be drawn forth by an inward and inevitable necessity, and compelled to ascend the scaffold.

Hester shook her head.

"Woman, transgress not beyond the limits of Heaven's mercy!" cried the Reverend Mr. Wilson, more harshly than before. "That little babe hath been gifted with a voice, to second and confirm the counsel which thou hast heard. Speak out the name! That, and thy repentance, may avail to take the scarlet letter off thy breast"

"Never!" replied Hester Prynne, looking, not at Mr. Wilson, but into the deep and troubled eyes of the younger clergyman. "It is too deeply branded. Ye cannot take it off. And would that I might endure his agony as well as mine!"

"Speak, woman!" said another voice, coldly and sternly, proceeding from the crowd about the scaffold. "Speak; and give your child a father!"

"I will not speak!" answered Hester, turning pale as death, but responding to this voice, which she too surely recognized. "And my child must seek a heavenly Father; she shall never know an earthly one!"

"She will not speak!" murmured Mr. Dimmesdale, who, leaning over the balcony, with his hand upon his heart, had awaited the result of his appeal. He now drew back with a long respiration. "Wondrous strength and generosity of a woman's heart! She will not speak!"

Discerning the impracticable state of the poor culprit's mind, the elder clergyman, who had carefully prepared himself for the occasion, addressed to the multitude a discourse on sin. in all its branches, but with continual reference to the ignominious letter. So forcibly did he dwell upon this symbol, for the hour or more during which his periods were rolling over the people's heads, that it assumed new terrors in their imagination, and seemed to derive its scarlet hue from the flames of the infernal pit. Hester Prynne, meanwhile, kept her place upon the pedestal of shame, with glazed eyes, and an air of weary indifference. She had borne that morning all that nature could endure; and as her temperament was not of the order that escapes from too intense suffering by a swoon, her spirit could only shelter itself beneath a stony crust of insensibility, while the faculties of animal life remained entire. In this state, the voice of the preacher thundered remorselessly, but unavailingly, upon her ears. The infant, during the latter portion of her ordeal, pierced the air with its wailings and screams; she strove to hush it, mechanically, but seemed scarcely to sympathize with its trouble. With the same hard demeanor, she was led back to prison, and vanished from the public gaze within its iron-clamped portal. It was whispered by those who peered after her, that the scarlet letter threw a lurid gleam along the dark passageway of the interior.

1849-1850 1850

From THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES

XVIII

GOVERNOR PYNCHEON

Judge Pyncheon, <sup>1</sup> while his two relatives have fled away with such ill-considered haste, still sits in the old parlor, keeping house, as the familiar phrase is, in the absence of its ordinary occupants. To him, and to the venerable House of the Seven Gables, does our story

¹ In Hawthorne's novel, Col. Pyncheon in about 1660 had laid apparently unlawful claim to a prece of land belonging to Matthew Maule, a man of humble station. The dispute had ended when Matthew Maule—some said at the instigation of Col. Pyncheon—had been hanged as a wizard. His last words on the scaffold, as he pointed his finger at the Colonel had been, "God will give him blood to drink." The prophecy was remembered some years later, on the occasion of the Colonel's great house-warming in the new sevengabled mansion erected on the site of Maule's hut and garden-spot, when, after the guests had all assembled, Col. Pyncheon was found dead at his desk in his library, with blood on his ruff and beard. Maule's curse was again remembered one hundred years later when another Pyncheon died under similar circumstances. In the mid-nineteenth century the violent death of one member of the Pyncheon family at the hands of another had aroused the memories of the superstitious. The owner of the estate was then a rich Judge Pyncheon who allowed his very poor cousin Hepzibah Pyncheon to inhabit the house of the seven gables. Her rather simple-minded brother Clifford, who had been accused of the murder of the former heir, his bachelor uncle, had after about thirty years of imprisonment returned to Hepzibah, his mind almost a blank, and more like a gentle child than a man. Happy, cheerful little Phoebe Pyncheon, the daughter of another cousin, had also come to live with Hepzibah.

In the two preceding chapters Judge Pyncheon has announced to Hepzibah that he must see Clifford to get from him the secret of where the documents or deeds conveying vast estates of the Hyncheons lie hid. When Hepzibah insists that Clifford does not know, Judge Pyncheon states the alternative: Clifford must either tell or go to an insane asylum. Hepzibah, after resisting the demand as bravely as she can, has at last gone to call her brother. She does not find him until returning she meets him at the door of the parlor. Frightened by what they both see within, they hastily leave the house.

now betake itself, like an owl, bewildered in the daylight, and hastening back to his hollow

The Judge has not shifted his position for a long while now. He has not stirred hand or foot, nor withdrawn his eyes so much as a hair's breadth from their fixed gaze towards the corner of the room, since the footsteps of Hepzibah and Clifford creaked along the passage, and the outer door was closed cautiously behind their exit. He holds his watch in his left hand. but clutched in such a manner that you cannot see the dial-plate. How profound a fit of meditation! Or, supposing him asleep, how infantile a quietude of conscience, and what wholesome order in the gastric region, are betokened by slumber so entirely undisturbed with starts, cramp, twitches, muttered dream-talk, trumpetblasts through the nasal organ, or any the slightest irregularity of breath! You must hold your own breath, to satisfy yourself whether he breathes at all. It is quite inaudible. You hear the ticking of his watch; his breath you do not hear. A most refreshing slumber, doubtless! And yet, the Judge cannot be asleep. His eyes are open! A veteran politician, such as he, would never fall asleep with wide-open eyes, lest some enemy or mischiefmaker, taking him thus at unawares, should peep through these windows into his consciousness, and make strange discoveries among the reminiscences, projects, hopes, apprehensions, weaknesses, and strong points, which he has heretofore shared with nobody. A cautious man is proverbially said to sleep with one eye open. That may be wisdom. But not with both: for this were heedlessness! No. no! Judge Pyncheon cannot be asleep.

It is odd, however, that a gentleman so burdened with engagements—and noted, too, for punctuality, should linger thus in an old lonely mansion, which he has never seemed very fond of visiting. The oaken chair, to be sure, may tempt him with its roominess. It is, indeed, a spacious, and, allowing for the rude age that fashioned it, a moderately easy seat, with capacity enough, at all events, and offering no restraint to the Judge's breadth of beam. A bigger man might find ample accommodation in it. His ancestor, now pictured upon the wall, with all his English beef about him, used hardly to present a front extending from elbow to elbow of this chair, or a base that would cover its whole cushion. But there are better chairs than this,—mahogany, black walnut, rosewood, spring-seated and damask-cushioned, with varied slopes, and innumerable artifices to make them easy, and obviate the irksomeness of too tame an ease,-a score of such might be at Judge Pyncheon's service. Yes! in a score of drawing-rooms he would be more than welcome. Mamma would advance to meet him. with outstretched hand: the virgin daughter. elderly as he has now got to be.—an old widower, as he smilingly describes himself.—would shake up the cushion for the Judge, and do her pretty little utmost to make him comfortable. For the Judge is a prosperous man. He cherishes his schemes, moreover, like other people. and reasonably brighter than most others; or did so, at least, as he lay abed, this morning. in an agreeable half-drowse, planning the business of the day, and speculating on the probabilities of the next fifteen years. With his firm health, and the little inroad that age has made upon him, fifteen years or twenty—ves, or perhaps five-and-twenty!—are no more than he may fairly call his own. Five-and-twenty years for the enjoyment of his real estate in town and country, his railroad, bank, and insurance shares, his United States stock,-his wealth, in short, however invested, now in possession, or soon to be acquired; together with the public honors that have fallen upon him, and the weightier ones that are vet to fall! It is good! It is excellent! It is enough!

Still lingering in the old chair! If the Judge has a little time to throw away, why does not he visit the insurance office, as is his frequent custom, and sit awhile in one of their leathern-cushioned arm-chairs, listening to the gossip of the day, and dropping some deeply-designed chance-word, which will be certain to become the gossip of tomorrow! And have not the bank directors a meeting, at which it was the Judge's purpose to be present, and his office to preside? Indeed they have; and the hour is noted on a card, which is, or ought to be, in Judge Pyncheon's right vest-pocket. Let him go thither, and loll at ease upon his money-bags! He has lounged long enough in the old chair!

This was to have been such a busy day! In the first place, the interview with Clifford. Half an hour, by the Judge's reckoning, was to suffice for that; it would probably be less. but.—taking into consideration that Hepzibah was first to be dealt with, and that these women are apt to make many words where a few would do much better—it might be safest to allow half an hour. Half an hour? Why, Judge, it is already two hours, by your own undeviatingly accurate chronometer! Glance your eye down at it, and see! Ah! he will not give himself the trouble either to bend his head, or elevate his hand, so as to bring the faithful time-keeper within his range of vision! Time, all at once, appears to have become a matter of no moment with the Judge!

And has he forgotten all the other items of his memoranda? Clifford's affair arranged, he was to meet a State Street 1 broker, who has undertaken to procure a heavy percentage, and the best of paper, for a few loose thousands which the Judge happens to have by him, uninvested. The wrinkled note-shaver 2 will have taken his railroad trip in vain. Half an hour later, in the street next to this, there was to be an auction of real estate, including a portion of the old Pyncheon property, originally belonging to Maule's garden-ground. It has been alienated from the Pyncheons these fourscore years; but the Judge had kept it in his eye, and had set his heart on reannexing it to the small demesne still left around the Seven Gables; and now, during this odd fit of oblivion, the fatal hammer must have fallen, and transferred our ancient patrimony to some alien possessor! Possibly, indeed, the sale may have been postponed till fairer weather. If so, will the Judge make it convenient to be present, and favor the auctioneer with his bid, on the proximate occasion?

The next affair was to buy a horse for his own driving. The one heretofore his favorite stumbled, this very morning, on the road to town, and must be at once discarded. Judge Pyncheon's neck is too precious to be risked on such a contingency as a stumbling steed. Should all the above business be seasonably got through with, he might attend the meeting of a charitable society; the very name of which, however, in the multiplicity of his benevolence. is quite forgotten; so that this engagement may pass unfulfilled, and no great harm done. And if he have time, amid the press of more urgent matters, he must take measures for the renewal of Mrs. Pyncheon's tombstone, which, the sexton tells him, has fallen on its marble face, and is cracked quite in twain. She was a praiseworthy woman enough, thinks the Judge, in spite of her nervousness, and the tears that she was so oozy with, and her foolish behavior about the coffee; and as she took her departure so seasonably, he will not grudge the second tombstone. It is better, at least, than if she had never needed any! The next item on his list was to give orders for some fruit-trees, of a rare variety, to be deliverable at his countryseat in the ensuing autumn. Yes, buy them, by all means: and may the peaches be luscious in your mouth, Judge Pyncheon! After this comes something more important. A committee of his political party has besought him for a hundred or two of dollars, in addition to his previous disbursements, towards carrying on the fall campaign. The Judge is a patriot; the fate of the country is staked on the November election; and besides, as will be shadowed forth in another paragraph, he has no trifling stake of his own in the same great game. He will do what the committee asks; nay, he will be liberal beyond their expectations; they shall have a check for five hundred dollars, and more anon. if it be needed. What next? A decayed widow, whose husband was Judge Pyncheon's early friend, has laid her case of destitution before him, in a very moving letter. She and her fair daughter have scarcely bread to eat. He partly intends to call on her, today,—perhaps so perhaps not,—accordingly as he may happen to have leisure, and a small bank note.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a business street in Boston <sup>2</sup> one who buys promissory notes at a higher rate of the count than is current

Another business, which, however, he puts no great weight on—(it is well, you know, to be heedful, but not over anxious, as respects one's personal health)—another business, then, was to consult his family physician. About what, for Heaven's sake? Why, it is rather difficult to describe the symptoms. A mere dimness of sight and dizziness of brain, was it?—or a disagreeable choking, or stifling, or gurgling, or bubbling, in the region of the thorax, as the anatomists say?—or was it a pretty severe throbbing and kicking of the heart, rather creditable to him than otherwise, as showing that the organ had not been left out of the Judge's physical contrivance? No matter what it was. The doctor, probably, would smile at the statement of such trifles to his professional ear; the Judge would smile, in his turn; and meeting one another's eyes, they would enjoy a hearty laugh together! But a fig for medical advice. The Judge will never need it!

Pray, pray, Judge Pyncheon, look at your watch, now! What—not a glance! It is within ten minutes of the dinner-hour! It surely cannot have slipped your memory that the dinner of today is to be the most important, in its consequences, of all the dinners you ever ate. Yes, precisely the most important; although, in the course of your somewhat eminent career, you have been placed high towards the head of the table, at splendid banquets, and have poured out your festive eloquence to ears yet echoing with Webster's mighty organ-tones. No public dinner this, however. It is merely a gathering of some dozen or so of friends from several districts of the state; men of distinguished character and influence, assembling, almost casually, at the house of a common friend. likewise distinguished, who will make them welcome to a little better than his ordinary fare. Nothing in the way of French cookery, but an excellent dinner nevertheless. Real turtle, we understand, and salmon, tautog, canvas-backs, pig. English mutton, good roast beef, or dainties of that serious kind, fit for substantial country gentlemen, as these honorable persons mostly are. The delicacies of the season, in short, and flavored by a brand of old Madeira which has been the pride of many seasons. It is the Juno brand: a glorious wine, fragrant, and full of gentle might: a bottled-up happiness, put by for use; a golden liquid, worth more than liquid gold; so rare and admirable, that veteran winebibbers count it among their epochs to have tasted it! It drives away the heart-ache, and substitutes no head-ache! Could the Judge but quaff a glass, it might enable him to shake off the unaccountable lethargy which (for the ten intervening minutes, and five to boot, are already past) has made him such a laggard at this momentous dinner. It would all but revive a dead man! Would you like to sip it now, Judge Pyncheon?

Alas, this dinner! Have you really forgotten its true object? Then let us whisper it, that you may start at once out of the oaken chair, which really seems to be enchanted, like the one in Comus, or that in which Moll Pitcher imprisoned your own grandmother. 1 But ambition is a talisman more powerful than witch-Start up, then, and hurrying through the streets, burst in upon the company, that they may begin before the fish is spoiled! They wait for you; and it is little for your interest that they should wait. These gentlemen-need you be told it?—have assembled, not without purpose, from every quarter of the state. They are practiced politicians, every man of them, and skilled to adjust those preliminary measures which steal from the people, without its knowledge, the power of choosing its own rulers. The popular voice, at the next gubernatorial election, though loud as thunder, will be really <sup>1</sup> Comus, the evil spirit in Milton's masque, by his enchantment, prevents the lady from arising from the chair in which he has seated her. Moll Pitcher was a fortune-teller of Lynn, Massachusetts, who died in 1813. C. W. Upham, in his Lectures on Witchcraft, says: "... She derived her mysterious gifts by inheritance, her grandfather having practiced them before in Marblehead. Sailors, merchants, and adventurers of every kind visited her residence, and placed confidence in her predictions." According to Whittier, she foretold by consulting tea-leaves. See Whittier's suppressed poem, "Moll Pitcher"; also Alonzo Lewis's History of Lynn. Hawthorne apparently invents the story of her rivaling Comus.

but an echo of what these gentlemen shall speak, under their breath, at your friend's festive board. They meet to decide upon their candidate. This little knot of subtle schemers will control the convention, and, through it. dictate to the party. And what worthier candidate-more wise and learned, more noted for philanthropic liberality, truer to safe principles, tried oftener by public trusts, more spotless in private character, with a larger stake in the common welfare, and deeper grounded, by hereditary descent, in the faith and practice of the Puritans,-what man can be presented for the suffrage of the people, so eminently combining all these claims to the chief-rulership as Judge Pyncheon here before us?

Make haste, then! Do your part! The meed for which you have toiled, and fought, and climbed, and crept, is ready for your grasp! Be present at this dinner!—drink a glass or two of that noble wine!—make your pledges in as low a whisper as you will!—and you rise up from table virtually governor of the glorious old state! Governor Pyncheon, of Massachusetts!

And is there no potent and exhilarating cordial in a certainty like this? It has been the grand purpose of half your lifetime to obtain it. Now, when there needs little more than to signify your acceptance, why do you sit so lumpishly in your great-great-grandfather's oaken chair, as if preferring it to the gubernatorial one? We have all heard of King Log; ¹ but, in these jostling times, one of that royal kindred will hardly win the race for an elective chief-magistracy.

Well! it is absolutely too late for dinner! Turtle, salmon, tautog, woodcock, boiled turkey, South-Down mutton, pig, roast beef, have vanished, or exist only in fragments, with lukewarm potatoes, and gravies crusted over with cold fat. The Judge, had he done nothing else, would have achieved wonders with his knife and fork. It was he, you know, of whom it used to be said, in reference to his ogre-like appetite. that his creator made him a great animal, but that the dinner hour made him a great beast. Persons of his large sensual endowments must claim indulgence, at their feeding-time. But, for once, the Judge is entirely too late for dinner! Too late, we fear, even to join the party The guests are warm and at their wine! merry; they have given up the Judge; and, concluding that the Free-Soilers 2 have him, they will fix upon another candidate. Were

 See note 3, p. 180.
 The Free-Soil party, organized in 1848, believed in stipulating, on the admission of a state or territory, that slavery should not exist within its boundaries.

our friend now to stalk in among them, with that wide-open stare, at once wild and stolid, his ungenial presence would be apt to change their cheer. Neither would it be seemly in Judge Pyncheon, generally so scrupulous in his attire, to show himself at a dinner-table with that crimson stain upon his shirt-bosom. By the bye, how came it there? It is an ugly sight, at any rate: and the wisest way for the judge is to button his coat closely over his breast, and taking his horse and chaise from the livery-stable, to make all speed to his own house. There, after a glass of brandy and water, and a mutton chop, a beef steak, a broiled fowl, or some such hasty little dinner and supper all in one, he had better spend the evening by the fireside. He must toast his slippers a long while, in order to get rid of the chilliness which the air of this vile old house has sent curdling through his veins.

Up, therefore, Judge Pyncheon, up! You have lost a day. But tomorrow will be here anon. Will you rise, betimes, and make the most of it? Tomorrow! Tomorrow! Tomorrow! We, that are alive, may rise betimes tomorrow. As for him that has died today, his morrow will be the resurrection morn.

Meanwhile the twilight is glooming upward out of the corners of the room. The shadows of the tall furniture grow deeper, and at first become more definite; then, spreading wider, they lose their distinctness of outline in the dark gray tide of oblivion, as it were, that creeps slowly over the various objects, and the one human figure sitting in the midst of them. The gloom has not entered from without: it has brooded here all day, and now, taking its own inevitable time, will possess itself of everything. The Judge's face, indeed, rigid, and singularly white, refuses to melt into this universal solvent. Fainter and fainter grows the light. It is as if another double handful of darkness had been scattered through the air. Now it is no longer gray, but sable. There is still a faint appearance at the window; neither a glow, nor a gleam, nor a glimmer,-any phase of light would express something far brighter than this doubtful perception, or sense, rather, that there is a window there. Has it yet vanished? No!—ves!—not quite! And there is still the swarthy whiteness,-we shall venture to marry these ill-agreeing words,—the swarthy whiteness of Judge Pyncheon's face. The features are all gone: there is only the paleness of them left. And how looks it now? There is no window! There is no face! An infinite, inscrutable blackness has annihilated sight! Where is our universe? All crumbled away from us: and we, adrift in chaos, may hearken to the gusts of homeless wind, that go sighing and murmuring about, in quest of what was once a world!

Is there no other sound? One other, and a fearful one. It is the ticking of the Judge's watch, which, ever since Hepzibah left the room in search of Clifford, he has been holding in his hand. Be the cause what it may, this little, quiet, never-ceasing throb of Time's pulse, repeating its small strokes with such busy regularity, in Judge Pyncheon's motionless hand, has an effect of terror, which we do not find in any other accompaniment of the scene. 1

But, listen! That puff of the breeze was louder; it had a tone unlike the dreary and sullen one which has bemoaned itself, and afflicted all mankind with miserable sympathy. for five days past. The wind has veered about! It now comes boisterously from the northwest. and, taking hold of the aged frame-work of the Seven Gables, gives it a shake, like a wrestler that would try strength with his antagonist. Another and another sturdy tussle with the blast! The old house creaks again, and makes a vociferous but somewhat unintelligible bellowing in its sooty throat (the big flue, we mean, of its wide chimney) partly in complaint at the rude wind, but rather, as befits their century and a half of hostile intimacy, in tough defiance. A rumbling kind of a bluster roars behind the fire-board. 2 A door has slammed above-stairs. A window, perhaps, has been left open, or else is driven in by an unruly gust. It is not to be conceived, beforehand, what wonderful wind-instruments are these old timber mansions, and how haunted with the strangest noises, which immediately begin to sing, and sigh, and sob, and shriek,-and to smite with sledge-hammers, airy, but ponderous, in some distant chamber .-- and to tread along the entries as with stately footsteps, and rustle up and down the staircase, as with silks miraculously stiff,—whenever the gale catches the house with a window open, and gets fairly into it. Would that we were not an attendant spirit here! It is too awful! This clamor of the wind through the lonely house; the Judge's quietude, as he sits invisible; and that pertinacious ticking of his watch!

As regards Judge Pyncheon's invisibility. however, that matter will soon be remedied. The northwest wind has swept the sky clear. The window is distinctly seen. Through its panes, moreover, we dimly catch the sweep of the dark, clustering foliage, outside, fluttering with a constant irregularity of movement, and letting in a peep of starlight, now here, now there Oftener than any other object, these glimpses illuminate the Judge's face. But here comes more effectual light. Observe that silvery dance upon the upper branches of the pear tree, and now a little lower, and now on the whole mass of boughs, while, through their shifting intricacies, the moonbeams fall aslant into the room. They play over the Judge's figure, and show that he has not stirred throughout the hours of darkness. They follow the shadows, in changeful sport, across his unchanging features. They gleam upon his watch. His grasp conceals the dial-plate; but we know that the faithful hands have met: for one of the city clocks tells midnight.

A man of sturdy understanding, like Judge Pyncheon, cares no more for twelve o'clock at night than for the corresponding hour of noon. However just the parallel drawn, in some of the preceding pages, between his Puritan ancestor and himself, it fails in this point. The Pyncheon of two centuries ago, in common with most of his contemporaries, professed his full belief in spiritual ministrations, although reckoning them chiefly of a malignant character. The Pyncheon of tonight, who sits in yonder arm-chair, believes in no such nonsense. Such, at least, was his creed, some few hours since. His hair will not bristle, therefore, at the stories which-in times when chimney-corners had benches in them, where old people sat poking into the ashes of the past, and raking out traditions like live coals—used to be told about this very room of his ancestral house. In fact. these tales are too absurd to bristle even childhood's hair. What sense, meaning, or moral, for example, such as even ghost-stories should be susceptible of, can be traced in the ridiculous legend, that, at midnight, all the dead Pyncheons are bound to assemble in this parlor? And, pray, for what? Why, to see whether the portrait of their ancestor still keeps its place upon the wall, in compliance with his testamentary directions! 3 Is it worth while to come out of their graves for that?

We are tempted to make a little sport with the idea. Ghost-stories are hardly to be treated seriously, any longer. The family-party of the defunct Pyncheons, we presume, goes off in this wise.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The same effect is produced in Stevenson's "Mark-heim" by the ticking of innumerable clocks in the antique shop.

<sup>2</sup> the wooden screen for the fireplace formerly used when there was no fire

<sup>3</sup> The portrait of the first Colonel Pyncheon, who built the house, was, according to the supposed terms of his will, to remain fixed to the wall.

First comes the ancestor himself, in his black cloak, steeple-hat, and trunk-breeches, girt about the waist with a leathern belt, in which hangs his steel-hilted sword; he has a long staff in his hand, such as gentlemen in advanced life used to carry, as much for the dignity of the thing as for the support to be derived from it. He looks up at the portrait: a thing of no substance, gazing at its own painted image! All is safe. The picture is still there. The purpose of his brain has been kept sacred thus long after the man himself has sprouted up in gravevard grass. See! he lifts his ineffectual hand. and tries the frame. All safe! But is that a smile?—is it not, rather, a frown of deadly import, that darkens over the shadow of his features? The stout Colonel is dissatisfied! So decided is his look of discontent as to impart additional distinctness to his features: through which, nevertheless, the moonlight passes, and flickers on the wall beyond. Something has strangely vexed the ancestor! With a grim shake of the head, he turns away. Here come other Pyncheons, the whole tribe, in their half a dozen generations, jostling and elbowing one another, to reach the picture. We behold aged men and grandames, a clergyman with the Puritanic stiffness still in his garb and mien, and a red-coated officer of the old French war; 1 and there comes the shop-keeping Pyncheon of a century ago, with the ruffles turned back from his wrists; and there the periwigged and brocaded gentleman of the artist's legend, 2 with the beautiful and pensive Alice, who brings no pride out of her virgin grave. All try the picture frame. What do these ghostly people seek? A mother lifts her child, that his little hands may touch it! There is evidently a mystery about the picture, that perplexes these poor Pyncheons when they ought to be at rest. In a corner, meanwhile, stands the figure of an elderly man, 3 in a leather jerkin and breeches, with a carpenter's rule sticking out of his side pocket; he points his finger at the bearded Colonel and his descendants,

3 Matthew Maule's son: he had built the house and hidden away the deed.

nodding, jeering, mocking, and finally bursting into obstreperous, though inaudible laughter.

Indulging our fancy in this freak, we have partly lost the power of restraint and guidance. We distinguish an unlooked-for figure in our visionary scene. Among those ancestral people there is a young man, dressed in the very fashion of today: he wears a dark frock-coat. almost destitute of skirts, gray pantaloons, gaiter boots of patent leather, and has a finely wrought gold chain across his breast, and a little silver-headed whalebone stick in his hand. Were we to meet this figure at noonday, we should greet him as young Jaffrey Pyncheon, the Judge's only surviving child, who has been spending the last two years in foreign travel. If still in life, how comes his shadow hither? If dead, what a misfortune! The old Pyncheon property, together with the great estate acquired by the young man's father, would devolve on whom? On poor, foolish Clifford, gaunt Hepzibah, and rustic little Phoebe! But another and a greater marvel greets us! Can we believe our eyes? A stout, elderly gentleman has made his appearance; he has an aspect of eminent respectability, wears a black coat and pantaloons, of roomy width, and might be pronounced scrupulously neat in his attire, but for a broad crimson stain across his snowy neckcloth and down his shirt-bosom. Is it the Judge, or no? How can it be Judge Pyncheon? We discern his figure, as plainly as the flickering moonbeams can show us anything, still seated in the oaken chair! Be the apparition whose it may, it advances to the picture, seems to seize the frame, tries to peep behind it, and turns away, with a frown as black as the ancestral one.

The fantastic scene just hinted at must by no means be considered as forming an actual portion of our story. We were betrayed into this brief extravagance by the quiver of the moonbeams; they dance hand-in-hand with shadows, and are reflected in the looking-glass, which, you are aware, is always a kind of window or doorway into the spiritual world. We needed relief, moreover, from our too long and exclusive contemplation of that figure in the chair. This wild wind, too, has tossed our thoughts into strange confusion, but without tearing them away from their one determined center. Yonder leaden Judge sits immovably upon our soul. Will he never stir again? We shall go mad, unless he stirs! You may the better estimate his quietude by the fearlessness of a little mouse, which sits on its hind legs, in a streak of moonlight, close by Judge

&lt;sup>1</sup> the French and Indian War, 1754-1763
<sup>2</sup> Holgrave, the daguerreotype artist, a minor character, te'ls the story of Gervayse Pyncheon, who in his effort to find the missing deed, allowed his daughter, Alice, to fall under the spell of one of the Maules, who was thought to have inherited the art of witchcraft. Neither then nor later did the Pyncheons discover the secret, but Holgrave, a descendant of the Maules', at the end of the story finds the deed hidden in a recess behind the picture of Colonel Pyncheon.

Pyncheon's foot, and seems to meditate a journey of exploration over this great black bulk. Ha! what has startled the nimble little mouse? It is the visage of grimalkin, outside of the window, where he appears to have posted himself for a deliberate watch. This grimalkin has a very ugly look. Is it a cat watching for a mouse, or the devil for a human soul? Would we could scare him from the window!

Thank Heaven, the night is well-nigh past! The moonbeams have no longer so silvery a gleam, nor contrast so strongly with the blackness of the shadows among which they fall. They are paler, now: the shadows look gray. The boisterous wind is hushed. not black. What is the hour? Ah! the watch has at last ceased to tick; for the Judge's forgetful fingers neglected to wind it up, as usual, at ten o'clock, being half an hour or so before his ordinary bed-time, -and it has run down, for the first time in five years. But the great world-clock of Time still keeps its beat. The dreary nightfor, oh, how dreary seems its haunted waste. behind us!—gives place to a fresh, transparent. cloudless morn. Blessed, blessed radiance! The daybeam—even what little of it finds its wav into this always dusky parlor-seems part of the universal benediction, annulling evil, and rendering all goodness possible, and happiness attainable. Will Judge Pyncheon now rise up from his chair? Will he go forth, and receive the early sunbeams on his brow? Will he begin this new day,—which God has smiled upon, and blessed, and given to mankind,will he begin it with better purposes than the many that have been spent amiss? Or are all the deep-laid schemes of vesterday as stubborn in his heart, and as busy in his brain, as ever?

In this latter case, there is much to do. Will the Judge still insist with Hepzibah on the interview with Clifford? Will he buy a safe, elderly gentleman's horse? Will he persuade the purchaser of the old Pyncheon property to relinquish the bargain in his favor? Will he see his family physician, and obtain a medicine that shall preserve him, to be an honor and blessing to his race, until the utmost term of patriarchal longevity? Will Judge Pyncheon, above all, make due apologies to that company of honorable friends, and satisfy them that his absence from the festive board was unavoidable, and so fully retrieve himself in their good opinion that he shall yet be Governor of Massachusetts? And, all these great purposes accomplished, will he walk the streets again, with that dog-day smile of elaborate benevolence, sultry enough to tempt flies to come and buzz in it? Or will he, after the tomb-like seclusion of the past day and night, go forth a humbled and repentant man, sorrowful, gentle, seeking no profit, shrinking from worldly honor, hardly daring to love God, but bold to love his fellowman, and to do him what good he may? Will he bear about with him,—no odious grin of feigned benignity, insolent in its pretence, and loathsome in its falsehood,—but the tender sadness of a contrite heart. broken, at last, beneath its own weight of sin? For it is our belief, whatever show of honor he may have piled upon it, that there was heavy sin at the base of this man's being.

Rise up, Judge Pyncheon! The morning sunshine glimmers through the foliage, and, beautiful and holy as it is, shuns not to kindle up your face. Rise up, thou subtle, worldly, selfish, iron-hearted hypocrite, and make thy choice whether still to be subtle, worldly, selfish, iron-hearted, and hypocritical, or to tear these sins out of thy nature, though they bring the life-blood with them! The Avenger is upon thee! Rise up, before it be too late!

What! Thou art not stirred by this last appeal? No, not a jot! And there we see a fly,—one of your common house-flies, such as are always buzzing on the window-pane,—which has smelt out Governor Pyncheon, and alights, now on his forehead, now on his chin, and now, Heaven help us! is creeping over the bridge of his nose, towards the would-be chiefmagistrate's wide-open eyes! Canst thou not brush the fly away? Art thou too sluggish? Thou man, that hadst so many busy projects, yesterday! Art thou too weak, that wast so powerful? Not brush away a fly? Nay, then, we give thee up!

And hark! the shop-bell rings. After hours like these latter ones, through which we have borne our heavy tale, it is good to be made sensible that there is a living world, and that even this old, lonely mansion retains some manner of connection with it. We breathe more freely, emerging from Judge Pyncheon's presence into the street before the Seven Gables. 1850-51

RALPH WALDO EMERSON 1803-1882

Foremost among American didactic essayists and poets is Emerson, who expresses the awakened spiritual consciousness of his generation in New England. He was born in Boston of ministerial ancestry, graduated at Harvard, 1821, studied theology, and in 1829 was made minister in the pulpit held by Cotton Mather a century before, but which now had become Unitarian. Four years later he left the formal ministry, though he continued occasionally to preach. After a tour abroad he settled at Concord in 1834 where he spent the remainder of his life, and where he died. Collections of his poems were published in 1846, 1865, 1878. Conspicuous among his prose works are: The American Scholar, 1837; Divinity College Address, 1838; Essays, first series, 1841, second series, 1844; Representative Men. 1850: The Conduct of Life, 1860: Letters and Social Aims, 1875.

Two general views are held concerning Emerson's place as a poet. Some feel in him a manifest deficiency in artistic sense. This appears in thin and imperfect rimes, unnatural inversions in word order, lack of melody, inability to use verse forms suitable to his subjects, and general carelessness of artistic technique. Other critics stress his high-spirited presentation of Nature; he held it to be at one and the same time a part of the Divine Idea and a constant object of beauty for everyday men. He is also ranked high for the glow of moral enthusiasm that illuminates his verse, and for the frequent flashes of insight expressed in lines that cannot be forgotten or surpassed.

His prose has many of the qualities of his poetry, good and bad. Like Carlyle, he had faith in the inner vision and consciousness; he believed that the highest truth comes not from reasoning and experience, but from intuition. This belief, one of the tenets of Transcendentalism, caused him to be classed as a New England Transcendentalist, though he was not formally of that cult. His prose, like his poetry, may lack constructive skill, but like his poetry, it is full of a passionate earnestness pointed by wit, wisdom, and paradox. Of our greater nineteenth century writers, no other has produced so vital an effect on the minds and lives of his readers. Lowell speaks of him as a "fecundating" energy.

Biography and criticism: B. Perry, The Heart of Emerson's Journals, 1926; Richard Garnett, Life of Emerson, (GW) 1888; O. W. Firkins, same, 1915; G. E. Woodberry, R. W. Emerson, (EML) 1907; Sanborn (BB); Holmes (AML); Curtis (JL); Crothers (HKA); Sherman; P. E. More, "The Influence of Emerson," Ind. 55:1183-8 and (Shel. 1 and 11); Van Wyck Brooks, "Congenial Concord: An Emersonian Episode," Harper 153: 767-72, and "Emerson and the Reformers," Harper 154:114-19; J. M. Sloan, "Carlyle and Emerson," Liv. Age 309:486-9; "Emerson," Liv. Age 292: 674-9.

SELF RELIANCE 1

"Ne te quaesiveris extra." 2

Man is his own star and the soul that can Render an honest and a perfect man, Commands all light, all influence, all fate; Nothing to him falls early or too late. Our acts our angels are, or good or ill, Our fatal shadows that walk by us still.

Epilogue to Beaumont and Fletcher's Honest Man's Fortunes.

I read the other day some verses written by an eminent painter which were original and not conventional. The soul always hears an admonition in such lines. let the subject be what it The sentiment they instill is of more value than any thought they may contain. To believe your own thought, to believe that what is true for you in your private heart is true for all men.—that is genius. Speak your latent conviction, and it shall be the universal sense; for the inmost in due time becomes the outmost,-and our first thought is rendered back to us by the trumpets of the Last Judgment. Familiar as the voice of the mind is to each. the highest merit we ascribe to Moses. Plato. and Milton is, that they set at naught books and traditions, and spoke not what men but what they thought. A man should learn to detect and watch that gleam of light which flashes across his mind from within, more than the luster of the firmament of bards and sages. Yet he dismisses without notice his thought, because it is his. In every work of genius we recognize our own rejected thoughts: they come back to us with a certain alienated majesty. 3 Great works of art have no more affecting lesson for us than this. They teach us to abide by our spontaneous impression with good-humored inflexibility then most when the whole cry of voices is on the other side. Else, tomorrow a stranger will say with masterly good sense precisely what we have thought and felt all the time, and we shall be forced to take with shame our own opinion from another.

There is a time in every man's education when he arrives at the conviction that envy is ignorance; that imitation is suicide; that he must take himself for better, for worse, as his portion; that though the wide universe is full of good, no kernel of nourishing corn can come to him but through his toil bestowed on that plot of ground which is given to him to till. The power which resides in him is new in nature, and none but he knows what that is which he can do, nor does he know until he has tried. Not for nothing one face, one character, one fact, makes much impression on him. and another none. This sculpture in the memory is not without pre-established harmony. The eve was placed where one ray should fall. that it might testify of that particular ray. We

"we love First when we see them painted, things we have passed Perhaps a hundred times nor cared to see;

Perhaps a numered times not carred . . . Art was given for that;"

"Fra Lippo Lippi," 1, 299.

&lt;sup>1</sup> This essay of Emerson's can be profitably compared with Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.
<sup>2</sup> "Seek not beyond thyself."

<sup>3</sup> It is such perfect molding of form to thought that sets apart the maker of literature from the mere maker of phrases. Compare Browning, but half express ourselves, and are ashamed of that divine idea which each of us represents. It may be safely trusted as proportionate and of good issues, <sup>1</sup> so it be faithfully imparted, but God will not have his work made manifest by cowards. A man is relieved and gay when he has put his heart into his work and done his best; but what he has said or done otherwise shall give him no peace. It is a deliverance which does not deliver. In the attempt his genius deserts him; no muse befriends; no invention, no hope.

Trust thyself: every heart vibrates to that iron string. Accept the place the divine providence has found for you, the society of your contemporaries, the connection of events. Great men have always done so, and confided themselves childlike to the genius of their age, betraying their perception that the absolutely trustworthy was seated at their heart, working through their hands, predominating in all their being. And we are now men, and must accept in the highest mind the same transcendent destiny; and not minors and invalids in a protected corner, not cowards fleeing before a revolution, but guides, redeemers, and benefactors. obeying the Almighty effort, and advancing on Chaos and the Dark.

What pretty oracles nature yields us on this text, in the face and behavior of children, babes, and even brutes! That divided and rebel mind. that distrust of a sentiment because our arithmetic has computed the strength and means opposed to our purpose, these have not. Their mind being whole, their eye is as yet unconquered, and when we look in their faces, we are disconcerted. Infancy conforms to nobody; all conform to it, so that one babe commonly makes four or five out of the adults who prattle and play to it. So God has armed youth and puberty and manhood no less with its own piquancy and charm, and made it enviable and gracious and its claims not to be put by, if it will stand by itself. Do not think the vouth has no force, because he cannot speak to you and me. Hark! in the next room his voice is sufficiently clear and emphatic. It seems he knows how to speak to his contemporaries. Bashful or bold, then, he will know how to make us seniors very unnecessary.

The nonchalance of boys who are sure of a dinner, and would disdain as much as a lord to do or say aught to conciliate one, is the healthy attitude of human nature. A boy is in the parlor what the pit is in the playhouse; independent, irresponsible, looking out from his corner on such people and facts as pass by, he tries and sentences them on their merits. in the swift, summary way of boys, as good, bad. interesting, silly, eloquent, troublesome. He cumbers himself never about consequences, about interests; he gives an independent, genuine verdict. You must court him: he does not court you. But the man is as it were clapped into jail by his consciousness. As soon as he has once acted or spoken with éclat he is a committed person, watched by the sympathy or the hatred of hundreds, whose affections must now enter into his account. There is no Lethe 2 for this. Ah, that he could pass again into his neutrality! Who can thus avoid all pledges and having observed, observe again from the same unaffected, unbiased, unbribable, unaffrighted innocence, must always be formidable. He would utter opinions on all passing affairs, which being seen to be not private, but necessary, would sink like darts into the ear of men and put them in fear.

These are the voices which we hear in solitude, but they grow faint and inaudible as we enter into the world. Society everywhere is in conspiracy against the manhood of every one of its members. Society is a joint-stock company, in which the members agree, for the better securing of his bread to each shareholder, to surrender the liberty and culture of the eater. The virtue in most request is conformity. Self-reliance is its aversion. It loves not realities and creators, but names and customs.

Whoso would be a man, must be a nonconformist. He who would gather immortal palms must not be hindered by the name of goodness, but must explore if it be goodness. Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of your own mind. Absolve you to yourself, and you shall have the suffrage of the world. I remember an answer which when quite young I was prompted to make to a valued adviser. who was wont to importune me with the dear old doctrines of the church. On my saying, What have I to do with the sacredness of traditions, if I live wholly from within? my friend suggested,—"But these impulses may be from below, not from above." I replied, "They do not seem to me to be such; but if I am the Devil's child, I will live then from the Devil." No law can be sacred to me but that of my Good and bad are but names very nature. readily transferable to that or this; the only right is what is after my constitution, the only wrong what is against it. A man is to carry himself in the presence of all opposition, as if every thing were titular and ephemeral but he. I am ashamed to think how easily we capitulate to badges and names, to large societies and dead institutions. Every decent and wellspoken individual affects and sways me more than is right. I ought to go upright and vital. and speak the rude truth in all ways. If malice and vanity wear the coat of philanthropy, shall that pass? If an angry bigot assumes this bountiful cause of Abolition, and comes to me with his last news from Barbadoes. 1 why should I not say to him, 'Go love thy infant; love thy wood-chopper; be good-natured and modest: have that grace: and never varnish your hard, uncharitable ambition with this incredible tenderness for black folk a thousand miles off. Thy love afar is spite at home.' Rough and graceless would be such greeting, but truth is handsomer than the affectation of love. Your goodness must have some edge to it,-else it is none. The doctrine of hatred must be preached as the counteraction of the doctrine of love when that pules and whines. I shun father and mother and wife and brother. when my genius calls me. I would write on the lintels of the door-post, Whim. I hope it is somewhat better than whim at last, but we cannot spend the day in explanation. Expect me not to show cause why I seek or why I exclude company. Then, again, do not tell me. as a good man did today, of my obligation to put all poor men in good situations. Are they my poor? I tell thee, thou foolish philanthropist, that I grudge the dollar, the dime, the cent. I give to such men as do not belong to me and to whom I do not belong. There is a class of persons to whom by all spiritual affinity I am bought and sold; for them I will go to prison, if need be; but your miscellaneous popular charities: the education at college of fools; the building of meeting-houses to the vain end to which many now stand; alms to sots; and the thousand-fold Relief Societies; -though I confess with shame I sometimes succumb and give the dollar, it is a wicked dollar which by and by I shall have the manhood to withhold.

&lt;sup>1</sup> well proportioned to our needs or abilities and fitted to bring forth good

<sup>2</sup> the river of forgetfulness in Hades

Virtues are, in the popular estimate. rather the exception than the rule. There is the man and his virtues. Men do what is called a good action, as some piece of courage or charity, much as they would pay a fine in expiation of daily non-appearance on parade. Their works are done as an apology or extenuation of their living in the world,—as invalids and the insane pay a high board. Their virtues are penances. I do not wish to expiate, but to live. My life is for itself and not for a spectacle. I much prefer that it should be of a lower strain. so it be genuine and equal, than that it should be glittering and unsteady. I wish it to be sound and sweet, and not to need diet and bleeding. I ask primary evidence that you are a man, and refuse this appeal from the man to his actions. I know that for myself it makes no difference whether I do or forbear those actions which are reckoned excellent. I cannot consent to pay for a privilege where I have intrinsic right. Few and mean as my gifts may be, I actually am, and do not need for my own assurance or the assurance of my fellows any secondary testimony.

What I must do is all that concerns me, not what the people think. This rule, equally arduous in actual and in intellectual life, may serve for the whole distinction between greatness and meanness. It is the harder because you will always find those who think they know what is your duty better than you know it. It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude. <sup>2</sup>

The objection to conforming to usages that have become dead to you is that it scatters your force. It loses your time and blurs the impression of your character. If you maintain a dead church, contribute to a dead Biblesociety, vote with a great party either for the government or against it, spread your table like base housekeepers.—under all these screens I have difficulty to detect the precise man you are. And of course so much force is withdrawn from your proper life. But do your work, 3 and I shall know you. Do your work, and vou shall reinforce vourself. A man must consider what a blind-man's-buff is this game of conformity. If I know your sect I anticipate your argument. I hear a preacher announce for his text and topic the expediency of one of the institutions of his church. Do I not know beforehand that not possibly can he say a new and spontaneous word? Do I not know that with all this ostentation of examining the grounds of the institution he will do no such thing? Do I not know that he is pledged to himself not to look but at one side, the permitted side, not as a man, but as a parish minister? He is a retained attorney, and these airs of the bench are the emptiest affectation. Well, most men have bound their eyes with one or another handkerchief, and attached themselves to some one of these communities of opinion. This conformity makes them not false in a few particulars, authors of a few lies, but false in all particulars. Their every truth is not quite true. Their two is not the real two, their four not the real four; so that every word they say chagrins us and we know not where to begin Meantime nature is not to set them right. slow to equip us in the prison-uniform of the party to which we adhere. We come to wear one cut of face and figure, and acquire by degrees the gentlest asinine expression. There is a mortifying experience in particular, which does not fail to wreak itself also in the general history; I mean "the foolish face of praise," the forced smile which we put on in company where we do not feel at ease in answer to conversation which does not interest us. muscles, not spontaneously moved, but moved by a low usurping willfulness, grow tight about the outline of the face with the most disagreeable sensation.

<sup>1</sup> One of the British West India Islands; slavery was abolished there in 1834.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Emerson shaped his own life by this bracing maxim.
<sup>3</sup> Cf. Carlyle: "Cast forth thy Act, thy Word, into the ever-living, ever-working Universe: it is a seed grain that cannot die; unnoticed today (says one), it will be found flourishing as a Banyan grove (perhaps, alas, as a Hemlock forest!) after a thousand years." Sartor Resaitus, Bk. 1, Ch. 5.

For nonconformity the world whips you with its displeasure. And therefore a man must know how to estimate a sour face. The bystanders look askance on him in the public street or in the friend's parlor. If this aversation 1 had its origin in contempt and resistance like his own he might well go home with a sad countenance; but the sour faces of the multitude, like their sweet faces, have no deep cause, but are put on and off as the wind blows and a newspaper directs. Yet is the discontent of the multitude more formidable than that of the senate and the college. It is easy enough for a firm man who knows the world to brook the rage of the cultivated classes. Their rage is decorous and prudent, for they are timid, as being very vulnerable themselves. But when to their feminine rage the indignation of the people is added, when the ignorant and the poor are aroused, when the unintelligent brute force that lies at the bottom of society is made to growl and mow, it needs the habit of magnanimity and religion to treat it godlike as a trifle of no concernment.

The other terror that scares us from selftrust is our consistency; a reverence for our past act or word because the eyes of others have no other data for computing our orbit than our past acts, and we are loath to disappoint them.

1 hatred, aversion

But why should you keep your head over your shoulder? Why drag about this corpse of your memory, lest you contradict somewhat you have stated in this or that public place? Suppose you should contradict yourself; what then? It seems to be a rule of wisdom never to rely on your memory alone, scarcely even in acts of pure memory, but to bring the past for judgment into the thousand-eved present, and live ever in a new day. In your metaphysics you have denied personality to the Deity: yet when the devout motions of the soul come, yield to them heart and life, though they should clothe God with shape and color. Leave your theory, as Joseph 2 his coat in the hand of the harlot, and flee.

A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines. With consistency a great soul has simply nothing to do. He may as well concern himself with his shadow on the wall. Speak what you think now in hard words. and tomorrow speak what tomorrow thinks in hard words again, though it contradict every thing you said today.—"Ah, so you shall be sure to be misunderstood."—Misunderstood. Is it so bad, then, to be misunderstood? Pythagoras was misunderstood, and Socrates and Jesus, and Luther and Copernicus, and Galileo, and Newton, and every pure and wise spirit that ever took flesh. 3 To be great is to be mis-

I suppose no man can violate his nature. All the sallies of his will are rounded in by the law of his being, as the inequalities of Andes and Himmaleh are insignificant in the curve of the sphere. Nor does it matter how you gauge and try him. A character is like an acrostic or Alexandrian stanza, 4-read it forward, backward, or across, it still spells the same thing. In this pleasing, contrite woodlife which God allows me, let me record day by day my honest thought without prospect or

<sup>4</sup> A mistake; Emerson means a palindrome, which is the same read backwards or forwards: for example, "Madam, I'm Adam."

<sup>2</sup> Genesis xxxix
3 Pythagoras, a Greek philosopher, was banished; Socrates because of his advanced views was given poison; Luther was imprisoned; Copernicus, who first proved that the sun, not the earth, is the center of the solar system, was doubted; Galileo, for his astronomical views, was condemned, and by being menaced with the torture of the Inquisition was made to adjust the Copernican theory. <sup>2</sup> Genesis xxxix sition was made to abjure the Copernican theory; Sir Isaac Newton, who discovered the law of gravitation, waited years for recognition; all these like Christ dared to face disbelief.

retrospect, and, I cannot doubt, it will be found symmetrical, though I mean it not and see it not. My book should smell of pines and resound with the hum of insects. The swallow over my window should interweave that thread or straw he carries in his hill into my web also We pass for what we are. Character teaches above our wills. Men imagine that they communicate their virtue or vice only by overt actions, and do not see that virtue or vice emit a breath every moment.

There will be an agreement in whatever variety of actions, so they be each honest and natural in their hour. For of one will, the actions will be harmonious, however unlike they seem. These varieties are lost sight of at a little distance, at a little height of thought. One tendency unites them all. The voyage of the best ship is a zigzag line of a hundred tacks. See the line from a sufficient distance, and it straightens itself to the average tendency. Your genuine action will explain itself and will explain your other genuine actions. Your conformity explains nothing. Act singly, and what you have already done singly will justify you now. Greatness appeals to the future. If I can be firm enough today to do right, and scorn eyes, I must have done so much right before as to defend me now. Be it how it will, do right now. Always scorn appearances, and you always may. The force of character is cumula-All the foregone days of virtue work. their health into this. What makes the majesty of the heroes of the senate and the field, which so fills the imagination? The consciousness of a train of great days and victories behind. They shed an united light on the advancing actor. He is attended as by a visible escort of angels. That is it which throws thunder into Chatham's 1 voice, and dignity into Washington's port, 2 and America into Adams's 3 eye. Honor is venerable to us because it is no ephemeris. It is always ancient virtue. We worship it today because it is not of today. We love it and pay it homage, because it is not a trap for our love and homage, but is selfdependent, self-derived, and therefore of an old immaculate pedigree, even if shown in a voung person.

I hope in these days we have heard the last of conformity and consistency. Let the words be gazetted and ridiculous henceforward. Instead of the gong for dinner, let us hear a whistle from the Spartan fife. Let us never bow and apologize more. A great man is coming to eat at my house. I do not wish to please him: I wish that he should wish to please me. I will stand here for humanity, and though I would make it kind. I would make it true. Let us affront and reprimand the smooth mediocrity and squalid contentment of the times and hurl in the face of custom and trade and office, the fact which is the upshot of all history, that there is a great responsible Thinker and Actor working wherever a man works: that a true man belongs to no other time or place, but is the center of things. Where he is, there is nature. He measures you and all men and all events. Ordinarily, everybody in society reminds us of somewhat else, or of some other person. Character, reality, reminds you of nothing else; it takes place of the whole creation. The man must be so much that he must make all circumstances indifferent. Every true man is a cause, a country, and an age; requires infinite spaces and numbers and time fully to accomplish his design; -- and posterity seem to follow his steps as a train of clients. A man Caesar is born, and for ages after we have a Roman Empire. Christ is born, and millions of minds so grow and cleave to his genius that he is confounded with virtue and the possible of man. An institution is the lengthened shadow of one man; as, Monachism, of the Hermit Anthony: the Reformation, of Luther: Quakerism, of Fox: Methodism, of Wesley: Abolition, Scipio, 4 Milton called "the of Clarkson. height of Rome"; and all history resolves itself very easily into the biography of a few stout and earnest persons. 5

Let a man then know his worth, and keep things under his feet.6 Let him not peep or steal, or skulk up and down with the air of a charity-boy, a bastard, or an interloper in the world which exists for him. But the man in

<sup>1</sup> It is to the bold, imaginative energy of William Pitt, a brilliant orator, one of the greatest English prime ministers, that England owes her largest accessions in empire.

 &lt;sup>2</sup> bearing
 <sup>3</sup> Samuel Adams, one of the earliest and boldest leaders of the American Revolution

<sup>World Which exists for film. But the man in 4 Saint Anthony, or Anthony the Great, an Egyptian of the third century A.D., the founder of asceticism; George Fox, 1624-1601, founder of the Society of Friends; John Wesley, 1703-1791, one of the first "Methodists," so called from their strict methods of living: Thomas Clarkson, 1760-1846, worker for the abolition of slavery; Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus Major, the great Roman general who defeated Hannibal in 202 B.C.
6 Cf. Carlyle: "Universal history, the history of what man has accomplished in this world, is at bottom the history of the great men who have worked here." "In all epochs of the world's history we shall find the great man to have been the indispensable savior of his epoch: the lightning without which the fuel never would have burnt." Heroes and Hero Worship the street, finding no worth in himself which corresponds to the force which built a tower or sculptured a marble god, feels poor when he looks on these. To him a palace, a statue, or a costly book have an alien and forbidding air, much like a gay equipage, and seem to say like that, "Who are you, Sir?" Yet they all are his, suitors for his notice, petitioners to his faculties that they will come out and take pos-The picture waits for my verdict: it is not to command me, but I am to settle its claims to praise. That popular fable of the sot who was picked up dead drunk in the street. carried to the duke's house, washed and dressed and laid in the duke's bed, 1 and, on his waking, treated with all obsequious ceremony like the duke, and assured that he had been insane. owes its popularity to the fact that it symbolizes so well the state of man, who is in the world a sort of sot, but now and then wakes up, exercises his reason, and finds himself a true prince.
6 Cf. the old lama of Thibet, in Kipling's Kim, whose aim</sup>

&lt;sup>6</sup> Cf. the old lama of Thibet, in Kipling's Kim, whose aim was to get free from the Wheel of Things, upon which most men are bound.

Our reading is mendicant and sycophantic. In history our imagination plays us false. Kingdom and lordship, power and estate, are a gaudier vocabulary than private John and Edward in a small house and common day's work: but the things of life are the same to both: the sum total of both is the same. Why all this deference to Alfred and Scanderbeg and Gus-Suppose they were virtuous; did they wear out virtue? As great a stake depends on your private act today as followed their public and renowned steps. When private men shall act with original views, the luster will be transferred from the actions of kings to those of gentlemen.

The world has been instructed by its kings. who have so magnetized the eyes of nations. It has been taught by this colossal symbol the mutual reverence that is due from man to man. The joyful loyalty with which men have everywhere suffered the king, the noble, or the great proprietor to walk among them by a law of his own, make his own scale of men and things and reverse theirs, pay for benefits not with money but with honor, and represent the law in his person, was the hieroglyphic by which they obscurely signified their consciousness of their own right and comeliness, the right of every man.

The magnetism which all original action exerts is explained when we inquire the reason of self-trust. Who is the Trustee? What is the aboriginal Self, on which a universal reliance may be grounded? What is the nature and power of that science-baffling star, without parallax, 3 without calculable elements, which shoots a ray of beauty even into trivial and impure actions, if the least mark of independ-The inquiry leads us to that ence appear? source, at once the essence of genius, of virtue. and of life, which we call Spontaneity or In-We denote this primary wisdom as Intuition, whilst all later teachings are tuitions. In that deep force, the last fact behind which analysis cannot go, all things find their common origin. For the sense of being which in calm hours rises, we know not how, in the soul, is not diverse from things, from space, from light, from time, from man, but one with them, and proceeds obviously from the same source whence their life and being also proceeds. We first share the life by which things exist, and afterwards see them as appearances in nature. and forget that we have shared their cause. Here is the fountain of action and of thought. Here are the lungs of that inspiration which giveth man wisdom, and which cannot be denied without impiety and atheism. We lie in the lap of immense intelligence, which makes us receivers of its truth and organs of its activity. When we discern justice, when we discern truth we do nothing of ourselves, but allow a passage to its beams. If we ask whence this comes, if we seek to pry into the soul that causes, all philosophy is at fault. Its presence or its absence is all we can affirm. Every man discriminates between the voluntary acts of his mind, and his involuntary perceptions, and knows that to his involuntary perceptions a perfect faith is due. He may err in the expression of them, but he knows that these things are so, like day and night, not to be disputed. My wilful actions and acquisitions are but roving;—the idlest reverie, the faintest native emotion, command my curiosity and respect. Thoughtless people contradict as readily the statement of perceptions as of opinions, or rather much more readily; for, they do not distinguish between perception and notion. They fancy that I choose to see this or that thing. But perception is not whimsical, but fatal. If I see a trait, my children will see it after me, and in course of time all mankind,- <sup>1</sup> The oldest version is probably "The Story of The Sleeper Awakened" in The Arabian Nights. See also The Taming of the Shrew, induction.

2 Alfred the Great was King of England, 871-901; Scanderbeg Bey, in the 15th century, bravely defended his principality of Albania against the encroachments of Turkey; Gustavus Adolphus. King of Sweden, 1611-32, was a great Protestant leader in the Thirty Years' War.

<sup>3</sup> without apparent displacement as seen from two different stations and hence too far distant to be measured by ordinary means although it may chance that no one has seen it before me. For my perception of it is as much a fact as the sun.

The relations of the soul to the divine spirit are so pure that it is profane to seek to interpose helps. It must be that when God speaketh he should communicate, not one thing, but all things: should fill the world with his voice: should scatter forth light, nature, time, souls, from the center of the present thought; and new date and new create the whole. Whenever a mind is simple and receives a divine wisdom, old things pass away, -means, teachers, texts, temples fall; it lives now, and absorbs past and future into the present hour. All things are made sacred by relation to it,one as much as another. All things are dissolved to their center by their cause, and in the universal miracle petty and particular miracles disappear. If, therefore, a man claims to know and speak of God and carries you backward to the phraseology of some old moldered nation in another country, in another world, believe him not. Is the acorn better than the oak which is its fulness and completion? Is the parent better than the child into whom he has cast his ripened being? Whence then this worship of the past? The centuries are conspirators against the sanity and authority of the soul. Time and space are but physiological colors which the eve makes, but the soul is light: where it is, is day; where it was, is night; and history is an impertinence and an injury if it be any thing more than a cheerful apologue or parable of my being and becoming. 1

Man is timid and apologetic; he is no longer upright; he dares not say 'I think,' 'I am,' but quotes some saint or sage. He is ashamed before the blade of grass or the blowing rose. These roses under my window make no reference to former roses or to better ones; they are for what they are; they exist with God today. There is no time to them. There is simply the rose; it is perfect in every moment of its existence. Before a leaf-bud has burst, its whole life acts; in the full-blown flower there is no more; in the leafless root there is no less. Its nature is satisfied and it satisfies nature in all moments alike. But man postpones or remembers; he does not live in the present, but with reverted eye laments the past, or, heedless of the riches that surround him, stands on tiptoe to foresee the future. He cannot be happy and strong until he too lives with nature in the present, above time.

This should be plain enough. Yet see what strong intellects dare not yet hear God himself unless he speaks the phraseology of I know not what David, or Jeremiah, or Paul. We shall not always set so great a price on a few texts. on a few lives. We are like children who repeat by rote the sentences of grandames and tutors, and, as they grow older, of the men of talents and character they chance to see .-painfully recollecting the exact words they spoke; afterwards, when they come into the point of view which those had who uttered these savings, they understand them and are willing to let the words go; for at any time they can use words as good when occasion comes. If we live truly, we shall see truly. It is as easy for the strong man to be strong, as it is for the weak to be weak. When we have new perception, we shall gladly disburden the memory of its hoarded treasures as old rubbish. When a man lives with God, his voice shall be as sweet as the murmur of the brook and the rustle of the corn.

And now at last the highest truth on this subject remains unsaid; probably cannot be said; for all that we say is the far-off remembering of the intuition. That thought, by what I can now nearest approach to say it, is this. When good is near you, when you have life in yourself, it is not by any known or accustomed way; you shall not discern the footprints of any other; you shall not see the face of man; you shall not hear any name; -the way, the thought, the good, shall be wholly strange and new. It shall exclude example and experience. You take the way from man, not to man. All persons that ever existed are its forgotten ministers. Fear and hope are alike beneath it. There is somewhat low even in hope. In the hour of vision there is nothing that can be called gratitude, nor properly joy. soul raised over passion beholds identity and eternal causation, perceives the self-existence of Truth and Right, and calms itself with knowing that all things go well. Vast spaces of nature, the Atlantic Ocean, the South Sea, -long intervals of time, years, centuries,are of no account. This which I think and feel underlay every former state of life and circumstances, as it does underlie my present, and what is called life, and what is called death.

Life only avails, not the having lived. Power ceases in the instant of repose; it resides in the moment of transition from a past to a new state, in the shooting of the gulf, in the darting to an aim. This one fact the world hates, that the soul becomes: for that forever degrades the past, turns all riches to poverty, all reputation to a shame, confounds the saint with the rogue, shoves Jesus and Judas 1 equally aside. Why then do we prate of self-reliance? Inasmuch as the soul is present, there will be power not confident but agent. 2 To talk of reliance is a poor external way of speaking. rather of that which relies, because it works and Who has more obedience than I masters me, though he should not raise his finger. Round him I must revolve by the gravitation of spirits. We fancy it rhetoric when we speak of eminent virtue. We do not vet see that virtue is Height and that a man or a company of men, plastic and permeable to principles, by the law of nature must overpower and ride all cities, nations, kings, rich men, poets, who are

&lt;sup>1</sup> Cf. Carlyle: "Think well, thou too wilt find that Space is but a mode of our human sense, so likewise Time; there is no Space and no Time: We are we know not what;—light—sparkles floating in the aether of Deity!" Sartor Resartus, Bk. i, Ch. 8.

This is the ultimate fact which we so quickly reach on this, as on every topic, the resolution of all into the ever-blessed ONE. Self-existence is the attribute of the Supreme Cause, and it constitutes the measure of good by the degree in which it enters into all lower forms. All things real are so by so much virtue as they contain. Commerce, husbandry, hunting, whaling, war, eloquence, personal weight, are somewhat and engage my respect as examples of its presence and impure action. I see the same law working in nature for conservation and growth. Power is in nature the essential measure of right. Nature suffers nothing to remain in her kingdoms which cannot help itself. The genesis and maturation of a plant, its poise and orbit, the bended tree recovering itself from the wind, the vital resources of every animal and vegetable, are strong demonstrations of the self-sufficing, and therefore self-relying soul.

Thus all concentrates: let us not rove; let us sit at home with the cause. Let us stun and astonish the intruding rabble of men and books and institutions by a simple declaration of the divine fact. Bid the invaders take the shoes from off their feet, of for God is here within. Let our simplicity judge them, and our docility to our own law demonstrate the poverty of nature and fortune beside our native riches.

But now we are a mob. Man does not stand in awe of man, nor is the soul admonished to stay at home, to put itself in communication with the internal ocean, but it goes abroad to beg a cup of water of the urns of other men.

i. e., the highest and the lowest active active Exodus iii, 5

We must go alone. Isolation must precede true society. I like the silent church before the service begins, better than any preaching. How far off, how cool, how chaste the persons look. begirt each one with a precinct or sanctuary! So let us always sit. Why should we assume the faults of our friend, or wife, or father, or child, because they sit around our hearth. or are said to have the same blood? All men have my blood and I have all men's. Not for that will I adopt their petulance or folly, even to the extent of being ashamed of it. But your isolation must not be mechanical, but spiritual, that is, must be elevation. At times the whole world seems to be in conspiracy to importune you with emphatic trifles. Friend, client, child, sickness, fear, want, charity, all knock at once at thy closet door and say,-"Come out unto us." But keep thy state; come not into their confusion. The power men possess to annov me I give them by a weak curiosity. No man can come near me but through my act. "What we love that we have, but by desire we bereave ourselves of the love.'

If we cannot at once rise to the sanctities of obedience and faith, let us at least resist our temptations; let us enter into the state of war, and wake Thor and Woden, 4 courage and constancy, in our Saxon breasts. This is to be done in our smooth times by speaking the truth. Check this lying hospitality and lying affection. Live no longer to 5 the expectation of these deceived and deceiving people with whom we converse. Say to them, O father, O mother, O wife, O brother, O friend, I have lived with you after appearances hitherto. Henceforward I am the truth's. Be it known unto you that henceforward I obey no law less than the eternal law. I will have no covenants but proximities. 6 I shall endeavor to nourish my parents, to support my family, to be the chaste husband of one wife,—but these relations I must fill after a new and unprecedented way. I appeal from your customs. I must be myself. I cannot break myself any longer for you, or you. If you can love me for what I am, we shall be the happier. If you cannot, I will still seek to deserve that you should. I will not hide my tastes or aversions. I will so trust that what is deep is holy, that I will do strongly before the sun and moon whatever inly rejoices me and the heart appoints.

&lt;sup>4</sup>In Teutonic mythology Thor is the god of thunder and Woden or Odin the supreme father. <sup>5</sup> according to

&lt;sup>6</sup> I will make no promises for the future, but will do the nearest duty only.

If you are noble, I will love you; if you are not. I will not hurt you and myself by hypocritical attentions. If you are true, but not in the same truth with me, cleave to your companions; I will seek my own. I do this not selfishly but humbly and truly. It is alike your interest, and mine, and all men's, however long we have dwelt in lies, to live in truth. Does this sound harsh today? You will soon love what is dictated by your nature as well as mine, and if we follow the truth it will bring us out safe at last.—But so may you give these friends pain. Yes, but I cannot sell my liberty and my power, to save their sensibility. Besides, all persons have their moments of reason, when they look out into the region of absolute truth: then will they justify me and do the same thing.

The populace think that your rejection of popular standards is a rejection of all standard. and mere antinomianism; 1 and the bold sensualist will use the name of philosophy to gild his crimes. But the law of consciousness abides. There are two confessionals, in one or the other of which we must be shriven. You may fulfil your round of duties by clearing yourself in the direct, or in the reflex way. Consider whether you have satisfied your relations to father, mother, cousin, neighbor, town, cat, and dog; whether any of these can upbraid vou. But I may also neglect this reflex standard and absolve me to myself. I have my own stern claims and perfect circle. It denies the name of duty to many offices that are called duties. But if I can discharge its debts it enables me to dispense with the popular code. If any one imagines that this law is lax, let him keep its commandment one day.

And truly it demands something godlike in him who has cast off the common motives of humanity and has ventured to trust himself for a taskmaster. High be his heart, faithful his will, clear his sight, that he may in good earnest be doctrine, society, law, to himself, that a simple purpose may be to him as strong as iron necessity is to others!

If any man consider the present aspects of what is called by distinction society, he will see the need of these ethics. The sinew and heart of man seem to be drawn out, and we are become timorous, desponding whimperers. We are afraid of truth, afraid of fortune, afraid of death, and afraid of each other. Our age yields no great and perfect persons. We want

'opposition to law; from the Greek avti, against, and νόμος, law men and women who shall renovate life and our social state, but we see that most natures are insolvent, cannot satisfy their own wants, have an ambition out of all proportion to their practical force and do lean and beg day and night continually. Our housekeeping is mendicant, our arts, our occupations, our marriages, our religion, we have not chosen, but society has chosen for us. We are parlor soldiers. We shun the rugged battle of fate, where strength is born.

If our young men miscarry in their first enterprises they lose all heart. If the young merchant fails, men say he is ruined. If the finest genius studies at one of our colleges, and is not installed in an office within one year afterwards in the cities or suburbs of Boston or New York, it seems to his friends and to himself that he is right in being disheartened and in complaining the rest of his life. sturdy lad from New Hampshire or Vermont, who in turn tries all the professions, who teams it, farms it, peddles, keeps a school, preaches. edits a newspaper, goes to Congress, buys a township, and so forth, in successive years, and always like a cat falls on his feet, is worth a hundred of these city dolls. He walks abreast with his days and feels no shame in not 'studying a profession,' for he does not postpone his life, but lives already. He has not one chance, but a hundred chances. Let a Stoic 2 open the resources of man and tell men they are not leaning willows, but can and must detach themselves; that with the exercise of self-trust, new powers shall appear; that a man is the word 3 made flesh, born to shed healing to the nations, that he should be ashamed of our compassion, and that the moment he acts from himself, tossing the laws, the books, idolatries, and customs out of the window, we pity him no more but thank and revere him, -and that teacher shall restore the life of man to splendor and make his name dear to all history.

It is easy to see that a greater self-reliance must work a revolution in all the offices and relations of men; in their religion; in their education; in their pursuits; their modes of living; their association; in their property; in their speculative views.

1. In what prayers do men allow 4 themselves! That which they call a holy office 5 is not so much as brave and manly. Prayer

The Greek Stoics suppressed outward emotion of joy or grief, and held that virtue, not happiness, is the aim of life.
 The spirit of God; see John i, 1. justify, sanction
 an act of worship

looks abroad and asks for some foreign addition to come through some foreign virtue. and loses itself in endless mazes of natural and supernatural, and mediatorial and miraculous. Prayer that craves a particular commodity, anything less than all good,—is vicious. Prayer is the contemplation of the facts of life from the highest point of view. It is the soliloguy of a beholding and jubilant soul. It is the spirit of God pronouncing his works good. But prayer as a means to effect a private end is theft and meanness. It supposes dualism and not unity in nature and consciousness. As soon as the man is at one with God, he will not beg. He will then see prayer in all action. prayer of the farmer kneeling in his field to weed it, the prayer of the rower kneeling with the stroke of his oar, are true prayers heard throughout nature, though for cheap ends. Caratach, in Fletcher's Bonduca, when admonished to inquire the mind of the god Audate, replies.-

His hidden meaning lies in our endeavors; Our valors are our best gods.

Another sort of false prayers are our regrets. Discontent is the want of self-reliance: it is infirmity of will. Regret calamities if you can thereby help the sufferer; if not, attend your own work and already the evil begins to be repaired. Our sympathy is just as base. We come to them who weep foolishly and sit down and cry for company, instead of imparting to them truth and health in rough electric shocks, putting them once more in communication with their own reason. The secret of fortune is joy in our hands. Welcome evermore to gods and men is the self-helping man. For him all doors are flung wide: him all tongues greet, all honors crown, all eyes follow with desire. Our love goes out to him and embraces him because he did not need it. We solicitously and apologetically caress and celebrate him because he held on his way and scorned our disapprobation. The gods love him because men hated him. "To the persevering mortal," said Zoroaster, 2 "the blessed Immortals are swift."

As men's prayers are a disease of the will, so are their creeds a disease of the intellect. They say with those foolish Israelites, "Let not God speak to us, lest we die. Speak thou, speak any man with us, and we will obey."

<sup>2</sup> Zarathustra, the reputed founder of the ancient Persian religion

Everywhere I am hindered of meeting God in my brother, because he has shut his own temple doors, and recites fables merely of his brother's, or his brother's brother's God. new mind is a new classification. If it prove a mind of uncommon activity and power, a Locke, a Lavoisier, a Hutton, a Bentham, a Fourier, it imposes its classification on other men, and lo! a new system. In proportion to the depth of the thought, and so to the number of the objects it touches and brings within reach of the pupil, is his complacency. But chiefly is this apparent in creeds and churches. which are also classifications of some powerful mind acting on the great elemental thought of duty and man's relation to the Highest. Such is Calvinism, Quakerism, Swedenborgism. The pupil takes the same delight in subordinating every thing to the new terminology as a girl does who has just learned botany in seeing a new earth and new seasons thereby. It will happen for a time that the pupil will find his intellectual power has grown by the study of his master's mind. But in all unbalanced minds the classification is idolized, passes for the end and not for a speedily exhaustible means, so that the walls of the system blend to their eye in the remote horizon with the walls of the universe; the luminaries of heaven seem to them hung on the arch their master built. They cannot imagine how you aliens have any right to see,-how you can see; "It must be somehow that you stole the light from us." They do not yet perceive that light, unsystematic, indomitable, will break into any cabin, even into theirs. Let them chirp awhile and call it their own. If they are honest and do well, presently their neat new pinfold 4 will be too strait and low, will crack, will lean, will rot and vanish, and the immortal light, all young and joyful, million-orbed, million-colored, will beam over the universe as on the first morning.

2. It is for want of self-culture that the superstition of Traveling, whose idols are Italy, England, Egypt, retains its fascination for all educated Americans. They who made England, Italy, or Greece venerable in the imagination did so by sticking fast where they were, like an axis of the earth. In manly hours we feel that duty is our place. The soul is no traveler; the wise man stays at home, and when his necessities, his duties, on any occasion call him from his house, or into foreign lands, he is at home still, and shall make men sensible by the expression of his countenance that he goes the missionary of wisdom and virtue, and visits cities and men like a sovereign and not like an interloper or a valet.

* a pound or enclosure for beasts

&lt;sup>1</sup> John Fletcher, the Elizabethan dramatist, used the older names for Caractacus, the leader, and for Boadicea, the queen, of the Britons about 50 a.D. Audate was the Druid god of war.

&lt;sup>3</sup> Locke and Bentham were English philosophers; Lavoisier was a French chemist, the chief founder of modern chemistry; Fourier was a French socialist; Hutton was a celebrated Scotch geologist.

I have no churlish objection to the circumnavigation of the globe, for the purposes of art, of study, and benevolence, so that the man is first domesticated, or does not go abroad with the hope of finding somewhat greater than he knows. He who travels to be amused, or to get somewhat which he does not carry, travels away from himself, and grows old, even in youth among old things. In Thebes, in Palmyra, his will and mind have become old and dilapidated as they. He carries ruins to ruins.

Traveling is a fool's paradise. Our first journeys discover to us the indifference of places. At home I dream that at Naples, at Rome, I can be intoxicated with beauty and lose my sadness. I pack my trunk, embrace my friends, embark on the sea, and at last wake up in Naples, and there beside me is the stern fact, the sad self, unrelenting, identical, that I fled from. I seek the Vatican <sup>1</sup> and the palaces. I affect to be intoxicated with sights and suggestions, but I am not intoxicated. My giant goes with me wherever I go.

3. But the rage of traveling is a symptom of a deeper unsoundness affecting the whole intellectual action. The intellect is vagabond, and our system of education fosters restlessness. Our minds travel when our bodies are forced to stay at home. We imitate; and what is imitation but the traveling of the mind? Our houses are built with foreign taste; our shelves are garnished with foreign ornaments; our opinions, our tastes, our faculties, lean, and follow the Past and the Distant. created the arts wherever they have flourished. It was in his own mind that the artist sought his model. It was an application of his own thought to the thing to be done and the conditions to be observed. And why need we copy the Doric or the Gothic 2 model? Beauty. convenience, grandeur of thought, and quaint expression are as near to us as to any, and if the American artist will study with hope and love the precise thing to be done by him, considering the climate, the soil, the length of the day, the wants of the people, the habit and form of the government, he will create a house in which all these will find themselves fitted. and taste and sentiment will be satisfied also.

4. As our Religion, our Education, our Art look abroad, so does our spirit of society. All men plume themselves on the improvement of society, and no man improves.

Society never advances. It recedes as fast on one side as it gains on the other. It undergoes continual changes; it is barbarous, it is civilized, it is christianized, it is rich, it is scientific; but this change is not amelioration. For every thing that is given something is taken. Society acquires new arts and loses old instincts. What a contrast between the wellclad, reading, writing, thinking American, with a watch, a pencil, and a bill of exchange in his pocket, and the naked New Zealander, whose property is a club, a spear, a mat, and an undivided twentieth of a shed to sleep under! But compare the health of the two men, and you shall see that the white man has lost his aboriginal strength. If the traveler tell us truly, strike the savage with a broad axe and in a day or two the flesh shall unite and heal as if you struck the blow into soft pitch, and the same blow shall send the white to his grave.

Insist on vourself: never imitate. Your own gift you can present every moment with the cumulative force of a whole life's cultivation; but of the adopted talent of another you have only an extemporaneous, half possession. That which each can do best, none but his Maker can teach him. No man vet knows what it is. nor can, till that person has exhibited it. Where is the master who could have taught Shakespeare? Where is the master who could have instructed Franklin, or Washington, or Bacon, or Newton? Every great man is a unique. The Scipionism 3 of Scipio is precisely that part he could not borrow. Shakespeare will never be made by the study of Shakespeare. Do that which is assigned you and you cannot hope too much or dare too much. There is at this moment, for you an utterance brave and grand as that of the colossal chisel of Phidias, 4 or trowel of the Egyptians, or the pen of Moses, or Dante, but different from all these. Not possibly will the soul, all rich, all eloquent, with thousand-cloven tongue, deign to repeat itself; but if you can hear what these patriarchs say, surely you can reply to them in the same pitch of voice; for the ear and the tongue are two organs of one nature. Abide in the simple and noble regions of thy life, obey thy heart, and thou shalt reproduce the Foreworld again.

¹ the Pope's palace, which contains famous art galleries and libraries rich in ancient manuscripts

&lt;sup>2</sup> classic or medieval

<sup>8</sup> Scipio's daring resourcefulness often turned defeat into victory; see note 4, p. 367.

A Greek sculptor; see The Problem, note 1, p. 386.

The civilized man has built a coach, but has lost the use of his feet. He is supported on crutches, but lacks so much support of muscle. He has a fine Geneva watch, but he fails of the skill to tell the hour by the sun. A Greenwich nautical almanac he has, and so being sure of the information when he wants it, the man in the street does not know a star in the The solstice he does not observe; the equinox he knows as little; and the whole bright calendar of the year is without a dial in his mind. His notebooks impair his memory; his libraries overload his wit; the insurance-office increases the number of accidents; and it may be a question whether machinery does not encumber; whether we have not lost by refinement some energy, by a Christianity entrenched in establishments and forms, some vigor of wild virtue. For every Stoic was a Stoic; but in Christendom where is the Christian?

There is no more deviation in the moral standard than in the standard of height or bulk. No greater men are now than ever were. A singular equality may be observed between the great men of the first and of the last ages; nor can all the science, art, religion, and philosophy of the nineteenth century avail to educate greater men than Plutarch's 1 heroes, three or four and twenty centuries ago. Not in time is the race progressive. Phocion, Socrates, Anaxagoras, Diogenes, are great men, but they leave no class. He who is really of their class will not be called by their name, but will be his own man, and in his turn the founder of a sect. The arts and inventions of each period are only its costume, and do not invigorate The harm of the improved machinery may compensate its good. Hudson and Behring accomplished so much in their fishing-boats as to astonish Parry and Franklin, 2 whose equipment exhausted the resources of science and art. Galileo, with an opera-glass, discovered a more splendid series of celestial phenomena than any one since. Columbus found the New World in an undecked 3 boat. It is curious to see the periodical disuse and perishing of means and machinery which were introduced with loud laudation a few years or a mistake of Emerson's centuries before. The great genius returns to essential man. We reckoned the improvements of the art of war among the triumphs of science. and yet Napoleon conquered Europe by the bivouac, which consisted of falling back on naked valor and disencumbering it of all aids. The Emperor held it impossible to make a perfect army, says Las Casas. 4 "without abolishing our arms, magazines, commissaries, and carriages, until, in imitation of the Roman custom, the soldier should receive his supply of corn, grind it in his hand-mill, and bake his bread himself."

<sup>2</sup> Henry Hudson was a navigator of the seventeenth century; Vitus Bering, a Danish explorer of the eighteenth century; Sir William Edward Parry and Sir John Franklin, English navigators of the nineteenth century.

Society is a wave. The wave moves onward. but the water of which it is composed does not. The same particle does not rise from the valley to the ridge. Its unity is only phenomenal. 5 The persons who make up a nation today, next year die, and their experience with them.

And so the reliance on Property, including the reliance on governments which protect it, is the want of self-reliance. Men have looked away from themselves and at things so long that they have come to esteem the religious. learned, and civil institutions as guards of property, and they deprecate assaults on these, because they feel them to be assaults on property. They measure their esteem of each other by what each has, and not by what each is. But a cultivated man becomes ashamed of his property, out of new respect for his nature. Especially he hates what he has if he see that it is accidental,—came to him by inheritance, or gift, or crime; then he feels that it is not having; it does not belong to him, has no root in him, and merely lies there because no revolution or no robber takes it away. But that which a man is, does always by necessity acquire, and what the man acquires, is living property, which does not wait the beck of rulers, or mobs, or revolutions, or fire, or storm, or bankruptcies, but perpetually renews itself wherever the man breathes. "Thy lot or portion of life," said the Caliph Ali, "is seeking after thee; therefore be at rest from seeking after it." Our dependence on these foreign goods leads us to our slavish respect for num-The political parties meet in numerous conventions; the greater the concourse and with each new uproar of announcement, The delegation from Essex! The Democrats from New Hampshire! The Whigs of Maine! the young patriot feels himself stronger than before by a new thousand of eyes and arms. In like Plutarch was a Greek historian whose Parallel Lives of forty-six Greeks and Romans is a classic; Phocion, an Athenian statesman put to death on a false charge of treason; Socrates, a Greek philosopher given poison because of his beliefs; Anaxagoras, a Greek philosopher, exiled on the charge of heresy; Diogenes, a Greek cynic philosopher famous for his eccentricities.

&lt;sup>4</sup> a voluntary exile with Napoleon at St. Helena, to whom the emperor dictated part of his memoirs 5 apparent manner the reformers summon conventions and vote and resolve in multitude. Not so, O friends! will the God deign to enter and inhabit you, but by a method precisely the reverse. It is not only as a man puts off all foreign support, and stands alone, that I see him to be strong and to prevail. He is weaker by every recruit to his banner. Is not a man better than Ask nothing of men, and in the a town? endless mutation, thou only firm column must presently appear the upholder of all that surrounds thee. He who knows that power is inborn, that he is weak because he has looked for good out of him and elsewhere, and so perceiving throws himself unhesitatingly on his thought, instantly rights himself, stands in the erect position, commands his limbs, works miracles; just as a man who stands on his feet is stronger than a man who stands on his head.

<sup>6</sup> fourth caliph or successor of Mohammed, 600-661, and supposed writer of a collection of proverbs

So use all that is called Fortune. Most men gamble with her, and gain all, and lose all, as her wheel rolls. But do thou leave as unlawful these winnings, and deal with Cause and Effect, the chancellors of God. In the Will work and acquire, and thou hast chained the wheel of Chance, and shalt sit hereafter out of fear from her rotations. A political victory, a rise of rents, the recovery of your sick, or the return of your absent friend, or some other favorable event raises your spirits, and you think good days are preparing for you. Do not believe it. Nothing can bring you peace but yourself. Nothing can bring you peace but the triumph of principles.

1841

COMPENSATION

The wings of Time are black and white, Pied with morning and with night. Mountain tall and ocean deep Trembling balance duly keep.
In changing moon, in tidal wave, Glows the feud of Want and Have. Gauge of more and less through space Electric star and pencil plays. The lonely Earth amid the balls That hurry through the eternal halls, A makeweight flying to the void, Supplemental asteroid, Or compensatory spark, Shoots across the neutral Dark.

Man's the elm, and Wealth the vine; Stanch and strong the tendrils twine: Though the frail ringlets thee deceive, None from its stock that vine can reave. Fear not, then, thou child infirm, There's no god dare wrong a worm. Laurel crowns cleave to deserts And power to him who power exerts; Hast not thy share? On winged feet, Lo! it rushes thee to meet; And all that Nature made thy own, Floating in air or pent in stone, Will rive the hills and swim the sea And, like thy shadow, follow thee.

Ever since I was a boy I have wished to write a discourse on Compensation: for it seemed to me when very young that on this subject life was ahead of theology and the people knew more than the preachers taught. The documents too from which the doctrine is to be drawn, charmed my fancy by their endless. variety, and lay always before me, even in sleep; for they are the tools in our hands, the bread in our basket, the transactions of the street, the farm, and the dwelling-house, the greetings, the relations, the debts and credits. the influence of character, the nature and endowment of all men. It seemed to me, also, that in it might be shown men a ray of divinity, the present action of the soul of this world. clean from all vestige of tradition, and so the heart of man might be bathed by an inundation of eternal love, conversing with that which he knows was always and always must be, because it really is now. It appeared, moreover, that if this doctrine could be stated in terms with any resemblance to those bright intuitions in which this truth is sometimes revealed to us. it would be a star in many dark hours and crooked passages in our journey that would not suffer us to lose our way.

I was lately confirmed in these desires by hearing a sermon at church. The preacher, a man esteemed for his orthodoxy, unfolded in the ordinary manner the doctrine of the Last Judgment. He assumed that judgment is not executed in this world; that the wicked are successful; that the good are miserable; and then urged from reason and from Scripture a compensation to be made to both parties in the next life. No offense appeared to be taken by the congregation at this doctrine. As far as I could observe, when the meeting broke up they separated without remark on the sermon.

Yet what was the import of this teaching? What did the preacher mean by saying that the good are miserable in the present life? Was it that houses and lands, offices, wine, horses, dress, luxury, are had by unprincipled men, whilst the saints are poor and despised; and that a compensation is to be made to these last hereafter, by giving them the like gratifications another day,—bank-stock and doubloons, venison and champagne? This must be the compensation intended; for what else? Is it that they are to have leave to pray and praise? to love and serve men? Why, that they can do now. The legitimate inference the disciple would draw was,—"We are to have such a good time as the sinners have now";—or, to push it to its extreme import, "You sin now; we shall sin by and by; we would sin now, if we could; not being successful we expect our revenge tomorrow."

The fallacy lay in the immense concession that the bad are successful; that justice is not done now. The blindness of the preacher consisted in deferring to the base estimate of the market of what constitutes a manly success, instead of confronting and convicting the world from the truth; announcing the presence of the soul; the omnipotence of the will: and so establishing the standard of good and ill, of success and falsehood.

I find a similar base tone in the popular religious works of the day and the same doctrines assumed by the literary men when occasionally they treat the related topics. I think that our popular theology has gained in decorum, and not in principle, over the superstitions it has displaced. But men are better than this Their daily life gives it the lie. theology. Every ingenuous and aspiring soul leaves the doctrine behind him in his own experience; and all men feel sometimes the falsehood which they cannot demonstrate. For men are wiser than they know. That which they hear in schools and pulpits without afterthought, if said in conversation would probably be questioned in silence. If a man dogmatize in a mixed company on Providence and the divine laws, he is answered by a silence which conveys well enough to an observer the dissatisfaction of the hearer, but his incapacity to make his own statement.

I shall attempt in this and the following chapter <sup>1</sup> to record some facts that indicate the path of the law of Compensation; happy beyond my expectation if I shall truly draw the smallest arc of this circle.

POLARITY, or action and reaction, we meet in every part of nature; in darkness and light; in heat and cold; in the ebb and flow of waters; in male and female; in the inspiration and expiration of plants and animals; equation of quantity and quality in the fluids of the animal body; in the systole and diastole of the heart; in the undulations of fluids, and of sound; in the centrifugal and centripetal gravity; in electricity, galvanism, and chemical affinity. Superinduce magnetism at one end of a needle;

the opposite magnetism takes place at the other end. If the south attracts, the north repels. To empty here, you must condense there. An inevitable dualism bisects nature, so that each thing is a half, and suggests another thing to make it whole; as, spirit, matter; man, woman; odd, even; subjective, objective; in, out; upper, under; motion, rest; yea, nay.

Whilst the world is thus dual, so is every one of its parts. The entire system of things gets represented in every particle. There is somewhat that resembles the ebb and flow of the sea, day and night, man and woman, in a single needle of the pine, in a kernel of corn, in each individual of every animal tribe. The reaction, so grand in the elements, is repeated within these small boundaries. For example, in the animal kingdom the physiologist has observed that no creatures are favorites, but a certain compensation balances every gift and every defect. A surplusage given to one part is paid out of a reduction from another part of the same creature. If the head and neck are enlarged, the trunk and extremities are cut

The theory of the mechanic forces is another example. What we gain in power is lost in time; <sup>2</sup> and the converse. The periodic or compensating errors of the planets is another instance. <sup>3</sup> The influences of climate and soil in political history are another. The cold climate invigorates. The barren soil does not breed fevers, crocodiles, tigers, or scorpions.

The same dualism underlies the nature and condition of man. Every excess causes a defect; every defect an excess. Every sweet hath its sour; every evil its good. Every faculty which is a receiver of pleasure has an equal penalty put on its abuse. It is to answer for its moderation with its life. For every grain of wit there is a grain of folly. For every thing you have missed, you have gained something else; and for every thing you gain, you lose something. If riches increase, they are increased that use them. If the gatherer gathers too much, nature takes out of the man what she puts into his chest; swells the estate, but kills the owner. Nature hates monopolies and exceptions. The waves of the sea do not more speedily seek a level from their loftiest tossing than the varieties of condition tend to equalize themselves. There is always some leveling circumstance that puts down the overthe essay entitled "Spiritual Laws"

&lt;sup>2</sup> a law of mechanics <sup>3</sup> "The periodic inequalities of the planets are so small, because as a rule there is a nearly complete compensation effected at every few revo'utions, so that the accelerations balance the retardations ' Young, General Astronomy, p. 312.

bearing, the strong, the rich, the fortunate. substantially on the same ground with all others. Is a man too strong and fierce for society, and by temper and position a bad citizen,-a morose ruffian, with a dash of the pirate in him:—nature sends him a troop of pretty sons and daughters who are getting along in the dame's classes at the village school, and love and fear for them smooths his grim scowl to courtesy. Thus she contrives to intenerate 1 the granite and felspar, takes the boar out and puts the lamb in, and keeps her balance true.

The farmer imagines power and place are fine things. But the President has paid dear for his White House. It has commonly cost him all his peace, and the best of his manly attributes. To preserve for a short time so conspicuous an appearance before the world. he is content to eat dust before the real masters who stand erect behind the throne. Or, do men desire the more substantial and permanent grandeur of genius? Neither has this an immunity. He who by force of will or of thought is great, and overlooks thousands, has the charges of that eminence. With every influx of light comes new danger. Has he light? he must bear witness to the light, and always outrun that sympathy which gives him such keen satisfaction, by his fidelity to new revelations of the incessant soul. He must hate father and mother, wife and child. Has he all that the world loves and admires and covets? —he must cast behind him their admiration, and afflict them by faithfulness to his truth, and become a byword and a hissing. 2

This law writes the laws of cities and nations. It is in vain to build or plot or combine against it. Things refuse to be mismanaged Res nolunt diu male administrari.3 long. Though no checks to a new evil appear, the checks exist, and will appear. If the government is cruel, the governor's life is not safe. If you tax too high, the revenue will yield nothing. If you make the criminal code sanguinary, juries will not convict. If the law is too mild, private vengeance comes in. If the government is a terrific democracy, the pressure is resisted by an overcharge of energy in the citizen, and life glows with a fierce soften

 Emerson was himself twice hissed: once when making a political speech in favor of his friend Dr. Palfrey; and again when in 1861 at Wendell Philips's request he addressed an Anti Slavery Society. He wrote in his Journal, "The mob roa ed and hissed whenever I attempted to speak, and after several attempts I withdrew." From A Memo'r of Ralph Waldo Bmerson, by James El'iott Cabot, Vol. ii, p. 598-9.
 translated in the preceding sentence flame. The true life and satisfactions of man seem to elude the utmost rigors or felicities of condition, and to establish themselves with great indifferency under all varieties of circumstances. Under all governments the influence of character remains the same,-in Turkey and in New England about alike. Under the primeval despots of Egypt, history honestly confesses that man must have been as free as culture could make him.

These appearances indicate the fact that the universe is represented in every one of its particles. Every thing in nature contains all the powers of nature. Every thing is made of one hidden stuff; as the naturalist sees one type under every metamorphosis, and regards a horse as a running man, a fish as a swimming man, a bird as a flying man, a tree as a rooted Each new form repeats not only the main character of the type, but part for part all the details, all the aims, furtherances, hindrances, energies, and whole system of every other. Every occupation, trade, art, transaction is a compend of the world and a correlative of every other. Each one is an entire emblem of human life; of its good and ill, its trials. its enemies. its course and its end. And each one must somehow accommodate the whole man, and recite all his destiny.

The world globes itself in a drop of dew. The microscope cannot find the animalcule which is less perfect for being little. 4 Eyes. ears, taste, smell, motion, resistance, appetite, and organs of reproduction that take hold on eternity,—all find room to consist in the small creature. So do we put our life into every act. The true doctrine of omnipresence is, that God reappears with all his parts in every moss and cobweb. The value of the universe contrives to throw itself into every point. If the good is there, so is the evil; if the affinity, so the repulsion; if the force, so the limitation.

Thus is the universe alive. All things are moral. That soul, which within us is a sentiment, outside of us is a law. We feel its inspirations; out there in history we can see its fatal strength. "It is in the world, and the world was made by it." Justice is not postponed. A perfect equity adjusts its balance in all parts of life. Oi  $\kappa \dot{\nu} \beta oi \Delta i \dot{o}_s \dot{a} \dot{\epsilon} \dot{\iota} \dot{\epsilon} \dot{\nu} \pi \dot{\iota} \tau \tau oi \sigma \iota$ , <sup>5</sup> The dice of God are always loaded. The world looks like a multiplication table, or a mathematical equation, which, turn it how you will. balances itself. Take what figure you will, its <sup>4</sup> The amoebas, though they cannot be said to have eyes, ears, taste, and smell, are nevertheless sensitive to light, sound, and odors, and distinguish between food and other substances.

5 translated in the following sentence exact value, nor more nor less, still returns to you. Every secret is told, every crime is punished, every virtue rewarded, every wrong redressed, in silence and certainty. What we call retribution is the universal necessity by which the whole appears wherever a part appears. If you see smoke, there must be fire. If you see a hand or a limb, you know that the trunk to which it belongs is there behind.

Every act rewards itself, or in other words integrates 1 itself, in a twofold manner; first in the thing, or in real nature; and secondly in the circumstance, or in apparent nature. Men call the circumstance the retribution. The causal retribution is in the thing, and is seen by the soul. The retribution in the circumstance is seen by the understanding; it is inseparable from the thing, but is often spread over a long time, and so does not become distinct until after many years. The specific stripes may follow late after the offense, but they follow because they accompany it. Crime and punishment grow out of one stem. Punishment is a fruit that unsuspected ripens within the flower of the pleasure which concealed it. Cause and effect, means and ends, seed and fruit, cannot be severed; for the effect already blooms in the cause, the end preëxists in the means, the fruit in the seed.

Whilst thus the world will be whole, and refuses to be disparted, we seek to act partially. to sunder, to appropriate; for example,-to gratify the senses, we sever the pleasure of the senses from the needs of the character. The ingenuity of man has always been dedicated to the solution of one problem,—how to detach the sensual sweet, the sensual strong, the sensual bright, etc., from the moral sweet, the moral deep, the moral fair; that is, again, to contrive to cut clean off this upper surface so thin as to leave it bottomless; to get a one end, without an other end. The soul says, "Eat"; the body would feast. The soul says, "The man and woman shall be one flesh and one soul"; the body would join the flesh only. The soul says, "Have dominion over all things to the ends of virtue"; the body would have the power over things to its own ends.

The soul strives amain to live and work through all things. It would be the only fact. All things shall be added unto it,—power, pleasure, knowledge, beauty. The particular man aims to be somebody; to set up for himself; to truck and higgle for a private good; and, in particulars, to ride that he may ride; to dress that he may be dressed; to eat that

This dividing and detaching is steadily counteracted. Up to this day, it must be owned, no projector has had the smallest success. The parted water reunites behind our hand. Pleasure is taken out of pleasant things, profit out of profitable things, power out of strong things, as soon as we seek to separate them from the whole. We can no more halve things and get the sensual good, by itself, than we can get an inside that shall have no outside, or a light without a shadow. "Drive out nature with a fork, she comes running back." <sup>2</sup>

Life invests itself with inevitable conditions. which the unwise seek to dodge, which one and another brags that he does not know; brags that they do not touch him: -but the brag is on his lips, the conditions are in his soul. If he escapes them in one part they attack him in another more vital part. If he has escaped them in form and in the appearance, it is because he has resisted his life, and fled from himself, and the retribution is so much death. So signal is the failure of all attempts to make this separation of the good from the tax, that the experiment would not be tried,—since to try it is to be mad,—but for the circumstance that when the disease began in the will, of rebellion and separation, the intellect is at once infected, so that the man ceases to see God whole in each object, but is able to see the sensual allurement of an object and not see the sensual hurt; he sees the mermaid's head but not the dragon's tail; and thinks he can cut off that which he would have, from that which he would not have. "How secret art thou who dwellest in the highest heavens in silence, O thou only great God, sprinkling with an unwearied Providence certain penal blindnesses upon such as have unbridled desires!" 3

The human soul is true to these facts in the painting of fable, of history, of law, of proveros, of conversation. It finds a tongue in literature unawares. Thus the Greeks called Jupiter, Supreme Mind; but having traditionally ascribed to him many base actions, they involuntarily made amends to reason by tying up the hands of so bad a god. He is made as helpless as a king of England. 4 Prometheus knows one secret which Jove must bargain

he may eat; and to govern, that he may be seen. Men seek to be great; they would have offices, wealth, power, and fame. They think that to be great is to possess one side of nature,—the sweet, without the other side,—the bitter.

<sup>1</sup> makes a whole of

&lt;sup>2</sup> Horace, Epistles, i, 10, 24 <sup>3</sup> from St. Augustine's Confessions, I, xviii <sup>4</sup> dependent upon Parliament for: 1 Minerva, another. He cannot get his own thunders: Minerva keeps the key of them.

Of all the gods, I only know the keys That one the solid doors within whose vaults His thunders sleep. 2

A plain confession of the in-working of the All and of its moral aim. The Indian mythology ends in the same ethics; 3 and it would seem impossible for any fable to be invented and get any currency which was not moral. Aurora forgot to ask youth for her lover, and though Tithonus 4 is immortal, he is old. Achilles is not quite invulnerable; the sacred waters did not wash the heel by which Thetis held him. Siegfried, in the Niebelungen. 5 is not quite immortal, for a leaf fell on his back whilst he was bathing in the dragon's blood, and that spot which it covered is mortal. And so it must he. There is a crack in every thing God has made. It would seem there is always this vindictive circumstance stealing in at unawares even into the wild poesy in which the human fancy attempted to make bold holiday and to shake itself free of the old laws,—this backstroke, this kick of the gun, certifying that the law is fatal; that in nature nothing can be given, all things are sold.

This is that ancient doctrine of Nemesis. 6 who keeps watch in the universe and lets no offense go unchastised. The Furies, they said, are attendants on justice, and if the sun in heaven should transgress his path they would The poets related that stone punish him. walls and iron swords and leathern thongs had an occult sympathy with the wrongs of their owners; that the belt which Ajax gave Hector dragged the Trojan hero over the field at the wheels of the car of Achilles, and the sword which Hector gave Ajax was that on whose point Ajax fell. 8 They recorded that when the Thasians 9 erected a statue to Theogenes, a victor in the games, one of his rivals went to it by night, and endeavored to throw it down by repeated blows, until at last he moved it from its pedestal and was crushed to death beneath its fall.

<sup>1</sup>Jupiter tried unsuccessfully to extort the secret of his own doom from Prometheus. See the Prometheus of Aeschylus, and Shelley's Prometheus Unbound.

he does not know; that which flowed out of his constitution and not from his too active invention; that which in the study of a single artist you might not easily find, but in the study of many you would abstract as the spirit of them all. Phidias 10 it is not, but the work of man in that early Hellenic world that I would know. The name and circumstances of Phidias, however convenient for history, embarrass when we come to the highest criticism. We are to see that which man was tending to do in a given period, and was hindered, or, if you will, modified in doing, by the interfering volitions of Phidias, of Dante, of Shakespeare, the organ whereby man at the moment wrought. Still more striking is the expression of this fact in the proverbs of all nations, which are

This voice of fable has in it somewhat divine.

It came from thought above the will of the writer. That is the best part of each writer which has nothing private in it; that which always the literature of reason, or the statements of an absolute truth, without qualification. Proverbs, like the sacred books of each nation, are the sanctuary of the intuitions. That which the droning world, chained to appearances, will not allow the realist to sav in his own words, it will suffer him to say in proverbs without contradiction. And this law of laws, which the pulpit, the senate, and the college deny, is hourly preached in all markets and workshops by flights of proverbs, whose teaching is as true and as omnipresent as that of birds and flies.

All things are double, one against another. -Tit for tat; an eye for an eye; a tooth for a tooth: blood for blood; measure for measure: love for love.—Give, and it shall be given you.-He that watereth shall be watered himself .- What will you have? quoth God; pay for it and take it.-Nothing venture, nothing have.-Thou shalt be paid exactly for what thou hast done, no more, no less.—Who doth not work shall not eat.—Harm watch, harm catch.—Curses always recoil on the head of him who imprecates them.—If you put a chain around the neck of a slave, the other end fastens itself around your own.—Bad counsel confounds the adviser.—The Devil is an ass. 11

It is thus written, because it is thus in life. Our action is overmastered and characterized above our will by the law of nature. We aim at a petty end quite aside from the public good,

<sup>2</sup> Aeschylus, The Eumenides, 830
3 God in everything, and everything leading to God
4 Cf. Tennyson, "Tithonus."
5 an ancient Teutonic epic Greek goddess of retribution who allotted to each mortal his exact share of good and evil the Erinyes, or Eumenides, or Furies—the avengers of injunity

&lt;sup>8</sup> See Iliad, vii, 303; and Sophocles's Ajax, 865, 1029.

<sup>9</sup> inhabitants of Thasos, an island off the coast of Thrace

<sup>10</sup> See note 1, page, 386. ri very probably Emerson's own thought, though possibly suggested by the title of Ben Jonson's play,

The Devil Is an Ass

but our act arranges itself by irresistible magnetism in a line with the poles of the world.

A man cannot speak but he judges himself. With his will, or against his will, he draws his portrait to the eye of his companions by every word. Every opinion reacts on him who utters it. It is a thread-ball thrown at a mark, but the other end remains in the thrower's bag. Or, rather, it is a harpoon thrown at the whale, unwinding, as it flies, a coil of cord in the boat, and if the harpoon is not good, or not well thrown, it will go nigh to cut the steersman in twain or to sink the boat.

You cannot do wrong without suffering wrong. "No man had ever a point of pride that was not injurious to him," said Burke. The exclusive in fashionable life does not see that he excludes himself from enjoyment, in the attempt to appropriate it. The exclusionist in religion does not see that he shuts the door of heaven on himself, in striving to shut out others. Treat men as pawns and ninepins and you shall suffer as well as they. If you leave out their heart, you shall lose your own. The senses would make things of all persons; of women, of children, of the poor. The vulgar proverb, "I will get it from his purse or get it from his skin," is sound philosophy.

All infractions of love and equity in our social relations are speedily punished. They are punished by fear. Whilst I stand in simple relations to my fellow-man, I have no displeasure in meeting him. We meet as water meets water, or as two currents of air mix, with perfect diffusion and interpenetration of nature. But as soon as there is any departure from simplicity and attempt at halfness, or good for me that is not good for him, my neighbor feels the wrong; he shrinks from me as far as I have shrunk from him; his eyes no longer seek mine; there is war between us; there is hate in him and fear in me.

All the old abuses in society, universal and particular, all unjust accumulations of property and power, are avenged in the same manner. Fear is an instructor of great sagacity, and the herald of all revolutions. One thing he teaches, that there is rottenness where he appears. He is a carrion crow, and though you see not well what he hovers for, there is death somewhere. Our property is timid, our laws are timid, our cultivated classes are timid. Fear for ages has boded and mowed and gibbered over government and property. That obscene bird is not there for nothing. He indicates great wrongs which must be revised.

Of the like nature is that expectation of change which instantly follows the suspension of our voluntary activity. The terror of cloudless noon, the emerald of Polycrates, the awe of prosperity, the instinct which leads every generous soul to impose on itself tasks of a noble asceticism and vicarious virtue, are the tremblings of the balance of justice through the heart and mind of man.

Experienced men of the world know very well that it is best to pay scot and lot 2 as they go along, and that a man often pays dear for a small frugality. The borrower runs in his own debt. Has a man gained any thing who has received a hundred favors and rendered none? Has he gained by borrowing, through indolence or cunning, his neighbor's wares, or horses, or money? There arises on the deed. the instant acknowledgment of benefit on the one part and of debt on the other; that is, of superiority and inferiority. The transaction remains in the memory of himself and his neighbor: and every new transaction alters according to its nature their relation to each other. He may soon come to see that he had better have broken his own bones than to have ridden in his neighbor's coach, and that "the highest price he can pay for a thing is to ask for it."

A wise man will extend this lesson to all parts of life, and know that it is the part of prudence to face every claimant and pay every just demand on your time, your talents, or your heart. Always pay; for, first or last, you must pay your entire debt. Persons and events may stand for a time between you and justice, but it is only a postponement. You must pay at last your own debt. If you are wise you will dread a prosperity which only loads you with more. Benefit is the end of nature. But for every benefit which you receive, a tax is levied. He is great who confers the most benefits. He is base-and that is the one base thing in the universe—to receive favors and render none. In the order of nature we cannot render benefits to those from whom we receive them, or only seldom. But the benefit we receive must be rendered again, line for line, deed for deed, cent for cent, to somebody. Beware of too much good staying in your hand. It will fast corrupt and worm worms. 3 Pay it away quickly in some sort.

Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, fearing, because of his great good fortune, to incur the envy of the gods, threw away a ring. But it was found in a fish and returned to him.
*taxes
*breed worms

Labor is watched over by the same pitiless laws Cheapest, say the prudent, is the dearest labor. What we buy in a broom, a mat, a wagon, a knife, is some application of good sense to a common want. It is best to pay in your land a skilful gardener, or to buy good sense applied to gardening; in your sailor, good sense applied to navigation; in the house, good sense applied to cooking, sewing, serving: in your agent, good sense applied to accounts and affairs. So do you multiply your presence. or spread yourself throughout your estate. But because of the dual constitution of things, in labor as in life there can be no cheating. The thief steals from himself. The swindler swindles himself. For the real price of labor is knowledge and virtue, whereof wealth and credit are signs. These signs, like paper money, may be counterfeited or stolen, but that which they represent, namely, knowledge and virtue, cannot be counterfeited or stolen. These ends of labor cannot be answered but by real exertions of the mind, and in obedience to pure motives. The cheat, the defaulter, the gambler, cannot extort the knowledge of material and moral nature which his honest care and pains vield to the operative. The law of nature is. Do the thing, and you shall have the power: but they who do not the thing have not the power.

Human labor, through all its forms, from the sharpening of a stake to the construction of a city or an epic, is one immense illustration of the perfect compensation of the universe. The absolute balance of Give and Take, the doctrine that every thing has its price,-and if that price is not paid, not that thing but something else is obtained, and that it is impossible to get any thing without its price,is not less sublime in the columns of a ledger than in the budgets of states, in the laws of light and darkness, in all the action and reaction of nature. I cannot doubt that the high laws which each man sees ever implicated in those processes with which he is conversant. the stern ethics which sparkle on his chiseledge, which are measured out by his plumb and foot-rule, which stand as manifest in the footing of the shop-bill as in the history of a state, -do recommend to him his trade, and though seldom named, exalt his business to his imagination.

The league between virtue and nature engages all things to assume a hostile front to vice. The beautiful laws and substances of the world persecute and whip the traitor. He finds that things are arranged for truth and benefit, but there is no den in the wide world to hide a rogue. Commit a crime, and the earth is made of glass. Commit a crime, and it seems as if a coat of snow fell on the ground. such as reveals in the woods the track of every partridge and fox and squirrel and mole. You cannot recall the spoken word, you cannot wipe out the foot-track, you cannot draw up the ladder, so as to leave no inlet or clew. Some damning circumstance always transpires. The laws and substances of nature-water, snow, wind, gravitation—become penalties to the thief.

On the other hand, the law holds with equal sureness for all right action. Love, and you shall be loved. All love is mathematically just, as much as the two sides of an algebraic equation. The good man has absolute good, which like fire turns every thing to its own nature, so that you cannot do him any harm; but as the royal armies sent against Napoleon. 1 when he approached cast down their colors and from enemies became friends, so disasters of all kinds, as sickness, offense, poverty, prove benefactors:--

Winds blow and waters roll Strength to the brave, and Power and Deity: Yet in themselves are nothing!2

The good are befriended even by weakness and defect. As no man had ever a pint of pride that was not injurious to him, so no man had ever a defect that was not somewhere made useful to him. The stag in the fable admired his horns and blamed his feet. but when the hunter came, his feet saved him. and afterwards, caught in the thicket, his horns destroyed him. Every man in his lifetime needs to thank his faults. As no man thoroughly understands a truth until he has contended against it, so no man has a thorough acquaintance with the hindrances or talents of men, until he has suffered from the one, and seen the triumph of the other over his own want of the same. Has he a defect of temper that unfits him to live in society? Thereby he is driven to entertain himself alone, and acquire habits of self-help; and thus, like the wounded oyster, he mends his shell with pearl.

Our strength grows out of our weakness. The indignation which arms itself with secret forces does not awaken until we are pricked and stung, and sorely assailed. A great man is always willing to be little. Whilst he sits on the cushion of advantages, he goes to sleep. When he is pushed tormented defeated, he has a chance to learn something; he has been put on his wits, on his manhood; he has gained facts; learns his ignorance; is cured of the insanity of conceit; has got moderation and real skill. The wise man throws himself on the side of his assailants. It is more his interest than it is theirs to find his weak point. The wound cicatrizes and falls off from him like a dead skin, and when they would triumph, lo! he has passed on invulnerable. Blame is safer than praise. I hate to be defended in a newspaper. As long as all that is said is said against me. I feel a certain assurance of success. But as soon as honeyed words of praise are spoken for me. I feel as one that lies unprotected before his enemies. In general, every evil to which we do not succumb is a benefactor. As the Sandwich Islander believes that the strength and valor of the enemy he kills passes into himself, so we gain the strength of the temptation we resist.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Troops were sent by the Bourbon government against Napoleon, on his escape from Elba, but at sight of him they shouted "Vive l'Empereur" and joined his ranks.

Wordsworth's sonnet, "Near Dover, September, 1802,"

"Inland, within a hollow vale, I stood."

The same guards which protect us from disaster, defect, and enmity, defend us, if we will, from selfishness and fraud. Bolts and bars are not the best of our institutions, nor is shrewdness in trade a mark of wisdom. Men suffer all their life long under the foolish superstition that they can be cheated. But it is as impossible for a man to be cheated by any one but himself, as for a thing to be and not to be at the same time. There is a third silent party to all our bargains. The nature and soul of things takes on itself the guaranty of the fulfilment of every contract, so that honest service cannot come to loss. If you serve an ungrateful master, serve him the more. Put God in your debt. Every stroke shall be repaid. The longer the payment is withholden, the better for you; for compound interest on compound interest is the rate and usage of this exchequer.

The history of persecution is a history of endeavors to cheat nature, to make water run up hill, to twist a rope of sand. It makes no difference whether the actors be many or one, a tyrant or a mob. A mob is a society of bodies voluntarily bereaving themselves of reason and traversing its work. The mob is man voluntarily descending to the nature of the beast. Its fit hour of activity is night. Its actions are insane, like its whole constitution. It persecutes a principle; it would whip a right; it would tar and feather justice, by inflicting fire and outrage upon the houses and persons of those who have these. It resembles the prank of boys, who run with fireengines to put out the ruddy aurora streaming to the stars. The inviolate spirit turns their spite against the wrongdoers. The martyr cannot be dishonored. Every lash inflicted is a tongue of fame; every prison, a more illustrious abode; every burned book or house enlightens the world; every suppressed or expunged word reverberates through the earth from side to side. Hours of sanity and consideration are always arriving to communities as to individuals, when the truth is seen, and the martyrs are justified.

Thus do all things preach the indifferency of circumstances. The man is all. Every thing has two sides, a good and an evil. Every advantage has its tax. I learn to be content. But the doctrine of compensation is not the doctrine of indifferency. The thoughtless say, on hearing these representations,—What boots it to do well? there is one event to good and evil; if I gain any good I must pay for it; if I lose any good I gain some other; all actions are indifferent.

There is a deeper fact in the soul than compensation, to wit, its own nature. The soul is not a compensation, but a life. The soul is. Under all this running sea of circumstance, whose waters ebb and flow with perfect balance, lies the aboriginal abyss of real Being. Essence, or God, is not a relation, or a part, but the whole. Being is the vast affirmative, excluding negation, self-balanced, and swallowing up all relations, parts, and times within itself. Nature, truth, virtue, are the influx from thence. Vice is the absence or departure of the same. Nothing, Falsehood, may indeed stand as the great Night or shade, on which, as a background, the living universe paints itself forth; but no fact is begotten by it; it cannot work; for it is not." 1 It cannot work any good; it cannot work any harm. It is harm inasmuch as it is worse not to be than to be.

We feel defrauded of the retribution due to evil acts, because the criminal adheres to his vice and contumacy and does not come to a crisis or judgment anywhere in visible nature. There is no stunning confutation of his nonsense before men and angels. Has he therefore outwitted the law? Inasmuch as he carries the malignity and the lie with him he so far deceases from nature. In some manner there will be a demonstration of the wrong to the understanding also; but should we not see it, this deadly deduction makes square the eternal account

&lt;sup>1</sup> Cf. "A false man found a religion? Why, a false man cannot build a brick house! If he do not know and follow truly the properties of mortar, burnt clay, and what else he works in, it is no house that he makes, but a rubbish-heap." Carlyle, Heroes and Hero Worship: "The Hero as Prophet."

Neither can it be said, on the other hand, that the gain of rectitude must be bought by any loss. There is no penalty to virtue; no penalty to wisdom; they are proper additions of being. In a virtuous action, I properly am; in a virtuous act I add to the world; I plant into deserts conquered from Chaos and Nothing and see the darkness receding on the limits of the horizon. There can be no excess to love; none to knowledge; none to beauty, when these attributes are considered in the purest sense. The soul refuses limits, and always affirms an Optimism, never a Pessimism.

His life is a progress, and not a station. His instinct is trust. Our instinct uses "more" and "less" in application to man, of the presence of the soul, and not of its absence: the brave man is greater than the coward: the true, the benevolent, the wise, is more a man and not less, than the fool and knave. There is no tax on the good of virtue; for that is the incoming of God himself, or absolute existence, without any comparative. Material good has its tax, and if it came without desert or sweat, has no root in me, and the next wind will blow it away. But all the good of nature is the soul's, and may be had, if paid for in nature's lawful coin, that is, by labor which the heart and the head allow. I no longer wish to meet a good I do not earn, for example to find a pot of buried gold, knowing that it brings with it new burdens. I do not wish more external goods,-neither possessions, nor honors, nor powers, nor persons. The gain is apparent; the tax is certain. But there is no tax on the knowledge that the compensation exists and that it is not desirable to dig up treasure. Herein I rejoice with a serene eternal peace. I contract the boundaries of possible mischief. I learn the wisdom of St. Bernard, 1—"Nothing can work me damage except myself; the harm that I sustain I carry about with me, and never am a real sufferer but by my own fault."

In the nature of the soul is the compensation for the inequalities of condition. The radical tragedy of nature seems to be the distinction of More and Less. How can Less not feel the pain; how not feel indignation or malevolence towards More? Look at those who have less faculty, and one feels sad, and knows not well what to make of it. He almost shuns their eye; he fears they will upbraid God. What should they do? It seems a great injustice. But see the facts nearly and these mountainous inequalities vanish. Love reduces them as the sun melts the iceberg in the sea. The heart and soul of all men being one, this bitterness of His and Mine ceases. His is mine. I am my brother, and my brother is me. If I feel overshadowed and outdone by great neighbors, I can yet love; I can still receive; and he that loveth maketh his own the grandeur he loves. Thereby I make the discovery that my brother is my guardian, acting for me with the friendliest designs, and the estate I so admired and envied is my own. It is the nature of the soul to appropriate all things. Jesus and Shakespeare are fragments of the soul, and by love I conquer and incorporate them in my own conscious domain. His virtue.—is not that mine? His wit,—if it cannot be made mine, it is not wit.

Such also is the natural history of calamity. The changes which break up at short intervals the prosperity of men are advertisements of a nature whose law is growth. Every soul is by this intrinsic necessity quitting its whole system of things, its friends and home and laws and faith, as the shell-fish crawls out of its beautiful but stony case, because it no longer admits of its growth, and slowly forms a new house. 2 In proportion to the vigor of the individual, these revolutions are frequent, until in some happier mind they are incessant and all worldly relations hang very loosely about him, becoming, as it were, a transparent fluid membrane through which the living form is always seen, and not, as in most men, an indurated heterogeneous fabric of many dates, and of no settled character, in which the man is imprisoned. Then there can be enlargement, and the man of today scarcely recognizes the man of yesterday. And such should be the outward biography of man in time, a putting off of dead circumstances day by day, as he renews his raiment day by day. But to us, in our lapsed estate, resting, not advancing, resisting, not cooperating with the divine expansion, this growth comes by shocks.

We cannot part with our friends. We cannot let our angels go. We do not see that they only go out that archangels may come in. We are idolators of the old. We do not believe in the riches of the soul, in its proper eternity and omnipresence. We do not believe there is any force in today to rival or recreate that beautiful yesterday. We linger in the ruins of the old tent where once we had bread and shelter and organs, nor believe that the spirit can feed, cover, and nerve us again. We cannot again find aught so dear, so sweet, so graceful. But we sit and weep in vain. The voice of the Almighty saith, "Up and onward for evermore!" We cannot stay amid the ruins. Neither will we rely on the new; and so we walk ever with reverted eyes, like those monsters who look backwards.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a French monk of the twelfth century, who preached the Second Crusade

&lt;sup>2</sup> Cf. Holmes, "The Chambered Nautilus," p. 565.

And yet the compensations of calamity are made apparent to the understanding also, after long intervals of time. A fever, a mutilation, a cruel disappointment, a loss of wealth, a loss of friends, seems at the moment unpaid loss, and unpayable. But the sure years reveal the deep remedial force that underlies all facts. The death of a dear friend, wife, brother, lover, which seemed nothing but privation, somewhat later assumes the aspect of a guide or genius; for it commonly operates revolutions in our way of life, terminates an epoch of infancy or of youth which was waiting to be closed, breaks up a wonted occupation, or a household, or style of living, and allows the formation of new ones more friendly to the growth of character. It permits or constrains the formation of new acquaintances and the reception of new influences that prove of the first importance to the next years; and the man or woman who would have remained a sunny garden-flower, with no room for its roots and too much sunshine for its head, by the falling of the walls and the neglect of the gardener is made the banian 1 of the forest, yielding shade and fruit to wide neighborhoods of men.

1841

THE RHODORA:

ON BEING ASKED, WHENCE IS THE FLOWER?

In May, when sea-winds pierced our solitudes, I found the fresh Rhodora in the woods, Spreading its leafless blooms in a damp nook, To please the desert and the sluggish brook. The purple petals, fallen in the pool, Made the black water with their beauty gay; Here might the red-bird come his plumes to cool,

And court the flower that cheapens his array.
Rhodora! if the sages ask thee why
This charm is wasted on the earth and sky,
Tell them, dear, that if eyes were made for seeing,

<sup>1</sup> A fig tree of India which sends down from its branches roots that in turn become trunks. One tree group may become 1500 feet in circumference; see note 3, p. 365. Then Beauty is its own excuse for being:
Why thou wert there, O rival of the rose!
I never thought to ask, I never knew;
But, in my simple ignorance, suppose
The self-same Power that brought me there brought you.

1834

1839

EACH AND ALL

Little thinks, in the field, you red-cloaked clown,

Of thee from the hill-top looking down: The heifer that lows in the upland farm, Far-heard lows not thine ear to charm: The sexton, tolling his bell at noon, Deems not that great Napoleon Stops his horse, and lists with delight, Whilst his files sweep round you Alpine height; Nor knowest thou what argument 10 Thy life to thy neighbor's creed has lent. All are needed by each one, Nothing is fair or good alone. I thought the sparrow's note from heaven. Singing at dawn on the alder bough; I brought him home, in his nest, at even; He sings the song, but it pleases not now, For I did not bring home the river and sky;— He sang to my ear,—they sang to my eye. The delicate shells lay on the shore: 20 The bubbles of the latest wave Fresh pearls to their enamel gave: And the bellowing of the savage sea Greeted their safe escape to me. I wiped away the weeds and foam, I fetched my sea-born treasures home; But the poor, unsightly, noisome things Had left their beauty on the shore With the sun, and the sand, and the wild uproar. The lover watched his graceful maid, 30 As 'mid the virgin train she strayed, Nor knew her beauty's best attire Was woven still by the snow-white choir. At last she came to his hermitage. Like the bird from the woodlands to the cage;-

cage;—
The gay enchantment was undone,
A gentle wife, but fairy none.
Then I said, "I covet truth;
Beauty is unripe childhood's cheat;
I leave it behind with the games of youth"—
As I spoke, beneath my feet
The ground-pine curled its pretty wreath,
Running over the club-moss burrs;
I inhaled the violet's breath;
Around me stood the oaks and firs;
Pine-cones and acorns lay on the ground;

30

40

50

60

1839

Over me soared the eternal sky, Full of light and of deity;
Again I saw, again I heard,
The rolling river, the morning bird;—
Beauty through my senses stole;
I yielded myself to the perfect whole.
1834?

1839

HYMN

SUNG AT THE COMPLETION OF THE CONCORD

By the rude bridge that arched the flood, Their flag to April's breeze unfurled, Here once the embattled farmers stood, And fired the shot heard round the world.

The foe long since in silence slept;
Alike the conqueror silent sleeps;
And Time the ruined bridge has swept
Down the dark stream which seaward creeps.

On this green bank, by this soft stream, We set today a votive stone; That memory may their deed redeem, When, like our sires, our sons are gone.

Spirit, that made those heroes dare
To die and leave their children free,
Bid Time and Nature gently spare
The shaft we raise to them and thee.
1836

1837

10

10

THE HUMBLEBEE

Burly, dozing humblebee, Where thou art is clime for me. Let them sail for Porto Rique, Far-off heats through seas to seek; I will follow thee alone, Thou animated torrid-zone! Zigzag steerer, desert cheerer, Let me chase thy waving lines; Keep me nearer, me thy hearer, Singing over shrubs and vines.

Insect lover of the sun,
Joy of thy dominion!
Sailor of the atmosphere;
Swimmer through the waves of air;
Voyager of light and noon;
Epicurean of June;
Wait, I prithee, till I come
Within earshot of thy hum,—
All without is martyrdom.

When the south wind, in May days,
With a net of shining haze
Silvers the horizon wall,
And, with softness touching all,
Tints the human countenance
With the color of romance,
And, infusing subtle heats,
Turns the sod to violets,
Thou, in sunny solitudes,
Rover of the underwoods,
The green silence dost displace
With thy mellow, breezy bass.

Hot midsummer's petted crone, Sweet to me thy drowsy tone Tells of countless sunny hours, Long days, and solid banks of flowers; Of gulfs of sweetness without bound In Indian wildernesses found; Of Syrian peace, immortal leisure, Firmest cheer, and bird-like pleasure.

Aught unsavory or unclean Hath my insect never seen; But violets and bilberry bells. Maple-sap and daffodels. Grass with green flag half-mast high. Succory to match the sky, Columbine with horn of honey. Scented fern, and agrimony, Clover, catchfly, adder's-tongue And brier-roses, dwelt among; All beside was unknown waste. All was picture as he passed. Wiser far than human seer, Yellow-breeched philosopher! Seeing only what is fair, Sipping only what is sweet, Thou dost mock at fate and care, Leave the chaff and take the wheat. When the fierce northwestern blast Cools sea and lands so far and fast, Thou already slumberest deep; Woe and want thou canst outsleep; Want and woe, which torture us, Thy sleep makes ridiculous. 1837

THE PROBLEM

I like a church; I like a cowl; I love a prophet of the soul; And on my heart monastic aisles Fall like sweet strains, or pensive smiles; Yet not for all his faith can see Would I that cowled churchman be.

Why should the vest on him allure. Which I could not on me endure?

Not from a vain or shallow thought His awful Jove young Phidias 1 brought; Never from hps of cunning fell The thrilling Delphic oracle; 2 Out from the heart of nature rolled The burdens of the Bible old: The litanies of nations came, Like the volcano's tongue of flame, Up from the burning core below,-The canticles of love and woe: 19 The hand that rounded Peter's dome. And groined the aisles of Christian Rome, Wrought in a sad sincerity; Himself from God he could not free; He builded better than he knew;— The conscious stone to beauty grew.

Know'st thou what wove you woodbird's nest Of leaves, and feathers from her breast? Or how the fish outbuilt her shell. Painting with morn each annual cell? Or how the sacred pine-tree adds To her old leaves new myriads? Such and so grew these holy piles, Whilst love and terror laid the tiles.

Earth proudly wears the Parthenon, 3 As the best gem upon her zone; And Morning opes with haste her lids To gaze upon the Pyramids; O'er England's abbeys bends the sky, As on its friends, with kindred eye; For, out of Thought's interior sphere, These wonders rose to upper air; And Nature gladly gave them place. Adopted them into her race, And granted them an equal date With Andes and with Ararat.

These temples grew as grows the grass: Art might obey, but not surpass. The passive Master lent his hand To the vast soul that o'er him planned; And the same power that reared the shrine, Bestrode the tribes that knelt within. Ever the fiery Pentecost 4 ancients for its moral value.

Phidias, the greatest Greek sculptor; one of his masterpieces was a colossal statue of Zeus, or Jove, at Olympia; his work was highly regarded by the ancients for its moral value.

The utterances of the oracle of the Pythian Apollo at Delphi, the greatest of all the Greek oracles, were not, Emerson implies, the mere whims of priestcraft, but the voice of morality and justice.

This temple of Pallas Athene at Athens is the purest example of Greek architecture.

The fiftieth day after the Passover and the crucifixion, when the Holy Spirit appeared as tongues of flame upon the Christians assembled in Jerusalem; see Acts ii. 1 ff.

salem; see Acts ii, I ff.

Girds with one flame the countless host. Trances the heart through chanting choirs. And through the priest the mind inspires.

60

70

1840

The word unto the prophet spoken Was writ on tables vet unbroken; The word by seers or sibyls 5 told, In groves of oak, 6 or fanes of gold, Still floats upon the morning wind, Still whispers to the willing mind. One accent of the Holy Ghost The heedless world hath never lost. I know what say the fathers wise,-The Book itself before me lies, Old Chrysostom, 7 best Augustine, 8 And he who blent both in his line, The younger Golden Lips or mines, Taylor, 9 the Shakespeare of divines. His words are music in my ear, I see his cowled portrait dear: And yet, for all his faith could see, I would not the good bishop be. 1839

THE SNOW-STORM

Announced by all the trumpets of the sky Arrives the snow, and, driving o'er the fields, Seems nowhere to alight: the whited air Hides hills and woods, the river, and the heaven.

And veils the farm-house at the garden's end. The sled and traveler stopped, the courier's

Delayed, all friends shut out, the housemates

Around the radiant fireplace, enclosed In a tumultuous privacy of storm.

10 Come see the north wind's masonry. Out of an unseen quarry evermore Furnished with tile, the fierce artificer Curves his white bastions with projected roof Round every windward stake, or tree, or door. Speeding, the myriad-handed, his wild work So fanciful, so savage, naught cares he For number or proportion. Mockingly, On coop or kennel he hangs Parian 10 wreaths;

<sup>5</sup> prophetesses
<sup>6</sup> The Druid priests of early Britain are supposed to have worshiped in oak groves.
<sup>7</sup> Saint John Chrysostom (golden mouthed), so named because of his eloquence, was a celebrated prelate of the Greek church in the fourth century A.D. Saint Augustine, 354-430 A.D., a great ecclesiastic of the Latin church, whose autobiography is found in his Confessions

9 Jeremy Taylor, a seventeenth century bishop of the English church, whose Holy Living and Holy Dying are rich in poetic imagination

10 i. e., as of Parian marble, from Paros, in the Aegean Sea

30 40

50

60

A swan-like form invests the hidden thorn: 19 Fills up the farmer's lane from wall to wall. Maugre the farmer's sighs; and, at the gate A tapering turret overtops the work.

And when his hours are numbered, and the world

Is all his own, retiring, as he were not, Leaves, when the sun appears, astonished Art To mimic in slow structures, stone by stone. Built in an age, the mad wind's night-work, The frolic architecture of the snow.

1841

COMPENSATION

Why should I keep holiday When other men have none? Why but because, when these are gay, I sit and mourn alone?

And why, when mirth unseals all tongues Should mine alone be dumb? Ah! late I spoke to silent throngs, And now their hour is come. 1834

1841

FORBEARANCE

Hast thou named all the birds without a gun? Loved the wood-rose, and left it on its stalk? At rich men's tables eaten bread and pulse? Unarmed, faced danger with a heart of trust? And loved so well a high behavior, In man or maid, that thou from speech refrained. Nobility more nobly to repay? O, be my friend, and teach me to be thine! 1842

TO RHEA 1

Thee, dear friend, a brother soothes, Not with flatteries, but truths, Which tarnish not, but purify To light which dims the morning's eye. I have come from the spring-woods. From the fragrant solitudes;— Listen what the poplar-tree And murmuring waters counseled me.

If with love thy heart has burned; If thy love is unreturned; Hide thy grief within thy breast,

Rhea, recognized by the ancients as a deity of the earth, seems in this poem to typify men and women of earthly mold. The gods, or the higher sort of humanity, escape the pangs of human passoin and mere earthly love by heaping gifts on those who have rejected their devotion. Emerson would point the contrast between ordinary human passion and love of a more ethereal nature. See his essay "Love."

Though it tear thee unexpressed: For when love has once departed From the eves of the false-hearted. And one by one has torn off quite The bandages of purple light: Though thou wert the loveliest Form the soul had ever dressed, Thou shalt seem, in each reply, A vixen to his altered eve: Thy softest pleadings seem too bold, Thy praying lute shall seem to scold; Though thou kept the straightest road. Yet thou errest far and broad.

But thou shalt do as do the gods In their cloudless periods; For of this lore be thou sure,-Though thou forget, the gods, secure, Forget never their command, But make the statute of this land. As they lead, so follow all, Ever have done, ever shall, Warning to the blind and deaf. 'Tis written on the iron leaf, 2 Who drinks of Cupid's nectar cup Loveth downward, and not up; Therefore, who loves, of gods or men, Shall not by the same be loved again: His sweetheart's idolatry Falls, in turn, a new degree. When a god is once beguiled By beauty of a mortal child, And by her radiant youth delighted, He is not fooled, but warily knoweth His love shall never be requited. And thus the wise Immortal doeth.-'Tis his study and delight To bless that creature day and night; From all evils to defend her; In her lap to pour all splendor; To ransack earth for riches rare, And fetch her stars to deck her hair: He mixes music with her thoughts, And saddens her with heavenly doubts: All grace, all good his great heart knows, Profuse in love, the king bestows: Saying, "Hearken! Earth, Sea, Air! This monument of my despair Build I to the All-Good, All-Fair. Not for a private good, But I, from my beatitude, Albeit scorned as none was scorned, Adorn her as was none adorned. I make this maiden an ensample To Nature, through her kingdoms ample, Whereby to model newer races, Statelier forms, and fairer faces;

2 i. e., inexorably

To carry man to new degrees
Of power, and of comenness.
These presents be the hostages
Which I pawn for my release.
See to thyself, O Universe!
Thou art better, and not worse."—
And the god, having given all,
Is freed forever from his thrall.

EROS 1

The sense of the world is short, —
Long and various the report,—
To love and be beloved;
Men and gods have not outlearned it;
And, how oft soe'er they've turned it,
'Tis not to be improved.

EXPERIENCE

The lords of life, the lords of life,-I saw them pass, In their own guise. Like and unlike. Portly and grim,-Use and Surprise, Surface and Dream, Succession swift, and spectral Wrong, Temperament without a tongue, 10 And the inventor of the game Omnipresent without name; -Some to see, some to be guessed, They march from east to west: Little man, least of all, Among the legs of his guardians tall, Walked about with puzzled look. Him by the hand dear Nature took, Dearest Nature, strong and kind, Whispered, "Darling never mind! Tomorrow they will wear another face. The founder thou; these are thy race!"

1844, 1867

10

FORERUNNERS

Long I followed happy guides,
I could never reach their sides;
Their step is forth, and, ere the day,
Breaks up their leaguer, <sup>2</sup> and away.
Keen my sense, my heart was young,
Right good-will my sinews strung,
But no speed of mine avails
To hunt upon their shining trails.
On and away, their hasting feet
Make the morning proud and sweet;
Flowers they strew.—I catch the scent;
Or tone of silver instrument

1 god of love 2 camp

Leaves on the wind melodious trace: Yet I could never see their tace. 70 On eastern hills I see their smokes. Mixed with mist by distant lochs. I met many travelers Who the road had surely kept: They saw not my fine revelers.-These had crossed them while they slept. 1843 Some had heard their fair report. In the country or the court. Fleetest couriers alive Never yet could once arrive. As they went or they returned, At the house where these sojourned. Sometimes their strong speed they slacken. Though they are not overtaken; In sleep their jubilant troop is near.— 30 1844 I tuneful voices overhear: It may be in wood or waste,-At unawares 'tis come and past. Their near camp my spirit knows By signs gracious as rainbows. I thenceforward, and long after, Listen for their harp-like laughter. And carry in my heart, for days.

1846

1846

FABLE

Peace that hallows rudest ways.

The mountain and the squirrel Had a quarrel: And the former called the latter "Little Prig;" Bun replied. "You are doubtless very big; But all sorts of things and weather Must be taken in together, To make up a year And a sphere. 10 And I think it no disgrace To occupy my place. If I'm not so large as you, You are not so small as I, And not half so spry. I'll not deny you make A very pretty squirrel track; Talents differ; all is well and wisely put; If I cannot carry forests on my back, Neither can you crack a nut."

MITHRIDATES 3

I cannot spare water or wine, Tobacco-leaf, or poppy, or rose; From the earth-poles to the line, <sup>3</sup> Mithridates, 132-63 B.C., was King of Pontus, a country on the Black Sea. He was said so to have filled his system with poisons, by magic, as to be immune to them.

20

1847

10 20 30 40

1847

All between that works or grows, Everything is kin of mine.

Give me agates for my meat: Give me cantharids 1 to eat: From air and ocean bring me foods, From all zones and altitudes:-

From all natures, sharp and slimy, Salt and basalt, wild and tame: Tree and lichen, ape, sea-lion, Bird, and reptile, be my game.

Ivv for my fillet band: Blinding dog-wood in my hand; Hemlock for my sherbet cull me, And the prussic juice to lull me: Swing me in the upas 2 boughs. Vampyre-fanned, when I carouse.

Too long shut in strait and few, Thinly dieted on dew. I will use the world, and sift it, To a thousand humors shift it. As you spin a cherry. O doleful ghosts, and goblins merry! O all you virtues, methods, mights, Means, appliances, delights, Reputed wrongs and braggart rights, Smug routine, and things allowed, Minorities, things under cloud! Hither! take me, use me, fill me, Vein and artery, though ye kill me; God! I will not be an owl, But sun me in the Capitol.

ASTRAEA 3

Each the herald is who wrote His rank, and quartered 4 his own coat. There is no king nor sovereign state That can fix a hero's rate; Each to all is venerable. Cap-a-pie invulnerable, Until he write, where all eyes rest, Slave or master on his breast.

I saw men go up and down, In the country and the town, With this tablet on their neck,-"Judgment and a judge we seek." Not to monarchs they repair, Nor to learned jurist's chair; But they hurry to their peers, a kind of poisonous beetle

To their kinsfolk and their dears: Louder than with speech they pray.-"What am I? companion, say." And the friend not hesitates To assign just place and mates: Answers not in word or letter, Yet is understood the better: Each to each a looking-glass. Reflects his figure that doth pass. Every wayfarer he meets What himself declared repeats. What himself confessed records. Sentences him in his words:

The form is his own corporal form.

And his thought the penal worm.

Yet shine forever virgin minds, Loved by stars and purest winds, Which, o'er passion throned sedate, Have not hazarded their state; Disconcert the searching spy. Rendering to a curious eve The durance of a granite ledge To those who gaze from the sea's edge. It is there for benefit: It is there for purging light; There for purifying storms: And its depths reflect all forms; It cannot parley with the mean,— Pure by impure is not seen. For there's no sequestered grot, Lone mountain tarn, 5 or isle forgot, But Justice, journeying in the sphere, Daily stoops to harbor there.

GIVE ALL TO LOVE

Give all to love: Obey thy heart; Friends, kindred, days, Estate, good-fame, Plans, credit, and the Muse,-Nothing refuse.

'Tis a brave master; Let it have scope: Follow it utterly, Hope beyond hope: High and more high It dives into noon, With wing unspent, Untold intent; But it is a god, Knows its own path, And the outlets of the sky.

It was not for the mean; It requireth courage stout,

5 lake

10

&lt;sup>2</sup> a poisonous tree <sup>3</sup> the Greek goddess of justice <sup>4</sup> added an heraldic sign to a coat of arms; hence, settled his own rank

Souls above doubt, Valor unbending; Such 'twill reward,— They shall return More than they were, And ever ascending.

Leave all for love; Yet, hear me, yet, One word more thy heart behoved, One pulse more of firm endeavor,— Keep thee today, Tomorrow, forever, Free as an Arab Of thy beloved.

Cling with life to the maid; But when the surprise, First vague shadow of surmise Flits across her bosom young Of a joy apart from thee, Free be she, fancy-free; Nor thou detain her vesture's hem, Nor the palest rose she flung From her summer diadem.

Though thou loved her as thyself, As a self of purer clay, Though her parting dims the day, Stealing grace from all alive; Heartily know, When half-gods go, The gods arrive.

MERLIN 1

T

Thy trivial harp will never please Or fill my craving ear; Its chords should ring as blows the breeze, Free, peremptory, clear. No jingling serenader's art, Nor tinkle of piano strings, Can make the wild blood start In its mystic springs. The kingly bard Must smite the chords rudely and hard, As with hammer or with mace; That they may render back Artful thunder, which conveys Secrets of the solar track, Sparks of the supersolar blaze. Merlin's blows are strokes of fate,

A half-legendary poet of perhaps the sixth century; the name is also that of the great magician of the Arthurian legends,

Chiming with the forest tone,
When boughs buffet boughs in the wood;
Chiming with the gasp and moan
Of the ice-imprisoned flood;
With the pulse of manly hearts;
With the voice of orators;
With the din of city arts;
With the cannonade of wars;
With the marches of the brave;
And prayers of might from martyrs' cave.

Great is the art,
Great be the manners, of the bard.
He shall not his brain encumber
With the coil of rhythm and number;
But, leaving rule and pale forethought,
He shall aye climb
For his rime.
"Pass in, pass in," the angels say,
"In to the upper doors,
Nor count compartments of the floors.
But mount to paradise

40 By the stairway of surprise."

Blameless master of the games,
King of sport that never shames,
He shall daily joy dispense
Hid in song's sweet influence.
Things more cheerly live and go.
What time the subtle mind
Sings aloud the tune whereto
Their pulses beat,
And march their feet,
And their members are combined.

By Sybarites <sup>2</sup> beguiled,
He shall no task decline;
Merlin's mighty line
Extremes of nature reconciled,—
Bereaved a tyrant of his will,
And made the lion mild.
Songs can the tempest still,
Scattered on the stormy air,
Mold the year to fair increase
And bring in poetic peace.

He shall not seek to weave,
In weak, unhappy times,
Efficacious rimes;
Wait his returning strength.
Bird, that from the nadir's <sup>3</sup> floor
To the zenith's top can soar,
The soaring orbit of the muse exceeds that journey's length.

The inhabitants of the city of Sybaris, an ancient city of Italy, were known for their great luxury.
 the point just opposite the zenith or directly below our fact.

gn.

100

110

120

Nor profane affect to hit
Or compass that, by meddling wit,
Which only the propitious mind
Publishes when 'tis inclined.
There are open hours

70
When the God's will sallies free,
And the dull idiot might see
The flowing fortunes of a thousand years;—
Sudden, at unawares,
Self-moved, fly-to the doors,
Nor sword of angels could reveal
What they conceal.

п

The rime of the poet Modulates the king's affairs: Balance-loving Nature Made all things in pairs. To every foot its antipode: Each color with its counter glowed: To every tone beat answering tones, Higher or graver; Flavor gladly blends with flavor: Leaf answers leaf upon the bough: And match the paired cotyledons. Hands to hands, and feet to feet, In one body grooms and brides: Eldest rite, two married sides In every mortal meet. Light's far furnace shines. Smelting balls and bars, Forging double stars, Glittering twins and trines. The animals are sick with love. Lovesick with rime: Each with all propitious time Into chorus wove.

Like the dancer's ordered band, Thoughts come also hand in hand: In equal couples mated, Or else alternated; Adding by their mutual gage, One to other, health and age. Solitary fancies go Short-lived wandering to and fro, Most like to bachelors, Or an ungiven maid, Not ancestors. With no posterity to make the lie afraid, Or keep truth undecayed. Perfect-paired as eagle's wings. Justice is the rime of things: Trade and counting use The self-same tuneful muse: And Nemesis, 1

Who with even matches odd, Who athwart space redresses The partial wrong, Fills the just period, And finishes the song.

Subtle rimes, with ruin rife, Murmur in the house of life, Sung by the Sisters <sup>2</sup> as they spin; In perfect time and measure they Build and unbuild our echoing clay, As the two twilights of the day Fold us music-drunken in.

1847

129

THRENODY 3

The South-wind brings
Life, sunshine, and desire,
And on every mount and meadow
Breathes aromatic fire;
But over the dead he has no power,
The lost, the lost, he cannot restore;
And, looking over the hills, I mourn
The darling who shall not return.

I see my empty house, 10 I see my trees repair their boughs; And he, the wondrous child, Whose silver warble wild Outvalued every pulsing sound Within the air's cerulean round,-The hyacinthine boy, for whom Morn well might break and April bloom,— The gracious boy, who did adorn The world whereinto he was born, And by his countenance repay 20 The favor of the loving Day, -Has disappeared from the Day's eye; Far and wide she cannot find him; My hopes pursue, they cannot bind him. Returned this day, the south wind searches, And finds young pines and budding birches: But finds not the budding man; Nature, who lost, cannot remake him; Fate let him fall, Fate can't retake him; Nature, Fate, men, him seek in vain.

And whither now, my truant wise and sweet, O, whither tend thy feet?

I had the right, few days ago,
Thy steps to watch, thy place to know;
How have I forfeited the right?

<sup>1</sup> goddess of retribution, and allotter of divine justice

&lt;sup>2</sup> the Fates, who spin, weave, and cut the thread of human life

a from θρήνος, wailing, and ἀδή, song: the poem was written in 1842, just after the death of Emerson's oldest son Waldo, "a perfect little boy of five years and three months," as Emerson wrote Carlyle.

Hast thou forgot me in a new delight? I hearken for thy household cheer. O eloquent child! Whose voice, an equal messenger, Conveyed thy meaning mild. What though the pains and joys Whereof it spoke were toys Fitting his age and ken. Yet fairest dames and bearded men, Who heard the sweet request. So gentle, wise, and grave, Bended with joy to his behest, And let the world's affairs go by. Awhile to share his cordial game, Or mend his wicker wagon-frame, Still plotting how their hungry ear That winsome voice again might hear: For his lips could well pronounce Words that were persuasions.

Gentlest guardians marked serene His early hope, his liberal mien; Took counsel from his guiding eyes To make this wisdom earthly wise. Ah, vainly do these eyes recall The school-march, each day's festival, When every morn my bosom glowed To watch the convoy on the road: The babe in willow wagon closed, With rolling eyes and face composed: With children forward and behind, Like Cupids studiously inclined: And he the chieftain paced beside. The center of the troop allied, With sunny face of sweet repose, To guard the babe from fancied foes. The little captain innocent Took the eye with him as he went, Each village senior paused to scan And speak the lovely carayan. From the window I look out To mark thy beautiful parade, Stately marching in cap and coat To some tune by fairies played;-A music heard by thee alone To works as noble led thee on.

Now Love and Pride, alas! in vain, Up and down their glances strain. The painted sled stands where it stood; The kennel by the corded wood; The gathered sticks to stanch the wall Of the snow-tower, when snow should fall; The ominous hole he dug in the sand, And childhood's castles built or planned; His daily haunts I well discern,—
The poultry-yard, the shed, the barn,—

And every inch of garden ground
Paced by the blessed feet around,
From the roadside to the brook
Whereinto he loved to look.
Step the meek birds where erst they ranged;
The wintry garden lies unchanged;
The brook into the stream runs on;
But the deep-eved boy is gone.

On that shaded day, Dark with more clouds than tempests are. When thou didst yield thy innocent breath In birdlike heavings unto death, Night came, and Nature had not thee; I said, "We are mates in misery." The morrow dawned with needless glow: Each snowbird chirped, each fowl must crow; Each tramper started; but the feet Of the most beautiful and sweet Of human youth had left the hill And garden,—they were bound and still. 110 There's not a sparrow or a wren. There's not a blade of autumn grain, Which the four seasons do not tend, And tides of life and increase lend: And every chick of every bird, And weed and rock-moss is preferred. O ostrich-like forgetfulness! O loss of larger in the less! Was there no star that could be sent, No watcher in the firmament. 120 No angel from the countless host That loiters round the crystal coast. Could stoop to heal that only child, Nature's sweet marvel undefiled, And keep the blossom of the earth. Which all her harvests were not worth? Not mine,—I never called thee mine, But Nature's heir,—if I repine, And seeing rashly torn and moved Not what I made, but what I loved, 130 Grow early old with grief that thou Must to the wastes of Nature go .-'T is because a general hope Was quenched, and all must doubt and grope. For flattering planets seemed to say This child should ills of ages stay, By wondrous tongue, and guided pen, Bring the flown Muses back to men. Perchance not he but Nature ailed, The world and not the infant failed. 140 It was not ripe yet to sustain A genius of so fine a strain, Who gazed upon the sun and moon As if he came unto his own, And, pregnant with his grander thought, Brought the old order into doubt.

160

His beauty once their beauty tried: They could not feed him, and he died. And wandered backward as in scorn. To wait an aeon to be born. Ill day which made this beauty waste. Plight broken, this high face defaced! Some went and came about the dead: And some in books of solace read: Some to their friends the tidings say: Some went to write, some went to pray: One tarried here, there hurried one: But their heart abode with none. Covetous death bereaved us all. To aggrandize one funeral. The eager fate which carried thee Took the largest part of me: For this losing is true dying; This is lordly man's down-lying: This his slow but sure reclining, Star by star his world resigning.

O child of paradise. Boy who made dear his father's home. In whose deep eyes Men read the welfare of the times to come, I am too much bereft. The world dishonored thou hast left. O truth's and nature's costly lie! O trusted broken prophecy! O richest fortune sourly crossed! Born for the future, to the future lost! The deep Heart answered, "Weepest thou? Worthier cause for passion wild If I had not taken the child. And deemest thou as those who pore, 180 With aged eyes, short way before.— Think'st Beauty vanished from the coast Of matter, and thy darling lost? Taught he not thee—the man of eld. Whose eyes within his eyes beheld Heaven's numerous hierarchy span The mystic gulf from God to man? To be alone wilt thou begin When worlds of lovers hem thee in? Tomorrow, when the masks shall fall 190 That dizen Nature's carnival, The pure shall see by their own will, Which overflowing Love shall fill, 'T is not within the force of fate The fate-conjoined to separate. But thou, my votary, weepest thou? I gave thee sight—where is it now? I taught thy heart beyond the reach Of ritual, bible, or of speech; Wrote in thy mind's transparent table. 200 As far as the incommunicable; Taught thee each private sign to raise Lit by the supersolar blaze.

Past utterance, and past belief,
And past the blasphemy of grief,
The mysteries of Nature's heart;
And though no Muse can these impart,
Throb thine with Nature's throbbing breast,
And all is clear from east to west

"I came to thee as to a friend: 210 Dearest, to thee I did not send Tutors, but a joyful eve. Innocence that matched the sky. Lovely locks, a form of wonder, Laughter rich as woodland thunder. That thou mightst entertain apart The richest flowering of all art: And, as the great all-loving Day Through smallest chambers takes its way. That thou mightst break thy daily bread 220 With prophet, savior and head: That thou mightst cherish for thine own The riches of sweet Mary's Son. Boy-Rabbi, Israel's paragon. And thoughtest thou such guest Would in thy hall take up his rest? Would rushing life forget her laws, Fate's glowing revolution pause? High omens ask diviner guess: Not to be conned to tediousness. 280 And know my higher gifts unbind The zone that girds the incarnate mind. When the scanty shores are full With Thought's perilous, whirling pool; When frail Nature can no more. Then the Spirit strikes the hour: My servant Death, with solving rite, Pours finite into infinite.

"Wilt thou freeze love's tidal flow, Whose streams through nature circling go? Nail the wild star to its track On the half-climbed zodiac? Light is light which radiates, Blood is blood which circulates, Life is life which generates, And many-seeming life is one,— Wilt thou transfix and make it none? Its onward force too starkly pent In figure, bone, and lineament? Wilt thou, uncalled, interrogate, 250 Talker! the unreplying Fate? Nor see the genius of the whole Ascendant in the private soul, Beckon it when to go and come, Self-announced its hour of doom? Fair the soul's recess and shrine, Magic-built to last a season;

270

280

1847

Masterpiece of love benign, Fairer that expansive reason Whose omen 't is, and sign. Wilt thou not ope thy heart to know What rainbows teach, and sunsets show? Verdict which accumulates From lengthening scroll of human fates, Voice of earth to earth returned, Prayers of saints that inly burned,-Saving, What is excellent, As God lives, is permanent; Hearts are dust, hearts' loves remain; Heart's love will meet thee again. Revere the Maker; fetch thine eye Up to his style, and manners of the sky. Not of adamant and gold Built he heaven stark and cold: No, but a nest of bending reeds. Flowering grass and scented weeds; Or like a traveler's fleeing tent, Or how above the tempest bent; Built of tears and sacred flames. And virtue reaching to its aims; Built of furtherance and pursuing, Not of spent deeds, but of doing. Silent rushes the swift Lord Through ruined systems still restored, Broadsowing, bleak and void to bless, Plants with worlds the wilderness: Waters with tears of ancient sorrow Apples of Eden ripe tomorrow. House and tenant go to ground, Lost in God, in Godhead found." 1842

ODE

SUNG IN THE TOWN HALL, CONCORD. JULY 4, 1857

Oh tenderly the haughty day
Fills his blue urn with fire;
One morn is in the mighty heaven,
And one in our desire.

The cannon booms from town to town, Our pulses are not less, The joy-bells chime their tidings down, Which children's voices bless.

For He that flung the broad blue fold O'er-mantling land and sea, One third part of the sky unrolled For the banner of the free.

The men are ripe of Saxon kind
To build an equal state.—
To take the statute from the mind
And make of duty fate.

United States! the ages plead,—
Present and Past in under-song,—
Go put your creed into your deed,
Nor speak with double tongue.

For sea and land don't understand
Nor skies without a frown
See rights for which the one hand fights
By the other cloven down.

90

9Λ

10

Be just at home; then write your scroll
Of honor o'er the sea,
And bid the broad Atlantic roll
A ferry of the free.

And henceforth there shall be no chain,
Save underneath the sea
The wires shall murmur through the main <sup>1</sup>
Sweet songs of liberty.

The conscious stars accord above,
The waters wild below,
And under, through the cable wove,
Her fiery errands go.

For He that worketh high and wise,
Nor pauses in his plan,
Will take the sun out of the skies
Ere freedom out of man.

1857
1867

THE ROMANY 2 GIRL

The sun goes down, and with him takes The coarseness of my poor attire; The fair moon mounts, and aye the flame Of gypsy beauty blazes higher.

Pale northern girls! you scorn our race; You captives of your air-tight halls, Wear out in-doors your sickly days, But leave us the horizon walls.

And if I take you, dames, to task, And say it frankly without guile, Then you are gypsies in a mask, And I the lady all the while.

If, on the heath, below the moon, I court and play with paler blood, Me false to mine dare whisper none,—One sallow horseman knows me good.

Although submarine telegraphy had already been established between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, and the transatlantic line had been projected, the laying of the great Atlantic cable was not completed until 1866.
2 gypsy

20

1860

1857

Go, keep your cheek's rose from the rain, For teeth and hair with shopmen deal; My swarthy tint is in the grain, The rocks and forest know it real.

The wild air bloweth in our lungs, The keen stars twinkle in our eyes, The birds gave us our wily tongues, The panther in our dances flies.

You doubt we read the stars on high, Nathless we read your fortunes true; The stars may hide in the upper sky, But without glass we fathom you. 1855

BRAHMA 1

If the red slayer think he slays, Or if the slain think he is slain, They know not well the subtle ways I keep, and pass, and turn again.

Far or forgot to me is near; Shadow and sunlight are the same; The vanished gods to me appear; And one to me are shame and fame.

They reckon ill who leave me out: When me they fly, I am the wings; I am the doubter and the doubt, And I the hymn the Brahmin sings.

The strong gods pine for my abode, And pine in vain the sacred Seven; But thou, meek lover of the good! Find me, and turn thy back on heaven. 1857 1857

WORSHIP

This is he, who, felled by foes, Sprung harmless up, refreshed by blows: He to captivity was sold, But him no prison-bars would hold:

<sup>1</sup> Brahma was the personal god of the Hindus, "the original source and ultimate goal of all that exists." Oscar W. Firkins, of the University of Minnesota, author of Ralph Waldo Emerson (Houghton Miffiin Company, 1915), has kindly furnished the following interpretation of the poem:

the following interpretation of the poem:

"In the poem Brahma stands for the cosmic force which is the ultimatum of science, and which in Emerson's mind was identical with the divine spirit, the spirit of truth, goodness, and beauty, the ultimatum of religion. As Brahma, this force is here viewed with special reference to its unending and manifold transformations."

Emerson, hearing that the poem was not always understood, said that the meaning might be easily grasped if "Jehovah" were substituted for "Brahma." See Centenary Edition of Emerson's Poems, page 464, 7.

Poems, page 464, 7.

Mountain chains he can unlock: Thrown to lions for their meat. 20 . The crouching lion kissed his feet: Bound to the stake, no flames appalled, But arched o'er him an honoring vault. This is he men miscall Fate. Threading dark ways, arriving late, But ever coming in time to crown The truth, and hurl wrong-doers down. He is the oldest, and best known, More near than aught thou call'st thy own, Yet, greeted in another's eyes, Disconcerts with glad surprise.

Though they sealed him in a rock.

This is Jove, who, deaf to prayers. Floods with blessings unawares. Draw, if thou canst, the mystic line Severing rightly his from thine, Which is human, which divine. 1859-1860

BOSTON HYMN

READ IN MUSIC HALL, JANUARY 1, 1863

The word of the Lord by night To the watching Pilgrims came, As they sat by the seaside, And filled their hearts with flame.

God said, I am tired of kings, I suffer them no more: Up to my ear the morning brings The outrage of the poor.

Think ve I made this ball A field of havoc and war, Where tyrants great and tyrants small Might harry the weak and poor?

My angel, his name is Freedom,-Choose him to be your king; He shall cut pathways east and west, And fend you with his wing.

Lo! I uncover the land Which I hid of old time in the West, As the sculptor uncovers the statue When he has wrought his best;

I show Columbia, of the rocks Which dip their foot in the seas, And soar to the air-borne flocks Of clouds, and the boreal fleece.

I will divide my goods; Call in the wretch and slave: None shall rule but the humble, And none but Toil shall have.

10

20

I will have never a noble, No lineage counted great; Fishers and choppers and plowmen Shall constitute a state.

Go, cut down trees in the forest, And trim the straightest boughs; Cut down the trees in the forest. And build me a wooden house.

Call the people together. The young men and the sires, The digger in the harvest field. Hireling, and him that hires;

And here in a pine state-house They shall choose men to rule In every needful faculty, In church, and state, and school.

Lo, now! if these poor men Can govern the land and sea, And make just laws below the sun, As planets faithful be.

And ye shall succour men;
'T is nobleness to serve;
Help them who cannot help again:
Beware from right to swerve.

I break your bonds and masterships. And I unchain the slave: Free be his heart and hand henceforth As wind and wandering wave.

I cause from every creature His proper good to flow: As much as he is and doeth, So much he shall bestow.

But laying hands on another To coin his labor and sweat, He goes in pawn to his victim For eternal years in debt.

Today unbind the captive So only are ye unbound; Lift up a people from the dust. Trump of their rescue, sound!

Pav ransom to the owner,
And fill the bag to the brim.
Who is the owner? The slave is owner,
And ever was. Pay him.

O North! give him beauty for rags, And honor, O South! for his shame;

Nevada! coin thy golden crags
With Freedom's image and name. 1

Up! and the dusky race That sat in darkness long.— Be swift their feet as antelopes, And as behemoth 2 strong.

Come, East and West and North, By races, as snow-flakes, And carry my purpose forth, Which peither halts nor shakes.

My will fulfilled shall be, For, in daylight or in dark, My thunderbolt has eyes to see His way home to the mark.

1863

10

80

VOLUNTARIES

1

Low and mournful be the strain, Haughty thought be far from me; Tones of penitence and pain, Moanings of the tropic sea; Low and tender in the cell Where a captive sits in chains, Crooning ditties treasured well From his Afric's torrid plains. Sole estate his sire bequeathed—Hapless sire to hapless son—Was the wailing song he breathed, And his chain when life was done.

What his fault, or what his crime? Or what ill planet crossed his prime? Heart too soft and will too weak To front the fate that crouches near,-Dove beneath the vulture's beak:-Will song dissuade the thirsty spear? Dragged from his mother's arms and breast, Displaced, disfurnished here, His wistful toil to do his best Chilled by a ribald jeer, Great men in the Senate sate, Sage and hero, side by side, Building for their sons the State, Which they shall rule with pride. They forbore to break the chain Which bound the dusky tribe, Checked by the owners' fierce disdain, 30 Lured by "Union" as the bribe. Destiny sat by, and said. "Pang for pang your seed shall pay, Nevada was admitted in 1864 chiefly to add one more loval state to the Urion.

 an animal described in Job xI, 15-24; possibly the hippopotamus Hide in false peace your coward head, I bring round the harvest-day."

1863

П

Freedom all winged expands, Nor perches in a narrow place: Her broad van seeks unplanted lands: She loves a poor and virtuous race. Clinging to a colder zone Whose dark sky sheds the snow-flake down, The snow-flake is her banner's star. Her stripes the boreal streamers are. Long she loved the Northman well: Now the iron age is done. She will not refuse to dwell With the offspring of the Sun; Foundling of the desert far, Where palms, plume, siroccos blaze. He roves unhurt the burning ways In climates of the summer star. He has avenues to God Hid from men of Northern brain, Far beholding, without cloud, What these with slowest steps attain If once the generous chief arrive To lead him willing to be led. For freedom he will strike and strive, And drain his heart till he be dead.

Ш

In an age of fops and tovs. Wanting wisdom, void of right, Who shall nerve heroic boys To hazard all in Freedom's fight.— Break sharply off their jolly games, Forsake their comrades gay, And quit proud homes and youthful dames For famine, toil, and fray? Yet on the nimble air benign Speed nimbler messages, That waft the breath of grace divine To hearts in sloth and ease. So nigh is grandeur to our dust, So near is God to man, When Duty whispers low, Thou must, The youth replies, I can.

τv

O, well for the fortunate soul Which music's wings infold, Stealing away the memory Of sorrows new and old! Yet happier he whose inward sight, Stayed on his subtile thought, Shuts his sense on toys of time, To yacant bosoms brought.

But best befriended of the God He who, in evil times, Warned by an inward voice, Heeds not the darkness and the dread, Biding by his rule and choice, Feeling only the fiery thread Leading over heroic ground, Walled with mortal terror round. To the aim which him allures. And the sweet heaven his deed secures.

Stainless soldier on the walls. Knowing this .- and knows no more .-Whoever fights, whoever falls, Tustice conquers evermore. Justice after as before.-And he who battles on her side. God, though he were ten times slain, 100 Crowns him victor glorified. Victor over death and pain: 50 Forever: but his erring foe, Self-assured that he prevails, Looks from his victim lying low. And sees aloft the red right arm Redress the eternal scales. He, the poor foe, whom angels foil, Blind with pride, and fooled by hate, Writhes within the dragon coil. 110 Reserved to a speechless fate.

v

Blooms the laurel which belongs To the valiant chief who fights: I see the wreath, I hear the songs Lauding the Eternal Rights, Victors over daily wrongs: Awful victors, they misguide Whom they will destroy, And their coming triumph hide In our downfall, or our joy: 120 They reach no term, they never sleep, In equal strength through space abide; 70 Though, feigning dwarfs, they crouch and creep. The strong they slav, the swift outstride: Fate's grass grows rank in valley clods, And rankly on the castled steep,— Speak it firmly, these are gods, All are ghosts beside.

LETTERS

Every day brings a ship, Every ship brings a word; Well for those who have no fear, Looking seaward well assured That the word the vessel brings Is the word they wish to hear.

1867

20

1867

THE PAST

The debt is paid, The verdict said, The Furies 1 laid. The plague is stayed, All fortunes made: Turn the key and bolt the door, Sweet is death forevermore. Nor haughty hope, nor swart chagrin, Nor murdering hate, can enter in. All is now secure and fast; Not the gods can shake the Past; Flies-to the adamantine door Bolted down forevermore. None can re-enter there.-No thief so politic, No Satan with a royal trick Steal in by window, chink, or hole, To bind or unbind, add what lacked, Insert a leaf, or forge a name, New-face or finish what is packed, Alter or mend eternal Fact.

> HENRY DAVID THOREAU 1817-1862

Thoreau, who was of mingled French and New England blood, was born and died at Concord, Massachusetts. He graduated at Harvard, 1837, returned to Concord, lived for a while with Emerson, and intermittently taught school, surveyed, or worked at lead-pencil making, carpentry, or other day-labor, long enough to meet the necessities of his simple life. He expressed his independent mind in social and ethical essays, and strongly upheld the cause of anti-slavery. His chief delight was in the first-hand study of nature. Foremost among his works are A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers, 1849; Walden, 1854; Excursions, 1863; The Maine Woods, 1864; Cape Cod, 1865.

Thoreau is the most conspicuous convert and disciple of Emerson, the sage. He follows his master somewhat in style, but more particularly in his attitude toward nature and the spiritual values of life. Yet Thoreau was individual. Although, like Emerson, he interpreted nature with spiritual insight, he also loved it for its own sake with the instinct of a naturalist. He was the foremost of his generation to live and preach the simple life, withdrawing for awhile to the woods of Walden Pond where he lived alone. Doubtless much more has been made of this "hermit life" than the facts warrant; but the scenes from nature that it brought into his writings are exact, permanent, tonic. As a member of society he tried to put into practice such principles as Emerson preached; he was once jailed because he refused to pay taxes to support a government that he thought to be iniquitous. He embodied so strongly the shrewd, gnarled phases of Yankeeism that Lowell, for one, felt that his sense of social and spiritual values was warped and his spiritual vision distorted. However we approach him, Thoreau remains one of the most picturesque figures in American literature of the nineteenth century.

Biography and criticism: H. S. Salt, (GW) 1890, 1896; B. F. Sanborn, (AML) 1882, 1910; same, The Life of Henry David Thoreau, 1917; L. Bazalgette, H. Thoreau, Bachelor of Nature, 1924; More (Shel. 1 and 2); Payne; Macy; Chubb; N. Foerster, "Thoreau and 'The Wild,' "Dial 63:8-11; H. S. Canby, "The Modern Thoreau," Dial 59: 54-55; N. Foerster, "The Humanism of Thoreau," Nation 105:9-12; O. Shepard, "The Paradox of Thoreau," Scrib. M. 68:335-42; J. Burroughs, "A Critical Glance into Thoreau," Atlan. 123:777-86. See also J. R. Lowell, My Study Windows, 1871; R. L. Stevenson, Familiar Studies in Men and Books, 1882.

From WALDEN<sup>2</sup>

From I. ECONOMY

When I wrote the following pages, or rather the bulk of them, I lived alone, in the woods, a mile from any neighbor, in a house which I had built myself, on the shore of Walden Pond, in Concord, Massachusetts, and earned my living by the labor of my hands only. I lived there two years and two months. At present I am a sojourner in civilized life again.

I should not obtrude my affairs so much on the notice of my readers if very particular inquiries had not been made by my townsmen concerning my mode of life, which some would call impertinent, though they do not appear to me at all impertinent, but, considering the circumstances, very natural and pertinent. Some have asked what I got to eat; if I did not feel lonesome; if I was not afraid; and the like. Others have been curious to learn what portion of my income I devoted to charitable purposes; and some, who have large families, how many poor children I maintained. I will therefore ask those of my readers who feel no particular interest in me to pardon me if I undertake to answer some of these questions in this book. In most books, the I, or first person, is omitted; in this it will be retained;

the Eumenides, female divinities and the avengers of iniquity that, in respect to egotism, is the main difference. We commonly do not remember that it is, after all, always the first person that is speaking. I should not talk so much about myself if there were anybody else whom I knew as well. Unfortunately, I am confined to this theme by the narrowness of my experience. Moreover, I, on my side, require of every writer, first or last, a simple and sincere account of his own life, and not merely what he has heard of other men's lives; some such account as he would send to his kindred from a distant land: for if he has lived sincerely, it must have been in a distant land to me. Perhaps these pages are more particularly addressed to poor students. As for the rest of my readers. they will accept such portions as apply to them. I trust that none will stretch the seams in putting on the coat, for it may do good service to him whom it fits.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Walden Pond is a small lake one and one-half miles south of Concord, Massachusetts.

I would fain say something, not so much concerning the Chinese and Sandwich Islanders, as you who read these pages, who are said to live in New England; something about your condition, especially your outward condition or circumstances in this world, in this town, what it is, whether it is necessary that it be as bad as it is, whether it cannot be improved as well as not. I have traveled a good deal in Concord: and everywhere, in shops, and offices, and fields, the inhabitants have appeared to me to be doing penance in a thousand remarkable ways. What I have heard of Brahmans sitting exposed to four fires and looking in the face of the sun; or hanging suspended, with their heads downward, over flames; or looking at the heavens over their shoulders "until it becomes impossible for them to resume their natural position, while from the twist of the neck nothing but liquids can pass into the stomach"; or dwelling, chained for life, at the foot of a tree; or measuring with their bodies, like caterpillars, the breadth of vast empires; or standing on one leg on the tops of pillars,—even these forms of conscious penance are hardly more incredible and astonishing than the scenes which I daily witness. The twelve labors of Hercules 1 were trifling in comparison with those which my neighbors have undertaken; for they were only twelve, and had an end; but I could never see that these men slew or captured any monster or finished any labor. They have no friend Iolas 2 to burn with a hot iron the root of the hydra's head, but as soon as one head is crushed, two spring up.

I see young men, my townsmen, whose misfortune it is to have inherited farms, houses, barns, cattle, and farming tools; for these are more easily acquired than got rid of. Better if they had been born in the open pasture and suckled by a wolf, that they might have seen with clearer eves what field they were called to labor in Who made them serfs of the soil? Why should they eat their sixty acres, when man is condemned to eat only his peck of dirt? Why should they begin digging their graves as soon as they are born? They have got to live a man's life, pushing all these things before them, and get on as well as they can. How many a poor immortal soul have I met well nigh crushed and smothered under its load, creeping down the road of life, pushing before it a barn seventy-five feet by forty, its Augean stables 3 never cleansed, and one hundred acres of land tillage, mowing, pasture, and wood-lot! The portionless, who struggle with no such unnecessary inherited encumbrances, find it labor enough to subdue and cultivate a few cubic feet of flesh.

Near the end of March, 1845. I borrowed an axe and went down to the woods by Walden Pond, nearest to where I intended to build my house, and began to cut down some tall arrowy white pines, still in their youth, for timber. It it difficult to begin without borrowing, but perhaps it is the most generous course thus to permit your fellow-men to have an interest in your enterprise. The owner of the axe, as he released his hold on it, said that it was the apple of his eye; but I returned it sharper than I received it. It was a pleasant hillside where I worked, covered with pine woods, through which I looked out on the pond, and a small open field in the woods where pines and hickories were springing up. The ice in the pond was not yet dissolved, though there were some open spaces, and it was all dark colored and saturated with water. There were some slight flurries of snow during the days that I worked there; but for the most part when I came out on to the railroad, on my way home, its yellow sand heap stretched away gleaming in the hazy atmosphere, and the rails shone in Hercules, to obtain immortality, had to perform twelve great tasks; he cleansed the Augean stables, strangled the Nemean lion, killed the Lernean hydra. procured the golden apples from the Hesperides brought to earth Cerberus, the dog that guarded Hades, and did other superhuman deeds.

&lt;sup>2</sup> the companion and charioteer of Hercules, without whose help the hydra might scarcely have been overcome

Hercules cleansed the stables of Augeas, in which three thousand oxen had been stabled for thirty years, in one day by turning the rivers Alpheus and Peneus through them.

the spring sun, and I heard the lark and pewee and other birds already come to commence another year with us. They were pleasant spring days, in which the winter of man's discontent 1 was thawing as well as the earth, and the life that had lain torpid began to stretch itself. One day, when my axe had come off and I had cut a green hickory for a wedge, driving it with a stone, and had placed the whole to soak in a pond hole in order to swell the wood. I saw a striped snake run into the water, and he lay on the bottom, apparently without inconvenience, as long as I stayed there, or more than a quarter of an hour; perhaps because he had not yet fairly come out of the torpid state. It appeared to me that for a like reason men remain in their present low and primitive condition: but if they should feel the influence of the spring of springs arousing them, they would of necessity rise to a higher and more ethereal life. I had previously seen the snakes in frosty mornings in my path with portions of their bodies still numb and inflexible, waiting for the sun to thaw them. On the 1st of April it rained and melted the ice, and in the early part of the day, which was very foggy, I heard a stray goose groping about over the pond and cackling as if lost, or like the spirit of the fog.

So I went on for some days cutting and hewing timber, and also studs and rafters, all with my narrow axe, not having many communicable or scholar-like thoughts, singing to myself.—

Men say they know many things; But lo! they have taken wings,—
The arts and sciences,
And a thousand appliances;
The wind that blows
Is all that anybody knows.

I hewed the main timbers six inches square, most of the studs on two sides only, and the rafters and floor timbers on one side, leaving the rest of the bark on, so that they were just as straight and much stronger than sawed ones. Each stick was carefully mortised or tenoned by its stump, for I had borrowed other tools by this time. My days in the woods were not very long ones; yet I usually carried my dinner of bread and butter, and read the newspaper in which it was wrapped, at noon, sitting amid the green pine boughs which I had cut off, and to my bread was imparted some of their fragrance, for my hands were covered with a thick coat of pitch. Before I had done I was more the friend than the foe of the pine tree, though I had cut down some of them, having become better acquainted with it. Sometimes a rambler in the wood was attracted by the sound of my axe, and we chatted pleasantly over the chips which I had made.

By the middle of April, for I made no haste in my work, but rather made the most of it. my house was framed and ready for the raising. I had already bought the shanty of James Collins, an Irishman who worked on the Fitchburg Railroad, for boards. James Collins' shanty was considered an uncommonly fine one. When I called to see it he was not at home. I walked about the outside, at first unobserved from within, the window was so deep and high. It was of small dimensions. with a peaked cottage roof, and not much else to be seen, the dirt being raised five feet all around as if it were a compost heap. roof was the soundest part, though a good deal warped and made brittle by the sun. Door-sill there was none, but a perennial passage for the hens under the door board. Mrs. C. came to the door and asked me to view it from the inside. The hens were driven in by my approach. It was dark, and had a dirt floor for the most part, dank, clammy, and aguish, only here a board and there a board which would not bear removal. She lighted a lamp to show me the inside of the roof and the walls, and also that the board floor extended under the bed, warning me not to step into the cellar, a sort of dust hole two feet deep. In her own words, they were "good boards overhead, good boards all around, and a good window,"-of two whole squares originally, only the cat had passed out that way lately. There was a stove, a bed, and a place to sit, an infant in the house where it was born, a silk parasol, gilt-framed looking-glass, and a patent new coffeemill nailed to an oak sapling, all told. The bargain was soon concluded, for James had in the mean while returned. I to pay four dollars and twenty-five cents tonight, he to vacate at five tomorrow morning, selling to nobody else meanwhile: I to take possession at six. It were well, he said, to be there early, and anticipate certain indistinct but wholly unjust claims on the score of ground rent and fuel. assured me was the only encumbrance. six I passed him and his family on the road. One large bundle held their all,—bed, coffeemill, looking-glass, hens,—all but the cat; she took to the woods and became a wild cat, and, as I learned afterward, trod in a trap set for woodchucks, and so became a dead cat at last.

I took down this dwelling the same morning, drawing the nails, and removed it to the pond side by small cart-loads, spreading the boards on the grass there to bleach and warp back again in the sun. One early thrush gave me a note or two as I drove along the woodland path. I was informed treacherously by a young Patrick that neighbor Seeley, an Irishman, in the intervals of the carting, transferred the still tolerable straight, and drivable nails, staples, and spikes to his pocket, and then stood when I came back to pass the time of day. and look freshly up, unconcerned, with spring thoughts, at the devastation; there being a dearth of work, as he said. He was there to represent spectatordom, and help make this seemingly insignificant event one with the removal of the gods of Trov. 1

I dug my cellar in the side of a hill sloping to the south, where a woodchuck had formerly dug his burrow, down through sumach and blackberry roots, and the lowest stain of vegetation, six feet square by seven deep, to a fine sand where potatoes would not freeze in any winter. The sides were left shelving, and not stoned; but the sun having never shone on them, the sand still keeps its place. It was but two hours' work. I took particular pleasure in this breaking of ground, for in almost all latitudes men dig into the earth for an equable temperature. Under the most splendid house in the city is still to be found the cellar where they store their roots as of old, and long after the superstructure has disappeared posterity remark its dent in the earth. The house is still but a sort of porch at the entrance of a burrow.

At length, in the beginning of May, with the help of some of my acquaintances. 2 rather to improve so good an occasion for neighborliness than from any necessity. I set up the frame of my house. No man was ever more honored in the character of his raisers than I. They are destined. I trust, to assist at the raising of loftier structures one day. I began to occupy my house on the 4th of July, as soon as it was boarded and roofed, for the boards were carefully feather-edged and lapped, so that it was perfectly impervious to rain; but before boarding I laid the foundation of a chimney at one end, bringing two cartloads of stones up the hill from the pond in my arms. I built the chimney after my hoeing in the fall, before a fire became necessary for warmth, doing my cooking in the mean while out of doors on the ground, early in the morning: which mode I still think is in some respects more convenient and agreeable than the usual one. When it stormed before my bread was baked, I fixed a few boards over the fire, and sat under them to watch my loaf, and passed some pleasant hours in that way. In those days, when my hands were much employed, I read but little, but the least scraps of paper which lay on the ground, my holder, or tablecloth, afforded me as much entertainment, in fact answered the same purpose as the Iliad.

. . . . . . . .

Before winter I built a chimney, and shingled the sides of my house, which were already impervious to rain, with imperfect and sappy shingles made of the first slice of the log, whose edges I was obliged to straighten with a plane.

I have thus a tight shingled and plastered house, ten feet wide by fifteen long, and eightfeet posts, with a garret and a closet, a large window on each side, two trap doors, one door at the end, and a brick fireplace opposite. The exact cost of my house, paying the usual price for such materials as I used, but not counting the work, all of which was done by myself, was as follows; and I give the details because very few are able to tell exactly what their houses cost, and fewer still, if any, the separate cost of the various materials which compose them:—

```
Boards .......$8.03½, mostly shanty boards.
Refuse shingles for roof and sides. . 4.00
Laths ..... 1.25
Two second-hand windows with glass ..... 2.43
One thousand old brick . . . . . . 4.00
Two casks of lime 2.40
                        That was high.
                        More than I needed.
Mantle-tree iron.
                 .15
Nails . . . . . . . . . 3.90 Hinges and screws .....
Latch .....
Chalk .....
Transportation .. 1.40
                        I carried a good part on my back.
  In all . . . . . . . . $28.12\frac{1}{2}
```

These are all the materials excepting the timber, stones, and sand, which I claimed by squatter's right. I have also a small woodshed adjoining, made chiefly of the stuff which was left after building the house.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The spirit of Hector commanded Aeneas to build a new city, Rome, to shelter the Lares and Penates —household gods—of fallen Troy. Vergil, Aeneid ii, 248-311.

ii, 248-311.

These he'pers included Emerson. Fllery Channing.
Bronson Alcott, and George William Curtis, then a Harvard student of twenty-one who was working on a farm near by.

I intend to build me a house which will surpass any on the main street in Concord in grandeur and luxury, as soon as it pleases me as much and will cost me no more than my present one.

I thus found that the student who wishes for a shelter can obtain one for a lifetime at an expense not greater than the rent which he now pays annually. If I seem to boast more than is becoming, my excuse is that I brag for humanity rather than for myself: and my shortcomings and inconsistencies do not affect the truth of my statement. Notwithstanding much cant and hypocrisy,—chaff which I find it difficult to separate from my wheat, but for which I am as sorry as any man,-I will breathe freely and stretch myself in this respect, it is such a relief to both the moral and physical system; and I am resolved that I will not through humility become the devil's attorney. I will endeavor to speak a good word for the truth. At Cambridge College the mere rent of a student's room, which is only a little larger than my own, is thirty dollars each year, though the corporation had the advantage of building thirty-two side by side and under one roof, and the occupant suffers the inconvenience of many and noisy neighbors, and perhaps a residence in the fourth story. I cannot but think that if we had more true wisdom in these respects, not only less education would be needed, because, forsooth, more would already have been acquired, but the pecuniary expense of getting an education would in a great measure vanish. Those conveniences which the student requires at Cambridge or elsewhere cost him or somebody else ten times as great a sacrifice of life as they would with proper management on both sides. Those things for which the most money is demanded are never the things which the student most wants. Tuition, for instance, is an important item in the term bill, while for the far more valuable education which he gets by associating with the most cultivated of his contemporaries no charge is made. The mode of founding a college is, commonly, to get up a subscription of dollars and cents, and then following blindly the principles of a division of labor to its extreme, a principle which should never be followed but with circumspection,—to call in a contractor who makes this a subject of speculation, and he employs Irishmen or other operatives actually to lay the foundations, while the students that are to be are said to be fitting themselves for it; and for these oversights successive generations have to pay. I think that it would be better than this, for the students, or those who desire to be benefited by it, even to lay the foundation themselves. The student who secures his coveted leisure and retirement by systematically shirking any labor necessary to man obtains but an ignoble and unprofitable leisure, defrauding himself of the experience which alone can make leisure fruitful. "But." says one. "you do not mean that the students should go to work with their hands instead of their heads?" I do not mean that exactly, but I mean something which he might think a good deal like that; I mean that they should not play life, or study it merely, while the community supports them at this expensive game, but earnestly live it from beginning to end. How could youths better learn to live than by at once trying the experiment of living? 1 Methinks this would exercise their minds as much as mathematics. If I wished a boy to know something about the arts and sciences, for instance, I would not pursue the common course, which is merely to send him into the neighborhood of some professor, where anything is professed and practiced but the art of life;—to survey the world through a telescope or a microscope. and never with his natural eye; to study chemistry, and not learn how his bread is made, or mechanics, and not learn how it is earned; to discover new satellites to Neptune, and not detect the motes in his eyes, or to what vagabond he is a satellite himself; or to be devoured by the monsters that swarm all around him, while contemplating the monsters in a drop of vinegar. Which would have advanced the most at the end of a month,—the boy who had made his own jackknife from the ore which he had dug and smelted, reading as much as would be necessary for this,-or the boy who had attended the lectures on metallurgy at the Institute in the meanwhile, and had received a Rogers' penknife from his father? Which would be most likely to cut his fingers?

. . . To my astonishment I was informed on leaving college that I had studied navigation! -why, if I had taken one turn down the harbor I should have known more about it. Even the poor student studies and is taught only political economy, while that economy of living which is synonymous with philosophy is not even sincerely professed in our colleges. The consequence is that while he is reading Adam Smith, Ricardo, and Sav. 2 he runs his father in debt irretrievably.

1 This shows the seriousness of Thoreau's own experiment.

<sup>2</sup> These three men were prominent students of and writers on economics; the first two were English, the third was French.

Before I finished my house, wishing to earn ten or twelve dollars by some honest and agreeable method, in order to meet my unusual expenses. I planted about two acres and a half of light and sandy soil near it chiefly with beans, but also a small part with potatoes, corn, peas, and turnips. The whole lot contains eleven acres, mostly growing up to pines and hickories, and was sold the preceding season for eight dollars and eight cents an acre. One farmer said that it was "good for nothing but to raise cheeping squirrels on." I put no manure whatever on this land, not being the owner, but merely a squatter, and not expecting to cultivate so much again, and I did not quite hoe it all once. I got out several cords of stumps in plowing, which supplied me with fuel for a long time, and left small circles of virgin mold, easily distinguishable through the summer by the greater luxuriance of the beans there. The dead and for the most part unmerchantable wood behind my house, and the driftwood from the pond, have supplied the remainder of my fuel. I was obliged to hire a team and a man for the plowing, though I held the plow myself. My farm outgoes for the first season were, for implements, seed, work, etc., $14.72½. The seed corn was given me. This never costs anything to speak of, unless you plant more than enough. I got twelve bushels of beans, and eighteen bushels of potatoes, besides some peas and sweet corn. The yellow corn and turnips were too late to come to anything. My whole income from the farm was

| Deducting the outgoes                           |
|---|
| There are left                                  |
| besides produce consumed and on hand at the     |
| time this estimate was made of the value of     |
| $4.50,—the amount on hand much more than       |
| balancing a little grass which I did not raise. |
| All things considered, that is, considering the |
| importance of a man's soul and of today, not-   |
| withstanding the short time occupied by my      |
| experiment, nay, partly even because of its     |
| transient character, I believe that that was    |

$23.44

The next year I did better still, for I spaded up all the land which I required, about a third of an acre, and I learned from the experience of both years, not being in the least awed by many celebrated works on husbandry, Arthur Young 1 among the rest, that if one would live doing better than any farmer in Concord did that year.

simply and eat only the crop which he raised. and raise no more than he ate, and not exchange it for an insufficient quantity of more luxurious and expensive things, he would need to cultivate only a few rods of ground, and that it would be cheaper to spade up that than to use oxen to plow it, and to select a fresh spot from time to time than to manure the old, and he could do all his necessary farm work as it were with his left hand at odd hours in the summer: and thus he would not be tied to an ox, or horse, or cow, or pig, as at present. I desire to speak impartially on this point, and as one not interested in the success or failure of the present economical and social arrange-I was more independent than any farmer in Concord, for I was not anchored to a house or farm, but could follow the bent of my genius, which is a very crooked one, every moment. Besides being better off than they already, if my house had been burned or my crops had failed. I should have been nearly as well off as before.

By surveying, carpentry, and day-labor of various other kinds in the village in the meanwhile, for I have as many trades as fingers, I had earned $13.34. The expense of food for eight months, namely, from July 4th to March 1st, the time when these estimates were made, though I lived there more than two years,—not counting potatoes, a little green corn, and some peas, which I had raised, nor considering the value of what was on hand at the last date, was

| Rice$ Molasses         | 1.73  | Cheapest form of the saccharine.                     |
|-------------------------|-------|--|
| Rye mealIndian meal | 1.043 | 400  |
| Indian meal             | .993  | 4Cheaper than rye.                                   |
| Pork                    | .22   | ) ≧  |
| Flour                   | .88   | Costs more than Indian meal, both money and trouble. |
| Sugar                   | .80   | ( money and trouble.   E                             |
| Lard                    | .65   | L#   |
| Apples                  | .25   | 1  |
| Dried apples            | .22   | l N  |
| Sweet potatoes          | .10   | which  |
| One pumpkin             | .06   | 125  |
| One watermelon .        | .02   | failed   |
| Salt                    | .03   | ع ا  |

Yes, I did eat $8.74, all told; but I should not thus unblushingly publish my guilt, if I did not know that most of my readers were equally guilty with myself, and that their deeds would look no better in print. The next year I sometimes caught a mess of fish for my dinner, and once I went so far as to slaughter a woodchuck which ravaged my beanfield,—effect his transmigration, as a Tartar would say,—and devour him, partly for experiment's sake; but though it afforded me a momentary enjoyment, notwithstanding a musky flavor, I saw that the longest use would not make that a good practice, however it might seem to have your woodchucks ready dressed by the village but cher.

&lt;sup>1</sup> a noted English writer on agriculture and social economy

Clothing and some incidental expenses within the same dates, though little can be inferred from this item, amounted to ...$8.403/4
Oil and some household utensils ...... 2.00

So that all the pecuniary outgoes, excepting for washing and mending, which for the most part were done out of the house, and their bills have not yet been received,—and these are all and more than all the ways by which money necessarily goes out in this part of the world,—

| House                   | . 14.72½. 8.74 |
|-------------------------|--------------------|
| Oil, etc., eight months | 2.00               |

| Earned by | $23day-labor 13 | 3.44 |
|-----------|----------------------|------|
| In all    | $36                 | 5.78 |

I have for farm produce sold which subtracted from the sum of the outgoes leaves a balance of $25.2134 on the one side,—this being very nearly the means with which I started, and the measure of expenses to be incurred,—and on the other, besides the leisure and independence and health thus secured, a comfortable house for me as long as I choose to occupy it.

These statistics, however accidental and therefore uninstructive they may appear, as they have a certain completeness, have a certain value also. Nothing was given me of which I have not rendered some account. It appears from the above estimate, that my food alone cost me in money about twenty-seven cents a week. It was for nearly two years after this, rye and Indian meal, without yeast, potatoes, rice, a very little salt pork, molasses, and salt, and my drink, water. It was fit that I should live on rice, mainly, who loved so well the philosophy of India. To meet the objections of some inveterate cavilers, I may as well state that if I dined out occasionally, as I always had done, and I trust shall have opportunities to do again, it was frequently to the detriment of my domestic arrangements. But the dining out, being, as I have stated, a constant element, does not in the least effect a comparative statement like this.

I learned from my two years' experience that it would cost incredibly little trouble to obtain one's necessary food, even in this latitude; that a man may use as simple a diet as the animals, and yet retain health and strength.

From II. WHERE I LIVED AND WHAT I LIVED FOR

When first I took up my abode in the woods, that is, began to spend my nights as well as days there, which, by accident, was on Independence day, or the fourth of July, 1845, my house was not finished for winter, but was merely a defense against the rain, without plastering or chimney, the walls being of rough weather-stained boards, with wide chinks, which made it cool at night. The upright white hewn studs and freshly planed door and window casings gave it a clean and airy look, especially in the morning, when its timbers were saturated with dew, so that I fancied that by noon some sweet gum would exude from them. To my imagination it retained throughout the day more or less of this auroral character, reminding me of a certain house on a mountain which I had visited the year before. This was an airy and unplastered cabin, fit to entertain a traveling god, and where a goddess might trail her garments. The winds which passed over my dwelling were such as sweep over the ridges of mountains, bearing the broken strains, or celestial parts only, of terrestrial music. The morning wind forever blows, the poem of creation is uninterrupted; but few are the ears that hear it. Olympus is but the outside of the earth everywhere.

The only house I had been the owner of before, if I except a boat, was a tent, which I used occasionally when making excursions in the summer, and this is still rolled up in my garret; but the boat, after passing from hand to hand, has gone down the stream of time. With this more substantial shelter about me. I had made some progress toward settling in the world. This frame, so slightly clad, was a sort of crystallization around me, and reacted on the builder. It was suggestive somewhat as a picture in outlines. I did not need to go out doors to take the air, for the atmosphere within had lost none of its freshness. It was not so much within doors as behind a door where I sat, even in the rainiest weather. The Harivansa 1 says, "An abode without birds is like a meat without seasoning." Such was not my abode, for I found myself suddenly neighbor to the birds; not by having imprisoned one, but having caged myself near them. I was not only nearer to some of those which commonly frequent the garden and the orchard, but to those wilder and more thrilling songsters of the forest which never, or rarely, serenade a villager,—the wood-thrush, the veery, the scarlet tanager, the field-sparrow, the whippoorwill, and many others.

I was seated by the shore of a small pond. about a mile and a half south of the village of Concord and somewhat higher than it, in the midst of an extensive wood between that town and Lincoln, and about two miles south of that our only field known to fame. Concord Battle Ground; but I was so low in the woods that the opposite shore, half a mile off, like the rest, covered with wood, was my most distant horizon. For the first week, whenever I looked out on the pond it impressed me like a tarn high up on the side of a mountain, its bottom far above the surface of other lakes. and, as the sun arose, I saw it throwing off its nightly clothing of mist, and here and there, by degrees, its soft ripples or its smooth reflecting surface was revealed, while the mists. like ghosts, were stealthily withdrawing in every direction into the woods, as at the breaking up of some nocturnal conventicle. The very dew seemed to hang upon the trees later into the day than usual, as on the sides of mountains.

This small lake was of most value as a neighbor in the intervals of a gentle rain storm in August, when, both air and water being perfectly still, but the sky overcast, mid-afternoon had all the serenity of evening, and the woodthrush sang around, and was heard from shore to shore. A lake like this is never smoother than at such a time; and the clear portion of the air above it being shallow and darkened by clouds, the water, full of light and reflections, becomes a lower heaven itself so much the more important. From a hill top near by. where the wood had been recently cut off. there was a pleasing vista southward across the pond, through a wide indentation in the hills which form the shore there, where their opposite sides sloping toward each other suggested a stream flowing out in that direction through a wooded valley, but stream there was none. That way I looked between and over the near green hills to some distant and higher ones in the horizon, tinged with blue. Indeed, by standing on tiptoe I could catch a glimpse of some of the peaks of the still bluer and more distant mountain ranges in the northwest, those true-blue coins from heaven's own mint, and also of some portion of the village. But in other directions, even from this point, I could not see over or beyond the woods which surrounded me. It is well to have some water in your neighborhood, to give buovancy to and float the earth. One value even of the smallest well is, that when you look into it you see that earth is not continent but insular. This is as important as that it keeps butter cool. When I looked across the pond from this peak toward the Sudbury meadows, which in time of flood I distinguished elevated perhaps by a mirage in their seething valley, like a coin in a basin. all the earth beyond the pond appeared like a thin crust insulated and floated even by this small sheet of intervening water, and I was reminded that this on which I dwelt was but dry land.

1 an ancient Sanskrit poem

Though the view from my door was still more contracted, I did not feel crowded or confined in the least. There was pasture enough for my imagination. The low shrub-oak plateau to which the opposite shore arose, stretched away toward the prairies of the West and the steppes of Tartary, affording ample room for all the roving families of men. "There are none happy in the world but beings who enjoy freely a vast horizon,"—said Damodara, 2 when his herds required new and larger pastures.

Both place and time were changed, and I dwelt nearer to those parts of the universe and to those eras in history which had most attracted me. Where I lived was as far off as many a region viewed nightly by astronomers. We are wont to imagine rare and delectable places in some remote and more celestial corner of the system, behind the constellation of Cassiopeia's Chair, far from noise and disturbance. I discovered that my house actually had its site in such a withdrawn, but forever new and unprofaned, part of the universe. If it were worth the while to settle in those parts near to the Pleiades or the Hyades, 3 to Aldebaran or Altair, 4 then I was really there, or at an equal remoteness from the life which I had left behind, dwindled and twinkling with as fine a ray to my nearest neighbor, and to be seen only in moonless nights by him. Such was that part of creation where I had squatted:

&lt;sup>2</sup> a name for Krishna, a Hindoo divinity <sup>3</sup> star groups
<sup>4</sup> stars

There was a shepherd that did live,
And held his thoughts as high
As were the mounts whereon his flocks
Did hourly feed him by.

What should we think of the shepherd's life if his flocks always wandered to higher pastures than his thoughts?

Every morning was a cheerful invitation to make my life of equal simplicity, and I may say innocence, with Nature herself. I have been as sincere a worshiper of Aurora as the Greeks. I got up early and bathed in the pond: that was a religious exercise, and one of the best things which I did. They say that characters were engraven on the bathing tub of king Tching-thang to this effect: "Renew thyself completely each day; do it again, and again, and forever again." I can understand that. Morning brings back the heroic ages. I was as much affected by the faint hum of a mosquito making its invisible and unimaginable tour through my apartment at earliest dawn, when I was sitting with door and windows open, as I could be by any trumpet that ever sang of fame. It was Homer's requiem: itself an Iliad and Odyssey in the air, singing its own wrath and wanderings. There was something cosmical about it; a standing advertisement. till forbidden, of the everlasting vigor and fertility of the world. The morning, which is the most memorable season of the day, is the awakening hour. Then there is least somnolence in us; and for an hour, at least, some part of us awakes which slumbers all the rest of the day and night. Little is to be expected of that day, if it can be called a day, to which we are not awakened by our Genius, but by the mechanical nudgings of some servitor, are not awakened by our own newly-acquired force and aspirations from within, accompanied by the undulations of celestial music, instead of factory bells, and a fragrance filling the airto a higher life than we fell asleep from; and thus the darkness bear its fruit, and prove itself to be good, no less than the light. That man who does not believe that each day contains an earlier, more sacred, and auroral hour than he has yet profaned, has despaired of life, and is pursuing a descending and darkening way. After a partial cessation of his sensuous life, the soul of man, or its organs rather, are reinvigorated each day, and his Genius tries again what noble life it can make. All memorable events. I should say, transpire in morning time and in a morning atmosphere. The Vedas 1 say, "All intelligences awake with the morning." Poetry and art, and the fairest and most memorable of the actions of men, date from such an hour. All poets and heroes, like Memnon, are the children of Aurora, and emit their music at sunrise. 2 To him whose elastic and vigorous thought keeps pace with the sun. the day is a perpetual morning. It matters not what the clocks say or the attitudes and labors of men. Morning is when I am awake and there is a dawn in me. Moral reform is the effort to throw off sleep. Why is it that men give so poor an account of their day if they have not been slumbering? They are not such poor calculators. If they had not been overcome with drowsiness they would have performed something. The millions are awake enough for physical labor; but only one in a million is awake enough for effective intellectual exertion, only one in a hundred millions to a poetic or divine life. To be awake is to be alive. I have never yet met a man who was quite awake. How could I have looked him in the face?

We must learn to reawaken and keep ourselves awake, not by mechanical aids, but by an infinite expectation of the dawn, which does not forsake us in our soundest sleep. I know of no more encouraging fact than the unquestionable ability of man to elevate his life by a conscious endeavor. It is something to be able to paint a particular picture, or to carve a statue, and so to make a few objects beautiful; but it is far more glorious to carve and paint the very atmosphere and medium through which we look, which morally we can do. To affect the quality of the day, that is the highest of arts. Every man is tasked to make his life, even in its details, worthy of the contemplation of his most elevated and critical hour. If we refused, or rather used up, such paltry information as we get, the oracles would distinctly inform us how this might be done.

I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately, to front only the essential facts of life, and see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived. <sup>3</sup> I did not wish to live

Cf. Stevenson's more suavely stated but similar thought in "Aes Triplex" and "El Dorado."

These are ancient writings of India dating before 1500 B.C.

&lt;sup>2</sup> The colossal statue at Thebes, when struck by the rays of the morning sun, gave forth, it was believed, a musical sound; it was supposed to represent. Memnon, a solar hero who fought in the Troian war, who thus greeted his mother Aurora, the Dawn.

what was not life, living is so dear; nor did I wish to practice resignation, unless it was quite necessary. I wanted to live deep and suck out all the marrow of life, to live so sturdily and Spartan-like as to put to rout all that was not life, to cut a broad swath and shave close, to drive life into a corner, and reduce it to its lowest terms, and, if it proved to be mean, why then to get the whole and genuine meanness of it, and publish its meanness to the world; or if it were sublime, to know it by experience, and be able to give a true account of it in my next excursion. For most men, it appears to me, are in a strange uncertainty about it, whether it is of the devil or of God, and have somewhat hastily concluded that it is the chief end of man here to "glorify God and enjoy him forever."

Still we live meanly, like ants; though the fable tells us that we were long ago changed into men; like pygmies we fight with cranes; 1 it is error upon error, and clout upon clout, and our best virtue has for its occasion a superfluous and evitable wretchedness. life is frittered away by detail. An honest man has hardly need to count more than his ten fingers or in extreme cases he may add his ten toes, and lump the rest. Simplicity, simplicity, simplicity! I say, let your affairs be as two or three, and not a hundred or a thousand; instead of a million count half a dozen, and keep your accounts on your thumb nail. In the midst of this chopping sea of civilized life, such are the clouds and storms and quicksands and thousand-and-one items to be allowed for, that a man has to live, if he would not founder and go to the bottom and not make his port at all, by dead reckoning, and he must be a great calculator indeed who succeeds. plify, simplify. Instead of three meals a day, if it be necessary eat but one; instead of a hundred dishes, five; and reduce other things in proportion. Our life is like a German Confederacy, made up of petty states, with its boundary forever fluctuating, so that even a German cannot tell you how it is bounded at any moment. The nation itself, with all its so-called internal improvements, which, by the way are all external and superficial, is just such an unwieldy and overgrown establishment, cluttered with furniture and tripped up by its own traps, ruined by luxury and heedless expense, by want of calculation and a worthy aim, as the million households in the land; and the only cure for it as for them is in a rigid economy, a stern and more than Spartan simplicity of life and elevation of purpose. It lives too fast. Men think that it is essential that the Nation have commerce, and export ice, and talk through a telegraph, and ride thirty miles an hour, without a doubt, whether they do or not; but whether we should live like baboons or like men, is a little uncertain. If we do not get out sleepers, and forge rails, and devote days and nights to the work, but go to tinkering upon our lives to improve them, who will build railroads? And if railroads are not built, how shall we get to heaven in season? But if we stay at home and mind our business, who will want railroads? We do not ride on the railroad; it rides upon us. 2 Did you ever think what those sleepers are that underlie the railroad? Each one is a man, an Irishman, or a Yankee man. The rails are laid on them. and they are covered with sand, and the cars run smoothly over them. They are sound sleepers. I assure you. And every few years a new lot is laid down and run over; so that, if some have the pleasure of riding on a rail, others have the misfortune to be ridden upon. And when they run over a man that is walking in his sleep, a supernumary sleeper in the wrong position, and wake him up, they suddenly stop the cars, and make a hue and cry about it, as if this were an exception. I am glad to know that it takes a gang of men for every five miles to keep the sleepers down and level in their beds as it is, for this is a sign that they may sometime get up again.

Why should we live with such hurry and waste of life? We are determined to be starved before we are hungry. Men say that a stitch in time saves nine, and so they take a thousand stitches today to save nine tomorrow. As for work, we haven't any of any consequence. We have the Saint Vitus' dance, and cannot possibly keep our heads still. If I should only give a few pulls at the parish bell-rope, as for a fire, that is, without setting the bell, 3 there is hardly a man on his farm in the outskirts of Concord, notwithstanding that press of engagements which was his excuse so many times

Making it stand upside down; but any careless jerk of the rope would draw the crowd, Thoreau thought.

According to Homer, the pygmies, or dwarfs, were obliged each autumn to defend themselves against the cranes on the shores of the ocean. See Iliad, this morning, nor a boy, nor a woman, I might almost say, but would forsake all and follow that sound, not mainly to save property from the flames, but, if we will confess the truth. much more to see it burn, since burn it must, and we, be it known, did not set it on fire.or to see it put out, and have a hand in it, if that is done as handsomely; yes, even if it were the parish church itself. Hardly a man takes a half hour's nap after dinner, but when he wakes he holds up his head and asks, "What's the news?" as if the rest of mankind had stood his sentinels. Some give directions to be waked every half hour, doubtless for no other purpose; and then, to pay for it, they tell what they have dreamed. After a night's sleep the news is as indispensable as the breakfast. "Pray tell me anything new that has happened to a man anywhere on this globe."and he reads it over his coffee and rolls, that a man has had his eves gouged out this morning on the Wachito River; never dreaming the while that he lives in the dark unfathomed mammoth cave of this world, and has but the rudiment of an eve himself.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Cf. Ruskin, Fors Clavigera, Letter v. "You Enterprised a Railroad through the valley—you blasted its rock away, heaped thousands of tons of shale into its lovely stream. The valley is gone and the Gods with it; and now, every fool in Buxton can be in Bakewell in half an hour, and every fool in Bakewell at Buxton; which you think a lucrative process of exchange—you Fools Everywhere." where."

From IV. SOUNDS

